'ORFEO' PRESENTED IN CONCERT VERSION

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Frances Greer, Jane Hobson, Eleanor Link, Mary Humphrey, sopranos; Whitfield Lloyd, contralto; Charles Kullman, John McCollum, Mack Harrell, tenors; J. Alden Edkins, Marden Bate, basses, The Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, director. At Carnegie Hall.

The program consists of a concert version of Monteverdi's "Orfeo."

By OLIN DOWNES

The wonderful music of Claudio Monteverdi's first opera, "Orfeo," which had its première in 1607 at the Gonzaga Palace in Mantua, was performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society last night in Carnegie Hall for the first time here in the Respighi version. The orchestral performance was magnificent, and so was that of the Schola Cantorum, prepared for its task by its director, Hugh Ross.

There are various "realizations," reconstitutions and arrangements of the score of this opera. All of them are more or less guesses at Monteverdi's sonorous intentions. The instruments of his time are now obsolete. According to the record, he used an immense variety of them. Whether Monteverdi's instrumentation had the effect on the audiences of his time that Respighi's had upon the audience of last night is not to be known.

What we heard sounded effectively, colorfully, dramatically, if more like the orchestra of the "Pines of Rome" than the patrician quality that one imagines that Monteverdi conceived. But we heard at least the texture, and the temper too, of his music; the line of his melody, his singularly eloquent recitative, and his tone-painting, by waves of ensemble voices as well as instruments.

Use of Sustained Song

The glory of this early opera lies supremely, of course, in Monteverdi's employment of sustained song. His noble recitative is a development of the expressive medium cultivated by the Florentine gentlemen who met in Bardi's palace for the purpose of developing a song speech emulative of the declamation of the Greek drama. They were predominantly literati.

Monteverdi is inalienably the dramatic musician. His emotional climaxes are transfigured not only by musical declamation of the most distinguished sort, but by the winged flight of melody. The development of the solo song, with the new concept of the dramatic employment of instruments, and the evolution of the madrigal as an element of music-drama were the distinguishing contributions of Monteverdi to the operatic form, which in essence has remained what it was when it left this great revolutionist's hands.

Orfeo's greeting to the sun, "the source of life to all the world," is a page which thrills you today and which must have had a transfigural effect when first it fell on the ears of men, Eurydice's cry of despair, later in the opera, when the pair have misused "the power of sight" in their longing to gaze upon each other is one of the most poignant passages in classic opera. And what the instruments accomplish without words, in the orchestral epilogue upon the news of Eurydice's death, is something that only a musician of modern orchestral imagination could have conceived—we say this irrespective of whatever amount of instrumental expansion Respighe may have bestowed upon the passage.

Well Presented by Cast

The opera was sung very intelligently and earnestly by the large cast. That it was invariably sung in the manner which would fully have realized Monteverdi's spirit cannot be said. There is no need to speak of the vocal accomplishments of prominent singers who in this respect were entirely representative of their art. But what of the Italian diction? Mr. Harrell, Mr. Kullman and Mr. Edkins, the Charon and Pluto, vocalized competently enough. What was needed was more incisive and subtly colored and accented declamation.

For if there ever was music in which the tone grows out of the words and all its meanings, it is this music of Monteverdi. A purer song-speech could not be created. In the treatment of this song-speech the performance often fell short and this is especially detrimental to Monteverdi. A notable exception was Frances Greer, who does not think that vocalization is sufficient as a projection of the word from which the music sprang, although she could rest upon her skill as a singer if she wanted to.

The second part of the opera loses some of the excitement, the contrast, the sustained emotional intensity of the first. There is a great deal of beautiful recitative.

They took their operas and their literary texts more deliberately and thoughtfully in Monteverdi's time than they do today. Also, opera was then a complete novelty, and marvelous must have been the effect of a score as rich in its inspiration, independent in its expression and unbelievably novel in its exciting sounds.

Mr. Mitropoulos understood all this very well. Perhaps his reason for using the Respighi arrangement grew from his desire to give the work as much contemporaneous color and outline as possible—even if this over-italicized Monteverdi's ideas. The performance aroused great enthusiasm. The audience stayed long after the last note had sounded to make known the pleasure and profit in the occasion.

Dimitri Mitropoulos Gets a Birthday Greeting

Mr. Mitropoulos conducting as singers, who will appear in a concert version of the opera "Orfeo" to be performed under his direction by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, render Greek version of "Happy Birthday to You" yesterday. The singers, left to right, Frances Greer, soprano; Charles Kullman, tenor; Jane Hobson, mezzo, and Mack Harrell, baritone, playing a lyre

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, was surprised on his fifty-sixth birthday yesterday when singers who will appear with the Philharmonic Thursday in a concert version of Monteverdi's opera, "Orfeo," entered the conductor's hotel room bearing a lyre and singing the Greek equivalent of "Happy Birthday to You."

Mack Harrell, baritone, who will sing the role of Orpheus, carried the lyre, which was a piece of stage property and soundless. He was followed by Jane Hobson, mezzo; Frances Greer, soprano, and Charles Kullman, tenor, all of whom will appear in the opera.

Mr. Mitropoulos, who was wearing the black pull-over sweater he usually dons for rehearsals, received the singers in his room at the Great Northern Hotel, 118 W. 57th St., where he rehearsed them afterward in their roles. Monteverdi's opera is one of the first and was produced for the first time in 1607 at Mantua, Italy.

Mr. Mitropoulos was born at Athens.

MUSIC

'Orfeo'

By VIRGIL THOMSON

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
CARNEGIE HALL

"Orfeo," opera by Monteverdi, concert performance. Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor; soloists: Mack Harrell, baritone (Orfeo); Frances Greer, soprano (Eurydice); Jane Hobson, mezzo-soprano (Silvia, a Messenger, Goddess of Music, Goddess of Hope and Prosperpina); Charles Kullman, tenor (First Shepherd and Apollo); J. Alden Edkins, bass (Charon and Pluto); Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, director.

Glorious Offering

MONTEVERDI'S "Orfeo," as played and sung last night under the direction of Dmitri Mitropoulos, was another of those memorable operatic readings that this conductor has in recent seasons been offering at the Philharmonic concerts. The work itself is one of the glories of music, and its performance was a dream of musicianship. The soloists were Jane Hobson and Frances Greer, Mack Harrell, Charles Kullman and J. Alden Eakins, plus five excellent voices out of Hugh Ross's Schola Cantorum, which sang the choral parts. All were distinguished, stylish, lovely. All sang with an intensity stimulated by the music's passionate humanity and with all the perfection of phrase and tone that befits its reputation and great antiquity.

Composed in 1609, this version of the Orpheus myth is almost the oldest opera there is. Certainly its predecessors are scarcely operas in the modern sense, so like are they to mere concerts on a narrative theme. But this one is intensely expressive; it vibrates with emotion; it makes you part of it. No shadow of any commercial routine or of any "wow" technique comes between its meaning and you. And neither does the somewhat statuesque, oratorio-like pacing of it, impede communication. It is musical drama (or theater, if you prefer) at its most convincing. No opera written since has quite its immediacy of impact.

Lovely tunes it has, too, and recitative as wildly passionate as those of Schuetz or Bach. And its choruses are part of the drama. They burst out as if their words, their feelings could no longer be contained. Almost nowhere else in music is there so close a union of prosodic declamation with real melody, real harmony and picturesque counterpoint. Nor are there many works in which the severe and the florid styles are married so meaningfully.

Orchestrally speaking, all the Monteverdi operas are phoney. They have all been "restored," "reconstructed" by modern composers. For only their vocal parts are completely known. Their scores contain all the solos and choral sections, a figured bass (which defines the harmony), a few passages of detailed string writing, and the listing of the instruments originally employed. What these actually played is not known. So it must be invented. Many distinguished writers have penned scores under "Orfeo," including d'Indy, Malipiero and Orff. Last night's version was by Respighi; and very pretty it was, as well as tasteful. Certainly the Philharmonic boys shone in it, as the singers' voices did against it. It gave to these support and, by its vivid coloration, grandeur. And it evoked for us all a past time, without pedantry or vulgarity.

The singers, too, evoked a time of long ago, when women could declaim without bellowing and men sing coloratura without being comical. Jane Hobson's dignity of style and beauty of voice were impeccable. Frances Greer was loveliness itself. Mack Harrell, in the great florid air "Possente spirto," was all tenderness and persuasion. J. Alden Eakins, as Pluto, was closer to modern bass customs, but not the less impressive for that. And the duet between Mr. Harrell and Charles Kullman—Orpheus and Apollo—was the season's high moment vocally, as it is all by itself, one of the great moments of music's history. This serene, ecstatic and flowery piece followed by a chorus of joy that Handel himself could scarcely have conceived so pungently, opened the heavens. I speak not only of this version's ending to the Orpheus story, but also of its effect on at least one listener.

Rummaging 'Round New York

By Barbara E. Scott Fisher

CARNEGIE HALL WAS never more pleasantly casual. You'd never have dreamed the New York Philharmonic-Symphony was sitting for its portrait. But there it was with Dimitri Mitropoulos in his white shirt conducting the rehearsal of "Orfeo" almost three and a half centuries after its first performance, his long, slim hands seeming almost to coax the sweet strains of melody from thin air.

It was as if the musicians dissolved before his demand for their music. And while the flutes and viols sighed, one of Carnegie Hall's most fascinating audiences sketched and painted and dreamed and drew their varying conceptions of this assemblage of musicians.

It was all Dimitri Mitropoulos' idea. With his genius for neighborliness, this famous conductor stretched his slim hands across 57th Street and invited the members of the Art Students League to attend rehearsals and concerts at Carnegie Hall and paint whatever they found pleasant to the sight.

"In the past," Mitropoulos explained, "musicians and musical instruments have frequently served as subjects for the great masters. Why not perpetuate this happy tradition by furnishing today's artists—and those of the future—with an opportunity to share music as subjects for painting and sculpture. Through the eyes and ears of sensitive artists I believe we can find in music still another dimension which can be transmitted to the music and art-loving public. We anticipate that these artists will create works which provide interesting and revealing insights into the abstract and spiritual aspects of music which we—and they—hear."

AND THEY WERE at it—almost 200 strong—filling all the best seats in the orchestra, and all the boxes, painting like mad. As I peered over the shoulders of artists and sketchers, excitement welled. One young woman in red ballet slippers, a piece of sheet tied handily over her skirt, was poised before a generous canvas. To my amazement when I looked over her shoulder I saw a long slim figure holding a parasol and standing on her head.

What's this, I thought. Does music have this wind of charms? "Oh," she exclaimed. "I'm just using up an old canvas!" And, as I watched, the lady with the parasol disappeared and in its place a delightful portrait of the stage emerged where base viols and harps and drums in a series of baroque curves came to light, framed by the soft rich red of curtains against which fluttered the musicians' faces and the coaxing, wheedling fingers of the maestro.

Many of the artists seemed bent upon catching the spirit of Dimitri Mitropoulos himself, which would be just about as easy as capturing "the wind that shakes the barley." But they were all trying—in charcoal, in pastels, in pen and ink, in water color. He was the favorite subject, possibly because he was so tantalizingly elusive.

He made me think of a Basque dancer, tireless grace in motion, yet all they could account for in the paintings was the gleam of his bald head.

BUT THE PUBLIC will have an opportunity to make up its own mind as to the entente between music and the graphic arts, because from March 6 to 20 the paintings and drawings resulting from this novel experiment will be on exhibition at Carnegie Hall. The jury, which will try and make up its mind about the exhibition when it is hung, will be composed of Dr. Alfred M. Frankfurter, editor of Art News; Vernon Porter, director of the National Academy of Design; and, very appropriately, Frederick Zimmerman, double bass player in the Symphony who is evidently one of those disarming Sunday painters who succeeds famously. For Mr. Zimmerman recently had one of his paintings bought by the Richmond Museum.

Another member of the orchestra, Harold Gomberg, who plays the obo, also has fun with paints and recently had a one-man show of his works.

MITROPOULOS TAKES PODIUM FOR SZELL

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. At Carnegie Hall.
Overture, Fidelio; Symphony No. 6, Beethoven
Symphony No. 5.....Tchaikovsky

Dimitri Mitropoulos made an unexpected appearance with his own Philharmonic-Symphony last night, because of the illness of George Szell, who was to have been guest conductor. And so it was a program of standard works that greeted the ears of the Carnegie Hall audience.

The musicians probably could play this music with their eyes closed, or at least do a creditable job with no conductor at all. It is just such a program that might become routine and lack luster, but Mr. Mitropoulos would not permit it.

His tempos were always alive and flexible, so that the Tchaikovsky was played with resilience, if without the maximum amount of passion. The Beethoven Symphony emerged with luminous and effortless tone and with fine clarity of detail.

Mitropoulos Fills In for Ailing Szell

By JOHN BRIGGS

One of those recurrent crises which plague the world of music no less than other branches of the arts brought Dimitri Mitropoulos to the podium of the Philharmonic-Symphony last evening.

Mr. Mitropoulos no doubt was counting on a week off; but word came from Cleveland that George Szell was indisposed with influenza, and Mr. Mitropoulos took over.

The program which Mr. Mitropoulos put together on short notice was conventional: the overture to "Fidelio," the "Pastoral" symphony and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony.

It was the sort of program which is in the repertoire, and which so experienced an organization as the Philharmonic could get through without breaking down if you or I were on the podium.

Nevertheless, Mr. Mitropoulos managed to impart an individuality to the shopworn works played last evening which made the concert more than a routine run-through.

I was especially struck with the orchestra's playing of the "Pathetique" symphony. It is a repertoire standby. It is the sort of thing which everyone turns up his nose at.

Yet it is not an easy work to do.

I think there has not been a genuinely superlative "Pathetique" since Koussevitzky died. Mr. Toscanini has had a whirl at performing the "Pathetique," but it is an immensely sentimental work, and Mr. Toscanini, despite his almost superhuman gifts in every direction, is not a sentimental conductor.

Mr. Mitropoulos did handsomely by the Tchaikovsky work last evening. He exploited to the full the dramatic contrasts in the work. He made the most of every entrance and exit in the choirs of the orchestra. He introduced rubato with great freedom, speeding up or slowing the tempo of the music at will.

All of which resulted in a fine performance. The "Pathetique" is at its best under a conductor who disregards the explicit instructions in the score, and senses intuitively how the work should go.

The performance of the "Pastoral" symphony was a fine, cleancut rendition in the finest Philharmonic tradition. And the "Fidelio" overture got the evening's music off to a rousing start.

Altogether it was an uncommonly fine evening of music put together at short notice.

CONCERT A

The Philharmonic

By Francis D. Perkins

Had last night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall followed its original plan it would have closed operatically with the latter part of Richard Strauss's "Salome" under George Szell's direction, with three soloists from the Metropolitan. But illness prevented the Cleveland conductor from filling the first week of his final fortnight of the season with the Philharmonic, and in his stead our orchestra's regular leader, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conducted a program of three familiar works, Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and Pastoral Symphony and the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Apart from their differences in style and period, the performance of these two symphonies in one program made for an additoinal contrast in the prevailing objectivity of the Pastoral Symphony and the thorough subjectivity of the Tchaikovsky work. Their interpretations under Mr. Mitropoulos, following the brilliantly played overture, realized these differences of expressive outlook in a straightforward reading of the Beethoven work and one marked by much emotional detail, as well as nuances of tempo, in the Russian music. The Beethoven interpretation seemed to lie in a middle ground of merit—well played, with ample spirit and clarity of detail, not overlooking distinctions of mood in the composer's impressions of rural scenes, but yet not consistently evocative. On this particular evening, Tchaikovsky's music was a more communicative medium for Mr. Mitropoulos; there was a striking emotional range and thorough conviction as well as richness of sonority and vividness of instrumental color. According to a member of the Philharmonic staff, it is hoped that the excerpt from "Salome" can be given next season, if it can be fitted into the already planned 1952-'53 schedule.

Opera in Concert Form Presented by Mitropoulos

By Miles Kastendieck

Just as Dimitri Mitropoulos's concert performance of Berg's "Wozzeck" became one of the events of the Philharmonic-Symphony season last year, so his concert presentation of Monteverdi's "Orfeo" qualifies similarly this year. Turning back to the opening pages of operatic history, Mr. Mitropoulos found distinct novelty in this score. Three performances gave music lovers a singularly satisfying experience.

Whatever the historical references to the beginnings of opera, Monteverdi's "Orfeo" crystallized operatic ideas with its appearance in 1607. Conceived as a music drama complementing poetry with music in itself poetic, "Orfeo" assumes monumental proportions in later opera history. Though it became a point of departure in the following century, it now assumes its place in a true concept of opera as music drama.

Not that "Orfeo" would be too satisfactory on the lyric stage today. It is probably more suitable in a concert version. That, at least, was the impression gained from the brilliant performance it received under Mr. Mitropoulos.

The version used was that of Respighi, made in 1934. While "freely realizing" the basso continuo and using modern instrumentation, Respighi may have given the score a grandeur it could not have had originally; but he has in no way obstructed the vocal parts, which are of course the only completely known elements of the original music.

Perhaps the loveliest passages belong to the second act of Respighi's three-act version. So much genuine feeling permeates the whole, however, that the work is remarkably sustained throughout. It attains a most imposing final duet between Orfeo and Apollo and it ends with a chorus of Bacchantes, in accordance with the earliest scores.

Model of Style

With characteristic musicianship, Mr. Mitropoulos fashioned a performance which flowed smoothly and became a model of style. Mack Harrell brought his artistic sensibilities to bear on Orfeo's plight persuasively. Frances Greer sang Eurydice affectingly. Jane Hobson used her beautiful voice with some distinction as the Goddess of Music and the Goddess of Hope, as well as the messenger.

This presentation climaxed a month of concerts under the direction of Mr. Mitropoulos. In this time he introduced Leon Kirchner's Sinfonia in Two Parts, Philip Greeley Clapp's Eighth Symphony, and Dohnanyi's Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra, dedicated to and played by Frances Magnes. The Dohnanyi Concerto reflected a lifetime of composing, finding its creator quite alive and vital at 72, when he conceived it two years ago. Its rhapsodic quality, its original touches of orchestration, and its Hungarian flavor made it quite attractive to hear. Miss Magnes played it with an expertness and spirit that set her up as a most accomplished violinist, worthy of the distinction conveyed upon her by the composer.

Music and Musicians

Opera at the Philharmonic

By VIRGIL THOMSON

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS, conductor of our Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, has been offering for several years now opera productions of highest distinction which amplify the available repertory and offer musical experiences of great value. In two cases the success of these performances has stimulated elsewhere revival and production in full panoply. For it is not at all certain that Richard Strauss's "Elektra," now in repertory at the Metropolitan, and Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," presently to be shown at the City Center, would have been undertaken at this time had not their programming by Mr. Mitropoulos proved them capable of a popular appeal.

In the case of Darius Milhaud's "Les Choéphores" and Maurice Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnol" he gave us celebrated works that our regular opera establishments seemed unlikely to produce at any early date. And he has just given us an unforgettable performance of Monteverdi's "Orfeo." For next season he promises Milhaud's massive "Christophe Colomb." Perhaps, if it is not too much to hope, he might go on from there and produce the other two operas in Milhaud's trilogy on subjects from the history of our continent, "Maximilien" and "Simon Bolivar."

Repertory Suggestions

THINKING up operas one would like to hear is an agreeable pastime. Ravel's "L'Enfant et les Sortilèges" comes easily to mind. So does Honegger's "Judith." Bizet's "Djamileh," an utterly delicious score, would be a pleasure to everybody. And his newly discovered "Ivan IV" would offer at least novelty interest. Perhaps The Little Orchestra Society, which has been giving eighteenth-century operas for some time and which will produce shortly Bizet's "Les Pecheurs de Perles," might find the new Bizet work appropriate for its concerts. Either this orchestra or the Philharmonic could give us without difficulty Fauré's "Pénélope." Really there is no end to the list of operas that could be put on in concert form by our orchestras. Even Toscanini's celebrated opera broadcasts with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra, though they have not enlarged much the repertory already available, have been interesting to us all as models of pacing; and they did offer once a relative novelty, Paul Dukas's "Ariane et Barbe-Bleu."

Respighi's "Restorations"

THE recent performances of Monteverdi's "Orfeo" by the Philharmonic have been a grand experience. This tender and passionate work has long been known by name to many, and a few have examined its printed score. But the full beauty of it was a surprise even to those who thought they knew it. And the good taste of Respighi's "Restoration" of the orchestral score turned out to be a pleasure too. A musicological restoration, of which several are available, would surely have offered a less vivid effect in exchange for historical observances of problematic authenticity and more than problematic communicative power. Respighi's version brought out the intense expressivity of the solo and choral parts, backed them up with an orchestral accompaniment of a breadth appropriate to modern concert halls. It evoked the orchestral practices of Monteverdi without pretending to reproduce them literally.

A Metropoulos Production

MR. MITROPOULOS, by seating his chorus in four sections, each independently sonorous, and by placing his soloists both at the center and at the two extreme ends of the down-stage, gave a semblance of staging to the performance without overstepping concert dignities. Indeed, the singers standing on platforms at the two sides and working in half-profile, gave dramatic expression by the simplest of means and added to the musical composition a spatial amplitude that evoked the theater. With a chorus in four sections at the back-stage and soloists in three placements down front, the orchestra was bracketed by a complex antiphony of voices that was enabled by this mere fact to dominate the reading, just as their possession of the stage enables the vocal forces in an opera house to dominate dramatically even the largest orchestra playing from a pit.

Neat but effective seating arrangements like this and slight variations on the clothes of concert custom have long enabled Mr. Mitropoulos to suggest the theater, to give meaning in concert to the music of the theater. Both acoustically and expressively his visual treatment of "Orfeo" seemed to me advantageous. Musically the performance, as reviewers reported at the time, was perfection itself. This correspondent was not the only one who found it pure heaven. And in remembering its beauties, the impeccable work of the conductor and his orchestra and of Hugh Ross's chorus from the Schola Cantorum, handsome as it was, overshadows not at all the lovely singing of Jane Hobson and Frances Greer, of J. Alden Edkins, Charles Kullman and that prince among vocal artists, Mack Harrell.

Mitropoulos and Orfeo

Leader Lends New Beauty To an Operatic Masterwork

By Paul Hume

LAST WEEK in New York City, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted three performances of Claudio Monteverdi's magnificent opera, Orfeo.

With a chorus of 62, and five soloists, Mitropoulis, using the Respighi orchestration for the seventeenth century music, produced another in a series of compelling concert versions of operas for which he is becoming increasingly famous.

There is a substantial audience, both critical and lay, that is not universally sympathetic to Mitropoulos as a conductor of the standard symphonic repertoire. But there are few who are not entirely convinced every time he presents his knowledgeable, masterly account of some operatic masterwork.

In such affairs, Mitropoulos supervises every detail of the performance. The resulting harmony of intention, based on his theatrical flair and his intellectual musicality, is of rare distinction. His repertoire in this field so far has included both Salome and Elektra of Strauss, Ravel's champagne score, L'Heure Espagnole, Busoni's Arlecchino, Les Choephores (a part of the Milhaud "Orestes" trilogy), Alban Berg's Wozzeck (reviewed in today's Record Player), and Orfeo.

A DESCRIPTION of some of the salient features of the Monteverdi will illustrate something of the way Mitropoulos achieves his successes in this increasing area of symphonic presentation.

The mere physical placement of the soloists on the stage is arranged to suggest their relative roles in the work at hand. For act one of Orfeo, Euridice was seated next to her husband. Frances Greer, singing the part, was dressed in a bridal gown, and at an appropriate moment in the duet with Orfeo, her husband, sung magnificently by Mack Harrell, reached across and covered her face with a veil.

Jane Hobson, singing variously as the Spirit of Music, a Messenger of Fate, and as Hope, sang from stage right. But during her fateful message of the death of Euridice, she advanced through the orchestra, while singing, to stand next to Orfeo as he received the news.

And he, sinking down to his seat, as if crushed by what he had heard, remained seated while singing of his grief, rising at that dramatic point where he defies the fates and determines to go to the underworld to bring back his dead Euridice.

SUCH DETAILS extended even to the chorus, drawn from the Schola Cantorum. Controlling their expert singing with the utmost shading, Mitropoulos, at one point, had the chorus rise while singing a chord. The effect, upon both word and tone quality, was precisely the startling sound intended by the text and music at that moment.

In later acts, J. Aldin Edkins, singing the deep bass roles of Charon and Pluto, sang from stage left, while Charles Kullman, as Apollo, come to take Orfeo to heaven, was centered in a spotlight on stage right, remaining there even while singing a complex and florid duet with the baritone in stage center.

Euridice's final lines, in act three, sung from the side of the stage, showed her in a fading light, as her voice grew fainter and fainter. But the light was intensified on both Orfeo and Apollo as they gazed upward toward that heaven to which they ascended.

WITH THESE and similar, countless appropriate touches, Mitropoulos made vivid and moving a score of such glowing beauty and astounding stature as to bring to life for us, with no props, no scenery, and no costumes, against a bare background of instruments, players, and chorus, one of the oldest operas in existence.

We, in Washington, have no opera house. We will welcome the forthcoming visit of the Metropolitan, as we have that of the Sadler's Wells Theater Ballet, in the Capitol Theater.

But in the meantime, might not our National Symphony essay what almost every major orchestra in the country has now made a regular part of their seasons, the presentation, in concert form, of some opera score with particular symphonic glories? Immediate suggestions from Mozart through Meyerbeer, Spontini, Verdi, Wagner, Strauss, Puccini, and a dozen others fill our minds. New York's musical audience was greatly moved by last week's Orfeo. Washington could easily share a similiar experience.

PICTORIAL REVIEW—Mar. 2, 1952

MUSIC -:- By Miles Kastendieck

WHEN Mitropoulos presented Monteverdi's "Orfeo" with the Philharmonic-Symphony last week he stirred up several pages of operatic history. The most obvious, of course, was the fact that opera really began with "Orfeo" in 1607. Historically, Peri's "Euridice", (1600), represents the earliest opera extant, but "Orfeo" crystallizes the ideas of Monteverdi's predecessors. It stands full-blown, a lonely masterpiece right at the start.

What Monteverdi achieved was to bring emotion into the form of musical drama current among the Florentines. In doing so, he shifted emphasis on an aristocratic spectacle to a realization of what might well be called modern music drama. Unfortunately a century later opera became side-tracked to emphasize vocal display. That influence has persisted to the present day. Its chief results were to stem the flow of dramatic action and to place performers in the spotlight.

When opera turned to showing off the voice, the original idea of opera as theater no longer had the same meaning for composers. Gluck made great efforts to reform the trend without too conspicuous success. Only Mozart's genius kept him from falling into the routine.

The significant page of history recalled by the performance of "Orfeo" was the Florentine's original concept. Operatic performance to them meant the synthesis of impression created not only by the poetry and the music but also by the scenery and the production as a whole. Certainly the singing was by no means the dominating factor. Not even the music itself assumed first position, though we know now that it is the musical score which gives operas their enduring value.

Today more emphasis is being placed on the production elements of operatic performance. Both City Center Opera and Metropolitan Opera recognize the theater aspect. Thus operatic performance is returning to the direct line of its origins.

Therefore as this "new interest" rises from demands of the times and present-day audiences, it is important for people to realize that stage directors and musical directors may contribute as much to a performance as singers. Recalling the beginnings of opera, we may justly re-evaluate our whole approach, realizing how far we may have gone afield. Rudolf Bing's contributions at the Metropolitan must be considered not only in the right direction but basically correct.

The Record Player—

Berg: Wozzeck. New York Philharmonic under Mitropoulos, with soloists Harrell and Farrell, Jagel, Eustis, and others, plus adult and children's chorus. Columbia SL 118. $11.57.

Through phonograph recordings we are able to become familiar with masterpieces whose problems of varying kinds prevent our hearing them often enough in live performances. Such a case is illustrated in this release of Alban Berg's great opera, Wozzeck. This recording was put together from the best of three actual performances in New York last year. The final result is tremendous.

Wozzeck, long neglected in this country, is being staged in New York by the City Center Opera this spring, in its second American staged version. It has been given often in Europe, especially during recent years, but has for 20 years been a steady visitor to some of the leading houses.

With the great singing of almost every soloist in this set, and above all that the colossal accomplishment of Dimitri Mitropoulos in giving the music such cogency and dramatic power, the music comes to life in an understandable way. If you can hear it with a score, fine. If not, the notes and text furnished with the set will give you what you need. Give the music a chance. Few of those who packed the three New York performances (many of whom came full of skepticism) went away with anything but a profoundly rooted belief that they had heard a great work.

Profits from the recording go to the orchestra's pension fund. This is a great, a historic, set, and a mature, adult record collection will include it.

PHILHARMONIC AIDS 'WEDDING' OF ARTS

Permission to Student Group to Sketch Musicians at Work Brings Prizes to Three

The musicians of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony were seen at work yesterday in paintings done by students of the Art Students League who were invited a few weeks ago to "do" the orchestra at rehearsal. The results of their work were put on display in the Carnegie Hall Art Gallery, which also is Carnegie Hall's refreshment room. The 100 or more pictures that lined the walls, a fraction of the work that was completed through about two weeks of rehearsals, won high praise from artists and other guests who thronged the gallery.

One of the guests at the opening was Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the Philharmonic, who initiated the experiment in an unexpected departure from the usual ban of "no admittance" at rehearsals.

Probably no orchestra has been painted so exhaustively as the Philharmonic—or its director, who was the commanding figure in most of the paintings, and in many cases the only one. The orchestra appeared as a whole and in fragments, and the musicians singly in a wide variety of poses.

Three prizes were awarded. The first, a set of all the recordings of the Philharmonic, contributed by Columbia Records, went to Walter H. Uhle for a series of twenty-two pen-and-ink drawings of the musicians.

The second prize, $100, contributed by Ralph F. Colin and David M. Keiser, Philharmonic board members, was won by Sava Morgan for her pastel, "Eroica." Mrs. Morgan, who had her hair fixed for the ceremony of the marriage of the arts, because she didn't want to put in her "usual messy appearance," studies at the league mornings, runs a medical laboratory in Jackson Heights and takes care of her three children.

Artists for the Eye and Ear

The third prize winner, who received $50, contributed by an anonymous Philharmonic board member, was La Verne Ray, whose work, a glimpse of the orchestra, was titled, "Carnegie Hall."

Another picture, which Mr. Mitropoulos looked at long, was a boldly blocked-out portrait of him conducting, painted by Willard Bond who caught a side and rear view. The maestro shook his head, and said: "This should have won a prize. That is my back."

On Feb. 13 last almost 100 persons had used pencils, crayons, paints, brushes, papers and canvas to depict the orchestra in rehearsal.

On that first day of the experiment painter and musician had sat side by side, one creating for the eye, the other for the ear. The hall was swarming with artists—in orchestra and box seats, in the wings, atop piano and organ.

Mr. Mitropoulos had said then that he believed "we can find in music still another dimension which can be transmitted to the music and art-loving public through the eyes and ears of sensitive artists."

Prices for the works, ranging from $2 for the smaller pen and ink sketches up to $300 for the larger canvases in oil, made it possible for orchestra members who had served as models to buy many of them while the exhibit was being hung.

The jurors were Fred Zimmerman, who is a double bass player in the orchestra and an artist; Aline Louchheim, associate art editor of THE NEW YORK TIMES; Vernon Porter, director of the National Academy of Design, and Dorothy Seckler, art critic of Art News.

The paintings and sketches will be on view through March 20.

DRUMS OF YONKERS TO BEAT IN GREECE

Four of Kettle Type Are Being Made by Goodman, Chief of Philharmonic Battery

By IRVING SPIEGEL

Give Saul Goodman a set of kettle drums, or just mention them, and he will give you a scholarly dissertation on tympani, their history, musical literature and their intrinsic value to a symphonic ensemble. And his colleagues, pupils and authority will avow that you can find little fault with his thesis.

Mr. Goodman began beating the drums at the age of 11 in a Boy Scout drum and bugle corps in his native Brooklyn — and hasn't stopped since. For the last twenty-six years the chunky 44-year-old drummer has been the star tympanist and head of the percussion section of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra.

And if that isn't enough, Mr. Goodman manufactures his own drums in Yonkers—where he lives with his wife—is a member of the faculty of the Juilliard School of Music, the author of books on tympani, and a composer. It might be noted that two of his former Juilliard pupils, Walter Rosenberger and Elden Bailey, are members of the Philharmonic's percussion section and that several former students of his are now playing with outstanding symphonic orchestras.

Drums for Athenians

Without a trace of false modesty, he will tell you that his proudest accomplishment is his invention of a chain-tuning device for kettledrums—now employed by the National Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra and the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. He explains that the chain circles the kettledrums and the drummer is able to manipulate the attached "screw" that tightens and loosens the skin to the desired note. The "endless" chain device also has increased the range of the kettledrums from one octave to an octave and one-half, giving the drums greater sonority and wider range.

Right now the enterprising Mr. Goodman is hard at work on a set of four kettledrums, with chain tuning device, of course, that has been commissioned by Dimitri Mitropoulos, the prominent conductor. The drums will be shipped to Athens to replace those lost in World War II by the Athens Conservatory and its orchestra.

Mr. Goodman will tell you that the kettledrums are "sensitive little monsters"—subject to all kinds of atmospheric conditions, such as temperature variations in the hall, air conditioning, the heat from stage lighting that can alter the drums' pitch. He will tell you that extreme dampness lowers the pitch and causes the drums to go flat. It might be noted at this point that Drummer Goodman instantaneously can hear the slightest departure from pitch—and act accordingly.

He can play every one of the percussion instruments — and the list is long.

"I suppose," he says, "I'm like a doctor who decided to get rid of general practice and go for a specialty—well, it's the kettledrums."

With sharp emphasis, he avows that "the kettledrums have dynamic power, subtleties of tone and effect."

For musician Goodman the great moments in a tympanist's career are the scherzo of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony or the funeral march from Wagner's opera "Die Goetterdaemmerung," where the kettledrums set the tempo and create the atmosphere of the tragic score.

Then somewhat ruefully, Mr. Goodman wanted it known that Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" did nothing to advance the career of the percussion specialist.

"The poor drummer sits through four movements and plays eight easy bars at the end of the work," the tympanist related.

The Goodman career did not begin until he was 14, when he chanced to pass Brooklyn Commercial High School and heard the old New York Philharmonic playing a concert. The principal work was Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, which includes a colorful tympani part. The undaunted youth waited his moment, accosted Alfred Friese, the orchestra's tympanist, and requested lessons.

The youngster displayed the attributes of a drummer—a natural sense of rhythm, a perfect musical ear and a keen memory. He was accepted as a student. At the age of 19 Saul Goodman became head of the Philharmonic's percussion section when his former teacher retired.

Mitropoulos Is Praised On 'La Mer'

DEBUSSY'S "LA MER" AND "IBERIA" (IMAGES. SET III NO. 2)—New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, and the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy. Columbia.

One of the most highly-regarded impressonistic scores ever written, Debussy's "La Mer" is given a skillful reading by Mitropoulos in this long-play recording. Mitropoulos, who didn't require nearly as much time as Toscanini to wax the work, nonetheless captures the restlessness, fury and frivolity of the sea in admirable manner.

Philharmonic-Symphony

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra gave the second of this season's special concerts for Philharmonic-Symphony Society members at the Grand Ballroom of the Hotel Plaza last night. Franco Autori conducted, and the feature of the evening was the appearance of Dimitri Mitropoulos, the orchestra's regular conductor, as soloist in Respighi's toccata for piano and orchestra, which was given its world premiere by the Philharmonic twenty-three years ago.

According to Respighi's program notes for the first performance, the work is based roughly on the old form of the toccata as found in Frescobaldi. This relationship is formal only, since "the real juice of the piece comes from the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries: full, rich Romantic harmonies and a few turns of modal melody. There is plenty of good, solid satisfying noise, especially from the piano, the louder the better, and Mr. Mitropoulos's pianism was exactly suitable. In fact, so resplendent was his performance and so lively and exuberant, that one wonders if happy musicianship in the solo part last night was responsible for making the work go rather than its own intrinsic nature.

Mr. Autori and the orchestra matched the Maestro's performance with enthusiasm. The program also listed Giovanni Battista Sammartini's Sinfonia No. 3, Debussy's "Petite Suite" in Busser's orchestration, and the "Gold and Silver" Waltz of Lehar.

Mitropoulos at Piano As Autori Wields Baton

Franco Autori, associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, led sixty members of that orchestra last night in a special concert for members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York at the Hotel Plaza. The surprise of the evening was the assisting artist, a pianist by the name of Dimitri Mitropoulos.

Mr. Mitropoulos, the orchestra's musical director, modestly played under the leadership of his subordinate in Resphighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra. It meant the program preserved the tradition of these special events in drawing its soloists from among the orchestra's personnel.

Sammartini's Symphony No. 3, Debussy's Petite Suite and Lehar's "Gold and Silver" Waltz completed the program.

Informal Philharmonic

The Philharmonic-Symphony last evening played a concert for members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society in the impressively baroque ballroom of the Plaza.

When the Philharmonic plays for members the atmosphere is cheerfully informal. One steps off the elevator to the sound of violinists warming up their instruments, and in the foyer is the Philharmonic's musical director, Dimitri Mitropoulos, smoking a final pre-concert cigaret as he welcomes members of the society.

One of Mr. Mitropoulos' most agreeable traits is that he is a celebrated conductor who is not in the least impressed by his own celebrity. So far as I can discover he is not a conductor first, last and always, but a musician whose talents and interests have led him toward conducting.

Mr. Mitropoulos, for example, has taken an interest in and participated in concerts of the Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble, composed of members of the orchestra. Since such events bring in little cash or fame, one can only conclude Mr. Mitropoulos is interested in music for its own sake, rather than as a medium for personal display.

Last night Mr. Mitropoulos turned over the baton to Franco Autori, the orchestra's associate conductor, and was billed as "assisting artist: Dimitri Mitropoulos, pianist." The assisting artist played the solo part in Respighi's fiendishly difficult Toccata for Piano and Orchestra. It was a remarkable exhibition of piano-playing from someone who does not work at it. The Toccata consists of a massive piano part against a cloudy orchestral background. Making the piano sound is an heroic task. Mr. Mitropoulos accomplished this with immense vigor and gusto. His playing suggested that an excellent pianist was lost when he took up the baton.

Mr. Autori and the orchestra gave an excellent account of themselves in the Sinfonia No. 3 of G. B. Sammartini, Debussy's "Petite Suite" and Lehar's "Gold and Silver" Waltz. The evening as a whole was a pleasant dividend for one's membership in the society.

CARNEGIE HALL

Conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos; soloist, Leonard Rose, cellist. The program: Overture to "Beatrice and Benedict".....Berlioz
Verklaerte Nach (Transfigured Night), for strings.....Schoenberg
Cello Concerto in B minor, Op. 104.....Dvorak
Dances from Galanta.....Kodaly

Leonard Rose, who was the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's first cellist for the last seven years, was heard with his former colleagues last night as guest soloist in Antonin Dvorak's concerto in B minor. This followed another romantic work composed in the 1890s, the late Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht"; the overture to Berlioz' last opera, "Beatrice and Benedict" and Zoltan Kodaly's "Dances from Galanta," completed the consistently melodious program conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos.

"Verklaerte Nacht," not typical of the Schoenberg who is a significant and controversial figure in musical history, is probably his most often played instrumental work; its character, which suggests the influence of Wagner's music and particularly of "Tristan," yet has a distinct individuality of its own. The interpretation under Mr. Mitropoulos was emotionally revealing; the orchestral sound was ingratiating, although the instrumental balance sometimes seemed slightly unbalanced in the violins' favor. The translation from the original scoring for string sextet to the full string orchestra, with a possible gain in expressive climaxes, may have militated against entire clarity of detail.

The early Schoenberg work, with much eloquence and imagination, also has its longuerurs; there is also an occasional sense of lengthiness in the Dvorak concerto, despite the appeal of its melodies and the color and effectiveness of its scoring, both for the solo cello and the orchestra; the sequence of these two works in this program probably emphasized the impression of extensiveness. Mr. Rose displayed the technical mastery and ingratiating quality of tone which were expected from him in a musicianly and sympathic interpretation. Its expressive scope had its limits; communication of mood was greatest in the music's many sustained lyric episodes, which were presented with a liberal range and memorable warmth of tonal hue. The orchestral accompaniment, vigorous and outspoken in the tutti, was dynamically well balanced, and unity of interpretative conception marked the joint performance.

Mitropoulos Returns to Philharmonic; Rose Soloist in Dvorak 'Cello Concerto

Dimitri Mitropoulos returned to Carnegie Hall last night to conduct the last four weeks of the Philharmonic-Symphony's current season. Appearing as soloist was Leonard Rose, former first 'cellist of the orchestra, who is now concentrating on a solo career. Between them, they managed to give us an evening of top-flight music-making.

Mr. Mitropoulos opened the proceedings with a refreshing reading of the overture to Berlioz' opera, "Beatrice and Benedict," after which the string section of the orchestra was heard in the late Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" ("Transfigured Night"). One would not call the conductor's interpretation of the latter work a particularly orthodox one. It was considerably more dramatic and excited than most performances we remember. Nevertheless, it had validity and unity, and many of its sensuous qualities were preserved, so that altogether it was a satisfying experience.

Warmth and Pathos

The concert reached its artistic climax with Mr. Rose's performance of the Dvorak 'Cello Concerto in B Minor. We have heard this work on numerous occasions as played by Mr. Rose and other prominent 'cellists, but never has it emerged with such warmth of tone and such a revelation of its hidden pathos.

Most performers prefer to make of this concerto a brilliant—if somewhat sombre—showpiece, giving it a bravura treatment with a certain tonal bite. Mr. Rose, however, was not interested in mere display; he chose to bring out the full meaning of the music, the yearning, searching phrases in which the concerto abounds. Consequently, some of the tempi were a bit slower than we are accustomed to, but the resulting beauty and expressiveness of every line was more than ample compensation. We don't ever recall having been so affected by a rendition of this work.

Memorable Impression

Conductor and orchestra were completely en rapport with the soloist, making the total impression a truly memorable and deeply moving one. At the end there was prolonged applause for everyone concerned.

But that wasn't all. Mr. Mitropoulos then rounded out the program with a reading of Kodaly's "Dances From Galanta" that was entirely in the vein—"full of high spirits and goulash," to quote Dr. Falke's words from the second act of "Die Fledermaus." While listening to it, one could easily imagine that it was being directed not by a Greek but by a Hungarian.

Our Own Philharmonic Does Itself Proud

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Everybody co-operated to inscribe last night's Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall on the season's honor roll of symphonic treats.

Dimitri Mitropoulos was back on the stand to conduct with a fire and intensity that made every number listed sound as if it were hot off the griddle.

Leonard Rose, who recently graduated from first Philharmonic 'cellist to solo careerist, played as he never played before—which means several strides ahead of almost any other 'cellist you might name.

A Touch of Local Pride.

And the orchestra performed like one big soloist in its own right. I like the Boston and I like the Philadelphia Orchestra, and I also have a soft spot for the NBC Symphony. But I feel a special pride in the city's name band.

Last night it performed Berlioz and Schoenberg and Dvorak and Kodaly as if they were recent discoveries. There was excitement in Berlioz's "Beatrice and Benedict" overture, and high tension in Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht."

That fantastic masterpiece of Schoenberg's seemed to be a favorite of everbody's last night—of the orchestra, of the audience and particularly of Mr. Mitropoulos. It was easy to see why.

The Performance Sings.

The music swirled in warm crescendos of feeling. It seemed a greater pity than ever that Schoenberg swerved from the main highway of music to wander into the wastelands of atonality.

The performance sang all through. Mr. Mitropoulos was determined to leave the score in everyone's memory as one of the season's crowning moments. He made the strings sound like so many voices of chanting anguish. Dvorak should have been around last night to hear his 'cello concerto come to new life in the playing of Mr. Rose.

One never thought of the young man as a 'cellist—he was more like a poet voicing memories of a beautiful experience and using a little music to help him.

Philharmonic

Mitropoulos returned to the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. His program featured Schoenberg's "Transfigured Night" and the Dvorak cello concerto with Leonard Rose as soloist. Hearing Rose was a treat. He has grown in stature during the last year. He made the cello sing with a richer tone and he played it with greater skill. Expressively, his playing sounded freer. Mitropoulos and the orchestra gave him excellent support.

ROSE IS SOLOIST FOR PHILHARMONIC

'Cellist Plays Concerto by Dvorak, Schoenberg Work in Second Appearance

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. 'Cello soloist, Leonard Rose. At Carnegie Hall.
Beatrice and Benedict Overture.....Berlioz
Verklaerte Nacht.....Schoenberg
'Cello Concerto.....Dvorak
Dances from Galanta.....Kodaly

Making his second appearance of the season with the Philharmonic-Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall, Leonard Rose, the former first 'cellist of the orchestra, chose the fine Dvorak concerto to reveal once more his superior powers as musician and executant.

Mr. Rose, it will be no news to anyone, is one of the best instrumentalists around. He commands a noble tone, and he is able to keep the 'cello from sounding like a carton of especially heavy molasses. In lyric passages, indeed, he is virtually unsurpassed. His intonation, too, is generally perfect, and so it was last night, aside from a brief but unhappy series of octaves in the first movement.

He even kept the final coda from dissolving, and that is a real feat. Dvorak made one miscalculation in this concerto. He dragged out the concluding measures of the finale to a point where they just about swoon, and it needs a canny combination of rhythmic justness and a pure melodic attack to keep the section alive.

Mr. Mitropoulos supplied his usual well-integrated accompaniment, give or take a few passages. In the Schoenberg "Verklaerte Nacht," where the string section is put on display, the results were always intelligent—excellent balances, immediate responses and the utmost textual fidelity to the score.

Whether the music emerged in all its tonal values, though, is another question. Mr. Mitropoulos is not overly interested in producing a sensuous or luminous tone from his string section; and "Verklaerte Nacht" is nothing if not post-romantic, sentimental Wagnerianism. It demands a luxurious tone; whereas, last night, there was sometimes an actual touch of shrillness to the strings.

But Mr. Mitropoulos was looking for other things in the score, and his interpretation was perfectly in line with his basic premise of restraint rather than abandon. There was a thoroughly free approach, however, to the opening "Beatrice and Benedict," conducted with an engaging rhythmic force.

WORDS and MUSIC

Romantic Program at Carnegie

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who musically is of a romantic turn of mind, gave an excellent account of himself in a program of romantic music with the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall last evening.

There was to begin with the Dvorak Cello Concerto, with Leonard Rose as soloist. Mr. Mitropoulos and Mr. Rose saw eye to eye on the proper manner of performing this work, which was brilliantly and with immense gusto. It is a showpiece, and a very effective one. That was the spirit in which it was played last evening.

Mr. Rose is one of the best cellists around today. His technique is sure-fingered. His playing last evening was for the most part deft, clean and precise. Some of the double-stops toward the close of the first movement were too much even for Mr. Rose, but I cannot take this as altogether an indictment of his playing, since I have never heard anyone play them in tune, either. Mr. Rose's tone is fine, brilliant, nervous and commendably free of the lugubrious quality which makes the cello in unskilled hands one of the most dismal of solo instruments. It was another triumph for Mr. Rose, recently graduated from the Philharmonic's first cello desk.

Earlier Mr. Mitropoulos had led the orchestra in a carefully-rehearsed and admirably effective performance of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht." One can imagine Schoenberg turning his back on this youthful work with the reflection that, though beautiful, it had all been said in much the same way by Chausson, Cesar Franck, Delius and Strauss in his early tone-poems, but though Schoenberg repudiated this particular idom, "Verklaerte Nacht" remains a charming highlight of post-Wagnerian romanticism.

The evening's music began with a lively reading of Berlioz' pleasant, Rossinian overture to "Beatrice and Benedict," and closed with Kodaly's "Dances From Galanta."

Cello Concerto in B minor, Op. 104.....Dvorak
Dances from Galanta.....Kodaly

Leonard Rose, who was the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's first cellist for the last seven years, was heard with his former colleagues last night as guest soloist in Antonin Dvorak's concerto in B minor. This followed another romantic work composed in the 1890s, the late Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht"; the overture to Berlioz' last opera, "Beatrice and Benedict" and Zoltan Kodaly's "Dances from Galanta," completed the consistently melodious program conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos.

"Verklaerte Nacht," not typical of the Schoenberg who is a significant and controversial figure in musical history, is probably his most often played instrumental work; its character, which suggests the influence of Wagner's music and particularly of "Tristan," yet has a distinct individuality of its own. The interpretation under Mr. Mitropoulos was emotionally revealing; the orchestral sound was ingratiating, although the instrumental balance sometimes seemed slightly unbalanced in the violins' favor. The translation from the original scoring for string sextet to the full string orchestra, with a possible gain in expressive climaxes, may have militated against entire clarity of detail.

The early Schoenberg work, with much eloquence and imagination, also has its longuerurs; there is also an occasional sense of lengthiness in the Dvorak concerto, despite the appeal of its melodies and the color and effectiveness of its scoring, both for the solo cello and the orchestra; the sequence of these two works in this program probably emphasized the impression of extensiveness. Mr. Rose displayed the technical mastery and ingratiating quality of tone which were expected from him in a musicianly and sympathic interpretation. Its expressive scope had its limits; communication of mood was greatest in the music's many sustained lyric episodes, which were presented with a liberal range and memorable warmth of tonal hue. The orchestral accompaniment, vigorous and outspoken in the tutti, was dynamically well balanced, and unity of interpretative conception marked the joint performance.

This is the concert version of Alban Berg's unique opera which was prepared by Mitropoulos for the New York Philharmonic and broadcast at that time, the recording of which is being sold for the benefit of the Philharmonic's pension fund. It is a superb realization of one of the most influential scores of modern times and it is altogether remarkable how gripping and dramatic the music is even without the benefit of stage action or scenic effects. LEVANT IS SOLOIST FOR PHILHARMONIC

Pianist Plays Rubinstein's D Minor Concerto at Carnegie —Gould's 'Legend' Heard

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos. Piano soloist, Oscar Levant. At Carnegie Hall.
Beatrice and Benedict Overture.....Berlioz
Piano Concerto No. 4 in D minor.:Rubinstein
Fall River Legend (first New York concert performance).....Gould
Dances from Galanta.....Kodaly

It has been a long time since the old Rubinstein D minor has turned up in this city. Josef Hofmann made a specialty of it (he had studied with the composer) but, in the last generation, he was virtually its sole exponent, although isolated performances did crop up here and there. This listener never expected to hear it again in concert, and was agreeably surprised when Oscar Levant resurrected it with the Philharmonic on Saturday evening.

The concerto is a period piece, though a fine one of its kind, even if it is marred by a hopelessly dated slow movement. The first movement is an uncomplicated, almost noble, conception; the last is a typical virtuoso splash. As in all the virtuoso concertos of that time, the piano writing is exceedingly idiomatic and brilliant. Not as difficult as it sounds, either.

Mr. Levant sparred a bit with the opening measures, and then went in swinging. One admired his objectives, much as one might have welcomed a less percussive and choppy style. And Mr. Levant's curious notions about the first-movement cadenza (while indisputably his own, did not contain the note values that Rubinstein composed. Granted that the concerto is a showpiece; but a pianist with more breadth and sympathy for the period might have transcended the purely digital aspects of the music.

Morton Gould's "Fall River Legend" has been familiar to ballet-goers for a few years. It was originally produced by Ballet Theatre to choreography by Agnes de Mille that revolved around the Lizzie Borden murder case. Mr. Gould's able, eclectic score was a fine complement to Miss de Mille's equally eclectic choreography.

Heard on its own, last Saturday, it sounded a little bare. One was overly conscious of the Copland-isms in it, and the general impression was that of a fine craftsman rather than a really creative figure. The orchestration, with all of Mr. Gould's considerable resource, was one of the best things about "Fall River Legend."

CONCERT

The Philharmonic

By Francis D. Perkins

Morton Gould's concert suite from his score for Agnes de Mille's ballet, "Fall River Legend," first produced here by Ballet Theater four years ago, had its first New York performance Saturday night by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

The program conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos also offered a piano concerto once in the standard list but now seldom heard, the one by Anton Rubinstein in D minor, with Oscar Levant as the soloist.

For the seven sections of his suite, Mr. Gould has taken more of the set dance sections than of the dramatic sequences, and thus the intent of the music can be readily discerned with the aid of a short summary of the scenario which is based on the still memorable Lizzie Borden murders in the Massachusetts city. With some derivative episodes, the suite seemed expressively communicative, and suggested, according to the composer's realized intention, the atmosphere and idiom of New England hymn tunes and dances of the period of the story.

Rubinstein's D minor concerto has long been associated here with the composer's noted student, Josef Hofmann; it has not been played for nearly fourteen years, and it is longer than this since it was last played here by a major orchestra. It suggests a blend of Russian influences of Rubinstein's time, giving some interesting anticipations of the idiom of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor concerto, and of influences from Liszt and from romantic German composers. The first movement is the strongest and most forward-looking; the second has a rather diffuse melodic appeal, but less musical profile; the finale, despite its suggestions of Russian folk music, seemed to have a Mendelssohnian, rather than a Slavic, liveliness. Mr. Levant, in good technical form, was also generally successful in conveying the moods and the romantic atmosphere of the music to his hearers, particularly in its most proclamative episodes, where there were imposing volume and sonority without hardness of tone.

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY

CARNEGIE HALL

Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Soloist, Robert Casadesus, pianist. The program: Brandenburg Concerto, No. 1, in F major.Bach
Suite for Orchestra, No. 2, in B-flat major .Casadesus
Piano Concerto, No. 2, in B-flat major.Brahms

The touch of spring that is now in the air drifted appropriately through the Philharmonic-Symphony program last night in Carnegie Hall. The list assembled by Dimitri Mitropoulos had a cool and refreshing beginning in Bach's "Brandenburg" Concerto, No. 1, and from that point on Robert Casadesus became the central figure of the evening, first as composer of a Suite for Orchestra, which had all the lightweight quality of music to be heard in the park, and then as piano soloist in the Brahms Second Concerto, in which he placed emphasis on the most pastel shades with his lovely, limpid tone.

One of the most completely satisfying points of the evening was the fourth movement of the Bach, in which Mr. Mitropoulos maintained a leisurely pace allowing the winds of the orchestra to go through their prominent roles with exceptional brightness and finish. The Second Suite of Mr. Casadesus, which had its first performance anywhere, is written with thorough professional grasp of the orchestra in a fairly eclectic, though predominantly French style. Here, too, the Philharmonic could prove its mettle as a group. The innocuous air of divertimento is somewhat related to the manner of Ibert. The music roams up and down scales quite a bit, and does not probe very deeply. By the mere fact of having written a fairly respectable orchestral work Mr. Casadesus demonstrates, however, that he has a certain breadth as a musician.

Even if his interpretation of the Brahms was somewhat mild at climaxes, that breadth, and a certain dignity, as a musician made itself felt in his approach. The chief pleasure of last night's performance derived from the blending of piano and orchestra, so that the work could be appreciated for its symphonic character. Mr. Mitropoulos followed the solo part with complete awareness of all its problems, and as if he himself were playing. The pianist, for his part, avoided the brutality that may easily enter into performances of a Brahms concerto and he did not drag the Andante. Some of the passage-work was, however, not too cleanly executed and one could take exception to his idea of some of its character.

CASADESUS SOLOIST; HIS SUITE IS HEARD

Philharmonic Plays Orchestral Work of Pianist, Who Gives Concerto by Brahms

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. Piano soloist, Robert Casadesus. At Carnegie Hall.
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 .....Bach
Suite for Orchestra (first time) ....Casadesus
Piano Concerto No. 2 .....Brahms

It was Robert Casadesus' evening last night at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert. His Suite for Orchestra, composed in 1938-1939, received its first performance, and he himself was the piano soloist in the Brahms B flat Concerto.

Mr. Casadesus' Suite is a very Gallic, sophisticated piece of music, transparently scored. The composer is a complete workman who knows his materials inside out. Stylistically the Suite is eclectic-French, with touches of impressionism that lie close to a more modern harmonic underpinning.

What Mr. Casadesus had to say, he said well and to the point; but whether the message was worth relating is another story. It did not carry too much conviction.

As piano soloist, Mr. Casadesus presented a Brahms B flat that stressed the lyric aspects. Plenty of strength was present when needed, but in the main Mr. Casadesus was interested in the inherent color and nuance of the score. This is in sharp contrast to most pianists of the German school, who can easily interpret the concerto as an example of Hegelian idealism.

But whereas Mr. Casadesus' conception might have been unorthodox (again according to the best established German procedures) it was thoroughly consistent along its preconceived lines. It would have been even better had Mr. Casadesus been in more secure technical form. There were, for a pianist of his stature, an unusually large number of finger slips, dropped notes and helter-skelter passages.

The accompaniment furnished by Mr. Mitropoulos was superb. He made the orchestra a pliant instrument, and Mr. Casadesus worked extraordinarily well with it and the conductor. It seemed apparent that this was a concerto greatly admired by Mr. Mitropoulos; and one also got the idea that he himself probably was a complete master of the solo part.

The "Brandenburg" Concerto No. 1 emerged in a somewhat routine fashion, but there was some superb horn and oboe playing from the orchestral soloists. When they are in the mood, there are no better soloists in any orchestra anywhere.—H. C. S.

William Masselos Is Soloist

William Masselos made his first appearance as a soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Saturday night's concert at Carnegie Hall, playing Brahms' piano concerto in D minor. Haydn's eighty-sixth symphony, in D major, was the other principal item in the program conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, which opened with Mendelssohn's scherzo in G minor and closed with Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

Mr. Masselos has been known here for several years as a prominent member of the younger generation of American pianists, and, as expected, had a command of the technical requirements of this exacting and rewarding concerto. His interpretation also gave an impression of musicianship, and, although a full revelation of the work's expressive resources seemed not yet within his grasp, he did display an auspicious degree of understanding. The first movement, although performed with considerable sensitiveness, needed rather more structural continuity and emotional range, but the playing of the other two movements conveyed more expressive conviction; the tone was pervasively musical.

The Haydn symphony, the fifth of those composed for performance in Paris, was last played here by the Philharmonic three seasons ago; it has an unwaning vitality which was well reflected in the admirable performance under Mr. Mitropoulos, which also did full justice to the more delicate measures of this verdant score. The Wagner overture received an eloquent interpretation.

MASSELOS HEARD AS PIANO SOLOIST

Performs Brahms' D Minor Concerto for Philharmonic —Young Audience Cheers

A young, strongly partisan audience attended Saturday night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, and cheered long and loud for William Masselos' performance of Brahms' D minor Concerto. And conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos bestowed the crowning award in the form of a kiss on the young pianist's brow.

Mr. Masselos is a good musician, with strong, capable fingers. He has made such a reputation as an interpreter of contemporary music that it was a surprise to find him involved with Brahms, and the rambling First Concerto at that.

A colorist or a great virtuoso might instill interest in the work. Mr. Masselos is neither. His tone is rather glassy, although it was right for the violent moments of the first movement and the tempestuous motion of the last. His interpretation lacked the kind of distinction that might seize the listener's imagination, and he fumbled some of the rapid-passage work.

But his performance was clear-cut and it honestly served the meager expression of the music. Next time, it is to be hoped that he will be allowed to play something closer to his heart.

Mr. Mitropoulos led the orchestra in close support in the concerto and in a frothy rendition of Mendelssohn's fanciful scherzo in G minor (arranged for full orchestra by the composer). The event concluded with Haydn's Symphony No. 86 and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi." C. H.

WORDS and MUSIC

By John Briggs

'Elijah' Presented at Carnegie

Dimitri Mitropoulos last evening had the happy idea of presenting Mendelssohn's "Elijah" with the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Westminster Choir at Carnegie Hall.

"Elijah" occupies a special place in the affections of English-speaking concert audiences. What the second part of Goethe's "Faust" is to a German audience, "Elijah" is to an English-speaking one; a work admired, even revered, in other countries, but not cherished in quite the same way elsewhere.

Moreover, there are few great choral works written to an English text. And English does not take kindly to translation. It is a heavily-stressed language rich in compound words. It has not the flexibility and compressibility of Italian, or the light beat of French. Consequently, unless text and music are created together in the first place, accents are almost invariably out of step at some points.

And though "Elijah" is probably performed as often as any choral work in the repertoire, it too often takes the form of a scratch performance by a hard-pressed choirmaster with one eye on next week's anthem and offertory. Consequently last night's well-prepared performance by the Philharmonic was a delight to hear.

Mr. Mitropoulos offered a semi-dramatic "Elijah." The choristers accompanied their prayers, threats and exhortations with suitable gestures. The soloists moved up and down flights of stairs and employed pantomime with their singing. The gestures were more symbolic than literal in the manner of the opera stage, yet they added surprisingly to the effectiveness of the performance.

The soloists were good, on the whole. Desire Ligeti, who sang Elijah, has a big, booming voice and impressive stage bearing.

The faults I had to find with his singing were that he was not always in tune and his English was strongly flavored with a Hungarian accent.

Richard Tucker sang the tenor solos admirably, with vocal suavity and clear diction. Frances Greer's light but pleasant voice was agreeable in the soprano solos, and Martha Lipton no less so in the mezzo-soprano parts. The Westminster Choir's singing was well-balanced and responsive to Mr. Mitropoulos' every gesture. It was a fine performance.

Mitropoulos Stages 'Elijah'

By MILES KASTENDIECK

BY giving Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Mitropoulos brought novelty to the Philharmonic-Symphony's observance of Eastertide in Carnegie Hall last night. It had last been performed by the New York Symphony in 1909.

Choosing to "stage" the work because of its essentially dramatic story he placed the Westminster Choir on an elevated platform framing the orchestra and raised above their heads.

He distributed the soloists on various levels at different points on the stage. He also instructed them all to use appropriate gestures to underline the dramatic content of the text.

What might have been a static account of the work thus took on dynamic qualities other than purely tonal through this manipulation. It was just as well for the sustained character of the performance needed pictorial relief. For all its impressiveness as music, it courted several reservations.

Thanks to splendid singing by the choir and Richard Tucker, the performance held together substantially. Singing the role of Elijah, Desire Ligeti seldom rose to the heights of distinction the part demands. He was expressive enough, but his voice needed to be more sharply focused and his diction better.

Only Tucker achieved distinction in diction. Frances Greer and Martha Lipton sang well but without special communicative power.

The initial drama of the opening measures could have had more impact as the performance progressed. Perhaps a touch more lyricism might have ameliorated the constant dramatic emphasis.

The second half of the work went much better. No doubt repetition today, Sunday, and Wednesday will bring the integration and contrasts required for full realization of the content both of text and of score.

Something Is Added To 'Elijah'

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

One of the season's most gripping performances in or out of the concert hall was that of Mendelssohn's oratorio, "Elijah," by the Philharmonic in Carnegie Hall last night.

Since it was over a century ago that the parent body of the Philharmonic had last run off the choral masterpiece, Dimitri Mitropoulos thought it time to remind subscribers of what they had been missing.

This is magnificent music all the way, powerful, intense, and dramatic, particularly dramatic. So I found myself completely in favor of Mr. Mitropoulos' lapse from accepted practice in staging the work.

Added Visual Impact.

The changes, while not drastic, were very effective. The huge Westminster Choir sat and stood along a higher level than usual, some steel-framed painters' scaffolds having been pressed into service.

At crucial moments, the chorus would rise in sections and fling up its hands or remain seated and bow its heads in prayer. They were always conspicuous above the orchestra, which added to the visual impact of the work.

Instead of standing together in front of the orchestra, the soloists were strategically scattered—back of the orchestra, to the right of it, or, in the case of Elijah himself, on a raised throne-like seat in the foreground to the left.

There was acting, modified, but intense and eloquent, enough to add to the illusion of mounting drama. All four soloists—Frances Greer, Martha Lipton, Richard Tucker, and Desire Ligeti—are to be congratulated on impressively carrying out a unique and gratifying experiment.

A Marvel of Artistry.

The performance was a marvel of artistic dedication, as all of Mr. Mitropoulos' projects are likely to be these days. The four singers applied warmth and variety of color to their lines, and chorus and orchestra sounded as if they were bound in holy wedlock.

It may be that Mr. Mitropoulos has hit on a sure way of bringing the great oratorios back into the working repertory. Getting away from tradition of poker-face singing and stilted ceremony seemed a very sound policy of salvage last night.

Mr. Mitropoulos, you may recall, is the man who has been symphonizing grand opera; he is now dramatizing the oratorios. If this be treason, I'm all in favor of making the most of it.

Air-Borne Choir on 4 Scaffolds At Philharmonic 'Elijah' Today

With the help of four painter's scaffolds, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and the Westminster Choir will perform Mendelssohn's oratorio, "Elijah," tonight at Carnegie Hall. It will be the first time in 101 years that the orchestra has played the ninety-minute composition in this country, although it did perform the oratorio forty years ago at Montreal, Canada.

The scaffolding became necessary when Dmitri Mitropoulos the Philharmonic's musical director, insisted that the entire chorus of 120 voices be seated above the heads of the orchestra. To accomplish this, a platform in the shape of a half-moon had to be erected against the back and sides of the stage, and the highest set of platforms at Carnegie—the top two risers of an eight-riser set—would reach only across the moon's back.

Confronted with the two horns of this musical dilemma, John Totten, house manager of Carnegie, conferred with his assistant, Timothy McGowan, and the pair remembered the painter's scaffolds. These are steel-framed structures onto which platforms can be fitted at varying levels, in this instance the 5-foot 8-inch level of the risers.

Mr. Mitropoulos will perform the Mendelssohn work in what he called a "stylized dramatic" manner, because he said he considered it a dramatic oratorio and he did not want the chorus and soloists appearing "like pupils coming out front and reciting lessons."

The soloists are Desire Ligeti, bass-baritone; Frances Greer, soprano; Richard Tucker, tenor, and Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano. Miss Lipton sings various roles, among them that of Jezebel, for which she has chosen "a beautiful black dress." For "the good parts," she said, she had "a little net scarf" to conceal the black.

Both soloists and chorus were instructed by Mr. Mitropoulos at rehearsals to accompany their singing with dramatic gestures. At one point the entire chorus bow their heads in their hands and at other points rise in unison and seat themselves in time with the musical measures. Mr. Mitropoulos said the musical purists will probably call it "sacrilege," but added, "Nobody agrees on anything, either in life, politics or art, so there's no use arguing about it."

Dramatic Performance of 'Elijah' Given Under Mitropoulos' Baton

Felix Mendelssohn's dramatic oratorio, "Elijah," this season's Holy Week offering by the Philharmonic-Symphony, was given a brilliant and dramatic performance under Dimitri Mitropoulos' baton last night at Carnegie Hall. Assisting in the presentation were Frances Greer, soprano; Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano; Richard Tucker, tenor; Desire Ligeti, baritone, and the Westminster Choir, Dr. John Finley Williamson, director.

Mr. Mitropoulos was obviously aiming for dramatic effect last night—and when he is dramatic he is at his interpretive best. We do not believe that it was necessary for him to go so far as to have soloists and chorus raising their arms, bowing in prayer and making other dramatic gestures. They contributed neither to the visual nor aural effect of this great work. The music is able to speak for itself, and the conductor need make no apologies for his strictly musical treatment of the score, which was more than sufficient to sustain the listener's interest.

Voices from Above

His idea of placing the soloists and chorus on very high risers at the rear of the stage, so that their feet were above the heads of the orchestral players, turned out, however, to be a good one, for their voices reached us with greater clarity and impact. Particularly was this so with the chorus, which we have never heard sing with a more concentrated, well-controlled sound. The orchestra, too, performed with fine precision and tonal wealth.

Of the four soloists, we enjoyed most the pure, expressive singing and clear diction of Mr. Tucker. Mr. Ligeti, singing the part of the prophet Elijah, gave us a strong, impassioned account of the music, though certain passages in the second part of the oratorio gave him some trouble. It may have been that his intensive work in the earlier sections brought some fatigue to his voice. Miss Lipton's tone was rich and deep and her interpretation musicianly. Though she strove nobly, Miss Greer was somewhat miscast as the soprano soloist. The part requires a more sumptuous voice, so that she was obliged to push her tones much of the time. When she didn't, her voice had a most pleasing sound.

In order to fit the work into the normal concert period, Mr. Mitropoulos made a number of cuts in the score. In some respects, this was regrettable, since we were thus prevented from hearing some beautiful passages, both for soloists and chorus. Perhaps it is not fair to quibble over such matters, though, when we were treated to such a vibrant account of this choral masterpiece.

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Francis D. Perkins

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY

CARNEGIE HALL

Mendelssohn's oratorio "Elijah," performed by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and Westminster Choir (Dr. John Finley Williamson, director), Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Soloists: Frances Greer, soprano; Martha Lipton, contralto; Richard Tucker, tenor; Desire Ligetti, baritone.

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and the Westminster Choir gave the first of four performances of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" at Carnegie Hall last night in the closing concert of the Philharmonic's "odd" Thursday series. The visual aspect of the interpretation under the direction of Dmitri Mitropoulos had certain differences from that of a major choral society's performance of a standard masterpiece; the choristers, red-robed instead of clad in conventional evening dress, were grouped in a semi-ellipse about and behind the orchestra instead of in ascending lines behind it; the soloists were placed at either side of the orchestra, high on the left and less high on the right, and both choristers and soloists employed occasional gestures. The most striking of these was the successive raising and outstretching of hands by the sections of the chorus in their opening appeal.

This "stylized dramatic" manner, as Mr. Mitropoulos has described it, did not prove obtrusive or incongruous with the musical and expressive atmosphere of the performance, or indeed, with the music itself. Twelve short sections sections of the score were omitted; in this abridgement, the aim seemed to be to preserve the continuity of the narrative. "Elijah" can probably be called the second best known oratorio in the English-speaking world, but, in the New York concert field, its frequency of performance has fallen off in the last fifteen or twenty years. Rehearing emphasized previous impressions of Mendelssohn's melodic inventiveness and persuasiveness in his masterpiece in this field; of his devotion and sincerity, and of his complete and imposing craftsmanship in his treatment and his combination of vocal solos, choruses and instrumental music. And yet, for one listener at least, the work as a whole did not carry a completeness of conviction of the kind which is conveyed by some of the major scores of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries in our current choral repertory, despite the expressive appeal of many of its parts.

With an apparent emphasis upon the dramatic element in "Elijah," the interpretation under Mr. Mitropoulos had an impressive underlying vitality; it had also continuity and momentum. Climaxes, contrasts of mood, volume and hue were strikingly presented; the orchestra played with spirit and vividness of color, but, with an exception or two, maintained a just balance between the instrumental and choral elements of the score. The choristers sang with expressive conviction; the tone was firm, well proportioned and prevalently lucid. With a high degree of color, there was occasional room for more nuance in this regard and at times in volume in the most outspoken passages, but the dominating spirit was laudable, and there was noteworthy delicacy and fineness of shading in softer measures, particularly in the second half.

Désiré Ligotti, as Elijah, sang with sympathetic earnestness and communicative expressive understanding; the quality of tone, at first variable in clarity, gained notably in this regard as the performance advanced. Miss Greer and Miss Lipton, in their solos, gave a sense of musicianship and expressive persuasive; Mr. Tucker, with fluent, clear and appealing tones, gave a similar impression. The standard of enunciation was praiseworthy.

MENDELSSOHN OPUS IS PRESENTED HERE

'Elijah,' Dramatic Oratorio, Offered at Carnegie Hall by Philharmonic-Symphony

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Assisting artists: Frances Greer, soprano; Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano; Richard Tucker, tenor; Desire Ligeti, bass-baritone, and the Westminster Choir, John Finley Williamson, director. At Carnegie Hall.
Elijah ..... Mendelssohn

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was designed as a dramatic oratorio, and in the performance that he conducted at Carnegie Hall last night Dimitri Mitropoulos took that description to heart. This was not a tame reading; it had pace and tension and impact. It was projected dramatically—not only musically but also visually.

Mr. Mitropoulos has developed a technique, in his performances of operas in concert form, of suggesting the spirit of the action by placement of his musical forces and by encouraging his singers to make appropriate and simple gestures. He used this approach last night.

He had hish chorus seated on a sweeping semi-circle of benches beyond and above the orchestra. The sections of the chorus rose in unison; each member of each division made the same movements of the head and hands. The gestures were not out of place, and the military precision of the movements provided snap.

The soloists were placed on different levels and sections of the stage. Désiré Ligeti as Elijah sat on a throne-like chair to the left of conductor and orchestra. Richard Tucker was far to the right and when he had to sing, he mounted a few steps with grave gait. Frances Greer and Martha Lipton were behind the orchestra on raised seats.

These would seem to be unimportant details beside the musical content of Mendelssohn's oratorio, but they should not be minimized. They added something to the performance. There were moments when the stage had the quality of a painting. Mr. Mitropoulos may occasiontally overdo his careful design of the stage, but he has a sound visual instinct.

As for the music, it is a full-hearted, rewarding score. It does not belong with the monumental choral works such as Bach's B minor Mass and Handel's "The Messiah." But it is not too far away from these sublime heights. There are places where Mendelssohn's musis is sweet and pretty when it should be noble, but there is more dramatic punch to this work than belittlers of Mendelssohn would have you think.

Mr. Mitropoulos directed a performance that conveyed the power and sentiment of subject and music. The men of the Philharmonic played with precision and transparency of tone and with a freshness that was surprising in an orchestra nearing the end of a long season. The young singers of the Westminster Choir were at the top of their bent, and they represent one of the two best choruses in this part of the country.

It was a great day for the cause of chamber music and its protagonists when a group of players from the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra banded together to form the Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble. With the blessing, the guidance, and occcasionally, the musical direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos, these expert musicians have been presenting a series of chamber music concerts at the Y.M. and Y.W.H.A. at 92d St., and Lexington Ave., Manhattan. The third and last of the current series was given on Saturday night, and proved to be a huge success.

Among the advantages of this group are the opportunities it offers many of the relatively obscure — but nonetheless accomplished—players in the orchestra to show what they can do, and the opportunities it offers its audiences to hear a wide variety of chamber works—many of them seldom performed—for an infinite variety of instrumental combinations. We got the impression on Saturday evening that all this variety was helping to make this wonderful—but often elusive—form of musical expression more entertaining for quite a number of skeptics in the audience.

The response from the large audience was enthusiastic throughout the evening, but it assumed the proportions of a thundering ovation after the octet, despite the fact that this composition lasted for nearly an hour.

We sincerely hope that this splendid new organization will receive enough encouragement to continue its fine work next season. It is too good not to last.

By HENRY BECKETT

Conductor, soloist and players of the orchestra worked themselves into climactic fury last night over the score of Liszt's Concerto No. 1, in E Flat, thus bringing to a brilliant close the Thursday programs of the Philharmonic-Symphony season.

Dimitri Mitropoulos was the conductor and the pianist was the same Artur Rubinstein who has been soloist with American orchestras, off and on, ever since his debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra 46 years ago.

In Carnegie Hall last night he also was the soloist in Karol Szymanowski's "Symphonie Concertante." The score was dedicated to Rubinstein and at Cleveland, in 1933, he gave it the first American hearing, with Artur Rodinski conducting. Only a player of his assurance and audacity could properly handle the half-barbaric folk themes of this composition and the grandiose rhythms of Liszt.

The program began with Handel's Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, No. 3, in G Minor, Opus 4, which was composed about 200 years before the Szymanowski work, but is far more civilized. In this spacious showpiece the organist was Edouard Nes-Berger, a musician of taste and devotion and a worthy disciple of Dr. Albert Schweitzer.

By far the greatest music on the program was the Brahms Third Symphony. The conductor seemed bent on emphasizing impassioned passages, so that unity and coherence were lost to a degree. It is true that Brahms for a while was accompanist to the Hungarian violinist, Remenyi, and he was influenced by the rhapsodic strains of the gypsy, but he was classicst as well as romanticist, and it is the structure of his symphonies which makes them unique.

A Hero's Welcome For Artur Rubinstein

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Hero of last night's Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall was Artur Rubinstein. There was a hero's welcome and a hero's ovation, and in between a heroic performance.

Two heroic performances, in fact. No sooner had the titan of the keys polished off Szymanowski's Concertante with orchestra than he returned to apply his dazzling powers to Liszt's E flat Major Concerto.

The playing was what Mr. Rubinstein has taught us to expect from him. It had a diamond-like glitter where the music asked for it. It had inexhaustible strength and infinite reserves of technic. And it had a vein of poetry that seemed to stretch back to Liszt, and beyond Liszt to Chopin.

Frankly, I am no partisan of Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante. It sounds big, it keeps everybody busy, and every once in a while it promises something out of this world—only to go back on its word. It is a substitute for great music.

However, Mr. Rubinstein plunged into this musical whirl with superb zest, and so did Dimitri Mitropoulos and the orchestra. The performance gathered terrific momentum. There was a perfect carnival of energy. In the end it was the performance, not the music, that remained in the memory.

Quite different was the Liszt concerto. Not that Liszt wasn't a showman, a keyboard charmer second to none. But he was a creative genius, too, and a wizard with the keys.

Mr. Rubinstein caught the personality of the man and his music, superimposed his own, and the result was one of the most exciting readings of the season. One departed with both them music and the performance ringing in the ear.

Earlier in the evening, Mr. Mitropoulos introduced a two-century old score into the Philharmonic repertory—the G minor concerto for organ and orchestra by Handel. Edouard Nies-Berger was the admirable soloist in this strangely neglected music. The contrasts were possibly too weighty and off balance to give Mr. Nies-Berger lyric right of way.

As main symphonic entry, Mr. Mitropoulos gave a stirring reading of Brahms' Third Symphony. It was epic in breadth without ever being pompous or inflated. One sensed Brahms' warm humanity in every phrase—a concern for the little things that allowed the big things to take care of themselves.

RUBINSTEIN SOLOIST FOR PHILHARMONIC

Pianist Heard in Szymanowski and Liszt Numbers—Work by Handel on Program

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Assisting artists, Artur Rubinstein, pianist; Edouard Nies-Berger, organist. At Carnegie Hall.
Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, Op. 4, No. 3, in G minor ..... Handel
Symphony No. 3, in F ..... Brahms
Symphonie Concertante for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 60 ..... Szymanowski
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 4, in E flat ..... Liszt

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra began the final week of its 110th season at Carnegie Hall last night, and it had the protean Artur Rubinstein as soloist in two works. This surely must have sent the audience home content, thinking not only of vacation plans but perhaps also of the need to sign and deliver the renewal notice for next season's subscription.

Mr. Mitropoulos arranged a program that compressed a wealth of fine music, some of it familiar and some relatively unhackneyed and provocative, into the less than two hours between the beginning and end of the concert. The Handel concerto, not exactly a novelty although it had its first performance by this society, was a little different. There were the sturdy vigor and spirituality of Brahms. There was the still fresh voice of Szymanowski, who died fifteen years ago. And there was the sure-fire bravura of Liszt.

Mr. Rubinstein's work in the Szymanowski and Liszt were enkindling enough to give any concert a lift. Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante, completed in 1932 and dedicated to Mr. Rubinstein, is in a sinewy, rugged folk vein, and it calls on the piano for both weight and crispness, for both rhythmic elasticity and massed tonal effects. The composer knew the capacities of his dedicatee, and Mr. Rubinstein, playing this music with devoted affection, gave it a brilliant interpretation.

At the end, when the music sounds like a horde of drunken peasants, it has been suggested that the composer had in mind one tipsy peasant, but he must have been a whale of a fellow—Mr. Rubinstein rose from his seat to smite the keys. And what came out was not merely a big noise, but music.

This kind of score is right up Mr. Mitropoulos' alley, and he led the orchestra in a vivid reading that was a perfect complement for Mr. Rubinstein's work. In the Liszt concerto there was more of the same on the part of soloist and orchestra. Mr. Rubinstein does not look down his nose at this piece, which has wide popularity, to cast suspicion upon it in exalted esthetic circles. He played the music with savor, sticking to Liszt's ideas, and what emerged was musically honest as well as exhilarating.

The Handel concerto was done with taste and restraint by a reduced ensemble of strings and by the accomplished Mr. Nies-Berger at the organ, John Corigliano, concertmaster, and Laszlo Vargas, solo 'cellist, contributed agreeable solo passages.

Since the intention is to bid conductor and orchestra a pleasant holiday without too much of a final unkind thrust, let there be only a sorrowful mention that the Brahms symphony was not so clear and consistent in design as it might have been. Perhaps Mr. Mitropoulos was trying too hard. Let's look ahead to the orchestra's 111th season.

Chamber Ensemble

The Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble, enlisting the services of members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, presented its third concert of the season Saturday night at the Kaufmann Auditorium of the Y.M.H.A. The program, long and diversified, listed two works for a choir of five brasses, Johann Pezel's Suite No. 4, from "Hora Decima" and Gabrieli's "Canzona per Sonare"; Beethoven's String Trio, Op. 9, No. 3, Albert Roussel's Trio for flute, viola and cello, and Schubert's Octet in F major, this last under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos.

By all odds, the finest playing of the evening came at the beginning of the program, and, indeed, the brass instrumentalists involved performed as brilliantly, accurately and heartily as any similar ensemble known to this reporter. The contrapuntal and harmonic elegances of the Pezel and the miraculous invention of the Gabrielli (whose melody resembles a modern Shaker tune), were sewn into a musical fabric amply smooth in sonority and perfectly matched in tone. It was, in sum, music-making of the rarest kind.

Elsewhere, the renditions of the Philharmonic men failed to ignite as the Pezel had done. The Beethoven was tendered a standard reading which failed to achieve the ultimate in chamber ensemble refinement. And the Roussel, a delicate and elfin work as gentle to the ear as mist to the face, was improperly balanced in the matter of instrumental weight. As a result, one heard the music as a flute sonata with string accompaniment rather than as a trio in which each participant lent assistance to the effect of the whole.

About the Schubert Octet there is little to be said. It is a grand piece but overlong, and Mr. Mitropoulos provided a highly individual and energetic interpretation. As a virtuoso of dramatic contrast, the conductor often demanded accents and emphases at the expense of a rounded melodic line, but the amenities of eloquence and chamber music grace were very much in evidence.

Philharmonic Begins Final Week; Rubinstein Brilliant as Piano Soloist

Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra began the final week of their current season last night at Carnegie Hall, and treated us to a diverting program. In this they were brilliantly aided by the principal soloist of the evening—the pianist, Artur Rubinstein.

But there were other soloists, too, for the concert opened with the Handel Organ Concerto No. 3 in G Minor, Op. 4, performed by the orchestra for the first time on this occasion. Edouard Nies-Berger, the Philharmonic's regular organist, was the soloist, playing in a simple, straightforward fashion. Calling this an organ concerto, however, is not altogether correct; since its two slow movements are concerned more with solos and duets by the concertmaster and first 'cellist, supported by the organ and string orchestra, it resembles more a concerto grosso. The two expert string soloists were John Corigliano, violinist, and Laszlo Varga, 'cellist.

At Opening and Closing

If you will examine the opening and closing programs of the nation's larger symphony orchestras, you will find that Brahms figures prominently on many of them. Such was the case last night, when Mr. Mitropoulos offered that master's third symphony. His was a sane reading, marked more by rhythmic incisiveness than by broad, lyric grace. We would have liked it better had the conductor allowed the lovely cello theme in the third movement to soar instead of holding it down, and we would also have appreciated a more even-flowing finale, with a deeper air of mystery and as the result of a firmer beat, more precise playing. On the whole, however, it was a clear, valid performance, one of Mr. Mitropoulos' more effective efforts with a standard symphonic work.

Two Concerti

Mr. Rubinstein, a man who can combine virtuosity with tonal warmth in a manner that few pianists can equal, chose to bring us two concerti instead of one. We are grateful to him for playing the unfamiliar but highly rewarding Symphonie Concertante for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 60, by the late Polish composer and pianist, Karol Szymanowski. Written in the customary three movements, it is a work which abounds in colorful folk-like melodies, haunting harmonic combinations and brilliant orchestral and pianistic effects, with the piano part closely integrated with that for the orchestra. We cannot imagine a more glowing or fiery interpretation, either.

Then, after only a few moments' rest, Mr. Rubinstein returned to give a dashing and glittering performace of the more popular E Flat Major Concerto of Franz Liszt. In both works he was admirably supported by Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra, who shared in the ovation at the concert's conclusion.

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY
CARNEGIE HALL

Last concert of the Thursday evening series, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conducting; soloist, Artur Rubinstein, pianist. The program:
Concerto for Organ and Orchestra, No. 3 in G minor, Op. 4 ..... Handel
Organist, Edouard Nies-Berger; first performance by this orchestra
Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90 .. Brahms
Symphonie Concertante for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 60 ..... Szymanowski
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1 in E flat major ..... Liszt

Artur Rubinstein, prefacing Liszt's piano concerto in E flat with a Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra by Karol Szymanowski, was the soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra yesterday for its last evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall. Dimitri Mitropoulos opened his program with a 200-year-old work which had not previously figured in the Philharmonic repertory, Handel's third organ concerto, in G minor, and the third symphony of Brahms.

The Syzmanowski work, with Mr. Rubinstein as the soloist, was last played by this orchestra in December, 1943, in a Polish program conducted by Artur Rodzinski. While the piano part is not always in the musical foreground, the pianist is called upon for ample virtuosity in music which has much rhythmic vigor and considerable national flavor. With its suggestions of Polish tunes and dances, the atmosphere sometimes has a certain cosmopolitanism, with what seems a French influence in the lyric episode which separate the work's spirited first and third sections. One drawback is a rather episodic structure, so that the effect of rising rhythmic tension is often interrupted by a new beginning.

Mr. Rubinstein, who gave a notable performance of this work with a sympathetically cooperative orchestra, was also in admirable technical form for the Liszt concerto, which, with some obvious and some rather outdated measures, still persuasively projects the composer's particular kind of romanticism, with eloquence as well as with occasional grandiosity. The interpretation combined deftness with clarity of detail, delicacy and imposing sonority. There seemed to be occasional unevenness in its imaginative communication, but the usual impression was one of expressive conviction, and the work gave this series a duly imposing close.

Edouard Nies-Berger, the Philharmonic's organist, played with skill and musicianship in the well proportioned performance of the Handel concerto. The performance of the Brahms symphony, rather temperate in the first movement, gained expressive warmth later on; the pace seemed unusually deliberate in the allegretto and had a surplus of nuances in the finale, but here there was a convincing realization of the movement's emotional resources.

Mitropoulos At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

MITROPOULOS began the final weekend of the Philharmonic-Symphony season with a stimulating concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Part of the stimulation was derived from the excellent playing of the orchestra under his direction; part came from the pianistic wizardry of Artur Rubinstein, the piano soloist.

Mitropoulos dominated the first half of the program offering Handel's Third Organ Concerto and Brahm's Third Symphony. Rubinstein dominated the second half playing Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante, Oups 60, No. 4 and Liszt's E Flat Piano Concerto. Both were in top form.

Of special interest was the society's first performance of the Handel organ concerto, wonderful music which has been too much neglected. Edouard Nies-Berger played the organ part, disclosing his artistic integrity in the registration and appreciation for the beauty of the work. The performance, however, tended to relegate the organ to secondary position.

Mitropoulos' way with Brahms was both individual and unorthodox. A relaxed yet controlled interpretation accented different aspects of the score. Even though the final movement sounded mannered in its deliberate pacing, the performance on the whole was an exciting one.

The virtuosity of Szymanowski found natural outlet in Rubinstein's performance, but the piece is an empty affair. His playing of Liszt, however, found him in a recreative mood. With his inimitable touch and his romantic spirit he restored musical values frequently lost in virtuoso display. Mitropoulos responded whole-heartedly to this work so that the performance was exhilarating.

ORCHESTRA SUBSCRIBER

He Helps Philharmonic Condition Its Programs

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

SINCE the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concludes its 110th season this afternoon, the presumption is that it is here to stay. It may be guessed that over the years, from the modest first concert in 1842 through the more than 100 concerts of its 1950-52 season, the orchestra has given pleasure and satisfaction to thousands of patrons. But the chances are equally good that there was some grumbling after the initial concert as there may be after the 5,071st today.

If there were no complaints in any of the long seasons the orchestra undertakes these days, it would be a miracle. Consider the occasions for discontent. Not counting other commitments, the orchestra has played ninety-eight subscription concerts at Carnegie Hall this year. The subscribers have represented about 65 per cent of the audiences at these concerts. Thus 65 per cent of the patrons at the subscription concerts were in a position to second-guess Dimitri Mitropoulos, the musical director, and the guest conductors on their programs and possibly their performances. After all, these patrons had paid for their tickets in advance and had reason to expect music they liked.

Different Tastes

The difficulties arise when the differing tastes of so many people have to be taken into account. A venerable organization like the Philharmonic has patrons who have been subscribers for decades. Some old subscribers die, and new ones come in. Have the old who remain and the new the same attitudes toward programs?

There is no certain way of telling except by polling every subscriber. Short of that, the Philharmonic must assume that a subscriber who renews is not too unhappy. And if, as has happened this season, there is an upswing in the sale of tickets for single concerts, management and conductors are entitled to feel that programs have been attractive to the majority of customers.

It is no secret that the contented customer seldom writes to express his approval. The one who is irritated is more likely to sound off. And the Philharmonic receives its share of indignant reactions. A few may be annoyed by the recurrence of the standard works of the repertoire; many more do not like the rising percentage of contemporary pieces that Mr. Mitropoulos has introduced.

Mr. Mitropoulos has affirmed, again and again, that it is his duty to program new music. Some months ago he met with a committee of Philharmonic patrons and agreed upon a formula with them. The orchestra has principal subscription series of fourteen concerts each—one is known as the odd series and the other as the even. Mr. Mitropoulos promised to alternate safe programs of established works with programs containing newer pieces in each series. Thus conservative subscribers would have to contend with difficult contemporary works only on alternate weeks.

Not every subscriber set his seal to this arrangement, which left those with resentments free to express them. And some have. Mr. Mitropoulos is painstaking about examining the complaints, and he spends many hours writing personal replies.

In any case, his concern with the problem does him credit, and his devotion to his principles that the new as well as the old must be heard on Philharmonic programs is altogether admirable.

Fundamental Problem

The problem, of course, goes deeper than Mr. Mitropoulos' effort to placate a few disaffected subscribers. It is fundamental, and it involves every musical organization in the country that rests on a foundation of a subscription audience. The compatibility or incompatibility of such an audience with a vigorous, adventurous, artistic policy has always been a prime consideration in the making of programs. No manager or conductor in his right senses can ignore the predilections of the majority of this audience, for without it the musical organization might not be able to exist at all.

With the costs of maintaining an orchestra as high as they are today and with the absence of multimillionaires willing to underwrite whopping deficits, a musical institution must rely more heavily than ever on its subscribers. A glance at the figures for the past seven seasons reveals how large a part the subscription list plays in the Philharmonic's affairs.

In the season of 1945-46 the subscribers were 65 3/5 per cent of the total audience; in 1946-47, 73 per cent; in 1947-48, 77 1/5 per cent; in 1948-49, 74 2/5 per cent; in 1949-50, 71 3/4 per cent; in 1950-51, 69 2/5 per cent; in 1951-52, with the figures not finally fixed, about 65 per cent.

The variations have probably had less to do with musical provenance than with the state of the individual's personal exchequer. When money is easier, taxes lower and costs of living more manageable, people are more likely to consider spending a sizable sum on a subscription. Despite the rise and fall of the number of subscribers, the total has not fallen below 65 per cent in seven seasons.

The income derived from subscribers thus represents a basic guarantee for the orchestra's existence. If there were no subscribers, the orchestra might very well be in an uncertain position with every week's concerts. Such a situation would make it impossible to sign contracts with players, soloists and conductors. Planning of any kind would be haphazard. There is no doubt that the durability of institutions like the Philharmonic and the Metropolitan Opera depends on their faithful subscribers.

As the financing of major musical organizations goes today, not even their reliable subscription lists are assurances of solvency. There must be additional income in large quantities. Some of it comes from broadcasting rights and recording royalties. Some comes from gifts. And nearly always there must be public appeals for funds to meet deficits.

It all boils down to this: An organization like the Philharmonic must consider the rights and wishes of its subscribers. It must, in any case, reflect the best music of the western heritage on its programs. But it must also fulfill its obligations to the living composer. A new generation of subscribers that can take today's music in its stride may come along. By then there may be even newer—and possibly more difficult music—to absorb, and the new generation of subscribers turned old may want today's music, which by then will be old. The coming generation's Mitropoulos may have his troubles. The likelihood is that there will always be an uneasy truce, if not a struggle, as long as there are old subscribers and new composers.

Philharmonic: Beethoven Wins

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Beethoven and Brahms head the list of composers who were most often represented in the programs of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's 110th season, which closes this afternoon in Carnegie Hall. This is not surprising, and the figures for the other leaders indicate no significant changes of policy so far as composers are concerned. The number of performances of American music and of music by contemporary composers fell off moderately, but this is probably a matter of seasonal fluctuation rather than a suggestion of a trend, resulting from the devotion of seven entire programs to two major works of the past, Monteverdi's "Orfeo" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

According to this department's summary of the society's official figures, thirteen works of Beethoven were played thirty-four times in the 100 concerts given for adult audiences in Carnegie Hall. Brahms, who had fewer works but more performances than Beethoven in the 1950-'51 programs, finished second with ten works given twenty-seven times. Seven works of Mozart were offered sixteen times, five by Mendelssohn and three by Franck twelve times each. Bach, Tchaikovsky, Haydn, Schumann, Rossini, Weber, Debussy, Monteverdi and Stravinsky (the only contemporary composer who scored more than five performances) follow. In all, these concerts offered 141 works or excerpts by sixty-nine composers (not counting those who figured only as arrangers) as compared with 148 works by fifty-eight composers last season.

Numbers of performances, however, may not give a true idea of the amount of each composer's share in the season's repertory, since a Mozart overture, say of ten minutes' extent, and "Elijah," taking about ninety minutes with Mr. Mitropoulos' cuts, count equally in such a list. An attempt, depending upon memory and some guesswork, to give an approximate idea of the time allotted the five leading composers in approximately 150 hours of playing time gives Beethoven nearly twenty hours and Brahms over nineteen and a half. The four performances of "Elijah" bring Mendelssohn up to third place with nine hours and fifteen minutes; Tchaikovsky to fourth place with seven and three-quarters hours, and Mozart to fifth place with six and a quarter hours. That is, Beethoven and Brahms shared more than one-quarter (twenty-six per cent) of the total playing time, which is a striking indication of these masters' importance and continuing popularity in our senior orchestra's programs.

Ten American composers, one more than in 1950-'51, were represented by ten works, the same figure as before, but the number of performances, twenty, was under last season's total by ten. As for contemporary composers, the season's total is twenty-three, represented by sixty performances of twenty-five works. This is 18 per cent of the total; last season's percentage was twenty. In this figuring, naturalized composers established in their field are not included among American composers; the contemporary label is here applied to composers born after 1880 and also to Arnold Schoenberg, whose contemporary significance is indisputable.

Among the American works played by the Philharmonic this season, six were played for the first time in New York; two, also heard here for the first time as concert music, were suites from ballets previously staged here; only two had been heard before on the local concert stage. We need more repetitions of deserving works which have been played here before if we are to have a more or less regularly performed American symphonic repertory.

Counting the fourteen concerts of last summer's Edinburgh Festival, the orchestra will have given 128 concerts when it and Artur Rubinstein play the last measures of Tchaikovsky's piano concerto in B flat minor today. With the two Young People's series and the two members' concerts, the home season's total is 110, plus four concerts out of town since mid-October. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted for seventeen of the regular season's twenty-eight weeks; four other conductors and Igor Buketoff, for the junior series, complete the list of directors. Artistically, the Philharmonic fares much better under one regular musical director and a few other conductors than in certain past seasons, when platoons of leaders shared its podium.

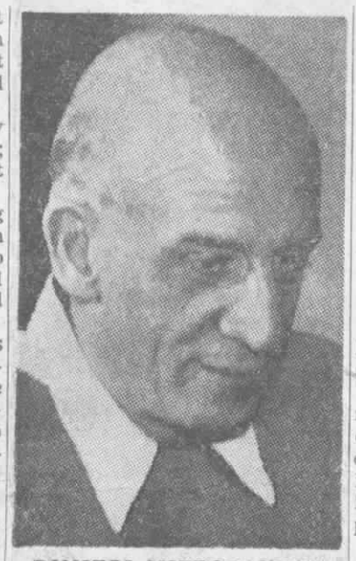
Mitropoulos and His Magic Hands

Philharmonic Gives Troy a Night of Note

Dimitri Mitropoulos had a great orchestra at his fingertips and an audience of thousands at his feet Saturday night in RPI Field House.

The Greek-born conductor truly gave Troy a Golden Age of music; a Golden Age even though it lasted only an evening.



"I hope you write a glowing account," said an acquaintance in the audience, who has been so kind as to read these occasional reports on musical affairs and such.

It should be easy, for in its program the New York Philharmonic Orchestra set hearts afire and left a glow that persists today. Yet it is not easy. For who is the reporter who can translate the luxurious sonorities of a Cesar Franck Symphony, played by a hundred great musicians, inspired by a great conductor, into a printed page?

The Franck D Minor Symphony is a familiar one, particularly in its second movement theme. For those who insist on adjectives to describe how Mr. Mitropoulos interpreted it, let's use "rich" and say no more. We would use "unfortunate" to describe those who did not hear it.

Mr. Mitropoulos opened the program with the Milhaud scoring of a Prelude and Allegro by the 18th Century French composer, Francois Couperin. It was for many of the audience an introduction to both the conductor and the orchestra—an introduction to their living music, at least, in contrast to recordings or radio concerts.

And as the program proceeded brilliantly through the Franck Symphony to the works of composers of today, Kodaly and Stravinsky, there were few who failed to compare the orchestra and its conductor to the Boston Symphony and its conductors, more familiar through Tanglewood and recent Troy concerts.

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS
Great Music and 'Body English'

No one was ready to sell the Boston down the river, but more than one said, as has been said before:

"The Philharmonic is the greater."

The Kodaly work played Saturday night was a dance group, "Dances from Galanta," at times mellow, at times spirited, but always entrancing. Galanta is a small Hungarian town with a gypsy flavor, the program notes revealed.

And from the Stravinsky works the orchestra presented a suite from Petrouchka.

Sometimes a certain knowledgeable friend is quoted in these reports. Knowledgeable Friend on this occasion had no complaint about the way the Stravinsky was played, but—rather complained that it was presented at all. Referring to the fact the music was written for a ballet, he intoned:

"Stravinsky is visual and not aural."

Which only goes to prove knowledgeable friends should sometimes be likewise.

More to our liking was a comment on Mr. Mitropoulos method of conducting, feet planted firmly on podium, but with great fluidity in his body movements that had him fairly dancing at certain proper times.

This comment came from a friend not knowledgeable at all, but with a wealth of wisdom. This friend had had the incomparable advantage of spending his formative years loitering about poolrooms.

Saturday night, after hearing Mr. Mitropoulous bring from the orchestra such a wealth of music as he had never before heard, and after watching the conductor "play" that orchestra as a single instrument and after observing with close attention how the conductor used head and heart and hands, shoulders, fingers, elbows and torso to bring from the orchestra the music he sought, this friend said—admiringly and sincerely, he said:

"Boy, does he put body English on 'em."

And, so help us, Mr. Mitropoulous really did. (D. LaF.)

Mitropoulos and Orchestra Receive Ovation at Troy

By D. E. RITZ

Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York in a program of Couperin-Milhaud, Cesar Franck, Kodaly and Stravinsky at RPI Field House in Troy Saturday night.

THE CONCERT, the first ever presented by the organization in the field house, was a success and the ovations which conductor and orchestra received were well-merited.

For the reviewer it was a first hearing of Mitropoulos' conducting and a more dynamic experience could not be imagined. He combines great personal magnetism with musical intelligence and obtains results from an orchestra that are amazing. His programming is a delight with its happy balance between the old and the new.

The Cesar Franck symphony, one of the best in symphonic literature, achieved richness and fullness of sonority with an emotional significance that was most stirring.

DARIUS MILHAUD'S arrangement of a Prelude and Allegro from Couperin's "Sonade en Quatuor" known as "La Sultane" combined the modern writing idiom with the spirit of the age of Couperin and provided glorious music making.

The last half of the program included Kodaly's "Dances from Galanta" with their gypsy airs and rhythms and their music in "the old Hungarian tradition." That the orchestra musicians delighted in its interpretation was evident throughout. The "Russian Dance," "Chez Petrouchka" and "Popular Festival of Carnival Week" from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" completed the program.

An encore, Rossini's "Overture to Semiramide," restored instruments to their normal tone colors and proved an excellent closing.

Artur Rubinstein In Philharmonic

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

With Artur Rubinstein as soloist in Tschaikowsky's Piano Concerto, the Philharmonic signed off for the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Rubinstein continued in the vein adopted at last Thursday's concert, which featured Liszt's E-Flat Major Concerto. The keynote was brilliance. The style was spacious, and a sense of high adventure was in every phrase.

End of Season.

It was good to find this concerto marking off the finale of another memorable Philharmonic season. It is the perfect farewell salute, and—when played as it was yesterday—works everybody up to a fever pitch of excitement.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who conducted, had every reason to feel gratified about the season that was closing. The quota of novelties presented was high and the innovations in the way of opera and oratorio made good news and better art.

It was a season of lofty ideals reflected in both the repertory and the playing. New York has every season to be proud of its name symphony and proud of the man who conducts it.

Podium Master.

During the intermission, I heard Jim Fassett interviewing personnel manager Maurice Van Praag, who is now retiring. Said Mr. Van Praag, who has known them all—from the masters to the mediocrities:

"This man Mitropoulos is one conductor who always makes you feel it is a privilege and an honor for him to be on the podium."

To which I might add it is a privilege and an honor to hear him conduct. Good work and good luck, maestro!

Mitropoulos Scheduled At Chautauqua, July 19

One of the major musical events of Chautauqua's approaching season will be the appearance of Dimitri Mitropoulos, Saturday evening, July 19, when he will appear as soloist with the Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra in a piano concerto. Franco Autori, associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, will conduct. It is expected that Mr. Mitropoulos will be at Chautauqua several days during this period.

Mr. Mitropoulos, who is musical director of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, is Greek by birth, American by adoption. A brilliant European reputation preceded his American debut in 1936 with the Boston Symphony. Since then, he has been an outstanding personality in the musical life of this country.

In August, 1951, Mitropoulos conducted a series of concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony at the Edinburgh Festival, sharing the podium with Bruno Walter. These concerts marked the first appearances of an American orchestra at that international event.

Although conducting has become the true metier of this gifted musician, Mitropoulos is a composer of rare talent and a virtuoso pianist. He is known as both a great interpreter of the classics and as a highly persuasive champion of the composers of his day.

'Elijah,' Dramatic Oratorio, Offered at Carnegie Hall by Philharmonic-Symphony

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC - SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Assisting artists: Frances Greer, soprano; Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano; Richard Tucker, tenor; Desire Ligeti, bass-baritone, and the Westminster Choir, John Finley Williamson, director. At Carnegie Hall.
Elijah ..... Mendelssohn

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was designed as a dramatic oratorio, and in the performance that he conducted at Carnegie Hall last night Dimitri Mitropoulos took that description to heart. This was not a tame reading; it had pace and tension and impact. It was projected dramatically—not only musically but also visually.

Mr. Mitropoulos has developed a technique, in his performances of operas in concert form, of suggesting the spirit of the action by placement of his musical forces and by encouraging his singers to make appropriate and simple gestures. He used this approach last night.

He had hish chorus seated on a sweeping semi-circle of benches beyond and above the orchestra. The sections of the chorus rose in unison; each member of each division made the same movements of the head and hands. The gestures were not out of place, and the military precision of the movements provided snap.

Chamber Group; 'Dy

It was a great day for the c protagonists when a group of pla harmonic Symphony Orchestra Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble ance, and occcasionally, the musical direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos, these expert musicians have been presenting a series of chamber music concerts at the Y.M. and Y.W.H.A. at 92d St., and Lexington Ave., Manhattan. The third and last of the current series was given on Saturday night, and proved to be a huge success.

Among the advantages of this group are the opportunities it offers many of the relatively obscure — but nonetheless accomplished—players in the orchestra to show what they can do, and the opportunities it offers its audiences to hear a wide variety of chamber works—many of them seldom performed—for an infinite variety of instrumental combinations. We got the impression on Saturday evening that all this variety was helping to make this wonderful—but often elusive—form of musical expression more entertaining for quite a number of skeptics in the audience.

NEW YORK CONCERTS

CARNEGIE HALL

N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulis conducting, April 10, E.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was presented with the assistance of the Westminster Choir (John Finley Williamson, director) and soloists Frances Greer, soprano; Martha Lipton, mezzo-soprano; Richard Tucker, tenor, and Desiré Ligeti, bass-baritone.

Not only in the musical reading but in the visual presentation, the work was given a semi-theatrical appearance. Surrounding the orchestra were scaffolds on which the chorus, clad in red robes, was placed in a half-circle. The singing was accompanied by gestures of grief, pleading and praying, in accordance with the text. The soloists were seated on elevated platforms on both sides of the proscenium and behind the orchestra. This reminded one a bit of the medieval mystery play, a device quite effective and appealing to the eye.

However, the procedure seemed to stress the more superficial effects of the work, and a straightforward reading would have done more justice to the composition. Mendelssohn's music draws its greatest impact from its melodic flow, the romantic feeling and the craftsmanship with which the composer builds his choral ensembles and vocal numbers.

The chorus sang admirably, with great discipline, tonal beauty and dramatic impact. The orchestra, often too loud, played with sweep and plasticity. Of the soloists, Richard Tucker enchanted the listeners with his magnificent voice, as did Martha Lipton, whose rendition had real dramatic power. Frances Greer also sang with taste and vocal impressiveness. Desiré Ligeti, in the title part, was vocally not an ideal representative. The voice seemed too light and not dark enough, so that in the arias Lord God of Abraham and It Is Enough, the dramatic impact was not fully realized. There also were definite faults in pitch at times, especially in the beginning, though his whole interpretation grew in power during the evening. H. W. L.

April 17, E.—The last week of the Philharmonic-Symphony's season opened with Artur Rubinstein as soloist in a rarely heard work dedicated to this pianist, Karol Szymanowski's Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra, No. 4, op. 60. The score is neo-romantic, the harmonic shadings and the orchestration being its main attractions. It gives the piano only second plac the orchestra to dominate. E a "personality" like Mr. Rubinstein at the keyboard, the solo contribution gained in impact and importance. As his second offering he played Liszt's Concerto in E flat, often called hackneyed; but in this artist's interpretation new light was shed on the familiar score and it became an exciting and provocative pianistic experience. A long ovation rewarded the soloist.

The concert opened with the first performance by the Society of Handel's Concerto in G minor for organ and orchestra, No. 3. Edouard Nies-Berger was the sensitive soloist, and the classic splendor of the work was realized with greatest impressiveness by the organist and the nobly playing orchestra.

Brahms' Symphony No. 3 completed the list. Inclined to dramatize and accentuate music in general, Mr. Mitropoulos in this reviewer's opinion went too far. It is, after all, not necessary to alter tempi clearly indicated by the composer, for a change of this kind endangers the character of the symphony, as when the Allegro became a leisurely Andante. Still, there were some interesting nuances in the reading, and it was warmly received. H. W. L.

Opera Again . . .

IN THIS ISSUE our Henry Marx pays well deserved tribute to Dimitri Mitropoulos, who has enriched the American operatic repertoire by giving excellent concert versions of works that are new or have never become standard repertory in opera theatre, like the Monteverdi "Orfeo." Perhaps one might wonder why a magazine like MUSIC NEWS continues to give space to such problems as pertain to opera, when opera can scarcely be considered a vital force in this country. The fact is that there are hundreds of tendencies in this country which all have as their goal the establishment of some form of operatic theatre. To be sure, from the present situation we see nothing but one desert, with an oasis here and there. But the Mitropoulos performances, just as the Toscanini performances of operatic masterworks did at one time, have done their share.

Philharmonic Ensemble Finale

The third and final concert of the Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble, given at the Theresa L. Kaufman Auditorium on April 12, was attended by a capacity house which greeted the performers enthusiastically. The organization, composed of members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, was heard in two quintets, the Johann Pezel Suite No. 4 from Hora Decima and Giovanni Gabrieli's Canzona Per Sonare, performed by Messrs. Ware, Smith, Pulis, De Intinis and Bell. Beethoven's String Trio, op. 9, No. 3, was played by Messrs. Andreasson, Zaratzian and Joachim, and the Roussel Trio, op. 40, by Messrs. Wummer, Sabinsky and Stutch, concluded the first half of superbly performed works.

The latter part of the concert was devoted to the seldom-heard Octet in F Major, op. 166, by Schubert. In six short movements, it is scored for two violins, viola, cello, bass, clarinet, bassoon and horn, and was played by Messrs. Weiner, Andraesson, Davis, Sophos, Zimmerman, Drucker, Zegler and Singer. Under the baton of Dimitri Mitropoulos it was given an exquisitely sensitive performance, which merited the many bows the music-wise audience forced conductor and artists to accept. S. B. M.

Philharmonic Concert Well Chosen

By KEITH MARVIN

With a stirring rendition of Rossini's "Semiramide" Overture, played as an encore, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dmitri Mitropolous, concluded an excellent and well-chosen program at the R.P.I. Field House Saturday night. The concert was attended by approximately 3,000 persons.

The program included the "Prelude and Allegro" by Couperin, arranged by Milhaud; the Franck "Symphony in D Minor;" the "Dances from Galanta" of the Hungarian contemporary, Zoltan Kodaly and a suite of three numbers from Strawinsky's delightful "Petrouchka."

Of these, we felt the high point was reached in the final movement of the Franck symphony, the "Allegro" of the Couperin-Milhaud combine and the "Russian Dance" from "Petrouchka."

Direct Contrast.

The "Allegro" was terrific: In direct contrast to the slower and more subdued "Prelude," this movement brought out the best in the brass section, as the simple pattern of the number worked up to its tremendous climax. This clarity and precision on the part of the brasses also served as an interesting comparison with the opening movement where the strings of the orchestra were of primary importance in carrying the effect of the number.

As for the Franck, the second and third movements were beautifully played, but in all sincerity we felt that the opening measures in the first movement were taken at too slow a pace and that in the development of one theme there was an obvious tendency to squeeze everything out of the theme when it was reached. Not that this is an uncommon procedure regarding this particular work, but repeated hearings of the rendition, in case of recordings, generally produce a cloying effect, with the usual result that the listener thereafter avoids the work whenever he can!

Finale Noteworthy.

The second movement was noteworthy as was the finale. The mysticism which pervades the entire work, seems to reach its climax in the second movement with its pizzicato opening followed by the soaring melody by the strings which acts as an instrument to show the violins in particular at their finest. This was evident Saturday night as the strings of the Philharmonic are, and have been for many years, noteworthy.

The "Dances from Galanta" by Kodaly proved to be most popular with the audience. These dances, written by Kodaly 18 years ago, are rapidly becoming part of the repertories of an increasing number of orchestras throughout the country.

Show Magyar Side.

Similar to the more popular "Rumanian Dances" of Kodaly's countryman the late Bela Partok, the "Dances from Galanta" show the Magyar side of contemporary Hungarian music in contrast to say, the majority of Ernest Dohnanyi's pseudo-Brahmsian output in symphonic works, which show the combination of a Hungarian composer following German romantic musical tradition!

The dances from "Petrouchka" were beautifully performed with great clarity of detail. This is music which one must hear on repeated occasions to truly appreciate, although it is appealing to many on first hearing. "Petrouchka" is one of Strawinsky's three most popular compositions standing alongside "The Fire Bird" and "the Rite of Spring."

Breaking the rule of "No Encores," Mr. Mitropoulis and his men gave an exciting performance of the "Semiramide Overture" by Rossini, whose good old-fashioned harmonies and wealth of melody more than compensated for the dissonances and atonalities of Stravinsky. The orchestra is scheduled for a return engagement in October.

Comment

WE NOTE THAT . . .

By Henry Marx

OPERA IN CONCERT FORM has become a welcome and entirely legitimate addition to the programs of our symphony orchestras. The main change which has occurred concerns repertory: whereas until a few years ago such performances tended to duplicate the offerings of the opera companies, the emphasis is now on works either never, or seldom given on American stages. There is also a somewhat dramatic style of presentation which has become associated with the present musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and has been dubbed "Mitropoulos production." If Mr. Mitropoulos had no other merits, this program of increasing the symphonic repertory by introducing operas to which he has steadfastly adhered during his three years at the helm of the Philharmonic would alone assure him a place in the annals of American orchestras.

Originally, the idea was anything but sensational. In his time, Arturo Toscanini had done the same thing, although almost exclusively concentrating on Wagner and Verdi—as if he wanted to show that he could do them much better than the Metropolitan, which he quit almost four decades ago, and he undoubtedly proved his point. Even his masterful performances with the NBC Symphony Orchestra of a few years ago—now slowly becoming available on records—will remain unforgettable as crowning achievements of one of the most glorious conductorial careers of all time.

BUT THE TOSCANINI influence was responsible for the fact that other conductors, instead of venturing further afield, tried to copy the Italian maestro, with the result that the boringly repetitive repertory of our few existing lyric theatres was carried into the symphony orchestra. It was Mitropoulos who crashed through this fence of tradition and thereby introduced something entirely new. While his success in so doing was instantaneous, not all conductors followed him in this endeavor: only recently the Indianapolis Symphony, for instance, presented scenes from "Lohengrin" (in an English translation, of which we were shown a few samples which were even more stilted than the German original), and a performance of the second part of "Salome" by the New York Philharmonic was canceled only through the sudden illness of George Szell, who had planned it. Both of these operas are neither little known nor performed, and no reason exists why they should be given the symphony treatment.

LET US TAKE a quick look at what Mitropoulos has offered so far: Darius Milhaud's "Les Choéphores" and Ravel's "Heure Espagnole," Richard Strauss's "Elektra" and Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," Busoni's "Arlecchino" and Monteverdi's "Orfeo," with Milhaud's "Christophe Colombe" and scenes from Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounov" planned for next season. With the possible exception of the latter none of these operas is familiar—and the announcement of the "Boris" project has already led to rumors that the Moussorgsky opus will be revived at the Met, too, where in the past it has had an abominably bad production in Italian (!) and with some of the oldest sets to be found in any opera house in the world. In two other cases Mitropoulos' concert performances have inspired the opera houses to act: "Elektra" was revived by the Met a few weeks ago after lying dormant for more than a dozen years, and the New York Opera Company will do "Wozzeck" later this month.

THAT MITROPOULOS is in no way addicted to modern opera exclusively (although his concern with it is justified in view of the almost complete neglect which it has suffered in this country) he made clear with the recent unbelievably beautiful performance of "Orfeo." Most people, even musically trained ones, know this opera only from their studies of music history; as one of the oldest operas in existence (it dates from 1607), it was revered but hardly ever performed. Instead of putting on one of the many musicological restorations of this opera, Mitropoulos somewhat bravely chose Respighi's "realizazzione libera," a three-act condensation, orchestrated with the ample means of the 20th century and yet truthful to the spirit of the original. It is idle speculation to guess how Monteverdi's orchestra may have sounded, but it can be said with some assurance that even were it possible to assemble the obsolete instruments of his time and have the work performed in an auditorium as it existed then, our ears would hardly delight in the performance. Admittedly, Respighi has underscored the emotional impact of this intensely dramatic opera, but only purists, to whom music is an object of research rather than a living art, will deny him that liberty.

The devotion which Mitropoulos brought to bear on his task resulted again in an unforgettable performance. The subject matter of the opera, simple in itself to the point of primitiveness, with hardly any action at all, cannot be expected to excite an audience of 1952, yet one found himself tensely waiting for the dénouement, almost sighing a breath of relief when Orfeo, through Apollo's timely intervention, was admitted to heaven and to reunion with his Eurydice. Mitropoulos' presentation of the score was masterly indeed; by dividing the excellent chorus of the Schola Cantorum into four sections and placing the singers in the middle, the sides and the far

4,000 ENJOYED N. Y. SYMPHONY

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

The oldest engineering school in America, Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute was host, Saturday night, to the oldest symphony orchestra in the United States in a rewarding cultural union of the arts and sciences.

Hundreds of Albany music lovers swelled the audeince to some 4,000 rapt listeners to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished permanent conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos, the journey to Troy being made necessary through the lack of a suitable auditorium in the Empire State's capital.

Conductor Is Dynamic

Although the host and the guests were [illegible] over the century mark, in actual performing years, the program, with the exception of the opening work by Couperin (1868-1733) was strictly late 19th and early 20th Century music. Mr. Mitropoulous most certainly rates the hackneyed term of "Dynamic" with a capital "D." He has enthusiasm, intelligence and tremendous physical attributes as he stands before the 100-piece ensemble which he conducts without a score.

The Greek director has a most unorthodox conducting stance. He beats phrases rather than measures. His graceful hands, loose-jointed arms and articulate shoulders create a pattern of melodic and rhythmic beauty not always present in the concerts by other major orchestras. At least, he is a creator and not an imitator. One may have formed certain opinions as to the traditional interpretations of some of the works, but none will cavil at the tremendous dramatic effects achieved.

These effects were apparent in the monumental Cesar Franck symphony in D-minor (the French organist's only major symphonic work) which took on new glories under the imaginative treatment of Mr. Mitropoulos. The Kodaly Dances from Galenta were an Hungarian rhapsody in the grand manner, with a climax of Gypsy songs interwoven into a breathtaking dance form.

Mardi Gras of Color

The "Petrouchka" suite by Stravinsky was a veritable Mardi Gras of color and movement, such a spectacle in sound and fury as a Cecil B. DeMille might have evolved had that genius been more interested i nthe aural rather than the visual appeal to two of the five senses. Every instrument in the orchestra comes into play, with a number of percussion interjections not generally associated with the ordinary instrumentation of the so-called classical style.

Breaking the rule of "No Encores," Mr. Mitropoulis and his men gave an exciting performance of the "Semiramide Overture" by Rossini, whose good old-fashioned harmonies and wealth of melody more than compensated for the dissonances and atonalities of Stravinsky. The orchestra is scheduled for a return engagement in October.

end of the stage he created operatic illusions within the well preserved confines of the concert hall. In Frances Greer, Jane Hobson, Charles Kullman, J. Alden Edkins, with Mack Harrell in the title part he had an ensemble that followed his every direction. The resurrection of "Orfeo" is but another example of the broadening of the Philharmonic's repertory undreamed of only a few years ago.

ON RECORDS: Another trend, not less welcome, has to do with the increased opportunities for our orchestras to make recordings. Until recently, only five orchestras were regularly represented on recordings: the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia on Columbia, and the NBC Symphony, the Boston Symphony and the San Francisco Symphony, on RCA Victor. While they will probably continue as the mainstays for some time to come, they will no longer have the advantage which has been denied to other, perhaps less famous, but by no means less meritorious orchestras.

Thus the Louisville Philharmonic's policy of commissioning works for each season has earned it a recording contract with Columbia, with the first two works — Villa-Lobos' "Origin of the Amazon River" and Dello Joio's "Triumph of St. Joan"—just put on tape. The 50-piece orchestra, under the leadership of Robert Whitney, will make all its recordings in Louisville. Columbia has also signed a contract with the Rochester Philharmonic under Erich Leinsdorf. Mercury Records, which recently inked the Chicago Symphony to a pact, has now added the Minneapolis Symphony, under Antal Dorati, which is guaranteed a minimum of four LP records annually for two years. The Pittsburgh Symphony under its new leader William Steinberg has been acquired by Capitol Records. Of the larger recording firms this leaves only MGM and Decca without an American orchestra. Remington Records is another firm which has only foreign orchestras in its catalogue, but it has just signed an exclusive contract for the services of conductor Artur Rodzinski who, however, will record abroad.

Speaking of American orchestras, we were glad to learn that Eugene Ormandy has done what we hoped he would do: appoint a young American as his assistant conductor with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The coveted assignment, which became available with the resignation of Alexander Hilsberg, went to 27-year-old, New Jersey born William R. Smith, who is mainly known as a choral conductor in Philadelphia and Virginia. We can only once more express the wish that each of the major orchestras endeavors in a similar fashion to hire young American assistant conductors; this is the only way for them to acquire the necessary experience and then to gain some permanent positions. At this time, only three major orchestras are in the hands of Americans (Thor Johnson in Cincinnati, Alfred Wallenstein in Los Angeles, and Howard Mitchell in Washington).

The shuffle of conductors, which is the result of recent resignations, has brought Massimo Freccia from New Orleans to Baltimore as successor to Reginald Stewart. Freccia, since 1944 in the Southern city, has been released from his contract there (it ran for another year). Whereas Stewart resigned the Baltimore post because he was dissatisfied with the way the orchestra's season was shortened and the "unremitting competition" of visiting orchestras, Freccia left New Orleans because he was displeased with the methods of selecting soloists. At this writing the conductor posts in San Francisco (wnere Pierre Monteux will retire at the end of this season) and Buffalo (from where Steinberg went to Pittsburgh) are still vacant.

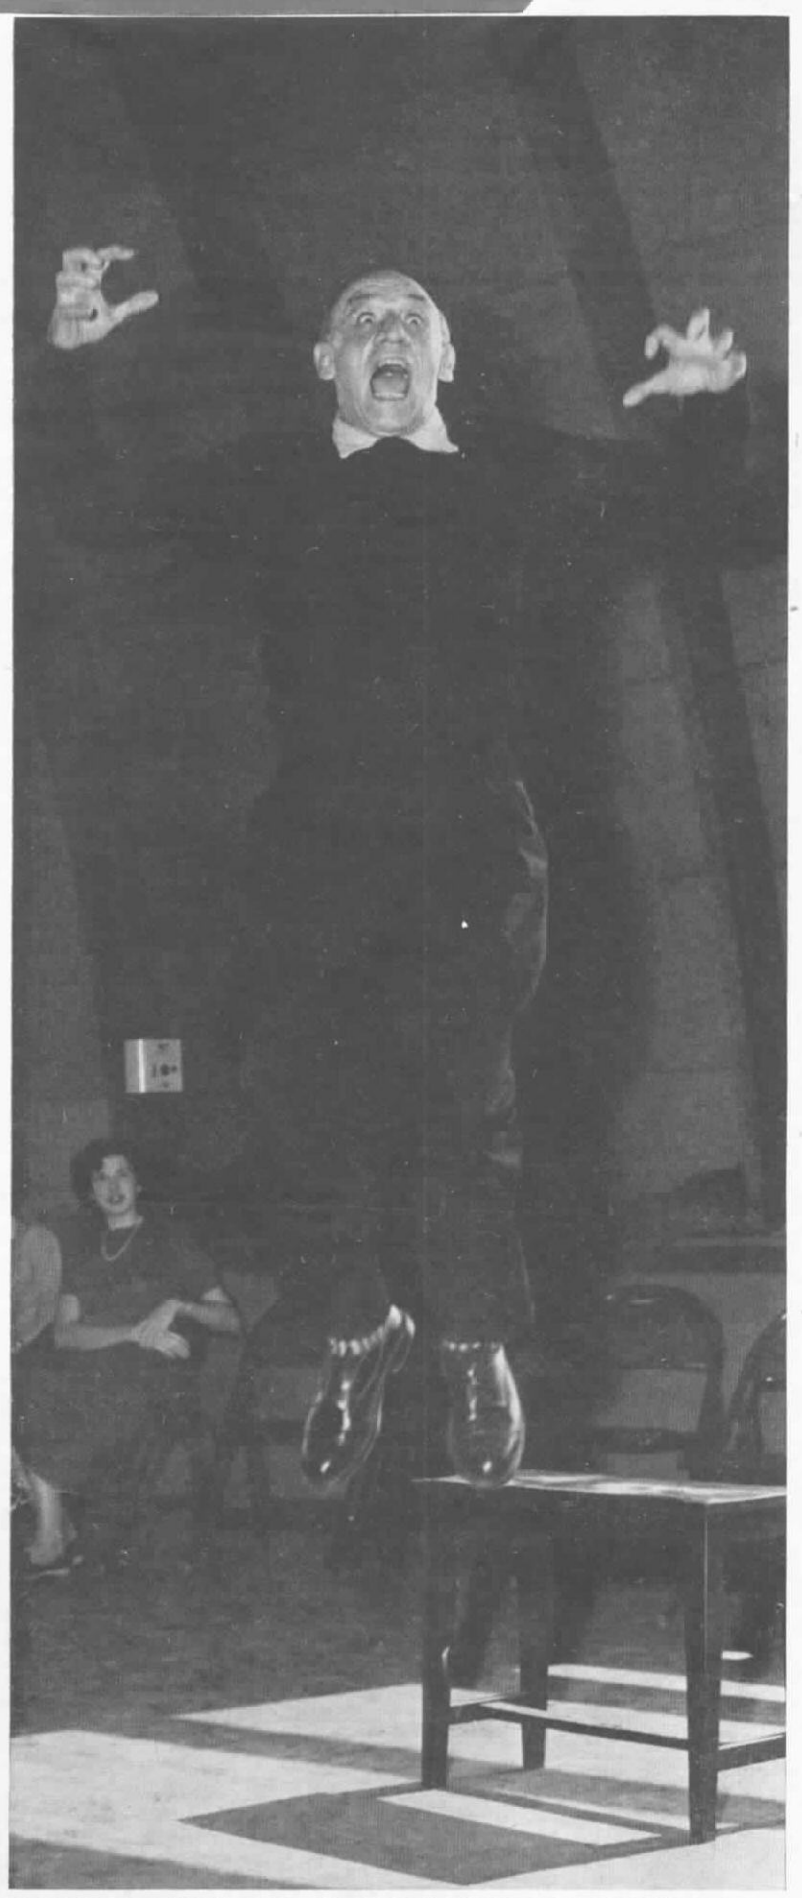
TRANSLATIONS: How does a young singer feel about the language operas should be presented in, particularly one who has sung in many countries in no less than six different tongues? Recently we discussed this question with bass-baritone George London. Because we felt that he must have had good reason to learn his roles in so many languages, we cautiously followed our question with the statement that there certainly are two sides to this problem, but he was more outspoken. "No," he said, "there is only one; if you want to popularize opera you'll have to do it in the vernacular." But, of course, he added, we have to train translators because most of the available translations simply won't do.



This is not only true of translations into English (the names of Rosa Newmarch, Th. Baker and Edward Dent were mentioned in this connection), but also of quite a few into German; at the Vienna State Opera he sang Hoffmann as well as Méphistopheles in the original French, because he felt the German to be unsingable and the authorities there seemed to agree with him. The Boris, incidentally, he did in

MAESTRO MITROPOULOS ZOOMS INTO AIR, EXPRESSING AGONY TO CHOIR

AIRBORNE MAESTRO

Even in confines of concert halls Conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra is wildly gymnastic. During rehearsal recently, he outdid himself. Rehearsing Westminister Choir for performances of Mendelssohn's Elijah, he thought the chorus lacked anguish in its cry, "Help, Lord!" sung after Elijah prophesies disaster. Mounting a chair, Mitropoulos leaped off with a frightful shriek. Everyone agreed that the example brought a fine response of agony from the singers and set a new altitude record for conductors.

Music and Musicians

Season's Highlights

By VIRGIL THOMSON

REMEMBERING the musical season and thumbing through my own reviews of it, I find that it has been chiefly notable, in my estimation, for distinguished orchestral conducting. I have not heard all the musical events. In New York City, where occasions for coverage sometimes number fifty in one week, no one reviewer ever hears everything. Consequently, my own view of the season, like any one else's, is incomplete. But nothing can be done about that. One tries to pick out the best in advance, and one tries to get around during the season to all the kinds of musical events. But neither effort is ever wholly successful. The present report, therefore, is no summary of the season. It is merely a selection of memorable items drawn from those occasions which the writer has actually attended.

Conductors at Work

AMONG those occasions your reviewer has noted no fewer than eight performances by orchestral conductors that have seemed to him (and still do) memorable. Far above average standards of excellence in an age remarkable for high standards in the conductor's art have been the performances of Richard Strauss's "Elektra," directed by Fritz Reiner at the Metropolitan Opera House; of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux, and of Verdi's "Manzoni" Requiem, in which Eugene Ormandy led the Philadelphia Orchestra and two college choirs from the same city. In all three cases the conductor seems to me to have surpassed, both in the force of his interpretation and in the perfection of its orchestral execution, all previous performances of these works that this writer has ever heard.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, in his reading with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of Monteverdi's opera "Orpheus," gave a performance no less perfect, no less illuminating. But since I had not heard the work before, I cannot compare executions of it. This performance, indeed, bore the double gift of an intrinsic loveliness and of a new musical experience. Monteverdi's powerful and touching work, for all its delights as a score to be read, was infinitely more vibrant in performance. And the immediate communicating power of this one was due no less to the conductor's care than to the work's own flame.

Molto applaudito il Concerto di Mitropoulos

La "Quinta sinfonia„ di Prokofieff non può certo fare da contraltare all'"Eroica„, ma ha due "tempi„ assai felici

Quando, circa una quindicina d'anni or sono, Dimitri Mitropoulos apparve per la prima volta sul podio del nostro Comunale, si restò colpiti dalla sua disinvolta maniera di dirigere sempre senza partitura, senza bacchetta (egli era stato uno dei primissimi ad abolirla definitivamente) con una espressività quasi medianica nelle lunghe pause che accennavano, sottolineavano, davano l'avvio senza mai fallire, alle volute della melodia agli accenti del ritmo.

Tale l'abbiamo ritrovato oggi dopo averlo ammirato nell'«Elettra» di Strauss due anni or sono. Il suo interiore dionisismo lo ha portato nei primi due tempi dell'«Eroica» beethoviana ad accelerare un pò troppo il ritmo e quindi, poichè Mitropoulos è sensibile musicista, a ricorrere a rallentandi che non sono consueti nè voluti, quando l'inflessione della frase esigeva un andamento più pacato. Il terzo e specialmente il quarto tempo invece sono risultati centrati bene e animati di quella «verve» che in un tale direttore non manca mai.

Quanto alla «Quinta» Sinfonia di Prokofieff che formava la seconda parte del programma, diremo che se è vero che l'autore si proponeva di creare una specie di «Eroica», allora il fine non è stato raggiunto davvero. Ma le intenzioni del compositore contano fino a un certo punto. Il secondo e il quarto tempo (due «allegri») rivelano invece il più autentico e felice Prokofieff, con gli andamenti ritmici e gli impasti strumentali che gli sono propri.

Nel primo tempo, carico di reminiscenze Wagneriane — e pare perfino incredibile — e nel terzo, pieno di un sentimentalismo prossimo a quello pucciniano, c'è soltanto una sapienza costruttiva che da sola non basta a giustificare un pezzo di musica. Ma in questa seconda parte, Mitropoulos è apparso felicissimo, pronto nel sottolineare ogni intenzione dello autore ed è stato infatti calorosamente e più volte applaudito insieme alla brava orchestra.

XV Maggio Musicale Fiorentino

Il primo concerto sinfonico diretto da Mitropoulos

Di questo interprete, Dimitri Mitropoulos, vivo ancora è in noi il ricordo per il «Requiem» verdiano da lui diretto in uno dei recenti «Maggi»: la misura dell'arte sua ci si era manifestata allora in piena evidenza per essenziali caratteri di rilievo plastico in cui egli sa far vivere una musica secondo i propri originari intenti formali. Si è nuovamente affermato nel concerto di ieri sera lo spirito interpretativo di Mitropoulos specialmente nella «Quinta sinfonia» di Prokofieff, composizione che riguardo alla profonda vitalità artistica di questo autore consolida i giudizi già espressi. Con un ricco estro inventivo in un linguaggio musicale a lui organicamente connaturato, egli giustifica ogni propria espressione sia essa diretto indice di vita sentimentale sia di quello estroso spirito umoresco che dà un definitivo accento e inconfondibili aspetti dell'arte sua; e nella «Quinta sinfonia» appunto il secondo tempo è di ciò dimostrativo. Per un'opera come l'«Eroica» l'ascoltatore si trovava in una situazione più direttamente volta all'arte dell'interprete, la cui seria, ben maturata conoscenza dell'autore, si è palesemente attuata in movenze che davano la strana impressione d'una virtù improvvisatrice.

Il pubblico molto numeroso ha vivamente ammirato il vigore con cui si impone chiara e vivace l'arte del Mitropoulos, applaudendo con fervido calore lui assieme all'orchestra.

Successo di Mitropoulos ieri sera al Comunale

Ieri sera Dimitri Mitropoulos, il grande direttore d'orchestra americano in questi giorni ospite del «Maggio», ha diretto al Comunale un concerto che ha suscitato nel pubblico entusiastici applausi.

Troppo singolare è la personalità di questo artista per poterne parlare in sede di resoconto di cronaca. Rimandiamo perciò ad un prossimo articolo il profilo di questa interessantissima figura di direttore d'orchestra.

GLI SPETTACOLI DEL «MAGGIO»

I due concerti diretti da Mitropoulos

A prima vista l'arte di Mitropoulos appare come una spettacolare esibizione di virtuosismo direttoriale: poichè la tecnica di questo direttore, la sua capacità di trasmettere con immediata prontezza agli esecutori la sua concezione di un testo, e di farlo ascoltare con una mirabolante chiarezza sonora, è tale da trovare difficilmente un raffronto. Ma subito ci si accorge della natura di musicista che sta sotto al virtuoso: un musicista che si definisce in un'orbita che va dal romanticismo al primo espressionismo, da Schumann a Mahler: anche se è capace di rivolgersi a un Prokofiev con una assoluta attendibilità di concezione, e di suonare e dirigere un concerto per pianoforte e orchestra di Malipiero con singolarissime attitudini interpretative. Del «Quarto concerto» di Malipiero, opera recente del compositore veneto, non si arriva a giustificare la necessità interiore, anche se vi si avverte una mano di musicista sicura e una sensibilità raffinata. E non sembra che la «Prima sinfonia» di Gustav Mahler regga al confronto degli anni. Ma va osservato che, di quest'opera, pur così ineguale, Mitropoulos ha una un'esecuzione sorprendente per rilievo sonoro, per intensità di espressione, per completa adesione emotiva. Così come della «Quinta sinfonia» di Prokofiev: dove il musicista russo dispone la sua inconfondibile materia musicale in una forma arguta e chiaramente definita. «Ouverture, scherzo e finale» di Schumann è opera poco nota del grande romantico tedesco, e lo dimostra intento a compensare il suo tormentato e sofferto mondo fantastico in una forma saldamente accademica. E' qui anche il punto che sembra possa definire l'essenza della musicalità di Mitropoulos: poichè egli è un direttore capace di trascinare l'orchestra fino alle più affocate ed esplosive concitazioni di suono e di espressione: ma senza perdere per un attimo l'equilibrio, il controllo di sè, soprattutto una limpidezza strutturale propria, semmai, alle interpretazioni cosiddette «oggettive». Ed è questo anche il motivo delle discussioni sollevate dalla esecuzione della «Terza sinfonia» beethoveniana, nella quale si è visto un troppo marcato prevalere della personalità di Mitropoulos su quella della musica da eseguire.

Il successo di questo grande direttore, nei due concerti di martedì e di domenica, è stato clamorosissimo: tutte le musiche in programma sono state accolte da clamorose ovazioni, di cui è degna partecipe la splendida orchestra del «Maggio musicale».

Al Maggio Musicale

Entusiasmo per Mitropulos

Ieri sera teatro gremito, pubblico elegante e attento. Sul podio, uno dei direttori di maggior nome sulla scena mondiale: Dimitri Mitropulos, già noto a Firenze prima, e in un recente «Maggio».

Il suo programma, dedicato a Beethoven e a Prokofieff, ha trascinato gli ascoltatori in un entusiasmo senza riserve: un successo grandissimo, che va alla nostra ottima orchestra non meno che all'illustre direttore. Ci soffermeremo più a lungo sull'arte direttoriale di Mitropulos dopo il suo secondo concerto, nel quale il celebre maestro sarà anche pianista solista nel concerto per pianoforte e orchestra di Malipiero.

TALIA CENTRALE — Martedì 13 M

I "GRANDI„ DELLA DIREZIONE D'ORCHESTRA

Dimitri Mitropoulos artista dionisiaco e moderno

Quando venne a Firenze tanti anni fa lo fischiarono - Ora, nel ciclo delle manifestazioni del "Maggio„ ha suscitato l'entusiasmo

IN questi ultimi tempi sono nati molti miti sulla direzione d'orchestra. E quello che più colpisce la fantasia del pubblico non è tanto il progredire della coscienza critica dei «maghi della bacchetta» (molti dei quali neanche a farlo apposta, preferiscono ora non impugnare con la destra neanche un fuscellino) quanto piuttosto lo «sport» dei vari direttori di orchestra: e i più grandi sono tutti ormai catalogati ed esaltati per prodigiose doti di memoria, per straordinaria abilità di chiaroscuro e di forza; anche, talvolta, per la linea elegante e ricca di valori, diciamo pure coreutici, del loro gesto.

E' certo, però, che l'«arte» della direzione d'orchestra è tale, oggi, da muovere non solamente la curiosità e l'interesse del pubblico in cerca, spesso, di emozioni «sportive»; ma costituisce per tutti — musicisti o no — un «fenomeno» che fa meditare più di quanto non accada, forse, quando si ha da analizzare il potere interpretativo di un pianista, di un violinista, di un cantante. Ascoltando quello che esce da un'orchestra guidata, mettiamo, da un direttore come Dimitri Mitropoulos, i musicisti stessi stentano a credere che si possa (non si sa per quali doti medianiche, per quale naturale potere di comunicazione) trasformare l'indole, la cultura quasi, di cento persone, e costringerle a diventare uno strumento: che vale non solo per il suo «insieme» meccanico, ma per una tensione misteriosa che è ebbrezza o contemplazione di ritmi e di suoni, innamoramento profondo e univoco. Ci può essere il direttore d'orchestra «classico» e «dionisiaco», si può aver l'impressione ora di una personalità, ora di un'altra — e quindi di «interpretazioni» diversissime di uno stesso brano di musica —; ma quello che fa meditare, (anche se chi ascolta è, ripetiamo, musicista scaltrito) e che sembra essere quasi l'esaltazione e il superamento di tutte le facoltà musicali è proprio questo potere di comunicare agli uomini che sono diventati strumenti (come il martelletto di un pianoforte, come la corda di un violino) per far loro ritrovare un'umanità che si comunichi ad altri uomini. Si guarda, si cerca di scoprire: il giovane che si avvia sulla strada della direzione d'orchestra crede di aver trovato di volta in volta il segreto del «grande» che ha davanti: l'espressività e l'autonomia della mano sinistra (nei trattati considerata la mano dell'espressione e del colore), la chiarezza quasi grafica della destra (destinata a determinare il ritmo); e poi, se questo non basta a giustificare il carattere di un'esecuzione, la potenza dello sguardo.

Ma il mistero non si svela: e alla fantasia e al pensiero non resta che fermarsi davanti a queste «nature», a questi «animali» fatti di musica che «sentono» i suoni e li sciolgono e li guidano; anche quelli lontani, anche quelli agglutinati nella mano malferma di un vecchio orchestrale: che è qualcosa di diverso dalla tastiera di un pianoforte.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, il celebre direttore americano che ha diretto in questi ultimi giorni due concerti sinfonici nel ciclo delle manifestazioni del «Maggio», è una di queste «nature». Confrontare la «tecnica» di questo grande maestro con quella di quei due o tre altri che possono, oggi, stargli a paragone è inutile; non foss'altro perchè il progresso dell'indagine critica ci ha insegnato a non considerare la tecnica (e le sue applicazioni) come un fatto staccato dall'espressione. Si può dire, certo, di aver di fronte un vero «fenomeno», di una prodigiosa prontezza di riflessi, di una chiarezza mentale che non è più umana; ma quel che più ci interessa è la sua personalità d'interprete, limitata se si vuole, ma terribilmente evidente.

Mitropoulos, a Firenze, ha diretto la «Terza» di Beethoven e la «Quinta» di Prokofieff, l'«Ouverture, scherzo e finale» di Schumann, il «Concerto n. 4 per pianoforte e orchestra» di Gian Francesco Malipiero e la «Sinfonia n. 1» di G. Mahler. La scelta di questi programmi (la «Terza» di Beethoven è stata forse inclusa per venire incontro ai desideri della Sovrintendenza del Teatro Comunale) ci dà subito l'idea di un ambiente. Siamo fuori da una concezione classica: problemi nuovi si sono affacciati alla mente dell'interprete che è portato a scegliersi soprattutto i momenti più tormentati e turbolenti della storia della musica. Il suono, il ritmo, il colore, sono sentiti con una ebbrezza dionisiaca, con la gioia di un artigiano meravigliosamente pazzo del suo lavoro; e di qui nasce un senso fisico e elettrizzante del dialogo musicale, ora teso in una specie di spasimo sonoro, ora rattenuto in vibrazioni febbricitanti. Ma mentre, per altri direttori «dionisiaci», il tuffarsi nella musica sembra diventare un progressivo perdere di coscienza, quello che impressiona, nell'arte di Mitropoulos, è una vertiginosa chiarezza, un meraviglioso controllo: egli si guarda dentro, con una prontezza mirabile, e da questo suo «aderire» alla musica nasce una gioia tormentosa, tutta moderna, insaziabile.

Così, Mitropoulos interprete si sente in genere più a suo agio nel clima musicale degli ultimi sessanta, settant'anni di musica: e la sua «Terza» di Beethoven, pur condotta con ferma volontà e chiara penetrazione formale della partitura, sembrava a momenti quasi contorcersi sotto la mano di un'artefice meravigliosamente crudele: e talvolta faceva pensare ad una anticipazione romantica dei valori dell'«espressionismo». Ma chi ha ascoltato Mitropoulos dirigere, suonando anche la parte del pianoforte solista, il «Concerto n. 4» di Malipiero (un'opera recente del compositore veneziano, che non ha i segni del capolavoro, ma certo quelli di una chiara personalità), chi ha vissuto soprattutto la commozione suscitata nell'interpretazione della «Sinfonia n. 1» di Mahler, ha provato senza dubbio quasi un senso di sbigottimento davanti all'arte di questo direttore, che è musicista profondissimo.

A Firenze l'avevamo ascoltato, due anni fa, nell'«Elettra» di Strauss e nel «Requiem» di Verdi. L'abbiamo risentito in questi giorni in due concerti sinfonici, con un programma scelto con grande onestà. E, vedendolo anche in veste di pianista (un pianista intelligentissimo, e senza velleità «concertistiche») ci sarà stato qualcuno che si è ricordato dell'ormai lontano 1933: quando Mitropoulos portò a Firenze, come direttore e come pianista, il «Concerto pour la main gauche» di Ravel: e il pubblico lo fischiò. Domenica sera, quel pubblico lo applaudì entusiasticamente in Malipiero e in Mahler: e quindi, bisogna dire, che un progresso c'è stato, e non possiamo che rallegrarcene.

Ma il progresso culturale del pubblico si fa soltanto con questi artisti. I «facili», i direttori «tuttofare», gli «euforici» farebbero bene, forse, a rompere la bacchetta, se ancora non l'hanno gettata via, per venire incontro alla moda.

Leonardo Pinzauti

Il secondo concerto di Mitropoulos

E' stato questo concerto, anche per le musiche del suo programma, a rendere manifesto in tutti i suoi aspetti lo spirito interpretativo di Dimitri Mitropoulos, da giudicarsi oggi come uno dei tre o quattro massimi direttori d'orchestra, dotato di un'arte originalissima e potente. Le musiche di Schumann, Malipiero e Mahler, si presentavano come tre diverse espressioni di un mondo unitario nel suo intimo significato se pur vario nella sua storia, storia che è anche quella appunto di un linguaggio musicale-strumentale, vivo di un tormentato lirismo e di una ansiosa ricerca di nuovi valori in Schumann, esuberante di tutti i risultati della conquista romantica in Mahler e in Malipiero indicativo di una crisi di tali risultati, orientata verso una asciutta interiorità. Di queste tre espressioni la più completa qui appare quella mahleriana per il suo carattere comprensivo di due elementi, l'elegiaco-paesistico e il drammatico-spirituale. Fino a qual segno il Mitropoulos abbia in sè rivissuto per affinità elettiva questo ricco mondo, egli ha potuto ieri darne la misura anche per quella immediatezza penetrativa nell'organismo orchestrale che specialmente per Mahler si è palesato in una affermazione vitale al di là d'ogni visibile suo rapporto col gesto del direttore, e per Malipiero questo direttore appunto in ordine a ciò ha potuto presentarsi come elemento della compagine strumentale nella parte del pianoforte, che qui tuttavia impropriamente è indicata come solistica.

Il numeroso pubblico ha dimostrato dell'arte di Mitropoulos piena comprensione, così da sentire di esprimere a lui un riconoscente consenso con scatti d'applausi ed ovazioni ad ogni numero del programma e più che mai alla fine del concerto.

VIRGILIO DOPLICHER

Il secondo concerto di Mitropulos al Comunale

Un pubblico abbastanza folto ha applaudito al Maestro Dimitri Mitropulos, questa volta non solo direttore d'orchestra ma anche solista al piano nel difficile concerto n. 4 per pianoforte e orchestra di Gianfrancesco Malipiero.

Di questa opera del compositore veneziano si può dire che non rivela nulla di eccezionalmente nuovo sulla personalità del musicista e, in sostanza, non se ne può dire nè male nè bene. Mitropulos è apparso un pianista attento, specialmente al gioco delle sonorità, padrone ed insieme maestro della sua parte.

Nello «Scherzo» di Schumann, meno riusciti la «Overture» e il finale. Nel terzo tempp della sinfonia di Mahler, si manifesta, forse meglio che negli altri, la personalità composta dell'autore. Ambedue le opere sono state dirette magistralmente a memoria da Mitropulos, e, alla fine, il pubblico ha tributato concordi applausi con richieste perfino di bis.

AU MAGGIO DE FLORENCE

Le 1er concert · M. D. Mitropoulos

Pour lutter avec quelque chance de succès contre une concurrence de plus en plus âpre — car le nombre de ces réunions s'accroît d'année en année — et pour gagner plus sûrement à leurs entreprises la faveur du public international de snobs élégants, qui a pris l'habitude de hanter ces manifestations, les organisateurs de festivals se voient contraints aujourd'hui de recourir toujours davantage aux méthodes qui ont fait la fortune de feu Barnum : A prix d'or, ils s'assurent la collaboration de quelques vedettes dont le nom possède un particulier pouvoir d'attraction, quand bien même leur valeur intrinsèque s'avère souvent fort aléatoire.

C'est là la raison pour laquelle on voit désormais des personnalités d'ordre résolument secondaire — tels un Léopold Stokowski, un Rafaël Kubelik et un Herbert von Karajan — s'installer au programme de grands festivals qui, jusqu'ici, s'enorgueillissaient de n'accueillir que des artistes de la classe la plus élevée et de la qualité la plus incontestable.

A ce point de vue, le cas de M. Léopold Stokowski est particulièrement symptomatique. Car si ce manieur de baguette peut se prévaloir d'une adresse peu commune, s'il sait à fond l'art de conduire un orchestre et d'obtenir de lui une exécution remarquablement précise et nuancée, si, au surplus, les procédés de la publicité moderne n'ont plus de secrets pour lui, force est bien d'ajouter qu'il se montre déplorablement ignorant — ou dédaigneux — des lois du style, qu'il est affligé d'un goût déplorable, et qu'en somme il fait figure de brillant et vain virtuose, bien plutôt que d'interprète. Ce qui ne l'empêche pas, au reste, de jouir, outre-Océan, d'une bruyante notoriété à laquelle il doit, sans aucun doute, d'avoir été appelé, cette année, à conduire deux des grands concerts symphoniques donnés à Florence, dans le cadre du Maggio musicale...

Tout de même en va-t-il du chef d'orchestre grec Dimitri Mitropoulos auquel était échu, l'autre soir, l'honneur de diriger le concert d'inauguration de la saison 1952.

Comme M. Léopold Stokowski, M. Dimitri Mitropoulos est fixé aujourd'hui aux Etats-Unis, où il a réussi à faire la conquête d'un public peu exigeant qui le tient pour l'un des grands chefs de notre époque... encore que la véritable place de cet artiste soit au cinéma, bien plutôt qu'à la salle de concerts.

A la vérité, on ne saurait lui contester certains mérites qui ne sont pas sans importance. En effet, il exerce une manifeste et solide emprise sur ses musiciens, et il excelle à faire passer en eux l'ardeur dont il est tout brûlant. Il a de l'allant et le sens du rythme. D'autre part, il équilibre avec soin le volume des diverses familles instrumentales, s'il n'attache pas toujours une suffisante attention à la beauté de la sonorité, et s'il montre une fâcheuse prédilection pour les éclats tonitruants.

Cela en usant d'une mimique qui, souvent, se traduit de manière assez inélégante. Car, lorsqu'il se propose d'obtenir des ripiénistes une particulière intensité du son ou de l'expression, M. Dimitri Mitropoulos recourt à des trémoussements convulsifs de la tête et des avant-bras qui, par instants, le font ressembler à un pantin épileptique : spectacle qui en impose peut-être à un public yankee, mais qui, chez nous, a le don de divertir irrésistiblement un auditoire cultivé auquel ces simagrées apparaissent aussi vaines que grotesques.

Mais ce qui est autrement grave, c'est la conception pour le moins étrange que M. Dimitri Mitropoulos se fait du style beethovénien, ainsi que l'attesta son interprétation des deux premiers épisodes de la Symphonie héroïque, où les accents et les nuances étaient inutilement grossis et poussés à l'extrême, où le pathétique devenait pathos, et où les périodes d'expression grave prenaient tout soudain un caractère déclamatoire, grâce à une déplorable boursouflure du phrasé, grâce à des élargissements arbitraires du tempo qui entendaient conférer une importance inattendue à certaines notes de la ligne mélodique, grâce aussi à une perpétuelle instabilité du mouvement et à des inflexions agogiques démesurées et parfaitement injustifiées.

De ce fait, l'Allegro con brio et la Marche funèbre de la Symphonie héroïque souffrirent, tour à tour, d'une pénible emphase et d'une sensiblerie dont la pensée de Beethoven s'accommode assez malaisément. Juste est-il toutefois, de reconnaître que le scherzo et le finale, où l'élément de mouvement prédomine nettement, furent exposés dans un esprit plus satisfaisant.

De même en alla-t-il de la 5e Symphonie de Serge Prokofief, aimable et brillant babillage d'un auteur qui a en partage une fantaisie très vive et un métier étourdissant, mais qui, se contraignant, cultive un langage d'une banalité accablante, soucieux qu'il est visiblement de se conformer au dirigisme rigoureux qu'impose aux artistes soviétiques, un gouvernement dont — on le sait de reste — le dessein est de susciter l'éclosion d'un art destiné expressément au populaire, accordé à la mentalité encore bien élémentaire de celui-ci, et surtout libéré du « formalisme bourgeois et décadent » qui, au dire des esthètes du Kremlin, mène aujourd'hui la musique occidentale au tombeau...

De fait, dans sa 5e Symphonie, Serge Prokofief passe d'un ton solennel et emphatique à des fadeurs écœurantes, à un orientalisme de bazar et à des propos d'une incroyable inconsistance qui doivent remplir d'aise un auditoire médiocrement exigeant sur la qualité de la langue qu'on lui parle, mais qui présentent un intérêt éminemment discutable pour un public plus raffiné.

Ce qui n'empêche pas l'œuvre de marcher d'un pas allègre, d'avoir de la couleur et de la vivacité, et de bénéficier d'une écriture orchestrale aussi ingénieuse que variée et que suggestive.

SERATA BURRASCOSA ALLA SCALA

"Wozzeck„ di Alban Berg diretto da Dimitri Mitropoulos

Discepolo e amico di Schönberg, Alban Berg ebbe la rara fortuna di superarlo. Dove lo abbia superato è noto. Non nel rigorismo dogmatico di un sistema — il sistema atonale poi codificato nelle leggi dodecafoniche — ch'egli pure applica con opportuni temperamenti; bensì nella umanizzazione e drammatizzazione di una musica che nell'autore di Pierrot lunaire appariva ancora scontrosa, astratta e spiritualmente sdivinizzata. Questa interessante opera di Alban Berg, eseguita per la prima volta in Italia una decina d'anni fa a Roma e poi due anni fa a Napoli e ieri sera alla Scala, questo Wozzeck ricavato da un pessimistico dramma tra verista e metafisico del giovanissimo primottocentesco Georg Büchner, è indubbiamente il prodotto di una mente ispirata ai procedimenti compositivi schönberghiani, di una lucida e forse profetica mente di esatto matematico dei suoni e di teorico sovvertitore dei tradizionali rapporti tonali. Ma è anzitutto un dramma liricamente vivo nella sua morbosa tetraggine, un dramma dinamico e pulsante che non può lasciare indifferenti.

Fu lo stesso Berg una ventina d'anni prima di morire, quindi suppergiù durante la prima guerra mondiale, a scegliere e raggruppare in un libretto tripartito le quindici scene fondamentali della omonima « ballata tragica » del Büchner, originalmente composta di venticinque scene. Naturalmente le quindici sulle quali il Berg aveva posto l'attenzione furono quelle che maggiormente rispondevano alle sue visioni catastrofiche della vita contemporanea e morale e sociale: peggio, della vita dell'uomo di sempre, da quando per sua disgrazia nasce. Furono le quindici scene che per la violenza dei contrasti, la crudezza delle tinte, l'amarezza dei sarcasmi, la desolazione delle anime e la sterilità dei cuori servivano a meglio organizzarsi in un documento d'accusa, non contro le povere creature umane — persecutori e perseguitati, derisori e derisi, traditori e traditi — ma contro una tragica fatalità dispotica: forse il Dio della Bibbia che legge l'infedele sposa di Wozzeck, il quale sopra tutte le creature incombe, il quale in tutte le creature mortali ha insinuato l'invincibile germe del male. E' in quest'opera tutto un panorama di diseredati, di deformati, di alienati, di minorati, un brulicare di esseri cui, come ai vermi, è imposto di strisciare. Nessuna speranza di salvezza, nessun raggio di luce nel groviglio di volgarità innocenti e sciatte, non un solo impulso ideale neppure nei timidi e sporadici e subitamente soffocati tentativi di nobilitazione. La prostituta resta prostituta anche dopo che diventa madre. Il Capitano è scemo per natura, il Dottore pazzo per antonomasia, il Tamburmaggiore vanitoso e brutale senza rimedio, gli altri si ubbriacano o dormono. Così la luna è macchiata di sangue e il ruscello bagnato d'acqua viscida. Così il soldato protagonista, uomo apparentemente semplice e buono e vagamente ingenuo e approssimativamente filosofo, è in realtà un ribelle automatico per mancanza di virilità, di equilibrio e di freni inibitori, assassino in potenza fin dal principio, quando rade la barba del capitano.

Analizzare ora i mezzi espressivi, la concezione tecnica e spettacolare, le finalità estetiche e rappresentative del teatro di Alban Berg, anche ricondotto al solo esemplare del Wozzeck (l'altro esemplare è la Lulù), è impresa che lo spazio non consente. Non basta avvertire che ogni base tonale tradizionalmente intesa è abolita e che la scrittura risulta come una combinazione indefinita, senza preoccupazioni di consonanze o dissonanze, di un numero determinato di suoni originari e generatori, scelti in precedenza così da configurare, essi soli, tutti i temi e gli accordi in disposizione tanto orizzontale quanto verticale. Non basta individuare la basilare costruzione concertistica, con carattere formale quasi di miniatura, che offre al compositore gli schemi della passacaglia, della variazione, del valzer, dello scherzo, della danza popolare, della « invenzione » con fuga finale, via via usati senza tuttavia comprimere il valore drammatico e atmosferico dell'opera sicuramente teatrale. Non basta osservare da vicino i risultati d'una vocalità ipertesa, singhiozzata, falsettonata, quelli d'una istrumentazione nervosa, contorta, spaziale, e lugubre e vibrante a un tempo. Non basta. Poiché il dono della creazione, con Alban Berg, non è soltanto o non è più questione di linguaggio, di forme e di principi sistematici, ma è altro ch'è difficile definire, difficilissimo approfondire. Siamo forse in presenza di un grande poeta dei suoni, un poeta notturno dalle cupe imprigionate espressioni aforistiche, dalle ardite meravigliose visioni tragiche. E sia pure la poesia del dissolvimento, la disperata poesia della negazione, peggio, della putrefazione: poesia resta, così come l'ultramoderno Alban Berg resta un romantico nel senso di individualista, di soggettivo arbitrario e spregiudicato. Noi Alban Berg non possiamo amarlo e ce ne dispiace. Una certa salute fisica, una certa non dissipata fede religiosa ce lo impediscono. Ma dobbiamo ammirarlo soprattutto dove, fuori dalle mefitiche paludi d'un romanticismo invertito, egli pare dire in musica una parola nuova. Una parola di oggi. Di domani. Chè di oggi, probabilmente di domani, è il suo scarno sintetismo stenografico, lucido provocante scardinato abbrividente, che si allaccia alle evasioni infinite e supercromatiche di Wagner, alle condensazioni accordali di Debussy, al simbolismo spettrale di Schönberg, al razionalismo avaro di Busoni. Di oggi, probabilmente di domani, e subito dopo il sontuoso barocco di Strauss e il timbrico nudismo neoclassico di Stravinski, è l'anelito berghiano alla purità estatica, ottenuta con bagliori istantanei, con immagini filiformi aculeate, e come generate e poi spaurite e disperse da una primordiale centrifuga forza disgregatrice.

La musica di Wozzeck procede o meglio incide per segmenti, intersecazioni brevi, viluppi apparentemente casuali e tronchi, azzardi cacofonici d'un fascino occulto. La personalità del creatore vi si delinea ricca e imperiosa. La si indovina anche se non sappiamo determinarla siccome proiettata innanzi nel tempo. La si sente anche se avvertiamo con qualche sforzo le sue interiori illuminazioni, sfolgorate alla superficie nella tessitura di vaganti melodie parlate o declamate o melismate, nella crudezza dei timbri ossessivi allucinanti maligni, nella essenzialità aggressiva del discorso strumentale rinsecchito frastagliato sussultorio. E' tutto un periodare mozzo, una punteggiatura eccitata, un'asimmetria ondulosa e totale, senza risolvenze, nè innesti, nè relazioni modulanti e cadenzali, nè parentele di note fondamentali e dominanti a toni relativi. Lo spirito di chi ascolta ne è percosso, a volte offeso, più spesso disorientato. Sprigiona dalla partitura sensoriamente ostile il senso dell'incubo freudiano della predestinazione al male, del fatalismo tenebroso e crudele. Specialmente negli atti secondo e terzo, tale senso addirittura supera e travolge i pregi e i difetti del linguaggio ermetico, addirittura cancella le storture e le deformazioni sonore, le quali non riflettevano qui che le storture e le deformazioni dell'animo umano. Nella marcia bandistica, nel valzer danzato e nella canzone sguaiata, nello stridore grandioso e presago dell'osteria, dove appunto le stonature deformatrici sono mezzo espressivo immediato e irresistibile, l'atmosfera drammatico-realistica della tragedia si espande altrettanto solenne quanto terrificante. L'intima contraddizione del soldato Wozzeck, essere sfruttato, malato e « disarmonico », ma il cui istinto barbarico è più forte di ogni convenzione morale, è attuata con luccicante vivezza di duri conflitti e con lapidario stile. E' psicologicamente denudata senza pietà. Una sola deviazione sentimentale tradisce il poeta notturno nel toccante episodio finale dell'opera, quando il bambino di Wozzeck va coi compagni a curiosare sul luogo ove giace il cadavere della mamma uccisa. Ma è cosa, ahi, superflua a tutti gli effetti voluti dall'autore.

Il compito di districare, comunicare, potenziare la partitura a volte indecifrabile del Wozzeck, governando insieme la concertazione d'uno spettacolo eccezionalmente ruvido e complicato, è stato assolto da Dimitri Mitropoulos con vigore di comando pari alla raffinatezza della sensibilità, con chiarezza di indagine non inferiore alla facoltà d'equilibratore perfetto dei valori sinfonici e vocali, dinamici ed espressivi. L'opera d'arte, anche dove feriva, dove umiliava, dove pareva sbandare nelle zone gelide d'un surrealismo sanguigno, è stata realizzata con pienezza di risultati. Sul palcoscenico — come già a Roma nell'esecuzione diretta da Serafin — Tito Gobbi ha interpretato con maschera intensamente drammatica e con voce adeguata e calda il personaggio di Wozzeck, avendo ancora a inestimabile compagno per la parte del monomaniaco Dottore il bravissimo Italo Tajo. Una Maria ben piantata vocalmente e scenicamente la Dorothy Dow, un simpatico Tamburmaggiore il Picchi, un Capitano grottescamente scolpito Hugues Cuenod. Appropriati nelle parti di fianco il Monteanu, Badioli, Campi, Della Pergola, Zareska e Fort. Ben preparato il coro da Vittore Veneziani. Impeccabilmente armonizzate e intonate alla spoglia desolazione del dramma le scene sui bozzetti di Gianni Ratto. Più ironicamente realistici i figurini di Ebe Colciaghi. Regia di Herbert Graf assolutamente esemplare. Allestimento e giochi di luce, diretti da Benois, di suggestiva efficacia.

Serata burrascosa. Abbiamo contato ventidue chiamate complessive, dopo i tre atti, agli artisti, al direttori di scena e al direttore d'orchestra e concertatore Mitropoulos, anche solo. Ciascuna chiamata ha segnato un uragano di applausi e una più contenuta tempesta di fischi. Mitropoulos a un certo punto tra l'una e l'altra chiamata coronante il secondo atto ha chiesto di parlare al pubblico. Ha detto di non deplorare i fischi, qualche volta necessari, ha però aggiunto che il Wozzeck è tale opera che vuole una speciale concentrazione di pensiero, quindi ha pregato di rinviare alla fine dello spettacolo le manifestazioni di intemperanza. In verità non crediamo che il pubblico della Scala meritasse la cortese lezione. Per il Console e per la Proserpina era accaduto ben altro. Il pubblico di ieri sera, in fin dei conti, si era limitato ad acclamare e a disapprovare soltanto dopo calato il sipario su ciascuno degli atti.

Diciassette anni dopo

Dimitri Mitropulos, colto dall'obbiettivo alla Scala fra una prova e l'altra dell'opera « Wozzeck » di Alban Berg, che egli dirigerà giovedì prossimo. Mitropulos è nativo di Atene, ed ha studiato a Berlino dove fra gli altri ebbe come maestro Ferruccio Busoni. Nel 1924 formò nella capitale greca un'orchestra e la diresse per tredici anni offrendo concerti in tutta l'Europa. Nel '37 si trasferì negli Stati Uniti come direttore stabile dell'orchestra sinfonica di Minneapolis; da tre anni è passato alla direzione della Filarmonica di Nuova York. Mitropulos mancava dalla Scala dal 1935.

COMBATTUTA ALLA SCALA LA BATTAGLIA DEL WOZZECK

L'opera di Berg è il più allucinante dramma del teatro lirico

Cronaca musicale di Teodoro Celli

La "battaglia per il Wozzeck" è stata combattuta alla Scala con grande impegno dalla pattuglia dei "mistici della dodecafonia", i quali, da ben predisposte posizioni strategiche in platea, nei palchi e nelle gallerie, hanno fatto il possibile per attribuire al buon successo ottenuto dall'opera di Alban Berg un significato più esteso, di fiducia in un sistema e in una scuola. Occorre riconoscere che i suddetti "mistici" sono stati notevolmente aiutati, nel raggiungimento del loro intento, da due fattori: dai soliti, insistenti e diciamo pur maleducati, fischietti "da tranviere", i quali valgono assai bene a rinfocolare, per reazione, gli applausi; e da un inopinato e ingiustificabile intervento oratorio del direttore d'orchestra Dimitri Mitropoulos. Il grande maestro, comparso alla ribalta dopo il secondo atto, ha fatto, ad un tratto, cenno di voler parlare; ottenuto a fatica il silenzio, ha dichiarato che il dirigere un'opera come il Wozzeck richiede "una grande concentrazione", ragion per cui pregava i dissenzienti "dii astenersi dal fischiare durante l'esecuzione". Ora, fra le caratteristiche di certi ascoltatori v'è quella del compiacersi nel "ricevere una lezione"; così, alcuni spettatori, udite le parole del greco Dimitrii Mitropoulos, salirono immediatamente al settimo cielo e furono pronti a giurare sulla grandezza del Wozzeck. Noi, però, ritenemmo e tuttora riteniamo che Mitropoulos abbia fatto molto male ad arringare il pubblico dal palcoscenico della Scala, anche se, d'altro canto, non ci sentiamo di approvare coloro che disturbavano durante lo spettacolo. Un interprete, com'è un direttore d'orchestra, non può scendere in polemica col pubblico, sotto pena di turbare il delicato rapporto che deve stabilirsi fra l'opera d'arte e chi si trova a contemplarla. Un artista, poi, com'è Mitropoulos, avrebbe dovuto astenersi dal prender la parola in quel teatro dove Arturo Toscanini (tanto per fare un nome solo) si limitò sempre ad esprimersi mediante la sola bacchetta.

Un ulteriore rinforzo nella "battaglia per il Wozzeck" gli zelatori della dodecafonia lo ricevettero da gruppetti di spettatori comunisteggianti, i quali non risparmiarono gli applausi alla "polemica sociale" implicita nell'opera di Berg. Costoro evidentemente non sapevano che il Wozzeck è proibito nei Paesi al di là della "cortina di ferro", in quanto vi è considerato un "esempio di musica degenerata", proprio come lo giudicava Hitler. Tutti questi fattori, dunque, tolgono all'esito ottenuto dal Wozzeck una seria significazione. Wozzeck è un'opera importante, ma è vecchia di trent'anni e come tale avrebbe dovuto essere serenamente considerata; è un'opera che si basa su procedimenti armonici atonali e, a volte, dodecafonici, ma che rappresenta un caso unico, coerentissimo ma non ripetibile, per le ragioni che esporremo. Riconoscere l'efficacia del Wozzeck non significa attribuire fiducia all'atonalismo; ma anzi concludere che in quest'opera Berg ha esaurito ogni possibilità dell'atonalismo. Cosicché, chi procede su quella via non può, ormai, che farsi imitatore magari inconsapevole di questa allucinata partitura.

Il viennese Alban Berg nacque nel 1885 e morì nel 1935. Dal 1904, e per sei anni, fu allievo di Arnold Schönberg, il quale già, esasperando la concitazione cromatica del Wagner del Tristano, aveva raggiunto gli inospitali lidi dell'atonalismo e si preparava, dopo aver distrutto, a "ricostruire", enunciando la teoria dodecafonica (vedi Oggi, 1951, n. 30). Il Wozzeck fu scritto da Berg fra il 1914 e il 1920, e fu rappresentato a Berlino nel 1925; dopo di esso il compositore viennese pose mano ad un'altra opera, Lulù, che doveva lasciare incompiuta. Per una di quelle affinità elettive a grande distanza di tempo, tutt'altro che rare nella storia dell'arte, l'argomento del Wozzeck fu suggerito a Berg da un dramma del poeta germanico ottocentesco Georg Büchner, scritto nel 1836; un dramma rimasto incompiuto, e dal quale Berg ha tolto quindici scene, brevissime, raggruppate in tre atti. Ora, a noi interessa qui esaminare unicamente il Wozzeck come Berg lo ha drammaticamente costituito in musica; d'altronde le quindici scene sembrano contenere l'essenziale del dramma büchneriano. Wozzeck è un "soldato semplice", e vorrebbe simboleggiare l'umanità più infima, nella sua condizione di avvilimento e di oppressione. È attendente del capitano — nella prima scena ci è presentato mentre fa la barba al suo superiore — ed è da lui schernito per la sua semplicità, per la sua povertà, e perché ha un figlio "che non è benedetto", nato dal suo amore con una donna di malaffare, Maria. Una delle scene seguenti ci presenta la camera della donna. Maria canta al suo bimbo una ninna-nanna; ma s'affaccia alla finestra quando per via passa la banda militare, alla testa della quale è il Tamburmaggiore, specie di bruto colossale, il "maschio" nel puro senso animalesco del termine. Wozzeck soffre di allucinazioni; s'affaccia appena alla porta della camera, in un trasognamento da ebete, agitato da un'indistinta angoscia. Ma nel "quadro" seguente vediamo il soldato nello studio del Dottore; anche questo medico, che Berg caratterizza con toni lividamente grotteschi, vorrebbe simboleggiare uno dei possibili "oppressori" dei poveri e dei semplici. Per il Dottore, infatti, Wozzeck non è che una "cavia" su cui esperimentare diete e medicine; e a lui Wozzeck si presta, pur di guadagnare qualche cosa, oltre alla sua misera paga di soldato, da portare a Maria. Ma Maria è già circuita dal Tamburmaggiore, il quale, ormai imbizzito, le dice: « Ti voglio regalare un figlio che ti assomigli ». Maria gli cede senza un sentimento, senza un rimpianto, senza alcuna partecipazione di quell'anima che è ben morta in lei: « È lo stesso », dice; « non mi importa niente ». Si compiace, vanitosa, di certi orecchini che l'omaccione le ha regalato; Wozzeck, intanto, è raggiunto dal cinico Capitano e dallo sconcio Dottore, i quali, per vile compiacimento, per sadica speranza di vedere il soldato soffrire, gli rivelano che Maria si è concessa al Tamburmaggiore. Ma è Wozzeck capace di vera sofferenza? O non è piuttosto — anch'egli "morto" spiritualmente — soltanto capace di sentire, animalescamente, l'acuirsi della cieca angoscia e di prepararsi, anch'egli, a "liberarsi" mediante la violenza e la viltà? In una osteria Wozzeck, non visto, assiste all'amoreggiamento di Maria col Tumburmaggiore. Non dice che una bestemmia: « Perché non spenge Iddio il sole? », pronunciata senza eroismo, senza alcun impeto di grandezza ribelle. D'altronde, nella scena seguente, il Tamburmaggiore s'abbandona anch'egli alla violenza per viltà, picchiando Wozzeck a sangue; e alla viltà si abbandona Maria, quando legge nella Bibbia l'episodio della Maddalena sperando, ma invano, di riuscire a sentirsi pentita e perciò perdonata. Non v'è purificazione possibile per i vili: e vilmente, Wozzeck si "scarica" contro l'unico essere più debole di lui, cioè appunto Maria, uccidendola senz'impeto, in un gesto molle, sulla riva di uno stagno, in una notte in cui splende sinistra una luna enorme, rossa come il sangue. Ora il destino di Wozzeck precipita verso l'ultima violenza e l'ultima viltà: il soldato si annega in quel medesimo stagno ch'egli ormai crede una immensa pozza di sangue. L'ultima scena, davanti alla stamberga di Maria, vorrebbe suggerire implicitamente una morale alla spaventosa favola drammatica: il bimbo di Wozzeck e di Maria gioca, insieme ad altri bimbi, con un cavalluccio di legno. A un tratto i fanciulli confabulano tra loro; poi gridano al bimbo di Maria: « Sai, tua madre è morta ». Il bimbo continua a giocare col cavalluccio: « Hopp, Hopp! ». Insistono i compagni, divertiti: « È morta, vicino allo stagno. Andiamo a vedere! ». S'avviano festosi, e col suo giocattolo s'avvia il bimbo di Maria, sorridendo stupidamente: « Hopp, hopp, hopp... ».

Quest'ultima scena risulta, in teatro, d'una retorica disgustosa. Si sente che Berg vorrebbe commuoverci, e il tentativo ci indigna, proprio perch'egli non ha le forze musicali sufficienti per commuovere. Egli ha ripudiato la secolare tradizione tonale, tutta la gloriosa storia che aveva condotto il "suono" a divenire specchio dello spirito umano; invano sollecita ora l'intervento della nostra spiritualità. Non possiamo accordare al bimbo alcuna pietà, perché sentiamo questa scena come un basso tentativo di strappare l'applauso. Ma nelle altre quattordici scene dobbiamo ammirare la coerenza assoluta. In un dramma cosiffatto l'atonalismo è l'unica soluzione musicale possibile e producente, in una esperienza che, appunto perché "totale", non è ripetibile. Il Wozzeck è il dramma della violenza esercitata per viltà, quindi esclusivamente sul più debole. Non lo sarebbe, se il soldato Wozzeck ci ispirasse commiserazione, o ammirazione, o compianto. Ma — così come Berg ce lo ha raffigurato — non può ispirarci che disgusto, anch'egli, e spavento: è un abulico, uno stupido, incapace tanto di perdono quanto di vera ribellione, altrettanto grottesco, squallido e livido quanto il Capitano, il Dottore e il Tamburmaggiore. E altrettanto amorale quanto Maria. Ecco dunque la ragione per cui l'atonalismo, per una volta nella storia della musica, ha potuto rappresentare, sia pur con la crudezza della cronaca, una condizione che tuttavia ci pare più bestiale che umana. La tonalità, nelle sue infinite esemplificazioni dell'arte musicale, aveva raffigurato la luce spirituale, l'uomo che leva il viso al cielo e prende coscienza di sé e del mondo; che sente Dio e a Lui s'abbandona, o con Lui lotta; che combatte o cede al destino. L'atonalità è invece condizione di tenebre; quelle tenebre morali di cui unicamente è costituito il dramma di Wozzeck. Si esprime con suoni che sanno di viltà piagnucolosa o di rissosa violenza; si lamenta oppure rumoreggia ciecamente. Berg ha il merito d'aver intuito qual era l'unico dramma possibile alla dissonanza continua, allo stridore, alla disarticolazione armonica, e ce ne ha dato un documento definitivo di fronte al quale il moralista potrà sbigottire, ma che il critico è costretto ad ammirare.

L'OPERA DI ALBAN BERG IERI SERA ALLA SCALA

WOZZECK SI DIFENDE alle spalle di Mitropoulos

ALLA fine del secondo atto di Wozzeck, mentre la stragrande maggioranza degli spettatori, applaudendo calorosamente, sollecitava gli interpreti a presentarsi più e più volte al proscenio, una esigua ma decisa minoranza continuava a fischiare. Il fatto in sè, d'una minoranza che esprima vigorosamente il proprio disappunto, non sarebbe degno di gran rilievo cronistico se, ier sera, non avesse determinato un singolare episodio. E' da premettere che la minoranza dissenziente s'era abbandonata al piacere di zittire e di fischiettare anche durante l'esecuzione del secondo atto (ormai sembra proprio che alcuni spettatori vengano alla Scala — quando si danno delle « novità » — armati del fischietto regolamentare). Orbene, il direttore d'orchestra Dimitri Mitropoulos, presentatosi insieme con gli interpreti al proscenio, fece ad un tratto cenno di voler parlare. Non gli fu facile ottenere il silenzio; s'incrociarono nella sala violente e strane grida d'insulto, lanciate dagli opposti partiti, come ad esempio: « Vergognatevi d'applaudire! » e: « Taccia lei, salumaio! »; ma infine Mitropoulos potè prender la parola. Disse, press'a poco, in un cattivo italiano: « Il diritto d'applaudire o di fischiare è sacrosanta prerogativa del pubblico; ma, poichè quest'opera mi impone una grandissima concentrazione mentale, prego gli spettatori dissenzienti di aspettare la fine dell'atto per lanciare i loro fischi, e di non disturbare durante l'esecuzione ».

Disse così, e — a nostro parere — fece una grandissima gaffe. Intendiamoci: siamo d'accordo con Mitropoulos che i fischiatori non avrebbero dovuto disturbare durante l'esecuzione. Ma non possiamo avallare un gesto, come quello del pur grande direttore d'orchestra, inteso a impartire una lezioncina al settore dissenziente degli spettatori e, insieme, a sottolineare le proprie inenarrabilmente meritorie fatiche artistiche. Che diamine, signor Mitropoulos! Siamo d'accordo che il Wozzeck è una opera difficile da dirigere (e lei ha superato le difficoltà da « cannone »); ma altrettanto difficile è il Pelléas et Mélisende: quando De Sabata lo diresse, un certo numero di maleducati spettatori continuò a chiacchierare durante gli « interludi »; De Sabata ne fu visibilmente seccato, ma non fece discorsetti ammonitori. Un altro direttore d'orchestra forse lei avrà sentito rammentare come uomo di carattere piuttosto suscettibile: Arturo Toscanini. Lui si seccava ad esempio, quando gli chiedevano i bis; e allorchè la seccatura raggiungeva una certa temperatura lui piantava lì la bacchetta e se ne andava magari fin nell'America del sud; ma non faceva discorsetti propagandistici. Non li faceva perchè in realtà chi comanda, in teatro, è il pubblico, beneducato o maleducato, intelligente o tonto che sia. Siamo d'accordo che il Wozzeck è un'opera importante e interessante, degnissima d'esser ascoltata con attenzione; ma il Barbiere, la Traviata, la Norma, ad esempio, sono addirittura dei capolavori, eppure i loro primi spettatori li fischiarono. E non solo alla fine degli atti. Ma nè Rossini, nè Bellini, nè Verdi tennero discorsetti propagandistici o propiziatori al pubblico, nè a quanto risulta, li tennero i loro interpreti.

Signor Mitropoulos, comprendo il suo entusiasmo per l'opera che lei ha così amorosamente concertato e guidato; ma, dia retta, si limiti a dirigere. E, dirigendo un lavoro come il Wozzeck, affronti tutti i rischi relativi, compreso quello di venir ogni tanto distratto dalla sua « concentrazione ». Il pubblico ha anche il diritto di fare eventualmente il maleducato; penserà poi la Storia a mettere a posto le cose. Non partecipi alla polemica; un direttore d'orchestra non può esprimersi, in teatro, che, appunto, dirigendo. Se tiene dei discorsetti finisce per danneggiare, nel concetto di certi ascoltatori, l'opera stessa, e per alienarsi quelle simpatie che s'era a buon diritto guadagnate.

Vede, ora mi ha, in certo modo, obbligato a farle, a mia volta, un incresciosо discorsetto ammonitore. E invece avrei voluto parlare di lei solo per riferire della veramente mirabile esecuzione di Wozzeck ier sera ascoltata. E avrei voluto evitare tutto questo preambolo, per dar subito conto di quest'opera singolare, a proposito della quale gli spettatori « dissenzienti » hanno commesso, io credo, un mero errore di prospettiva, non ricordando ch'essa ha ormai trent'anni sul groppone. Chi, come me, ebbe modo di ascoltare il Wozzeck nell'esecuzione data a Roma nell'autunno del '42 (quando la pesante atmosfera di guerra ci sospingeva, naturalmente, vorrei dire, nel desolato, squallido, disperante panorama di questi tre atti), ritrovando ier sera pressochè intatte le impressioni di dieci anni fa ha dovuto rammaricarsi che la Scala abbia aspettato fino ad ora ad allestire il lavoro di Alban Berg (anche se ora ha potuto contare su un direttore bravo e facondo come Dimitri Mitropoulos). Infatti non tutti gli spettatori hanno potuto situare mentalmente il Wozzeck nel posto che gli compete; e, avendo ascoltato da poco opere come il Console o come il Raskolnikof di Sutermeister (tanto per far qualche esempio), hanno commesso un errore di prospettiva. Ci sono, in quelle opere, pagine in chiave di ossessione, che sono lampanti derivazioni musicali dal Wozzeck berghiano; derivazioni, cioè diminuzioni, echi infelici, privi di carica espressiva, chiamati solo ad assumere funzioni di bassa retorica. A qualcuno dunque il Wozzeck è potuto apparire come un confratello di q u e l l e partiture spesso vanamente dissonanti, mentre ne è il male imitato (perchè inimitabile) esemplare. L'importanza e il valore del Wozzeck consistono nella assoluta e persino pazzesca coerenza di tutti i « quadri » (meno uno). Coerenza drammatico-musicale, cioè coerenza di una rappresentazione che si avvera e si impone mediante la musica. (E con ciò intendiamo escludere dal nostro discorso il Wozzeck di Georg Büchner, — com'è o come avrebbe potuto essere se il poeta l'avesse compiuto — per attenerci soltanto a quello di Alban Berg, limitandoci tu' al più a notare che fra il musicista e il drammaturgo s'è verificata una affinità elettiva, a cent'anni di distanza, simile a quella riscontrabile fra Jaspers o Heidegger e le ottocentesche solitarie e allucinate meditazioni di Kierkegaard).

Il valore drammatico del Wozzeck di Berg, dunque, sta nella non ripetibile coerenza, che ne fa un lavoro unico. Per non aver compreso ch'esso è inimitabile tanti musicisti hanno messo il piede in fallo. Lo stesso Berg non seppe realizzar nulla di positivo quando si affaticò attorno a Lulù. Wozzeck è inimitabile perchè dice tutto ciò che può esser detto sul conto d'una umanità contemplata in tale situazione di bassezza da rasentare il bestiale. Lo dice con ogni mezzo, con residui passaggi tonali e con brani dodecafonici, che si alternano ad altri semplicemente atonali. E perciò non mette conto, qui, di esaminare quei « mezzi » armonistici, e nemmeno l'impiego delle forme proprie della tradizione strumentale che Berg adotta, in quanto tutto è in funzione del dramma e appunto il d r a m m a conviene considerare.

Dramma della monomania, dell'ossessione, dramma d'incubo, visione allucinata della vita, parola d'inverosimile pessimismo che solo la « violenza » con cui il musicista persegue il suo scopo rende accettabile.

Il soldato Wozzeck è la vittima che per tre atti tutti calpestano brutalmente; ma è vittima non redenta da alcuna aureola: nè pietosa nè innocente vittima; nè agitata da un generoso palpito di perdono nè sublimata da un impeto di ribellione. E' solo uno stupido. E' privo di ogni spiritualità; sa soltanto bestemmiare: « Perchè non spenge Iddio il sole! »; ma senza la statura di un Capaneo. La sua donna, Maria, lo tradisce solo per animalesco appetito d'un bruto come il Tamburmaggiore; e quest'ultimo è di sconcia fatuità, non redenta dal ridicolo e tantomeno da qualsiasi notazione umoristica. Lividamente grotteschi sono il Capitano e il Dottore; gli altri personaggi sono mere notazioni ambientali, privi quindi di individualità. E lo ambiente è quello in cui cosiffatte persone del dramma possono acconciamente agire: un mondo dove impera la forza, dove chi opprime e chi è oppresso non fruisce di alcuna diversificazione, non gode d'un differente accento, da parte del drammaturgo-musicista. S'odono, contorte in una smorfia musicale, la « marcetta » interna, quando la banda capitanata dal Tamburmaggiore passa sotto le finestre della stanza di Maria, e la « ninna-nanna » che questa Maria, che dovremmo chiamare soltanto femmina e non donna, canta al suo piccolo, e — altrettanto sfigurate — le danze che risuonano nell'osteria. L'amore è degradato al livello di animalesco accoppiamento; e nemmeno la gelosia e lo impulso vendicativo agitano lo squallido protagonista (che non osiamo chiamar miserabile appunto perchè Berg non lo ha reso degno d'alcuna commiserazione), poichè egli agisce solo per riuscir violento a sua volta, e sostanzialmente per viltà.

Ecco: l'unico tratto « umano » di questi personaggi è la viltà. La violenza dei vili, quella che si manifesta solo contro un essere più debole. Se immaginiamo, dunq u e, u n a umanità contemplata esclusivamente sotto l'aspetto della « violenza per viltà », avremo individuato il dramma di Alban Berg. E avremo compreso la funzionalità, sempre coerente, di questa musica.

Il « suono » seppe essere angelico, nella melodia di Bellini; tragico nella sonata o nella sinfonia beethoveniana; seppe meditare e pregare con Bach, sorridere con Rossini. Si fece dolorosamente umano, con Verdi. Ora, il « suono » poteva anche impegnarsi a simboleggiare la violenza e la viltà. E col Wozzeck di Berg divenne violento e vile, rissoso e piagnucoloso, in un'esperienza totale, definitiva, che è da considerare irripetibile. In tutta l'opera non v'è alcuna retorica; e tutto è implacabilmente esatto, producente, espressivo, per quanto violenza e viltà possano comportare di espressione. Proprio perchè riconosciamo la coerenza di quest'opera ripudiamo l'ultimo quadro: qui — figurando il bimbo di Wozzeck e di Maria, che gioca, ignaro della morte della madre e del padre — Berg ha tentato una « morale » della squallida favola, ha tentato un giudizio e ha cercato, coi suoni, la nostra pietà. Ma è piombato nella retorica, nel più basso sentimentalismo, con un lenocinio che perfino ci indigna. L'opera terminerebbe assai meglio con la morte di Wozzeck, e si guadagnerebbe il nostro intero rispetto, per la sua dura coerenza, perseguita da un musicista che impiega con lucidità spaventevole la tecnica dell'arte.

Arte vera? Autentica poesia? E' poeticamente rappresentabile, nel corso di tre atti, solo la « Violenza per viltà »? O non è, piuttosto, soltanto cronisticamente circoscrivibile e documentabile? Almeno nessuno negherà al Wozzeck — crediamo — l'evidenza documentaria impressionante. L'umanità fortunatamente non è sempre e solo questa che Berg ci dimostra; ma è purtroppo capace anche di questa violenza e di questa viltà. Per una volta la musica è scesa a simboleggiarle.

Esecuzione letteralmente ammirabile. Hanno cantato, recitato o appena intonato, secondo le indicazioni della impervia partitura, ma sempre con risultati di splendida evidenza: Tito Gobbi (Wozzeck), Mirto Picchi (Tamburmaggiore), Hugues Cuenod (Capitano), Italo Tajo (Dottore), Dorothy Dow (Maria), e la Zaresca, il Munteanu, il Badioli, il Campi, il Della Pergola. Commovente l'impegno della piccola Silvana Fasola che impersonava il bimbo di Maria. Il coro di Veneziani ha cantato benissimo il breve brano affidatogli. E Dimitri Mitropoulos è stato grande, nel districare l'aggrovigliatissima partitura, nel renderla evidente, nell'animarla staccando i più opportuni movimenti, nell'ottenere dalla magnifica orchestra scaligera l'esatta esecuzione dei tanti passaggi insidiosi. Be', tutto sommato, possiamo perdonargli perfino l'inopportuno discorsetto.

Senza pretese spettacolari

NEL « Wozzeck » dieci scene si alternano in ben quindici cambiamenti. Strade, taverne e camere dimesse sono tutti soggetti scenografici terra terra senza pretese spettacolari. Ma Gianni Ratto, per ingranarsi nello spirito dell'opera, doveva soggettivizzare i suoi bozzetti in quello stato psichico fuori sesto che nel primo dopoguerra, specie nel popolo tedesco vinto ed affamato, precipitò gli artisti nel più nero pessimismo, nell'allucinazione e nella cattiveria. Perciò il Ratto, in un costante sfondo di altissime pareti che, senza definite forme, pesano sugli ambienti come un incubo, ha costretto tutta l'azione a svolgersi nello sprofondo. E qui ha fatto giocare i suoi posticci frammenti « indicativi » che hanno composto le varie scene dai profili deformati delle costruzioni che dànno il senso del fuori regola, del dissesto e dello sbilancio morale e quindi estetico.

Per pura incidenza ispirativa sono riemersi i caratteri di quell'arte terroristica che, ormai esaurito l'« espressionismo », andò a finire nei quadri con le « barricate » di Otto Dix o con gli « assassini » del Grosz. Tutta arte corrosiva che, in tempi un pochino più chetati, la critica che non venera soltanto la tecnica od il « linguaggio » fine a se stesso, ha relegato nelle dantesche bolgie.

Le scene del « gabinetto del Dottore », dalla facciata mortuaria decorata con scheletri, sezioni anatomiche, ampolline e rubinetti; del paesaggio con le fiamme dipinte in cielo; della selva con l'intreccio dei rami che combinano quasi una geometrica astrazione, sembrano più che artisticamente espresse, descritte, direi, letterariamente. Ma negli altri quadri moderni e suggestivi il Ratto (autore della riuscita lugubre scenografia della « Collina ») con acuta sensibilità ha creato una vera atmosfera di angustia e disperazione: così nella fredda e tetra « camera del capitano » ed in quella di Maria aperta a paravento; nella bieca strada con la casa della stessa protagonista dalle sagome fuori norma e le luci stravolte e nel « corpo di guardia » tragico e sinistro. Ottima anche l'esecuzione delle scene dovute a Ighina, Mantovani, Molinari e Pignataro.

Le luci dirette da Nicola Benois hanno fortemente contribuito a conferire un clima ossessivo ai vari quadri assumendo il ruolo simbolico quando, dopo l'uccisione di Maria, hanno arrossato di sangue la losca « taverna » e le scene successive. La regia di Hebert Graf, nel fosco caricaturale, nei balli animaleschi e nella barocca urlante scompostezza degli ubriachi all'osteria, è riuscita assai efficace. Ma Ebe Colciaghi non ha potuto sfoggiare nei costumi perchè erano di scena soltanto i poveracci.

SPETTACOLI

WOZZECK, di Alban Berg, alla « Scala »

Ecco: finalmente abbiamo sentito Wozzeck alla « Scala ». Wozzeck era ormai diventato leggenda, mito: rappresentato per la prima volta a Berlino nel 1925, in varie parti del globo in seguito, a Roma durante la guerra, a Napoli a guerra finita, qualcuno parlava e scriveva di questo spartito come del solo al quale fossero applicabili i versi di Carducci: « Al mondo, oggi, da questo luogo (musicale, s'intende) incomincia la novella istoria ». Dura responsabilità; pesante impegno, anche per alcuni quinterni di musica, quello di mettere una pietra sul passato e di spalancare un mondo nuovo, abbattendo i diaframmi della diffidenza e dell'incomprensione.

Alban Berg assisteva, trentacinque anni fa, alla prima recita di un dramma vecchio di oltre mezzo secolo, appunto il Wozzeck, e subito pensava di trarne un'opera, scegliendo quindici degli innumerevoli quadri messi in fila dal suo autore Georg Büchner, a modo suo un anticipatore, in pieno Romanticismo, del più tetro Verismo. Wozzeck è un povero soldato che vive con una donna dalla quale ha avuto un bimbo; la donna lo tradisce, cedendo supinamente al Tamburo Maggiore del reggimento: Wozzeck le taglia la gola, poi si affoga. Sipario.

Si dirà: estremamente banale, tutto questo. Già: ma se su questo fattaccio di cronaca si incolla la torva etichetta dell'« Espressionismo » tedesco del primo dopoguerra, tutto cambia aspetto: l'Espressionismo, superamento di quel Verismo che era pur stato ricco di palpiti, di sofferenze, di volontà di redenzione, non conosce, degli uomini e della loro vita, che le piaghe più putride e infette; non li giudica, li condanna; non tenta di soccorrerli, li stermina. L'esistenza umana non è, per gli « espressionisti », che un conglomerato di miseria, di viltà, di passività, di abulia, di ferocia e di bassezza. Autori drammatici « espressionisti » come Kaiser, Toller e Wedekind, romanzieri come Döblin e soci hanno continuato per anni a ripeterci: « l'uomo è un verme ». Delirio di dissolvimento e di negazione, anzi di rinnegamento.

Trasportata nel Teatro musicale, una letteratura di questo genere poteva logicamente accompagnarsi soltanto ad una musica che costituisse di per sè stessa un elemento polemico altrettanto intransigente, quasi spietato. Alban Berg applicava infatti con estremo rigore alla cinematografica cronaca nera di Wozzeck il « sistema dodecafonico » inventato dal suo maestro Schoenberg, cercando in esso nuove possibilità espressive alla parola cantata o declamata, un varco che lasciasse intravedere conquiste inedite, uno spiraglio attraverso il quale far passare quel tanto di ossigeno che occorreva alla sopravvivenza attiva del Melodramma, che dopo aver raggiunto i vertici della gloria nell'Ottocento, e tenuto bravamente le estreme posizioni con Strauss, nel primo Novecento, sembrava giunto, esteticamente e stilisticamente, a un punto morto. Di questo tentativo non può non essergli dato merito. Occorre però considerare con spassionata equanimità i risultati. Ammesso che nessuno, dal critico più conservatore allo spettatore più retrivo, possa ottusamente osteggiare per principio il linguaggio dodecafonico, questa formula tecnica che sembra sposare la Musica alla Tavola dei Logaritmi, vediamo — ed è la sola cosa che importi — quali emozioni lo spartito di Wozzeck susciti in noi. E subito si constata che le sue stridule frane di suoni, i suoi allucinanti scatti polifonici che sovente naufragano in mucillaginose enarmonie, i suoi barbarici clangori e le sue traslucide evanescenze ci lasciano troppe volte indifferenti. Se il dramma è urtante, la musica non è che l'esasperazione di una formula. Essa non ci conquista, non ci avvince, non ci soggioga, nè ci comunica uno schietto fremito. Qualcuno afferma che in alcuni istanti essa raggiunge una sua spettrale suggestività, una fosca potenza lirica; e ciò può essere benissimo: anche gli orologi fermi, in un certo attimo della giornata, segnano l'ora esatta. Ma tali apparirebbero coincidenze dell'azione e del commento sonoro risultano più che altro fortuite, e in ogni modo non si tratta che di pause effimere. Rimane invece la programmatica persecuzione di un discorso musicale acre, aspro ed ingrato: quello che ha fatto scrivere ad André Frédérique: « Wozzeck equivale a una trapanazione del cranio ». Malauguratamente, il cranio trapanato è il nostro.

A questo punto non ci sarebbe altro da aggiungere, se i paladini di Berg non offrissero qualche spunto che non può non essere ribattuto. Uno di questi paladini, in occasione del Wozzeck, pone il dilemma: o accettare il « messaggio » del loro profeta o — per quanto riguarda il Melodramma — appagarsi di dormire fra le tombe (dei Grandi trapassati, naturalmente). Risponderemo che è molto meglio dormire fra le tombe di Giuseppe Verdi e di Riccardo Wagner che aprire gli occhi e vedere una fila di vasi di vetro nei quali si rattrappiscano i feti sott'alcool delle opere mai dischiuse alla vita: infelici figlie, per esempio, di Darius Milhaud, di Gianfrancesco Malipiero e dei loro sparuti epigoni. Si è parlato anche dei « duetti » dei Romantici, (leggi: Verdi e Wagner) che si proponevano di elevare l'istinto amoroso a sfere sublimi, con « la grassa sensualità della musica » (!), mentre Berg, dovendo sottolineare episodi brutalmente sessuali, fa tacere l'orchestra (vale a dire: abdica). Stiano pure in pace, tutti quanti: fra un secolo il pubblico continuerà a commuoversi e ad esaltarsi ascoltando i « duetti » d'amore di Tristano e di Otello, e non saprà neppure che siano esistiti, un giorno, i « silenzi sessuali » di Berg.

Superba (ma non abbiamo più spazio!) l'esecuzione offerta dalla « Scala », con alla testa un direttore come Dimitri Mitropolus, il quale ha sviscerato in modo prodigioso le serpigne polifonie della partitura, e con un gruppo di magnifici interpreti. Il baritono Gobbi ha reso con rara evidenza l'ossessione di « Wozzeck »; Dorothy Dow, costretta a cantare su una tessitura stratosferica, ha dato a « Maria » un rilievo scenico impressionante; il tenore Picchi ha impersonato con misura il « Tamburmaggiore »; il basso Tajo ha fatto un'intelligente creazione del personaggio surrealista del « Dottore »; il Munteanu (« Andres »), il Cuenod (« Capitano »), il Della Pergola, la Zareska, il Badioli, il Campi e gli altri hanno figurato in modo impeccabile.

Gianni Ratto ha creato scene stupende, piene d'incubo; il regista Graf e Benois hanno conferito ai vari quadri un'atmosfera poderosamente suggestiva nelle luci, nei colori, nei movimenti. Appropriati e di gusto i costumi di Ebe Colciaghi.

Cronaca tempestosa. Cinque chiamate al primo atto, fra raffiche di fischi; altrettante al secondo, con altri fischi, invettive fra spettatori, clamori: il direttore Mitropolus faceva cenno di voler parlare e diceva: « Cari spettatori, questa è una musica che esige una grande concentrazione cerebrale: prima ascoltate, poi giudicate ». E questo era appunto ciò che il pubblico della « Scala », avvezzo a « concentrarsi cerebralmente » da centosettantacinque anni, aveva fatto: prima aveva ascoltato col massimo rispetto, poi aveva applaudito e fischiato.

Dieci clamorose chiamate al terzo (con diminuiti ma irriducibili fischi): e apparizione alla ribalta — uno la volta, secondo la tecnica dei « finalissimi » delle riviste — dei più importanti realizzatori dello spettacolo: Ratto, Graf, Benois, la signora Colciaghi, il capomacchinista Chiodi. E grandi feste personali a Mitropolus, direttore e oratore.

ANGELO FRATTINI

"Wozzeck„ alla Scala Domenica "Butterfly„

Dopo quello di Roma e di Napoli anche il pubblico della Scala ha potuto ascoltare i tre atti musicati ventisette anni or sono dal compositore viennese Alban Berg su libretto ricavato da una leggenda di Büchner. Anche per merito di un'esecuzione di raro pregio, l'opera del musicista scomparso poco dopo la prima guerra mondiale, amico e discepolo di Schönbergh che poi superò nei risultati dei procedimenti compositivi espressionistici, è stata ascoltata attentamente e, pur con dissidi, applaudita in crescente misura. Qualche intemperanza ostile alla fine, e talvolta anche nel corso di alcuni dei molti episodi ha spinto il maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos, un eccezionale padrone dell'irta partitura, a pronunciare un breve « speack » alla ribalta dopo il secondo atto, per far presente trattarsi di spettacolo che esigeva da tutti la massima concentrazione; si evitassero quindi i disturbi che potevano turbare gli impegnatissimi esecutori, per riserbare poi alla fine il giudizio. Come era stato festeggiatissimo al suo apparire ogni volta e alla fine di ogni atto, il valoroso maestro ha riscosso per il suo ammonimento una lunga acclamazione, ed il seguito della serata si è svolto in un'atmosfera tranquilla, salvo le disapprovazioni al chiudersi dell'ultimo sipario, soverchiate però da vivi ripetuti applausi.

L'edizione di Wozzeck ha sollevato sincera ammirazione, e Dimitri Mitropoulos, potenziatore e governatore saldo e sensibile, raffinato e preciso, è apparso alla ribalta tra gli esecutori, e poi da solo, tra dimostrazioni caldissime. Con lui al proscenio il pubblico ha voluto lungamente salutare il vigoroso intelligente protagonista Tito Gobbi e Dorothy Dow ottima vocalmente e scenicamente, insieme a Mirto Picchi, Petre Munteanu, Hugues Cuenod, Italo Tajo, Carlo Badioli, Enrico Campi, Luciano Della Pergola, Eugenia Zareska, Luigi Fort, Vittorio Paudano, che hanno reso egregiamente le loro parti, grotteschi o drammatici i primi, a posto anche gli ultimi nelle minori figurazioni. Giustamente hanno ricevuto il loro tributo di applausi Herbert Graf per la regia accorta e aderente, Vittore Veneziani per l'educazione dei cori anche se di breve intervento, Nicola Benois per la direzione dell'allestimento scenico, Gianni Ratto autore degli originali intonati bozzetti scenici. Lo stesso Mitropoulos, che qualche spettatore non aggiornato ha creduto per un momento l'autore, ha desiderato che apparissero al proscenio tutti gli altri collaboratori, da Ebe Colciaghi ideatrice dei figurini ad Aurelio Chiodi capo del servizio macchinismi di scena che hanno funzionato alla perfezione nelle suggestive dissolvenze tra i vari quadri, ed anche il bimbetto della povera casa di Wozzeck e di Maria, che viceversa è una bimbetta, Silvana Fasola, caracollante inconscia sul suo cavalluccio di legno nel tragico epilogo del dramma.

Domani alle ore 21, seconda di Wozzeck, per i turni B e D; da oggi le prenotazioni. Domenica sera, per i turni A e « prime », andrà in scena Butterfly di Puccini, concertata e diretta da Victor De Sabata, seguita dal passo d'addio delle allieve licenziande della Scuola di Ballo, diretta da Esmée Bulnes, con il balletto « Le nozze d'Aurora » di Ciaikowsky-Petipa.

"Wozzeck„ di A. Berg

Il convivio scaligero è stato quest'anno eccellente; ma bisogna convenire che la portata più saporita è rimasta in fondo: « Don Carlo » e « Wozzeck », due opere che dovevano insieme a poche altre formare non la coda ma l'ossatura del cartellone.. Tuttavia è piacevole e conveniente finire bene, concludere in bellezza.

Tardi è arrivato a Milano « Wozzeck » capolavoro della produzione lirica germanica del nostro secolo, opera completa sotto ogni rapporto e nuovissima pur nella sua intima aderenza allo spirito tradizionale del teatro in musica. Milano ha però fatto ammenda del ritardo o della sua distrazione allestendo uno spettacolo di grande valore artistico curatissimo in ogni aspetto, degno di essere visto rivisto e riascoltato.

Il caldo, commosso e incontenibile applauso finale ha compensato il direttore d'orchestra e gli esecutori della loro immensa fatica e riscattato il pubblico scaligero della sgradevole situazione in cui è stato coinvolto dal comportamento turbolento ineducato e ottuso di una minoranza che dopo aver disturbato l'esecuzione del primo e del secondo atto ha costretto il direttore ad una inaudita perorazione, Chiesto il silenzio, Mitropulos ha rivolto una breve preghiera al pubblico invitandolo al silenzio almeno durante l'esecuzione esigendo l'opera, per la sua complessità e difficoltà, una concentrazione esemplare; per cui ogni interferenza sonora e ogni minima fonte di distrazione possono compromettere la ricreazione dell'opera medesima.

Una simile clamorosa lezione di buona creanza teatrale il pubblico scaligero ha dovuto subirsela in silenzio; una tirata d'orecchie meritata e non molto lusinghiera, tanto più deplorevole a 27 anni dalla gloriosa nascita di Wozzeck. Un tentativo di polemica del tutto inutile superato rivelatore anche di scarsa cultura oltre che di modesta sensibilità.

Poco sa il pubblico scaligero di Alban Berg (Vienna 1885-1935); egli è con Anton von Webern il più noto allievo di Schönberg, il prediletto anzi che fece la fortuna del maestro. Se infatti Schönberg inventore del dodecafonismo fu un ben dotato ingegnere della musica, Berg, partendo dai procedimenti compositivi del maestro, senza però aderirvi totalmente e integralmente, ma riservandosi una notevole libertà di scelta per fornirsi di ogni materiale espressivo fu artista poeta di elevate concezioni e ricca sensibilità. Berg infatti non applica mai con rigore dogmatico il principio fondamentale di Schönberg dell'assoluta parità delle dodici note della scala cromatica e pertanto dell'abolizione di ogni senso tonale secondo il senso impresso alla musica dagli ultimi tre secoli. Il grande valore di Berg è di aver ampliato la tela melodica, il tessuto armonico, di aver spezzato i limiti che la tradizione armonica veniva — appunto per il peso della tradizione stessa — a imporre al musicista e al pubblico senza però rinnegare nè con atto puro di intelletto nè con spirito acremente polemico i dati di un passato glorioso e ancor vitale, ma di ampliarli e integrarli con una nuova concretezza artistica ed evitando la prigionia forse più arida e deprimente delle regolette del dodecafonismo.

E' pur vero che il dodecafonismo con i suoi cardini tecnici (variazioni, ma non intese nel senso decorativo settecentesco o nel senso poetico e drammatico ottocentesco) può permettere a un musicista ricco solo di talento e privo di genialità di salvarsi perchè gli offre i mezzi di procedere con un calcolo chiaro e matematico attraverso la via segnata da determinate regole (riappare il clima tecnico e costruttivo tutto razionale e meticoloso e pedante dei fiamminghi quando anche un chierico dotto poteva scrivere a quattro voci qualsiasi composizione, ma pochi, come sempre, furono i creatori geniali nella scuola stessa), ma è altrettanto vero che le più alte espressioni artistiche di questa scuola si realizzano solo attraverso evasioni larghe e sincere dalla scuola stessa.

La dodecafonia è stata una intuizione generosa per rompere il cerchio fastidioso della « cadenza » armonica e per avviare la musica su un piano diverso e più libero; ma come sempre ha commesso l'errore per sopravvivere di farsi più pedante e rigorosa della stessa armonia; e meno geniale. Infatti se nel primo atto si avverte ancora qualche rigidità nella ricerca di una evasione, in seguito ci si trova di fronte a una volontà precisa, a una sensibilità immensa che superando i normali mezzi d'espressione vuole raggiungere un proprio linguaggio immediato, violento, terrificante. Berg è l'autore che staccatosi dal movimento dell'espressionismo germanico ha saputo innalzare la sua ispirazione lirica sopra quella deformazione postromantica ironica e pessimistica toccando una espressione decisamente positiva e virile di una esperienza dolorosamente umana accettata con schiettezza ed espressa senza la minima scoria intellettualistica. Anzi i fattori intellettualistici sono superati facilmente non avendo egli da temere una retorica sentimentale, ma richiamandosi avidamente ai grandi temi emotivi del primo romanticismo. In questo senso « Wozzeck » tolto appunto dal dramma di un romantico puro, Buechner (1813-1837) è più vicino al melodramma verdiano che non « Pelleas » di Debussy e « La carriera di un libertino » di Strawinsky sole opere degne di competere per valore artistico, importanza storica e portata culturale con « Wozzeck ». Se in queste due opere qualche astrazione estetizzante o qualche intenzione di netto formalismo musicale ne avvolgono il clima (e qualche volta lo determinano), in « Wozzeck » il contenuto umano riesce ad esprimersi liberamente e con istintiva immediatezza superando i limiti della forma classicamente conclusa. Ma ciò che impressiona è anche la concisione e la solidità della partitura, la stesura perfetta e precisa, la toccante rispondenza tra dramma e musica e la travolgente e serrata tragicità. In ogni nota è riflessa una visione assolutamente pessimistica della vita, oscura e senza perdono come in « Don Carlo ». Il male con inesorabile fatalità prevale su tutto ciò che è bello e buono senza saziarsi mai. Le prime frasi del soldato Wozzeck mentre rade la barba al suo capitano bastano a caratterizzare tutto il dramma: « Noialtri, povera gente... veda, signor capitano, i soldi, i soldi! Sarebbe bello se uno di noi cercasse la morale in questo mondo... Noialtri siamo disgraziati in questo e nell'altro mondo. Deve essere una bella cosa la virtù, ma io sono un povero diavolo... ».

Wozzeck è un soldato mercenario istintivo, buono e sensibile; avido di danaro, per cui serve il capitano e fa da cavia a un medico pazzo pur di guadagnare qualcosa in più da portare a Maria, la sua amante. Egli non possiede altro che questo amore per Maria che vive con lui e gli ha dato un figlio. Un giorno però Maria finisce a cedere alle lusinghe del Tamburmaggiore. La musica pesa su queste vicende con dolorosa e immensa tragicità riuscendo a riscoprire quel senso assolutamente greco dell'inevitabilità del male e della innocenza di chi lo fa o lo patisce. Innocente è Wozzeck le cui idee fisse vengono coltivate dallo stesso psichiatra e ossessionate dalla vuotaggine del capitano; innocente è Maria che deve pur vivere e si vende al Tamburmaggiore; innocente è pure questi che non arriva a concedersi il lusso di problemi morali ma tende solo a soddisfare i suoi istinti. Innocenti pure lo psichiatra nella sua follia professionale e il capitano nella sua classica fatuità. Ma tutte queste forze finiscono col tormentare Wozzeck fino alla disperazione. La scena della taverna in cui Wozzeck vede Maria ballare col Tamburmaggiore è di una violenza inaudita e di una potenza drammatica raramente raggiunta nel teatro lirico; e così la breve scena della caserma quando il Tamburmaggiore ubriaco prende a calci Wozzeck dopo avergli portata via la donna. Allora la tragedia è inevitabile. Wozzeck attira Maria fuori della città presso uno stagno e la uccide; poi corre in una bettola dove una donna scopre la sua mano insanguinata; Wozzeck atterrito ritorna sul luogo del delitto a cercare il pugnale per nasconderlo e lo butta nello stagno; ma gli sembra di averlo buttato troppo vicino alla riva ed entra nello stagno dove annega.

Questa scena è davvero impressionante. La musica è diventata stagno, delitto, colpa, grida disperate di Wozzeck, terrore e disperazione. Qui la musica segue soltanto le regole dettate da un genio in un momento di felice e prepotente creazione artistica. L'opera si chiude con la scena della piazzetta davanti alla casa di Maria, col figlio di questa che gioca sul cavalluccio insieme ad altri bambini. Uno viene a recare la notizia: « hanno trovato il cadavere di Maria vicino allo stagno! Di', la tua mamma è morta... andiamo a vedere ». Il piccolo non capisce e continuando a cavalcare il suo cavallino segue indifferente gli altri che corrono verso lo stagno.

Come si vede è tutto teatro; e la musica è sempre teatralmente intesa e sviluppata anche quando sulla partitura si legge: passacaglia e 24 variazioni; oppure gavotta e tre variazioni; oppure tema variazioni e fuga forma nella quale è concepito nientedimeno che la prima scena del terzo atto quando Maria pentita dell'avventura col Tamburmaggiore sembra sentire un certo rimorso e sfoglia la Bibbia cercando conforto nella parabola dell'adultera.

Pagine superbe ricche di frammenti tematici interessanti e incisivi che si riassumono nel meraviglioso slancio della scena dello stagno. Agonia senza rumore, senza parole ma pervasa dalla tremenda voce dell'orchestra che si leva come un'onda immensa di pietà. Qui davvero la musica raccoglie i dispersi significati del dramma per farne una sintesi, disperatamente imprecando contro la miseria morale e materiale che ha spinto al delitto.

Il linguaggio di Berg non è però monocorde; anzi è vario e vasto e la descrizione dei due personaggi grotteschi, il capitano e il dottore, è davvero magistrale e degna di un Moussorgsky come la scena della taverna. Anzi in questi personaggi il formalismo è addirittura portato all'eccesso e serve magistralmente per definire la rigida fatuità e l'esteriorità di questi esseri. Ad un certo punto, quando il dramma è scatenato, colore, timbri, ritmi, polifonia assumono un tale valore espressivo da sovvertire i valori melodici tanto che l'essenza di un tema acquista un significato musicale così nuovo e fresco da stupire. Allora si sente che Berg ha davvero guardato in un mondo musicale inesplorato, ha intuito una nuova vita dei suoni.

La Scala, affidando la direzione di « Wozzeck » a Dimitri Mitropulos e non imponendo a questo ammirevole e geniale direttore alcuna limitazione di tempo per la preparazione del capolavoro di Berg ha confermato ancora una volta le elevate intenzioni artistiche del nostro massimo teatro. Possiamo dire che questa edizione curata in ogni particolare e allestita con gusto e intelligenza tocca la perfezione. Oltre agli artisti, bravissimi attori dei quali parleremo, un elogio a Gianni Ratto che ha penetrato con schiettezza i valori del dramma offrendoci una serie di quadri suggestivi e aderenti, realistici e idealizzati insieme. Non era facile risolvere il problema di ben 16 scene susseguentisi con rigore di tempo. Un elogio quindi anche al direttore dell'allestimento, Nicola Benois.

La regia di Herbert Graf ha impresso una conveniente e misurata dinamica al palcoscenico. Tito Gobbi è stato un Wozzeck ricco di umanità e commovente nei suoi umili slanci e nelle sue allucinazioni tenendo come nota fondamentale del personaggio una semplicità quasi primitiva. Ineccepibile dal punto di vista canoro. Così Mirto Picchi che sappiamo eccellente attore ha disegnato con tronfi atteggiamenti e gustosa incisività la figura del Tamburmaggiore. Bene il Cuenod come Capitano, fatuo e sciocco. Impegnato in un compito difficilissimo Italo Tajo; ol'ttimo basso è riuscito a esprimere tutte le fisime e le nevrastenie del folle psicologo con una ritmica davvero brillante e una gamma di gesti sempre freschi e riusciti. Bravissimo Luciano della Pergola nella delicata parte del pazzo.

Dorothy Dow ha disegnato una Maria sensibile e sincera, appassionata e dolorosa con veemenza ed efficacia. Brava la Zareska nella breve ma singolare parte di Margherita. Una fetta di torta speciale alla piccolissima Silvana Fasola che ha sostenuto tutto il terzo atto cavalcando il suo cavalluccio al ritmo voluto dall'orchestra di Berg e con la commovente incoscienza dei bambini.

L'orchestra è stata addirittura superiore a ogni elogio. Lo stesso Mitropulos si è confessato entusiasta della compagine scaligera ancor fresca dopo una così lunga battaglia quale la stagione 1951-52.

Behave Yourself, Mitropoulos Tells Milan Audience

MILAN, ITALY—(Reuters)—Conductor Dmitri Mitropoulos told a Milan audience to mind its manners Thursday night when some of them vocally disapproved during the city's premiere of Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck."

Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, told the Milanese that they should express their opinion at the proper time—the end of each act.

Viennese-born Berg used the 12-tone scale for his controversial work, first performed in Berlin in 1925.

Dimitri Speaks Out

Maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra had to lecture an unruly audience during the first performance at Milan of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck"—when rival cheers and whistles greeted the first stages of the opera. Mitropoulos asked the audience to reserve judgment until the end of the performance, adding that he didn't deplore whistling which sometimes is necessary.

IL WOZZECK ALLA SCALA

Il maestro Alban Berg e la coscienza del dramma

In Berg la sofferenza e l'incubo si dissolvono: lo spazio sonoro si apre, il tessuto musicale s'illumina vibra la terra, Wozzeck vive e si afferma al di là della propria tragedia di distruzione

di LUIGI ROGNONI

Nel 1928, rispondendo ad una inchiesta sul teatro musicale promossa dalla Neue Musik Zeitung, così si esprimeva Alban Berg: « Nel momento in cui decisi di scrivere un'opera non avevo altro intento che dare al teatro quello che appartiene al teatro, cioè d'articolare la musica in modo tale da renderla cosciente, ad ogni istante, della sua funzione nel dramma ». Dichiarazione senza equivoci, che fece inorridire chi riteneva morto il teatro musicale è tanto più la forma del Wort-ton-drama, nata, ingigantitasi e bruciatasi con Wagner, ma dichiarazione sostenuta da una dimostrazione eloquente come quella del Wozzeck, opera in tre atti e quindici quadri che Berg aveva fatto rappresentare a Berlino nel 1925, e alla quale aveva atteso sin dal 1914.

Ventisette anni ci separano dalla prima rappresentazione di Wozzeck, che giunge ora alla Scala in una impeccabile realizzazione e concertazione dovuta a Dimitri Mitropoulos su scene di Gianni Ratto, allestimento di Nicola Benois e regia di Herbert Graf, interpreti Tito Gobbi (Wozzeck) e Italo Tajo (Dottore), che già sostennero queste parti alla memorabile rappresentazione dell'Opera di Roma diretta da Serafin nel 1942, Dorothy Dow (Maria), Hugues Cuenod (Capitano), Mirto Picchi (Tamburo Maggiore) e Elena Zareska (Margherita). Mitropoulos ha concertato l'opera con sicura forza di penetrazione e con straordinario equilibrio, rivelandola in tutta la sua potenza espressiva. Il successo è stato soverchiante, nonostante qualche contrasto, con regolari fischietti, che ha provocato la reazione del pubblico, il quale ha chiamato alla ribalta artisti e direttore complessivamente ventidue volte. Tuttavia la critica professionale sembra ancora reticente di fronte a Wozzeck, anche se lo riconosce, a suo modo, un capolavoro: un capolavoro sì, ma della dissoluzione, della deformazione, del pessimismo, della disperazione, ecc., che, tutto sommato, la solita nostra serenità mediterranea (la si tirava in ballo per Wagner) rifiuta, nè potrà mai accettare. Un quotidiano maggiore, dopo averne riconosciuta la potenza e la forza dell'espressione drammatico-musicale, ha concluso, tout-court: « Noi Alban Berg non lo amiamo e ce ne dispiace. Una certa salute fisica, una certa non dissipata fede religiosa ce lo impediscono ». Ma siamo ben sicuri che sia salute fisica la nostra che ci fa impigrire sulla morte del teatro musicale e che sembra consolarci solo quando qualche raffinato giocoliere ci dà ad intendere che il miracolo mozartiano possa rinnovarsi attraverso acrobazie intellettualistiche e il miraggio della perfezione formale? Siamo ben sicuri che la nostra fede religiosa sia tacitata quando un compositore moderno, convinto della « crisi » del teatro, ci dà un teatro musicale che non è più teatro, ma oratorio o messa cantata?

Noi Wozzeck lo amiamo invece; perchè è teatro musicale autentico e proprio perchè Berg ha il coraggio di guardare in faccia alla realtà del nostro tempo, e sa trasfigurarla in arte, senza equivoci e senza giochi d'equilibrio.

Per questa umanità che si avvia all'abisso, profetizzata dall'acuta e sensibile angoscia di Georg Buchner sin dal 1837, per questa dolorante visione di una realtà che il nostro primo mezzo secolo ha vissuto attraverso guerre e massacri, crudeltà legiiicata ed ipocrisia sociale, noi amiamo Wozzeck, perchè esso rappresenta il nostro tempo, nella sintesi più acuta e sconcertante, nel simbolo più atroce e ammonitore, perchè Wozzeck non nega l'uomo, ma lo difende, lo afferma nella sua assoluta individualità e libertà di coscienza e di vita. Berg ha espresso questa coscienza attraverso la più calda e palpitante emozione lirica che musicista moderno abbia mai saputo raggiungere.

Alban Berg

Non per nulla è stato detto da più di un autorevole critico che Wozzeck è l'espressione più grande del teatro musicale apparsa dopo Boris Godunov e dopo Pelléas et Mélisande.

Perchè allora vedere il contorto, il deforme, l'« incubo freudiano » e via dicendo in un'opera d'arte che vuole solo esprimere al più alto grado dell'espressione lirica e drammatica, una protesta sociale, e riaffermare la fede nell'individuo anche quando esso e costretto a degenerare, ad abbrutire, a soccombere?

Berg è forse l'unico musicista contemporaneo per il quale la voce umana vibrò, non nella retorica e nella convenzione, ma nel suo potere di espressività interiore. Cosciente della necessità di rinnovare i mezzi espressivi della voce, Berg accetta il principio della « declamazione ritmica » e della « sprachstimme » affermate da Schönberg, ma lo traduce sul piano di una realtà di linguaggio inconfondibile, perfettamente rispondente alla sua intuizione musicale, che è essenzialmente lirica, di un lirismo la cui perorazione, sia vocale che strumentale o timbrica raggiunge talvolta il grado assoluto della purezza: come nel delirio leopardiano, dove la sofferenza si trasfigura talvolta nella gioia di un abbraccio alla natura che si tramuta in canto purissimo.

Anche in Berg la sofferenza e l'incubo si dissolvono: lo spazio sonoro si apre, il tessuto musicale s'illumina, vibra la terra, Wozzeck vive e si afferma al di là della propria tragedia, quando vede incubi del bosco, quando prega Iddio di non indurlo in tentazione, quando sente l'abisso, quando uccide Maria presso lo stagno, ma del bosco e della sua armonia, dello stagno e della luce lunare che lo innonda si inebria, nel tessuto polifonico e timbrico dell'orchestra berghiana.

Ciò che differenzia Berg dagli altri espressionisti, da Schönberg e da Webern, è proprio questa forza catartica di trasfigurare in un sentimento di infinita dolcezza lirica la visione del mondo.

Se Wozzeck appare al termine della fase « distruttiva » dell'esperienza espressionista, apre, nel contempo, l'orizzonte del teatro musicale, riaffondando le radici proprio in quella forma de Wort-ton drama wagneriano che sembrava esaurita e impraticabile. Non fraintendiamo però: Berg non continua il Wort-ton-drama, ma lo rivive, rinnovandolo, nella sua essenza e nella sua spiritualità, oltre Wagner, attraverso una nuova coscienza dei mezzi espressivi che si dischiuderà poi al musicista con l'individuazione dodecafonica. Wozzeck è sulla strada di questa individuazione, si muove in uno spazio sonoro già aperto e consapevole dell'irreversibilità del linguaggio musicale, protesa all'anticipazione.

Lulu sarà il coronamento di questa esperienza: il rapporto tra dramma e schemi vocali e strumentali (già individuato in Wozzeck) sarà ancor più approfondito al punto da costituire la caratterizzazione psicologica di un personaggio; e l'emozione lirica elevata a coscienza stilistica.

Peccato che l'edizione scaligera abbia offerto Wozzeck (come già a Roma nel 1942) nella versione italiana: l'aderenza tra i mezzi espressivi e l'immagine drammatico-lirica in Berg è così compiuta e totale che le sottili differenze di piani emotivi della sprachstimme, pensata sulla lingua tedesca, vanno in gran parte perdute nella lingua italiana.

IERI SERA ALLA SCALA

"Wozzeck„ di Alban Berg
retorica della maledizione

Diciamo pure che Wozzeck, alla Scala, è arrivato un po' tardi. Questa Scala che ha avuto tanta fretta, per esempio, di dare Raskolnikoff. Questa Scala, che è stato l'unico grande teatro d'opera del mondo intiero a gettarsi avidamente sul Console. Wozzeck, infatti, non è soltanto un melodramma ormai famoso in tutta Europa e America; non è soltanto un lavoro che i pubblici di Roma e di Napoli conoscono da una diecina d'anni; è ancora il pezzo forte della musica atonale e (in parte) dodecafonica, la prova, secondo i patiti di codesta musica, che atonalismo e dodecafonia possono essere capaci di condurre a un successo scenico non meno dei vecchi e stravecchi sistemi. Ciò posto, quella della Scala può considerarsi una strana pigrizia. Tanto più che Wozzeck, in certo qual senso, è assai più facile a eseguire che non il Rigoletto o il Trovatore. Comunque stiano le cose, ora che Wozzeck, già preannunziato e poi dato per disperso nel 1946, è finalmente approdato sul dock di piazza della Scala, occorre ben vedere che carico porti. Visitare le sue stive e farne un breve rapporto.

La storia ci informa che Alban Berg, nato a Vienna da un commerciante norimberghese il 6 febbraio 1885, e in Vienna morto cinquant'anni più tardi, incominciò a pensare a Wozzeck nel 1914; finì di pensarci, cioè finì di comporlo, nel 1920, e attese il 1925 per vederlo rappresentato in un teatro di Berlino. La storia esaurisce le sue comunicazioni col dirci che l'idea di porre in musica quel soggetto sorse immediata, nell'animo del maestro, durante una recita del dramma di Georg Büchner che si chiama, se non proprio Wozzeck, Woyzeck. Finito di parlare la storia, incomincia a parlare la critica, l'esegesi, le tabelle classificatrici e, qui, l'affare tende a imbrogliarsi, giacchè noi siamo invitati a giurare che Wozzeck è un melodramma «espressionista». A parte il fatto che noi, per abitudine, non giuriamo mai niente, ci riesce assai duro lo stendere la mano sopra una Bibbia che non arriviamo a capire. Già molte volte, in passato, ci siamo messi a leggere e a investigare intorno a questo «espressionismo». Immaginatevi se non abbiamo intensificato le nostre letture, le nostre indagini ed escavazioni nell'imminenza dell'andata in scena di Wozzeck. Ebbene, se la faccia esteriore dell'«espressionismo» ci è ormai familiare e abbiamo in testa un completissimo elenco degli «espressionisti» poeti (Werfel, Stadler, Trak, Heym, Ehrenstein,) degli «espressionisti» narratori (Frank, Zweig, Edschmid), degli «espressionisti» drammaturgi (Toller, Kornfeld, Von Unruh, Kaiser), degli «espressionisti» pittori (Meidner, Hoffer, Marc, Nolde, Kokoschka, Kandinsky), dei precursori come lo stesso Nietzsche, io credo, lo Strindberg etc., in quanto a renderci conto esatto, conto sintetico dell'espressionismo come linea comune di azione estetica, è un'altra faccenda. Ora, noi abbiamo forti sospetti che nessuno sia autorizzato a parlare di Wozzeck senza possedere una cognizione esatta dell'espressionismo. In uno studio di Franz Meyer trovo scritto che l'espressionismo «rigetta il procedimento psicologico, in quanto psicologia è già un'attività assunta dall'esterno, è già un invito a voler ordinare, secondo il principio di causa ed effetto, quella cosa irregolarissima, anzi giustificata [illegible] materiata dalla sua irregolarità, ch'è l'esistenza umana». Pertanto, dice più avanti il Meyer, [illegible] nico aspetto umano che noi [illegible] ssiamo raccogliere senza perilo di sostituire alla realtà i nostri desideri inconsci e l'attivismo incessante dei nostri poteri volitivi è quella maschera he ognuno di noi nasconde sotto lineamenti normali, imposti da na lunga abitudine e da una inga, quanto falsa, educazione ella cosiddetta società civile.

Strappare la maschera esterna mettere a nudo la maschera interna sarebbe, adunque, una tra le missioni dell'espressionismo. Ma questa maschera, in seguito a un censimento che gli espressionisti debbono avere pur compiuto anche se le sue modalità ci sfuggono, non c'è caso che riveli pace e allegria (nemmeno una mediocre pace e allegria), ma ha sempre il rictus dell'angoscia, del terrore, del peso insopportabile, della maledizione, o, nel caso più favorevole, dell'abbandono passivo a una incomprensibile cadenza del vivere. La discesa nel profondo delle anime non può portare, per gli espressionisti, se non al contatto con una materia caotica, regolata dalle stesse cieche energie che regolano il mondo minerale; al contatto con una materia comune a tutti gli individui ma, contemporaneamente, circoscritta nell'ambito di ciascun individuo e quindi intrasmissibile, non condivisibile, tanto meno capace di giudicare e correggere il proprio destino. Con una petizione di principio, assolutamente gratuita, gli espressionisti non ammettono che tutto quanto accade sia reale conseguenza, se è reale (e perciò vero) uno stato umano come quello che essi identificano nella decifrazione della maschera interna, è irreale (e perciò è falsa) ogni azione dal di fuori (come sarebbero la volontà etica, i dati dell'esperienza, gli insegnamenti della tradizione, peggio ancora i suggerimenti della fede) che tendono a inserirsi nella corrente centripeta degli istinti o nel flusso implacabile di un fato già determinato e prefisso. Come, ad esempio, possano gli espressionisti credere nell'esistenza storica di San Francesco è cosa che ci sembra impossibile. Infatti, dal momento che tutto quanto cerca opporsi all'oscura attrazione delle forze elementari è menzognero, illusorio e inane, non si comprende come l'intervento della menzogna, dell'illusione e dell'inanità possa produrre un vero. Si afferma, da parte dei teorici espressionisti, che la loro concezione riflette con onesta coerenza la condizione umana dopo la prima guerra mondiale, e che, avendo ogni arte il dovere di non straniarsi dalla propria epoca, bensì di specchiarne coraggiosamente lo spirito, essa concezione è legittima e valida. Qui, a parte il fatto che l'arte può anche intendersi come un trascendimento d'ogni attualità contingente, resterebbe a vedere se non si trovino opere «espsrsioniste» prima degli anni 1914-1918 (il Woyzeck di Büchner, di cui Berg fu così illuminato, risale appunto al 1836) e resterebbe a spiegare come la musica di Bach (tanto per citare un caso a tutti noto), la musica di Bach seguita alle devastazioni e alle catastrofi della Guerra dei Trent'Anni, sia così piena di speranza, di ansia trascendentale, di pietà affettuosa e di fraterna fiducia.

A nostro parere, l'espressionismo è una tra le molte manifestazioni artistiche derivate (come ben disse quel grande francese) dal progressivo attutimento della nostra sensibilità spirituale e quindi dal bisogno di ricorrere a eccitanti sempre più forti, a dosi sempre più grosse di stupefacenti. Come atto di individui isolati ha potuto essere, sicuramente, il corrispettivo di particolari strutture psicologiche, e, pertanto, documento vivo e sincero. Come «scuola», come tendenza, come organizzazione, è stato uno dei tanti residuati del romanticismo, una battaglia a freddo contro il solito bersaglio del quietismo, dell'opportunismo, della codardia e del moralismo borghesi, nonchè un segno del non meno solito impulso romantico ad atterrire, a incrudelire, a disorientare con l'aria di beneficare. Questo carattere dello espressionismo, in fondo in fondo assai superficiale, ci sembra tanto più indizio della sua intima essenza quanto più consideriamo che tutti gli entusiasti del fenomeno, così doviziosi di ricerche e di studi, dimenticano sempre di annoverare, fra i primi manifesti o appelli espressionisti, il libercolo del «giornalista» Max Nordau, le famigerate Menzogne convenzionali della nostra civiltà. Come sempre si verifica in movimenti del genere, anche l'espressionismo assume subito le forme di una teologia, il ritmo allucinato e intransigente di un fanatismo, il consueto andamento di rigorosità scientifica, l'artifizioso piacere di una ricercata sofferenza.

E così, l'accaparramento si estese alla musica. I musici, una volta, si contentavano di restare ignoranti, per una grazia del Signore che, attraverso l'ignoranza, li preservava dal confondere l'arte loro (del tutto inconfondibile e collocata in un settore speciale della conoscenza) con il resto delle attività spirituali, segnatamente con la critica storica, con la sociologia, con le filosofie di vario tipo, con la letteratura e con la politica. Adesso, i musici bazzicavano i dotti, discutevano con loro il da farsi; temevano di apparire arretrati se non si ponevano in linea con le novità del giorno. L'esempio di Wagner e del suo totalitarismo culturale, etico, estetico, rappresentava ormai una cappa di piombo, e bisognava troppo coraggio per togliersela dalle spalle. Su un piano puramente teorico l'indovinazione di una «musica espressionistica» non si presentava molto difficile. Il raffinamento del suono, il coordinamento del suono e il progressivo adeguarsi dei suoni a un'armonia interiore, cui l'uomo riguardava come a una speranza di uscita dalle disarmonie dell'esistere, si potevano considerare, grossolanamente, altrettante «menzogne civili», altrettante imposizioni di «maschere occultatrici» sulla «maschera ineliminabile» della verità universale. Pertanto, occorreva distruggere tutto quel lungo processo mediante cui gli uomini non avevano già voluto creare un ordine differenziato tra i suoni, ma avevano semplicemente constatato come nei suoni esistesse un ordine e come la percezione di tale ordine, sempre più approfondita, fosse il mezzo supremo per conoscerli e per scoprirne la più giusta natura. Si venne così all'atonalismo, ossia al rigetto della scala tonale, giudicata una limitazione e una specie di diaframma, interposto fra noi e il mondo caotico, elementare, puramente istintivo, che è l'unico mondo dove noi possiamo vivere e agire in autentica libertà e in sincerità perfetta.

Come voi ben sapete, il grande apostolo dell'atonalismo fu l'altro viennese Arnold Schönberg, colui che in seguito, per la fatalità propria a ogni rivoluzione (fatalità di irrigidirsi in un sistema ferreo, in una dottrina inderogabile) fondò la dodecafonia, vale a dire una regolamentazione assai più stretta e militaresca che non l'elasticissimo principio della tonalità. Alban Berg, discepolo e amico di Schönberg, applicò nella composizione di Wozzeck l'atonalismo già applicato dal maestro nella composizione di Pierrot lunaire e, in parte, i procedimenti dodecafonici che, fra il 1914 e il 1920, si andavano codificando. Diciamo pur subito che fra Alban Berg e Schönberg corre una forte differenza. Schönberg, davanti al suo assunto, conserva una freddezza implacabile; Berg è veramente travolto dall'intensità del suo oggetto. Schönberg si compiace della pura astrazione, laddove Berg, deciso ad astrarsi da ogni richiamo del passato, si rifà concreto nella contemplazione del suo impegno personale e nella simpatia verso i suoi personaggi. Il Woyzeck di Büchner lo ha certamente attratto per la sua eccezionalità, per il suo apparente distacco da ogni formula tradizionale (ossia ha servito i suoi preconcetti dottrinari), ma poi lo ha conquistato come una tragedia possibile, al di là dei canoni espressionistici, al di là di quanti gli esegeti dell'espressionismo chiamano «nuda produttività personale». Il problema della pazzia, problema centrale nell'attività dei Büchner e da Büchner già trattato col primissimo suo lavoro, la novella Lenz, è certamente esaminato da Berg secondo le modalità simboliche della psicanalisi, piuttosto che secondo gli stupori popolari di un Bellini, di un Donizetti, o secondo all'investimento grandioso di un Mussorgski. Ma tutti quei paranoici di diversa specie, il soldato Wozzeck abulico, infantile, spaurito e infine consistente nella volontà di uccidere; la sua donna Maria, rapita negli incanti di una felicità fisiologica e irresponsabile del bene o del male; il Dottore, con la sua mania di sperimentare e di considerare gli esseri umani sotto l'esclusivo aspetto di cavie; il Capitano, pervaso dagli indefinibili terrori che salgono da un universo miserevole e si scontrano con la sua mondanità malsicura; il Tamburmaggiore, gallo in montura e in pennacchio; tutti quei paranoici si conglomerano al fuoco di un impulso, mescolato di mostruosità e di scaltrezza, e ruotano verso una mèta imprecisata con la parabola di un pianeta funesto.

C'è indubbiamente, in Wozzeck, la retorica della maledizione, dell'inspiegabilità, la [illegible] dine della catena e della servi insormontabile, come c'è, in mol altri melodrammi, la retoric dell'«ideale». C'è un effettismo una ricerca del sensazionale, una uniformità di colori che, a noi, ingenerano una bella dose di noia. Ma c'è anche un montaggio abilissimo e una notevole aderenza fra il nero della musica e il nero dell'azione drammatica. C'è poi quell'ingenuo arcaismo, comune a tutti gli atonali e dodecafonici, che consiste nell'utilizzare vecchie forme di musica pura (scegliendo anzi le forme più incerte, come la passacaglia o l'invenzione) con l'intento di rimpiazzare, attraverso schemi per altro impercepibili, quell'unità che sentono distrutta dal polverizzamento della base tonale e dallo spappolamento dell'idea tematica. Risulta così che la musica di Wozzeck, mentre è ridigamente pensata e voluta, abbia un bizzarro aspetto di casuale e di improvvisato. Anche la caratterizzazione dei personaggi, malgrado espedienti inavvertibili come quello usato nella scena terza del second'atto, dove Maria canta sempre accompagnata da grande orchestra e Wozzeck da orchestra da camera; malgrado espedienti fin troppo avvertibili come quello dello «Sprechgesang», che vorrebbe riprodurre il moto nervoso, antecedente e condizione d'ogni parola pronunciata; anche la caratterizzazione dei personaggi, diciamo, si perde e corrompe nel livellamento, nel trattamento pianificato del metodo. Wozzeck ci sembra, dopo tutto, testimonianza retrospettiva di un periodo storico ormai superato, e, poichè sentiamo dire che, fra cinquanta anni, verrà considerato da tutti un capolavoro, noi non abbiamo alcuna difficoltà a restare nella memoria degli uomini come quel tale che non se ne era accorto. Non esiste anche in Svizzera un critico di cui si sa solo una cosa, che trovava Busoni un cattivo pianista? Alla solitudine di quel collega offriamo una modesta compagnia.

L'eccessiva lungaggine di questa cronaca ci costringe a sorvolare sulla esecuzione che Wozzeck ebbe iersera alla Scala. Non possiamo tuttavia tacere che il maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos si è rivelato un direttore fenomenale, un prodigio di bravura, di potenza imperativa, di grandezza artistica. Nè possiamo dimenticare che il baritono Tito Gobbi è stato un protagonista irresistibile per intensità scenica e per precisione di accenti; così come quell'interessantissimo interprete ch'è il basso Italo Tajo (Dottore), così come la splendida cantante-attrice Dorothy Dow (Maria), l'intelligentissimo tenore Hugues Cuenod (Capitano), l'altro validissimo tenore Mirto Picchi e infine il Munteanu, la Zareska, il Badioli, il Campi, il Della Pergola, la Eugenia Zareska, il Fort e il Pandano. Eccellente la regia di Herbert Graf.

Com'era da prevedersi, Wozzeck ha suscitato una burraschetta, con prevalenza finale di tempo sereno. Vale a dire, gli applausi hanno soverchiato le disapprovazioni e i fischi. Se non abbiamo male interpretato, le acclamazioni vennero particolarmente indirizzate al prodigioso maestro Mitropoulos il quale, dopo la fine del secondo atto, arringò il pubblico, con procedura di emergenza, invitandolo alla calma e alla concentrazione.

GIULIO CONFALONIERI

Wozzeck
trionfa alla «Scala»
in una memorabile esecuzione

DEGLI artisti grandi, ma non subito riconosciuti tali, si dice che ci lasciano, con la loro opera, un messaggio, il quale, proprio come una lettera, ha da essere da noi aperto, decifrato e interpretato, onde sia assunto tra le nostre acquisizioni d'anima e d'intelletto. Il messaggio di Alban Berg, la sua appassionata e disperata «lettera al mondo», il crudele e insieme umanissimo capolavoro intitolato «Wozzeck», ci ha messo quasi trent'anni a giungere sino a noi, almeno nella sua concretezza fonica e teatrale; esso è stato tenuto a lungo in quarantena, oltre e dentro i nostri confini, e la censura lo ha sovente ricoperto coi segni rabbiosi e incomprensibili del suo grasso inchiostro violetto. Persone simili, nella vita, al «Capitano», al «Dottore», al «Tamburmaggiore», i moralisti falsi e ipocriti, i dotti megalomani e ottusi, i caporali violenti e prevaricatori non ci avevano consentito, sinora, di riconoscerci nel povero soldato «Wozzeck», di compatire alla sua miseria di diseredato, di assolverlo fraternamente d'una colpa sua soltanto in parte, compiuta da chi è stato messo dagli altri al di qua o al di là del bene e del male.

Anche a Berg il messaggio era venuto da lontano, dal fondo di quell'Ottocento in cui a fatica riusciamo a immaginarci contemporanei Chopin che incanta col pianoforte una schiera di contessine, Leopardi che parla con la luna alta su Recanati e Georg Büchner che scrive con penna rapida e rovente la tragica storia di «Wozzek». Lungo tutto il secolo e oltre, sino al 1915, il messaggio è passato per vie occulte sotto i quadri storici, le fantasie esotiche, erotiche e leggendarie del Melodramma, ha nutrito di sè i pallidi eroi di Dostoiewski e di Kafka, per approdare a Vienna e a Berg, che lo ha fatto per sempre suo con la musica.

Dimitri Mitropoulos insieme a Dorothy Dow

Oggi, che dire di quest'opera, vittoriosa sia delle teorie estetiche che la presuppongono sia della temperie espressionista a cui si tenta ancora e invano di ridurla, sia dei divieti che furono posti al suo cammino nel mondo? Intorno al 1930 scriveva lo stesso Berg: «Son passati dieci anni da quando componevo Wozzeck; tante cose si son dette della mia opera che nulla quasi io posso dire senza plagiare i miei critici...». Dopo altri vent'anni, a noi non resta che segnare tra i pochi e felici eventi d'arte a cui assistiamo il giorno che ci ha rivelato la grandezza di un'opera in cui la poesia grida con verità la condizione degli uomini il cui dramma si svolge serrato nella sua immodificabile vicenda, e in cui la musica tutto avvolge, unifica e trasfigura col suo ardente rigore di stile. E tuttavia i modi di questa musica sono innumerevoli e mirabilmente diversi. Eccola cristallizzata in sapienti artifici d'architettura e di scrittura (la Suite in cinque tempi del colloquio tra il «Capitano» e «Wozzeck», la Passacaglia con ventun variazioni del consulto che il «Dottore» fa a «Wozzeck», la Fantasia e Fuga a tre soggetti dell'incontro in istrada del «Capitano» e del «Dottore» con «Wozzeck»), corrusca di tutti i suoi prestigi sinfonici (gli interludi tra le cinque scene di ciascuno dei tre atti, e in particolare l'ultimo, grandioso compendio dei temi dell'opera), modulata con tutte le inflessioni espressive del canto e della parola (la Rapsodia di «Wozzeck» e «Andres» nel bosco, la Berceuse di Maria, la lettura che Maria fa della Bibbia); ma anche, essa musica, quando lo esigano le circostanze drammatiche, non esita a cedere il campo a un duro e quasi documentario verismo scenico (la Marcia militare sotto le finestre di Maria, il Valzer stonato della orchestrina da ballo, la Polca della pianola nella taverna, il brevissimo girotondo dei bambini nella scena finale), e persino a ridursi a un semplice espediente fonico ma di straordinaria efficacia emotiva (il fruscio cromatico delle acque su «Wozzeck» caduto nello stagno, il parossistico «crescendo» sopra una sola nota che rende udibile il suo rimorso), e addirittura al silenzio (i finali del secondo e del terzo atto).

Da questi accenni resulta la singolare struttura dell'opera. Berg, per articolare un linguaggio asciutto e nuovo, dopo la disintegrazione armonica e formale attuatasi con Wagner, ha genialmente e liberamente inventato la sua musica sugli schemi della musica strumentale del Settecento e dell'Ottocento, ha fatto un cauto uso del sistema dei motivi-conduttori, e ha saputo compiere una ardua conciliazione tutta «funzionale», ossia in rapporto agli scopi espressivi, tra la musica tonale, la musica atonale e alcuni procedimenti della tecnica dodecafonica, quali furono trovati dal suo maestro Schönberg. Tutto questo, con tale naturalezza, con tanta dissimulata maestria che nessuno del pubblico, come ha scritto lo stesso Berg, «nessuno, dal momento in cui il sipario si leva al momento in cui cala, fa attenzione alle varie Fughe, Invenzioni, Suites, tempi di Sonata, Variazioni e Passacaglie, in merito alle quali tanto si è scritto. Ciascuno fa attenzione alle vaste implicazioni sociali del lavoro, che trascendono il personale destino di Wozzeck».

Aggiungiamo che il dramma di Büchner ha nell'opera di Berg un perfetto corrispettivo, e che tutti i personaggi vi conservano, trasformati in musica e da essa accresciuti, i loro caratteri, da «Wozzeck» «umiliato e offeso», a «Maria», peccatrice per derelitta scienza, da «Andres», bonario soldato, al «Tamburmaggiore», trionfo di lascivia fensore del moralismo, al «Dottore» invasato della sua bolezza d'istinto, dal «Capitano», malvagio e pavido dimpennacchiata e gallonata; nello stesso modo, i luoghi del dramma, il bosco o la casa di Maria, la osteria o lo stagno del delitto, si configurano musicalmente intorno ai personaggi con pochi segni, acri, quasi graffiati, ma con indimenticabile evidenza. Tale, con indicazioni necessariamente sommarie, la natura del capolavoro di Berg, ieri sera ascoltato e per la prima volta rappresentato a Milano. Se poi qualche «Capitano» o qualche «Dottore» dei nostri tempi non vi trova che un fatto di cronaca nera o un documento di degenerazione artistica, potrà far suo, dal testo originale di Büchner, il commento conclusivo della Guardia: «Un bell'assassinio, un vero assassinio, un magnifico assassinio; più bello di questo non lo si potrebbe pretendere; da molto tempo non ne avevamo avuto uno tanto bello».

Del tutto pari all'opera è stata, musicalmente, l'esecuzione, concertata con alacre e minuziosa cura e diretta con grandissima arte, prodiga di slanci e d'abbandoni, da Dimitri Mitropoulos; tali resultati gli furono possibili soprattutto per merito della generosa, instancabile orchestra della «Scala», che alla fine della stagione ha saputo trovare in se stessa tanta disciplina e tanto entusiasmo da rendere in tutto il suo splendore strumentale ed espressivo la difficile e inconsueta partitura di Berg. In palcoscenico, Tito Gobbi ha dato un bel rilievo vocale e scenico alla figura di «Wozzeck», Dorothy Dow ha impersonato «Maria» con perfetto stile e con appassionati accenti. Un «Capitano» di godibile caratterizzazione fu Hugues Cuenod mentre Italo Tajo, vocalmente ineccepibile, si trovò un po' a disagio, quale «basso buffo», nel tipo del «Dottore» che la regia ha incertamente delineato tra il cinematografico Caligaris e il ballettistico Coppelius. A Mirto Picchi, quale «Tamburmaggiore», conveniva forse un po' più di tracotanza. Petre Munteanu, «Andres» e Carlo Badioli, Enrico Campi, Luciano Della Pergola, Eugenia Zareska, Luigi Fort e Vittorio Pandano, tutti misurati e tempestivi. Nè vogliamo dimenticare, dopo la lode al coro e ai complessi musicali in palcoscenico, la lode alla bambina Silvana Fasola che ha contribuito con la sua azione, sebbene inconsapevolmente, all'agghiacciante stretta al cuore con cui l'opera si chiude. Alla realistica misurata regia di Herbert Graf non si è unita felicemente la scenografia di Gianni Ratto, in bilico tra un elegante rifacimento espressionistico e una elusiva illustrazione; sempre efficaci tecnicamente i molti quadri, che si succedono sopra un unico sfondo urbano, divisi da uno siparietto da copertina di rimanzo poliziesco. Anche gli ovvii figurini di Ebe Colciaghi son sembrati indifferenti al carattere del dramma, se non addirittura estranei, come per il «Dottore».

Il regista Herbert Graf

Nel corso della memorabile serata, vibrante di contrasti, «Wozzeck» si è imposto al pubblico via via che il dramma dispiegava la sua forza, sino a una grandiosa acclamazione finale al maestro Mitropoulos e agli interpreti, che si erano presentati alla ribalta alla fine di ciascun atto. Vi era in teatro la vedova di Alban Berg, a cui i soverchianti applausi hanno ripetuto la gloria del musicista di cui fu la compagna e i pochi dissensi la non sminuita acredine del capolavoro da lui donato al teatro musicale del nostro secolo.

LE PRIME

ALLA SCALA

"Wozzeck„ di Berg

Serata burrascosa, combattuta, quella di ieri sera alla Scala per la prima di «Wozzeck» di Alban Berg.

La fine del terzo atto, però, ha segnato il trionfo completo della parte intelligente del pubblico, che ha nella stragrande maggioranza tributato un autentico successo chiamando direttore e interpreti per dodici volte alla ribalta e soffocando così le sparse disapprovazioni. Tuttavia la serata è stata turbata da uno spiacevole incidente: durante il secondo atto, alcuni male educati hanno interrotto con fischi e battute di cattivo gusto. Ciò ha indotto Mitropulos ha tenere un cortese ma indicativo discorso alla fine dell'atto, pregando gli ascoltatori di astenersi, durante l'esecuzione, dal disturbare. E ciò per l'estrema concentrazione che la direzione di quest'opera richiede. Messa a punto giusta e doverosa, che ci auguriamo sistemi definitivamente i presuntuosi ignoranti maleducati, che offendono non solo l'arte (tuttavia nei loro gusti non vogliamo interferire), ma soprattutto to l'interprete, e quindi l'ospite.

Il «Wozzeck» di Alban Berg porta la data 1916-20. Anni di «tensione» per l'Europa, lanciata nell'avventura della guerra, da cui uscirà comunque spiritualmente sconfitta. E' in quell'epoca che dalla Germania, disintegrata e stanca, si leva la voce di un'arte amara, corrosiva, tutta volta alla scoperta e alla rivelazione della verità cinica e brutale che si nasconde dietro l'estremo brillare di una società in decadenza. E' l'età dell'espressionismo, dell'affermazioni di una realtà umana senza illusioni e senza romanticismi, di un pronunciamento contro i valori del mondo «borghese», del mondo del capitalismo e dell'imperialismo. E' Grotz che invade la verità nascosta nel cuore dello «junker», del pescecane arricchito; è Berg che scrive il «Wozzeck», che si riallaccia alla violenta polemica scaturita quasi cent'anni prima in pieno fervore di idealità romantiche, dal duro realismo di Büchner. E la polemica sociale, il realismo dei contenuti umani e dell'espressione del «Wozzeck» büchneriano, aveva spinto infatti Berg all'interpretazione musicale: in realtà il dramma di Büchner aveva messo il dito sulla piaga — la piaga della miseria umana — per constatarne l'esistenza, per conoscere il morbo; aveva compiuto in termini poetici l'indagine brutale, senza luce di speranza e prospettiva di salvezza, sul materiale umano che sarà poi di Grotz, di Weill, di Toller o di Brecht. E' in questo ordine di cose, materiali e spirituali, che nasce dunque il «Wozzeck» di Berg. Nasce riducendo a quindici le originarie venticinque scene di Büchner; ma la sostanza umana è la stessa, è sempre la vicenda del soldato, simbolo dei miserabili esclusi per la loro stessa «condizione» sociale alla «vita dell'uomo». Wozzeck vive questa sua situazione, e la medita anche: ma nulla egli può farvi contro, affondato come è in un ineluttabile destino. La ribellione non è presente nel dramma di Büchner, come non lo è in Berg. La storia di Wozzeck, lanciata ben oltre il suo stesso accadere, è semplice protesta: protesta degli autori, consapevoli e sofferenti di una realtà presente. E' questo il limite, se ben si guarda, di Büchner e del suo così detto «socialismo», come di Berg e in genere dell'espressionismo. I limiti di chi analizza senza risolversi, del constatare senza indicare un rimedio. Per Büchner si può parlare di un residuo di romantico fatalismo; per Berg di sentimento tragico e pessimistico della vita (il sentimento comune a tutta la sua generazione di artisti». E tale è la sua ricca musica, cioè direttamente rivolta a sottolineare il significato tragico (e non fatalistico), del contenuto sociale del dramma (si veda ad esempio, nel primo atto, la scena nello studio del dottore, dove violento è il contrasto fra le due mentalità e quindi i due mondi. Mentalità non singolari, ma collettive: cioè di «classe». Oppure, ancora, nel secondo atto l'incontro di Wozzeck con il capitano e il dottore, assolutamente indifferenti al suo dolore).

Musica, quella di Berg, che si costruisce in forme classiche (suites, rapsodie, tempi di sonata, passacaglie, fughe, invenzioni), ma per esclusiva esigenza espressiva del suo autore, non per precostituita intenzione innovatrice. Dirà lo stesso Berg: «Quello che io considero essere la mia particolare conquista, è che nessun pubblico dal momento in cui il sipario si alza al momento in cui cala, porge attenzione alle varie fughe, invenzioni, variazioni... Ognuno porge attenzione solo alle vaste implicazioni sociali del lavoro, che trascendono il personale destino di Wozzeck. Questa, io credo, è la mia conquista». Parole chiare e vere, che esprimono il temperamento teatrale di Berg. E infatti il «Wozzeck», a prescindere dai suoi [illegible] sieci e immensi valori musicali, si configura in una assoluta unità di stile, in cui la voce declamante si appoggia all'orchestra come alla sua naturale rivelatrice espressiva, mentre il taglio scenico è tale da non compromettere mai il ritmo teatrale. Abolita la forma chiusa, e quindi l'alternarsi di dialogo ed espansione sentimentale, il rischio era di cadere in un appesantimento della azione drammatica. Niente di tutto questo. Il testo musicale, pur così formalmente costruito e conseguente, non sacrifica nulla alla recitazione, così che non si può dire di un sopravvento della musica sullo spettacolo, di questo su quella. Berg ha nel «Wozzeck» dato vita a un'opera in cui ogni elemento è centrale e complementare nello stesso tempo, in virtù di quella mirabile sintesi e unità, che conosce sempre e solo l'opera d'arte.

Il contenuto della musica di questo «Wozzeck», si deduce da quanto si è detto. Una musica che non indulge a schemi linguistici e tuttavia fondamentalmente atonale. Non siamo, ancora, nella dodecafonia anche se già nell'ambito «seriale»: anzi non pochi sono gli squarci tonali che Berg, rispondendo ad un preciso impegno espressivo, introduce nel discorso. Una musica, comunque, che ha pagine sulle quali, pensiamo, nessuno potrà porre un dubbio. Così, nel secondo atto scena quarta, («Wozzeck» che incontra all'osteria la moglie con l'amante), il sovrapporsi di un valzer popolare accompagnata da una orchestrina paesana a quello che è in orchestra il racconto del tormento di Wozzeck, dà luogo ad impasto di armonie sovrapposte che realizza una narrativa di impressionante potenza. E' presente qui, più che mai, quel senso di sarcastico e amaro abbandono che poi di Welli sarà l'esclusiva materia poetica. Presente nell'orchestrina di paese, stonata e grachiante: elemento espressivo che però in Berg si accompagna ad una concezione ben più vasta del dolore umano. E tragico è in fatti Wozzeck, il suo personaggio, tragico il suo destino, che è poi quello di tutti gli uomini che, come lui, hanno vissuto la loro vicenda di miserabili paria, esclusi al diritto di essere e di sentire, relegati nel loro destino di oppressi nella vita e nella coscienza.

Esecuzione, quella di ieri sera alla Scala, mirabile. Mitropulos ha sostenuto lo spettacolo dalla prima scena all'ultima con la formidabile intelligenza artistica di chi ha approfondito la partitura in ogni sua nota. A nessuno può sfuggire la difficoltà di questo Wozzeck: e l'averlo diretto a memoria, non è pertanto un saggio di abilità tecnica, ma invece la prova di una partecipazione totale ed esclusiva all'opera. Accanto a lui, bravi, bravissimi, gli interpreti: interpreti che cantano in italiano, ma che ciò nonostante hanno mantenuto il tono duro e incisivo del dialogo buncheriano: primo di tutti Tito Gobbi (Wozzeck), intelligente e buono nella recitazione; poi Italo Tajo nella parte del dottore, efficace e vivissimo; Hugues Cuenod un capitano a posto. In quanto a (Maria), Dorothy Wow, c'è sembrata la più efficace, anche perchè la sua pronuncia straniera, più l'avvicinava all'originale pronuncia del testo tedesco. Regia di Graf sostanzialmente a posto, e scene di Ratto nel complesso riuscite. Insomma uno spettacolo di cui siamo grati a tutti: al teatro, al direttore, agli interpreti, ai realizzatori teatrali.

UN'ORA CON MITROPOULOS

La pelle del viso, scura, è spessa e forte. I peli della barba si vendicano del puntiglioso rasoio stendendo, tra poro e poro, una rete di minutissimi punti neri. Le labbra grosse non hanno colore proprio. Il naso è una montagna, e dalla sua cresta scendono valli profonde di rughe scoscese. Altre rughe, ininterrottamente mutevoli come onde, si inseguono e si accavallano sulla fronte. Una bassa corona di capelli, pure incolori, cinge una calvizie solenne, indispensabile. Le orecchie si stendono autonome: se non fossero tanto estranee parrebbero due manici. E sono grandi, come quelle di Verdi, di Manzoni, di Marconi. Gli occhi si lasciano scoprire per ultimi, dopo lungo inseguimento sotto l'aggetto profondo dei sopraccigli, velati dalla pelle improvvisamente fina delle palpebre. Occhi piccoli, mobilissimi, insidiosi. Ma solo da essi la voce acquista senso: le parole udite prima di averli scoperti vanno perdute. Anche le mani aiutano il discorso. Ossa dure, nervi ipersensibili, polpastrelli prensili, che sanno aggrapparsi all'aria. Le parole, prima di uscire per la bocca, vengono strette, pesate e palpate dalle dita. Il corpo è agilissimo, i muscoli sono impazienti. I vestiti vi si stendono sopra funzionali: persino la cravatta, l'indumento più inutile, sembra, su quel collo, giustificarsi; il frac calza come un maglione. Chi volesse intuirne il mestiere traverso i lineamenti, la struttura, il modo, direbbe: guida alpina e maestro di sci. Invece — cinquantasei anni, scapolo — è un direttore di orchestra: Dimitri Mitropoulos. Poche ore prima dell'ultima replica di « Wozzeck », Dimitri Mitropoulos si lascia intervistare: « L'ambizione più alta, per un musicista, è quella di arrivare alla Scala. Ora che ci sono arrivato mi considero al culmine della mia carriera ». Le bugie sono più che le parole: alla Scala c'era già arrivato tanti anni prima, direttore sinfonico e pianista, nelle stagioni di concerti del 1934 e del 1935; di lì a poco ammetterà esplicitamente ambizioni superiori. Bugie che presto si rivelano funzionali come i suoi vestiti: vuole, per questa via, impiantare una polemica: « Mi hanno chiamato a dirigere il " Wozzeck " di Alban Berg, come specialista di una scuola. Riconosco la specializzazione, ma non me ne accontento. Il teorizzare di Schoenberg ha condotto alla raffinatezza più alta il romanticismo. Ma la strada, in fondo, è chiusa; e andare avanti non si può: " empasse ". Per scavalcare la barriera qualcuno si è aggrappato al neoclassicismo: musica pura, musica stilizzata ». Gli occhi correvano già avanti quando le accorte mani, serrandosi a pugno, hanno soffocato le parole: china pericolosa. La via delle caute impressioni soggettive è certo più sicura: « L'eclettismo è il mio privilegio: ho uno spirito capace di aderire a tutti gli stili e di assimilarli senza mai cedere al fanatismo, neppure per quelli più vicini al cuore. E qui tengo a una dichiarazione: vicinissimo al mio, assieme allo stile inaugurato da Schoenberg, ve ne è un altro, quello dell'opera italiana, di Verdi, del verismo di Puccini. Fra il teatro di Berg e quello di Puccini, del resto, l'affinità è enorme. Ergo, dopo essere arrivato alla Scala, il mio desiderio più grande è quello di dirigere un'opera di Puccini ». Le bugie dell'esordio cominciano a essere riscattate. Ma il bello viene dopo: lo scopre una domanda insidiosa: « E la crisi del melodramma? » « Il cinematografo. Col suo rapido progresso tecnico e le sue larghe disponibilità economiche, il cinematografo è divenuto pericoloso dittatore. Chi più ne soffre è il teatro, e non solo quello di musica. O poco o tanto, nel teatro c'è sempre qualcosa di commerciale. Per questo il teatro è sempre, in un certo senso, un'arte inferiore, anche se utilissima, con la sua capacità di diretto contatto, a sospingere il pubblico verso le arti superiori, più libere. La crisi è tutta qui: denaro. Ridate quattrini al melodramma, rinascerà; negategliene ancora per un poco, e non ne sentiremo più parlare. Sembra assurdo questo discorso fatto qui alla Scala, lo so. La Scala, oltre che il primo, a grande distanza da tutti gli altri, è anche l'unico teatro in cui le cose

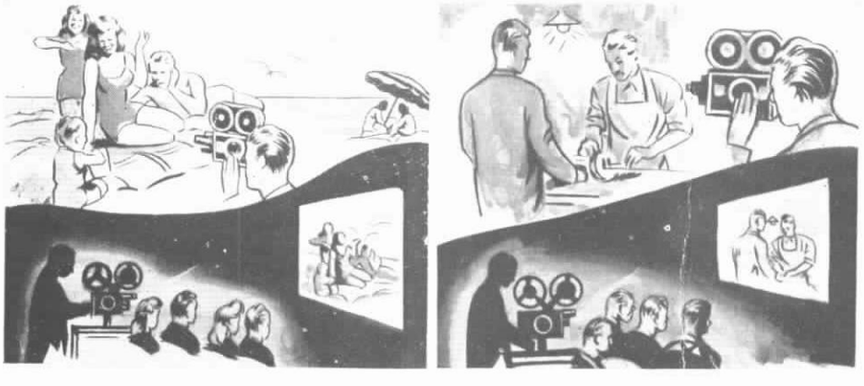
MILANO

Wozzeck. Quando battagliavo sul « Secolo - Sera » — e sono quasi vent'anni — perchè la Scala non venisse meno ai suoi doveri d'arte, non ero certamente affetto del ridicolo snobismo che andava caratterizzando il nostro tempo. C'erano serie ragioni. Prima di tutto quella, dirò così, culturalistica. La Scala poteva ignorare ciò che si faceva all'estero? Il pubblico non doveva tutto conoscere? Le altre ragioni nascondevano la voglia di mettere le cose a posto. C'era da far toccare con mano cioè che certe smanie europeistiche di italiani antiitaliani avevano un fondo tutto provinciale. C'era da rendere evidente che gli iconoclasti di casa nostra non erano che avanguardisti della retroguardia per il semplice fatto dell'accodamento alle stravaganze tecniche straniere.

Si minacciava una tristissima fine: i maestri che diventavano scolari... E ciò mentre teatralmente l'Italia poteva ancora vantare affermazioni superiori: nella consistenza non nell'apparenza. No? Il Wozzeck, il cosiddetto capolavoro avveniristico, è finalmente venuto a confortare questa verità. E dopo tanti anni di « avvenire »! Si è ripetuta la storia degli esperimenti Roussel, Hindemith, Milhaud, Bartok, Honegger. Funambolismi strumentali da far impellidire quelli vocali del più virtuosistico Seicento, con un fondo d'astrattismo curiosissimamente esteriore. Tanto esteriore che a me veniva da pensare che quando si metteranno le mani anche nel terribile anti-Dio del « Giornale del Poeta » di Alfred De Vigny, quell'interiore spasimo si risolverà nella più materialistica nevropatia sonora.

Non manca un substrato emotivo in Alban Berg — ed è questo anzi che più lo distingue — ma siamo più al di qua che al di là dell'espressione. Il nuovo parrebbe ridursi quasi all'informe come idea. Barlumi che restano barlumi anche attraverso la più straordinaria e rivoluzionaria tecnica che sprigiona effetti di allucinata suggestività ossessiva. Non discuto i mezzi. Li ho sempre lasciati discutere da chi dimentica che tutte le tecniche possono servire basta che ci sia l'idea. Mussorgski ha dato il suo «nuovo» anche tecnicamente perchè aveva una sua parola nuova. Qui nel Wozzeck, invece, non si trova la parola nuova: si trova la sillaba. E l'idea vera non può balenare da un susseguirsi di sillabe sia pure congegnate con scienza addirittura matematica. Attraverso queste sillabe, o meglio, queste briciole elettrizzate può balenare, tutt'al più, un fantasma.

Fantasmi: ed ecco venire la domanda: teatro? Si continua a sperare almeno in uno spiraglio sull'avvenire; e qualcuno l'ha intravisto, anche in buonafede, nel Wozzeck. Magari! Temo però che si creda ciò che si spera. Troppa inevidenza scenica mostra questa proiezione a sprazzi sfuggenti e deformanti: tanto vero che dove più illumina è dove il silenzio adombra i personaggi. Naturalmente si può sognare anche un teatro senza voci vive ma non sarebbe più teatro; e non so se segnerebbe evoluzione o involuzione. Questa impressione del resto, si è già insinuata per tutta la musicalità nuova in se stessa: superciviltà che rimbarbarisce.



A proposito: ho sentito dire che Alban Berg scava. Sì, in qualche punto; ma proprio barbaricamente mentre Verdi scava in

La Orafon in proiezione sonora

Don Carlo «con tremenda e quasi spietata potenza» (parole di Pizzetti) senza barbarie sonore. E non con qualche colpo di vanga ma con la più enorme scavatrice moderna. Ironie della modernità... Il ritorno di quest'opera è stato provvidenziale. Quel Verdi tanto dileggiato dai «novatori» ai tempi delle surricordate battaglie giornalistiche, è apparso ancora una rivelazione. Lo stupendo prosatore musicale spalanca davanti, nel Don Carlo, due vette di purissima poesia ove l'espressione vocale si fonde con l'espressione strumentale in miracolosa anticipazione delle più nuove sottigliezze introspettive. Verdi non cerca più di incidere soltanto il sentimento ma vuole illuminare la parola, ogni parola e nel più recondito significato. E vi riesce con tale arte da far diventare misteriosi certi ripiegamenti su forme da Ernani oppure da Battaglia di Legnano. L'incredibile: nella stessa opera che apre le finestre persino al morbido Massenet e all'estroso Mascagni!

Spettacoli di chiusura della stagione lirica: Falstaff e Butterfly. La malattia di Dobrowen ha fatto scomparire Eugenio Onieghin e c'è da dolersene perchè era una delle opere significative del vecchio teatro straniero che in Italia si dimenticano. Falstaff e Butterfly si prestano a concludere il ragionamentino iniziale. L'Ottocento si è chiuso col novecentistico testamento verdiano e il Novecento nostro si è aperto con Fedora, Iris, Tosca, Adriana, Butterfly, Maschere, Germania, Siberia, Oceana, Resurrezione, Amica, Conchita, I quattro rusteghi. L'Italia aveva bisogno, tecnicamente, di imparare all'estero? E nei primi decenni del Novecento (quel Novecento che anche l'attuale Festival di Parigi trova comodo far cominciare vent'anni dopo...) vennero anche Isabeau, Parisina, Fanciulla del West, Nerone (di Boito), Sakuntala, Amore dei tre re, Debora, Francesca, Tiefland, Vedova scaltra, Turandot, Fiamma, Dybuk, Maria d'Alessandria, Il malato immaginario, L'amore che ride, Campiello, Fra Gherardo e tante altre. Si poteva andare avanti. E senza credere o far credere che l'avvenire era oltr'Alpe traviando i giovani che ancora oggi non sentono l'orgoglio, l'intelligente orgoglio, dell'italianità pura e sicura.

La Scala non è stata concorde nel suo atteggiamento verso il Wozzeck. Si sa: alle mostre pittoriche non si usa fischiare ed è qui la fortuna dei vari «cubismi»; ma nei teatri... C'era, è vero, un grande direttore a incutere rispetto con la sua presenza che significava riconoscimento d'arte, ma la passione artistica (e auguriamoci non retrograda) scavalcò anche quest'ostacolo. Perchè però il pubblico della Scala non afferma questa sua passione di difesa verso quelle opere nuove, o nuove per l'Italia, che non disorientrano e servirebbero a rompere il solito cerchio dei soliti successi del solitissimo repertorio?

Parliamo adesso degli interpreti di questi ultimi spettacoli e cominciamo dal Wozzeck. Dirigeva Dimitri Mitropoulos e il rincrescimento di poter avere alla Scala un tale maestro solo per questo spettacolo era bilanciato dalla soddisfazione di poter dire che una musica di difficoltà veramente unica aveva avuto un interprete di sbalorditiva compenetrazione e di altrettanto sbalorditiva chiarificazione esecutiva. Una «trovata» di immedesimazione anche le scene di Ratto e geniali gli accorgimenti scenici per i molteplici quadri. Studiatissima la regia di Graf. Per le voci c'è da rilevare il nobile sagrificio. Una gara di intelligenza fra la Dow, il Gobbi, il Cuenod, il Taio, il Picchi e il Munteanu.

ma linea il maestro Votto che ha imposto una serietà artistica proprio da Scala. Contenti tutti di questo spettacolo allestito grandiosamente, e con felicità anche di bozzetti scenici (Benois) e di regia (Erhard). Fra i cantanti primeggiò Rossi-Lemeni: un basso di rari mezzi e di grande — dico grande — arte. E' attore anche nel canto e voglio dire che colora persino le sillabe. Avesse la stessa arte il possente Stefanoni! Ebe Stignani è sempre Ebe Stignani e Santa Cecilia ce la conservi. Non persuasiva nei primi atti la Martinis ma di bel risalto nell'ultimo. Per squilli e slanci e accenti ha sorpreso il Penno ma la linea talvolta è incrinata da stimbrature e slegature. Qualche ombra anche nel Silveri. Sempre in ascesa il Maionica.

Nella ripresa del Falstaff quasi nulla di nuovo. Ancora Victor de Sabata e ancora Mariano Stabile. Fra le donne emerse la Tebaldi. Nella ripresa della Butterfly si è invece avuta la novità dell'interprete Araujo, ricca più di voce che di arte, e tipica arte. Decorosissimo per limpidezza e sicurezza il Prandelli ma questo secondo Pertile di permanenza scaligera non ha poi tutte le risorse di Pertile. E c'è in giro pel mondo la più bella voce d'oggi: Di Stefano.

FIRENZE

Da un punto di vista di potenza e suggestione interpretativa, non v'ha dubbio che la comparsa di Dimitro Mitropoulos sul podio del Teatro Comunale è stato l'avvenimento saliente del «XV Maggio musicale fiorentino». E' noto che questo grandissimo direttore si batte strenuamente a favore dell'arte contemporanea e che di buon grado rinunzia ad un assenso più incondizionato di mille e millle ascoltatori pur di ottenere presso uno stuolo qualificato ed informato l'adesione convinta e consapevole. Tuttavia le doti interpretative di Mitropoulos sono talmente accese e galvanizzanti che egli riesce, e meritamente, a far successo anche in ordine ai suoi propositi culturali nei confronti della compilazione dei programmi. A parte la «Terza sinfonia» di Beethoven — che dalle mani di Mitropoulos affiorò colma di un ribelle fervore e di una stupenda intemperante concitazione — le musiche dei due concerti fiorentini erano dovute all'ingegno di Mahler, Prokofieff e Malipiero. Mahler, che ben a ragione sta riguadagnando terreno nell'opinione pubblica (e non già polemicamente, come vorrebbero certuni, ma per la documentata presenza di valori poetici vitali e validi), pone nella «Prima sinfonia» un magistero strumentale che condensa ed allinea si esperienze di poco antecedenti o addirittura contemporanee ma che risulta, al tempo stesso sempre compresso, infiammato e carico. Il terzo tempo è pagina non soltanto di durevole profondità interiore ma degna di far scuola — come lo ha fatto — in ordine a preblemi strumentali connessi a soluzioni estetiche e a crisi espressive. Nel «Quarto concerto per pianoforte e orchestra» di Gian Francesco Malipiero avvince la spaziata cantabilità del tempo centrale, ricco di quelle rapide meditazioni rapsodiche che costituiscono la grata e preziosa cifra emotiva del compositore veneziano. Nel Prokofieff della «Quinta sinfonia» si apprezza la scioltezza della materia, trattata brillantemente, senza pesantezze e prolissità, in vista di un gradimento generico forse, ma tutt'altro che spiacevole.

I FISARMONICISTI ITALIANI AL VI FESTIVAL INTERNAZIONALE DI LONDRA

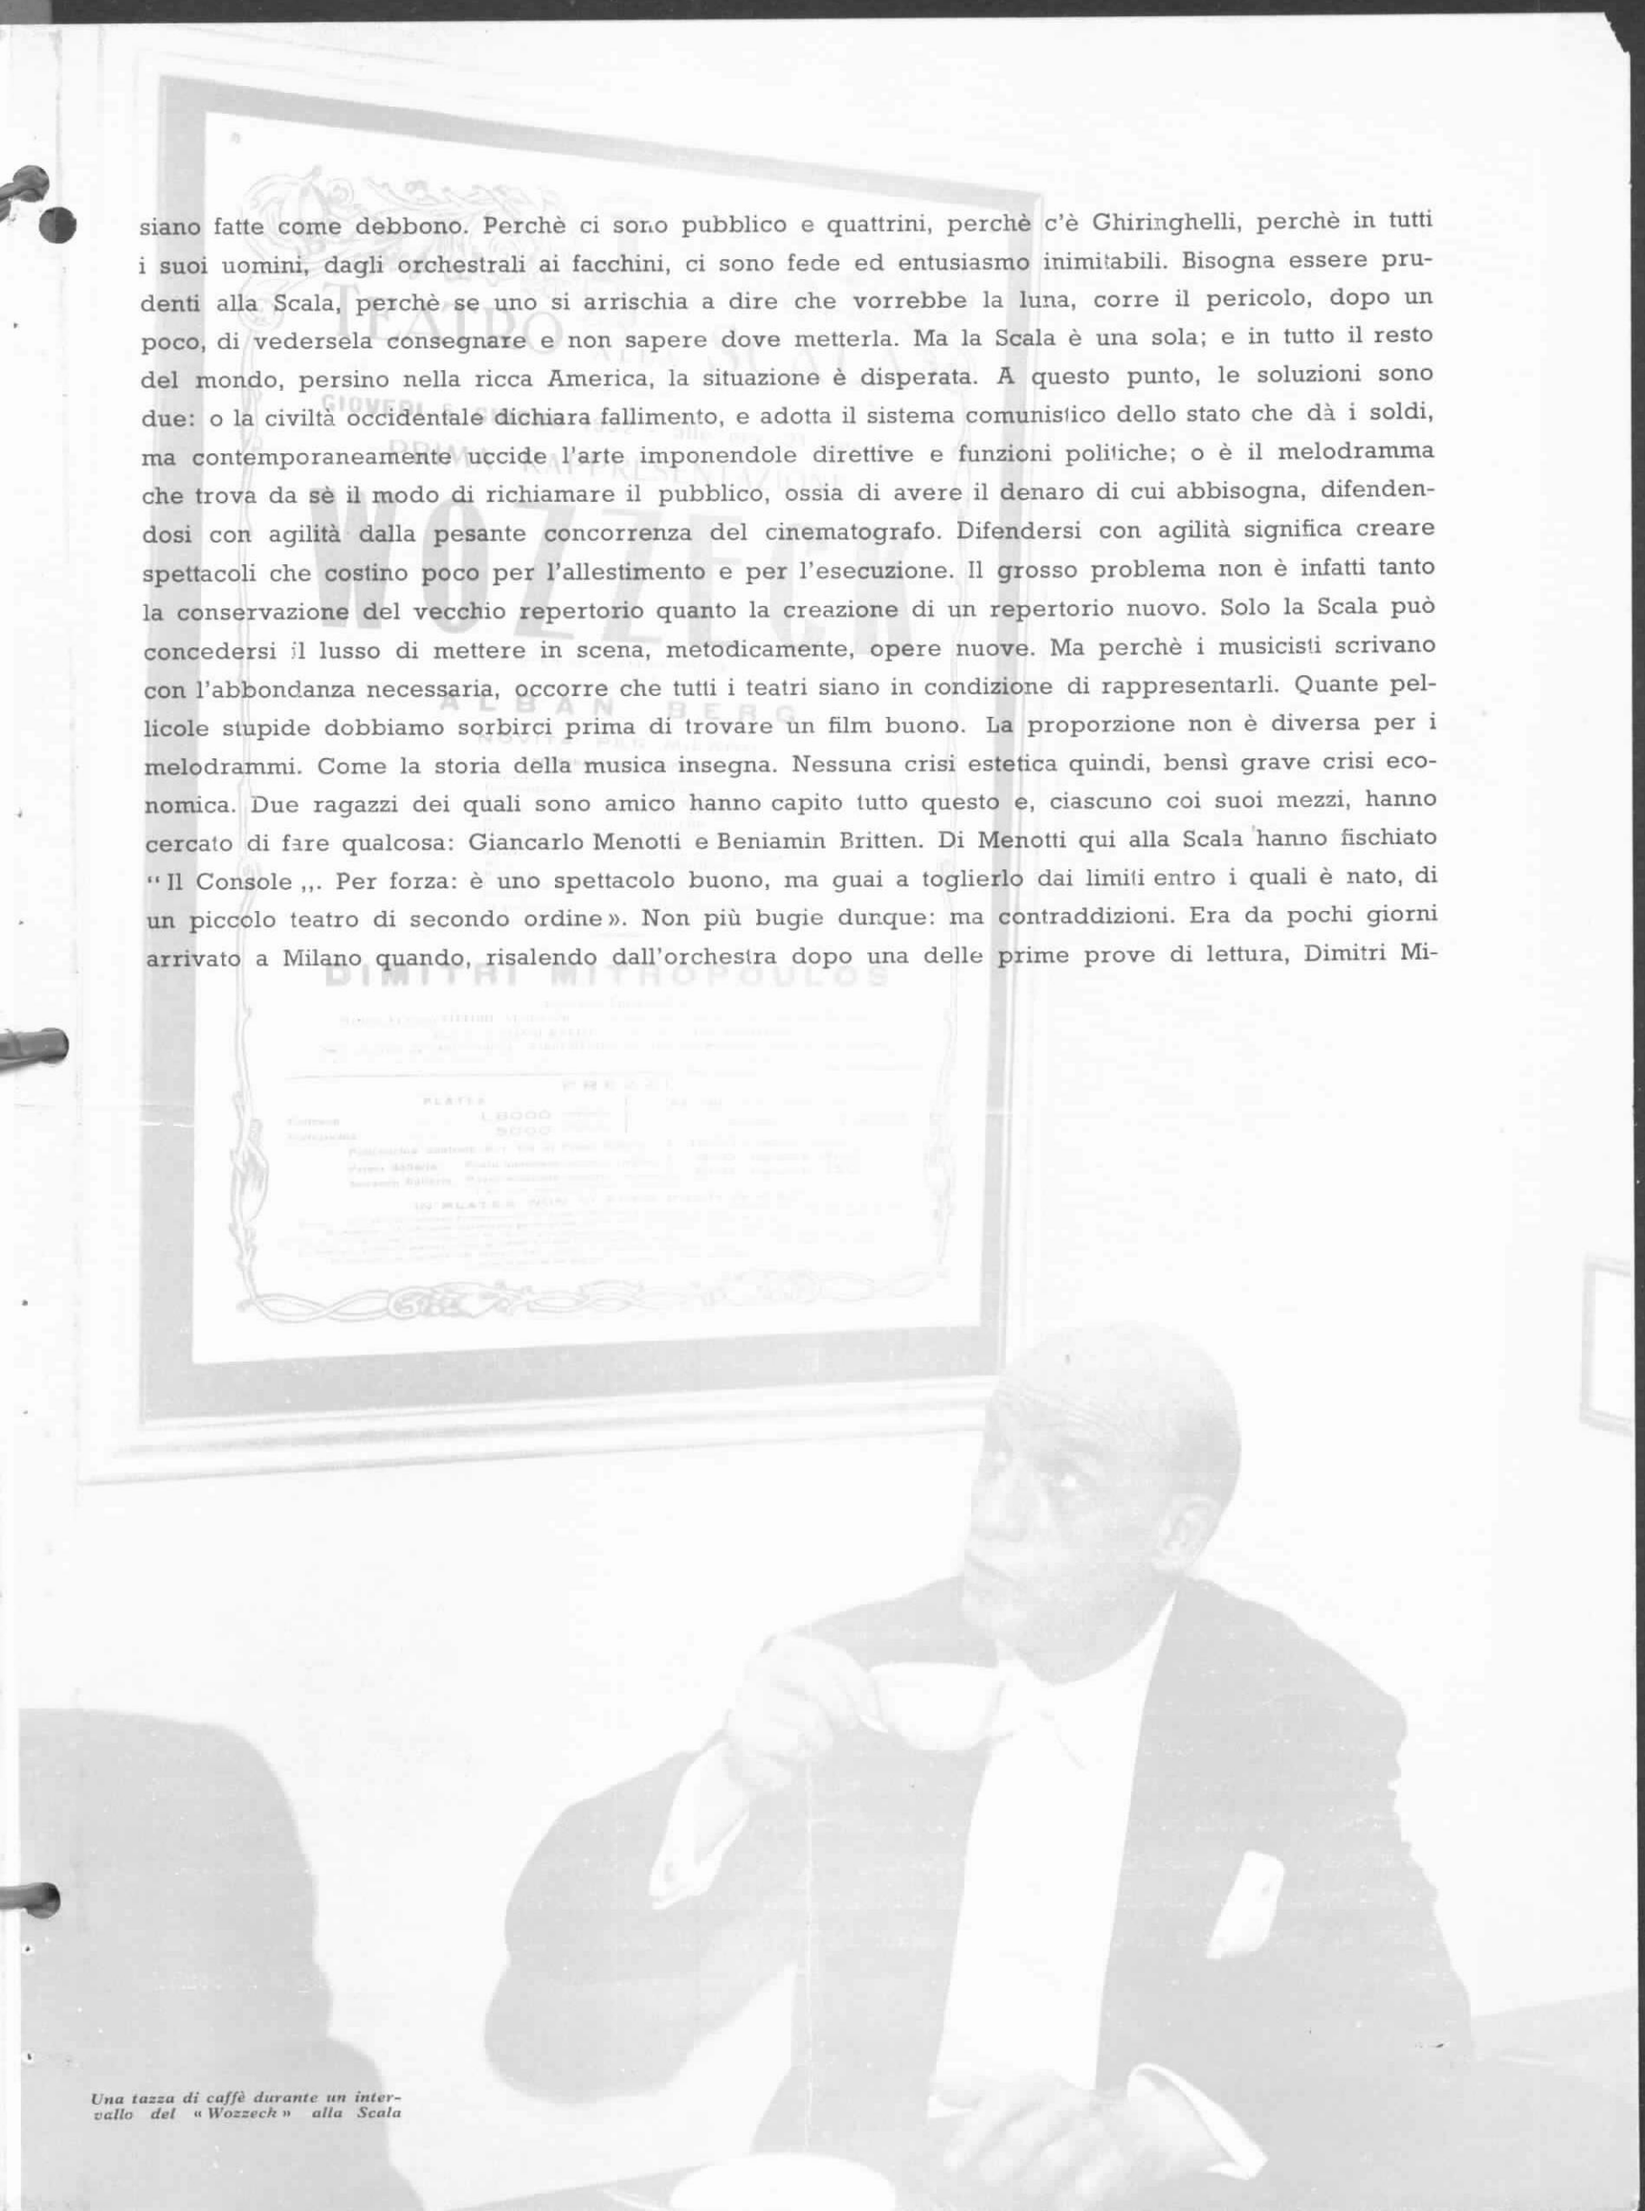
EGIDIO BENADUSI

Invitati dalla B. A. A. (Associazione fisarmonicisti britannici) al suo VI Festival Internazionale di Londra indetto per il 24 Maggio scorso, i nostri due candidati al 2° Trofeo Mondiale di Barcellona — Egidio Benadusi e Amleto Zonca —, nonchè Gervasio Marcosignori si sono esibiti brillantemente con altri virtuosi internazionali, quali il francese Aimable, i tedeschi Werner Heetfeld e Guido Wagner, gl'inglesi Gwenda Wilkin, Martin Lukins, James Reavy e Alf Edwards.

È stata un'altra magnifica manifestazione artistica che ha fatto rifulgere le qualità non comuni dei singoli esecutori, particolarmente dei nostri. Il pubblico d'eccezione del St. Pancras Hall (il bel teatro comunale di Londra) ha dimostrato di apprezzare al massimo grado le esecuzioni musicali degl'italiani, tanto da richiedere loro il bis. Egidio Benadusi, quindicenne appena, si è rivelato sicuro di sè, perfetto, in «Toccata e Fuga» di Bach, «2ª Rapsodia Ungherese» di Liszt e «Mosaico spagnolo» di Fugazza. Amleto Zonca ha messo in evidenza la bontà della sua tecnica in «Moto perpetuo» di Weber, «Malaguena» di Albeniz e «Valzer» di Prandi.

GERVASIO MARCOSIGNORI

Che dire poi di Gervasio Marcosignori? La signorilità del suo tocco, la caratteristica delle sue interpretazioni, la passionalità del suo temperamento, suscitano in chi lo ascolta un senso di viva ammirazione. Dopo di averlo ascoltato in «Clair de lune» di Debussy, «Preludio» di Volpi, «Carnevale di Venezia» di Frosini, «La Fileuse» di Volpi e «Dita veloci» di Frosini, la flemma dei britannici si è sciolta come la neve al sole, tramutandosi in entusiastici battimani. Non a torto l'hanno battezzato sul posto il «poeta della fisarmonica»!



AMLETO ZONCA

La prova data in terra straniera dai nostri tre campioni ha commosso il sottoscritto — anche lui presente quale Commissario alla propaganda della C.M.A. — confermando quanto egli sostiene da tempo: che nell'A. N. I. A. i giovani virtuosi crescono come i funghi, che il prodigio non è l'esclusività d'un sol ragazzo o d'una sola Scuola.

L'Italia, la nostra cara Patria, può andarne orgogliosa!

siano fatte come debbono. Perchè ci sono pubblico e quattrini, perchè c'è Ghiringhelli, perchè in tutti i suoi uomini, dagli orchestrali ai facchini, ci sono fede ed entusiasmo inimitabili. Bisogna essere prudenti alla Scala, perchè se uno si arrischia a dire che vorrebbe la luna, corre il pericolo, dopo un poco, di vedersela consegnare e non sapere dove metterla. Ma la Scala è una sola; e in tutto il resto del mondo, persino nella ricca America, la situazione è disperata. A questo punto, le soluzioni sono due: o la civiltà occidentale dichiara fallimento, e adotta il sistema comunistico dello stato che dà i soldi, ma contemporaneamente uccide l'arte imponendole direttive e funzioni politiche; o è il melodramma che trova da sè il modo di richiamare il pubblico, ossia di avere il denaro di cui abbisogna, difendendosi con agilità dalla pesante concorrenza del cinematografo. Difendersi con agilità significa creare spettacoli che costino poco per l'allestimento e per l'esecuzione. Il grosso problema non è infatti tanto la conservazione del vecchio repertorio quanto la creazione di un repertorio nuovo. Solo la Scala può concedersi il lusso di mettere in scena, metodicamente, opere nuove. Ma perchè i musicisti scrivano con l'abbondanza necessaria, occorre che tutti i teatri siano in condizione di rappresentarli. Quante pellicole stupide dobbiamo sorbirci prima di trovare un film buono. La proporzione non è diversa per i melodrammi. Come la storia della musica insegna. Nessuna crisi estetica quindi, bensì grave crisi economica. Due ragazzi dei quali sono amico hanno capito tutto questo e, ciascuno coi suoi mezzi, hanno cercato di fare qualcosa: Giancarlo Menotti e Beniamin Britten. Di Menotti qui alla Scala hanno fischiato "Il Console,,. Per forza: è uno spettacolo buono, ma guai a toglierlo dai limiti entro i quali è nato, di un piccolo teatro di secondo ordine». Non più bugie dunque: ma contraddizioni. Era da pochi giorni arrivato a Milano quando, risalendo dall'orchestra dopo una delle prime prove di lettura, Dimitri Mitropoulos aveva trovato ad attenderlo sulla porta del camerino, Herbert von Karajan: « Vorrei che tu facessi qualche concerto a Vienna, con la mia orchestra », aveva detto il direttore tedesco. E il collega greco aveva risposto: « Grazie. Ma cosa vuoi che diriga a Vienna: le sinfonie di Beethoven? ». Arte inferiore il teatro, trabocchetto per far cadere, chi vi si accosta, nel bel mezzo della musica, della poesia, delle arti « pure ». I due concerti del 1934 e del 1935 sono tuttavia dimenticati e solo il « Wozzeck » del 1952 conta come esperienza scaligera. E somma ambizione, anzichè le sinfonie di Beethoven innanzi al più beethoveniano dei pubblici, sono le opere di Puccini, in un teatro. Ama il melodramma pucciniano perchè verista, ama quello berghiano perchè esasperazione e raffinamento di romanticismo; fa, dell'opera italiana, un unico stile con due sole sfumature. Teme dai comunisti l'uccisione dell'arte, e comunisticamente riduce un problema estetico a conflitto economico. Dà ragione, seduto al caffè, ai fischiatori scaligeri de « Il Console »; e dalla ribalta della Scala invita al silenzio i fischiatori del « Wozzeck ». Questo — vi sono testimoni — ha detto Mitropoulos, poche ore prima dell'ultima replica del « Wozzeck ». Eppure l'intervista non è tutta qui. Ma come rubargli, dalle mani, le parole soffocate prima che gli giungessero alle labbra; come tradurre il discorso di quei suoi piccoli occhi mobilissimi, insidiosi, cangianti di continuo per tutte le tonalità del grigio e dell'azzurro? Si può soltanto, anzi si deve, per lealtà, dire che le sue parole, scelte dalle mani e porte dagli occhi, componevano le contraddizioni in ordine logico e riscattavano le bugie con sincerità sino a incantare e convincere. E a rivelare che in un punto solo lo spirito di Mitropoulos ha ceduto al fanatismo: nell'amore alla musica. Soprattutto alla musica d'opera.

PER LA PRIMA VOLTA ALLA SCALA L'OPERA DI BERG

La tragedia senza speranza del povero soldato Wozzeck

La pessimistica denuncia di una società in decadenza nel dramma più rappresentativo dell'espressionismo musicale tedesco

Composto tra il 1917 e il 1921, rappresentato per la prima volta a Berlino il 14 dicembre 1925, il Wozzeck di Alban Berg (1885-1935) ha avuto ieri la sua prima rappresentazione alla Scala. L'avvenimento, per quanto la coincidenza sia fortuita, si può paragonare alla mostra delle opere di Van Gogh che si è chiusa soltanto da poche settimane. Come Van Gogh nel campo della pittura e forse anche più decisamente, nel campo della musica Berg rappresenta un momento cruciale nella storia dell'arte moderna: quella della ribellione spinta sino all'estremo limite, oltre il quale non vi è che la disintegrazione completa della forma, il vuoto artistico, in una parola.

La ribellione di Berg è quella degli intellettuali tedeschi, i cosiddetti espressionisti, i quali, di fronte alla bestialità trionfante dell'imperialismo guglielmino, prima, e poi di fronte alle catastrofi della guerra e della rivoluzione tradita, tentarono di esprimere la condanna della borghesia dominante fotografandola nei suoi aspetti più ripugnanti e macabri, scoprendo la sua corruzione, cercando di far salire al cielo la puzza della sua putrefazione.

L'espressionismo, dai suoi maggiori scrittori (Wedekind, il primo Brecht, Toller), alla pittura di Kokoschka e del gruppo «Il ponte», al film di Wiener Il gabinetto del dottor Caliaris, fu quindi amaro e pessimistico, disperato e corrotto, fu spesso un atto di accusa contro la società, ma non riuscì a trasformarsi in un vero grido di rivolta. (Vi sono invece artisti come Brecht che riuscirono a superare l'esperienza espressionista giungendo al realismo).

In questo mondo il Wozzeck di Berg rappresenta un momento di grande importanza. Lo stesso dramma di Georg Buchner, sebbene composto un secolo prima, nel 1830, è tutto un grido di disperazione e di dolore. Wozzeck è il povero soldato, povero di danaro e povero di spirito, che ha un solo bene al mondo, Maria e il suo bambino. Per mantenerli è costretto a provare su se stesso le teorie pazzesche del dottore del reggimento che quasi lo fanno uscire di senno (l'identità tra questo dottore pazzo e coloro che opereranno esperimenti inumani nei campi di concentramento hitleriani è di una precisione allucinante). Ma questo è solo l'inizio del suo calvario: Maria, donna primitiva e incosciente lo stradisce col bel Tamburo Maggiore che, ubriaco, bastona Wozzeck rivelandogli la sua vergogna. Nella mente sconvolta di Wozzeck nasce l'idea del sangue; l'inferno del delitto lo attira. Incapace di rivoltarsi contro chi lo opprime, egli riversa la sua disperazione sulla donna; porta Maria in riva allo stagno e l'accoltella, finendo poi egli stesso nella palude dove annega. Il dramma si chiude con una scena terribile. I bambini che giocano annunciano al figlio di Maria che sua madre è morta e corrono a vedere il cadavere; il bimbo che non può comprendere, li segue sul suo cavallino di legno gridando: «hop, hop, hop».

In questa tragedia Wozzeck, torturato dal dottore, deriso dal suo capitano che è un idiota incosciente, picchiato e derubato dal Tamburo Maggiore, è il simbolo evidente del popolo tedesco oppresso da ogni parte e incapace di trovare una via di salvezza. Questo senso d'angoscia, di disperazione, di rivolta inutile trova nella musica la sua più allucinante espressione. Come la realtà si deforma sotto il pennello del pittore che l'aggredisce nella speranza di arrivare alla sua essenza, così l'armonia tradizionale, portando alle sue ultime conseguenze l'esperienza wagneriana, viene demolita, lacerata per lasciar posto a duri contrasti di sonorità, a nuove forme melodiche che, anzichè accarezzare l'orecchio lo feriscono e lo colpiscono come un urlo di disperazione.

Nel Wozzeck però questa deformazione arriva raramente alle sue estreme conseguenze. Là dove l'autore vuol far risaltare al di sotto della ferocia della società, la calda umanità dei suoi personaggi e il dolore del loro tragico destino (come nell'aria di Maria nel primo atto o nella lettura della Bibbia nel terzo) o dove il canto popolare entra, sia pure dalla porta di servizio (come nell'arrivo del Tamburo Maggiore, nella scena del ballo o nel finale), allora l'armonia si distende, la melodia si fa aperta e cantabile e un vento di fresca vita circola nell'opera. Lo stesso intimo legame della musica al dramma, così reale e concreto, costituisce il limite che l'autore stesso pone ad ogni gratuita astrazione: «Volli dare al teatro — egli scrisse — ciò che appartiene al teatro, cioè articolare la musica in tal modo che essa fosse cosciente in ogni istante della sua funzione al servizio del dramma». E il Wozzeck, infatti, è opera teatrale nella sua forma più piena ed anche se spesso aggredisce lo spettatore, lo prende e lo soggioga, lo turba e lo commuove.

Con quali mezzi tecnici dai nomi difficili, Berg sia giunto a questo risultato è cosa che interessa lo studioso, ma non lo spettatore. Come affermava lo stesso Berg, non è la conoscenza delle soluzioni di forma che avvince il pubblico, ma bensì «dal momento in cui il sipario si alza al momento in cui cala... ognuno pone attenzione solo alle vaste implicazioni sociali del lavoro che trascendono il particolare destino di Wozzeck».

Queste righe che abbiamo sottolineato confermano che per Alban Berg, come per gli altri espressionisti, ogni soluzione artistica non è che l'eco di una corrispondente soluzione sociale. Il disperato pessimismo della musica di Wozzeck, quel clima di fatalità e di angoscia che pervade il dramma sin dalle prime battute, è la traduzione in arte della sensazione di disperata impotenza che gli artisti tedeschi sentivano di fronte alla duplice sconfitta della Germania: nella guerra e nella rivoluzione (si ricordino, in un altro campo, i verdastri ritratti della pittura espressionista, vere e proprie immagini di cadaveri ambulanti!). Sotto la cappa di piombo della borghesia, gli espressionisti tedeschi, pur rifiutando di adattarvisi, non seppero varcarne i confini, non riuscirono a gettare un ponte verso un'arte veramente nuova, costruttiva e non solo distruttiva. Il Wozzeck, come, in un'altra direzione, il Pelleas et Melisande di Debussy, è quindi un'«opera limite», l'estremo frutto di un ramo ormai vizzo. Esso indica l'ultimo confine — ed un confine assai pericoloso — a cui la musica può ancora giungere restando musica; ed indica perciò stesso la necessità di una soluzione nuova che, superando la semplice negazione del mondo borghese, entro cui esso è chiuso, scelga la strada aperta dalle forze nuove che salgono sul crollo delle antiche classi dirigenti. E questo è, ad un tempo, il limite storico ed estetico di questo geniale documento di un'epoca cruciale nella storia.

Se ora, dalle difficoltà che offre la comprensione di questo lavoro, passiamo a considerare le difficoltà dell'esecuzione, dobbiamo, trascurando ogni osservazione di dettaglio, ammirare il lavoro fatto alla Scala: dall'allestimento scenico — bozzetti di Gianni Ratto (che ha trovato una soluzione piena di gusto e di intelligenza alla difficoltà della rapida successione delle 15 scene), figurini di E. Colciaghi, attenta regia di Herbert Graf — all'allestimento musicale. Qui stava il vero ostacolo che, sotto la trascinante guida di Dimitri Mitropulos, l'orchestra e i cori della Scala (magistralmente istruiti da Veneziani) hanno superato pienamente assieme ad una compagnia di canto a cui non vanno certo lesinate le lodi: Tito Gobbi (Wozzeck), Dorothy Dow (Maria), Hugues Cuenod (capitano), Italo Tajo (dottore), Mirto Picchi (Tamburo Maggiore), Petre Munteanu, Carlo Badioli, Enrico Campi, Luciano Della Pergola, Eugenia Zareska, Luigi Fort, Vittorio Pandano e Silvana Fasola, piccolissima perfetta interprete.

L'allestimento, dalla pittura delle scene, alle luci, ai macchinismi complicati, alla fattura dei costumi ha funzionato come un orologio contribuendo non poco al successo che è stato vivissimo nonostante qualche isolato contrasto.

Καὶ τὰ μάτια της ὑγράνθηκαν μόνο μὲ τὴν σκέψι αὐτή. Ἴσως τώρα νὰ ρωτήσετε πῶς εἶναι δυνατὸν τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Σκάλας νὰ προκαλῇ ἀμφιβολίας ὅσον ἀφορᾷ τὴν μουσικὴ του ἀντίληψιν. Καὶ ἐν τούτοις... Τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Σκάλας εἶνε ἕνα περίεργο τέρας, κολλημένο στὶς πατροπαράδοτες μελῳδίες, στοὺς γνωστοὺς σκοπούς, στὴν Ὄπερα τοῦ περασμένου αἰῶνος. Δὲν συμβιβάζεται μὲ νεωτερισμούς. Ἦταν λοιπὸν ἀπολύτως δικαιολογημένη ἡ παλιὰ δέσποινα τῶν Ἀθηνῶν ὅταν ἔτρεμε γιὰ τὸν Μητρόπουλό μας. Ὁ «Βώτσεκ» εἶνε μία ὄπερα σὲ τρεῖς πράξεις καὶ δεκαπέντε εἰκόνες, πέντε σὲ κάθε πρᾶξι. Ἀπὸ τὴν δευτέρη σκηνὴ τῆς πρώτης πράξεως ἀκούστηκαν οἱ σφυρίχτρες τοῦ ὑπερώου, χωρὶς νὰ βροῦν ἀντίδρασι. Τὸ διάλειμμα τῆς πρώτης πράξεως πέρασε ἀνάμεσα σὲ ἔντονες συζητήσεις ἀλλὰ χωρὶς ἔξαψι. Καὶ μόνο μετὰ τὸ σήκωμα τῆς αὐλαίας γιὰ τὴν δεύτερη πρᾶξι οἱ «ἀντιβώτσικοι» ἐνσαρκωμένοι ἀπὸ τὴν ἐλλειψι ἀντιδράσεως τοῦ κοινοῦ, ἄρχισαν νὰ καθιστοῦν τὴν παράστασι πεδίον μάχης. Ἀπὸ ἕνα θεωρεῖο μιὰ φωνὴ ἀπαντᾷ: «Ἠλίθιοι...» καὶ ὅταν ἀργότερα νέα σφυρίγματα διακόπτουν μιὰν ἄλλη σκηνή, ἄλλη φωνὴ ἀπαντᾷ μὲ θυμό: «Προσπαθῆστε νὰ εἶσαστε καλοανατεθραμμένοι, ἀφοῦ δὲν εἶσαστε ἔξυπνοι». Τὸ θέαμα δὲν εἶνε μόνον ἐπὶ σκηνῆς, ἀλλὰ καὶ στὴν πλατεία, τὸ ἀκροαμα δὲν προέρχεται ἀπὸ τὴν ὀρχήστρα μόνον ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀπὸ τὸ κοινό. Κι' ἔτσι τελειώνει ἡ δευτέρα πρᾶξις. Τὸ πέσιμο τῆς αὐλαίας, δὲν τὸ συνοδεύει ἡ ὀρχήστρα, ἀλλὰ ἡ ἰαχὴ τοῦ κοινοῦ, ἰαχὴ ἐπιδοκιμασίας ἀλλὰ καὶ σφυρίγματα. Διότι μέσα σὲ ὅλα τὰ ἄλλα παράξενα αὐτῆς τῆς Ὄπερας εἶναι ὅτι πρῶτα τελειώνει ἡ μουσικὴ καὶ ὕστερα ἐν σιγῇ πέφτει ἡ αὐλαία. Ἀλλὰ αὐτὴ τὴν φορὰ σιγὴ δὲν ὑπῆρξε: «μπράβο» ἀνάμεσα στὰ σφυρίγματα, χειροκροτήματα ἀνάμεσα στὶς ἀποδοκιμασίες...

Ὁ Μητρόπουλος τὴν στιγμὴ ποὺ δίδει ἕνα μάθημα θεατρικῆς καὶ κοινωνικῆς ἀγωγῆς στὸ κοινὸν τῆς Σκάλας τοῦ Μιλάνου, στὸ διάλειμμα τῆς δευτέρας πράξεως τοῦ «Βώτσεκ».

Στὸ διάλειμμα αὐτό, ἀξίζει νὰ ἀφιερώσωμε μερικὲς γραμμές. Ὕστερα ἀπὸ τὴν πρώτη ἐμφάνισι τῶν πρωταγωνιστῶν τὰ χειροκροτήματα ἐπιμένουν μὲ κάποια δειλία. Καὶ εἰς ἀπάντησιν τῶν χειροκροτημάτων αὐτῶν ἐμφανίζεται ἕνας Μητρόπουλος χαμογελαστός, ἀδιάφορος στὰ σφυρίγματα. Ἀσυγκίνητος στὰ χειροκροτήματα ἐκεῖνα, ποὺ προσπαθοῦσαν νὰ καλύψουν τὸ ἀνάγωγον ὡρισμένων κύκλων. Στὴν ἔκφρασί του ὑπῆρχε ὅλη ἐκείνη ἡ ἑλληνικὴ ἀνωτερότης, ἡ συνείδησις ἐκείνη τοῦ δημιουργοῦ ποὺ ἀκόμη δὲν κατώρθωσε νὰ τὸν καταλάβῃ τὸ πλῆθος.

Στὰ συνεχιζόμενα σφυρίγματα σηκώνει τὰ χέρια του, τὰ μαγικὰ ἐκεῖνα χέρια, ζητῶντας λίγη σιγὴ γιὰ νὰ μιλήσῃ. Εἰς ἀπάντησιν δέχεται ἀκόμη περισσότερα σφυρίγματα, ἀκούγονται ἀντεγκλήσεις μεταξὺ τοῦ κοινοῦ, ἐπακολουθεῖ πανδαιμόνιον. Ἡ ὑγιὴς κοινωνία ντρέπεται γιὰ τὴν κατάστασι αὐτή. Προσπαθεῖ νὰ ἐξουδετερώσῃ τὶς σηκωμένες γροθιὲς ποὺ χωρίζουν τοὺς ἀκροατὰς ἐνῶ ἡ θερμοαιμους. Καὶ μόνος, ἀπαθής, ὑπομονητικός, ὁ Μητρόπουλος γεμίζει τὴ σκηνή. Βρισιὲς ὅπως: «πλύστρα», «ἀμόρφωτε», «κακοανατεθραμμένε» κλπ., ἀβρότητες, ποὺ τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Σκάλας δὲν ἀνήλλαξε ποτὲ μεταξύ του, καλύπτονται ἀπὸ τὰ «σσσσς». Καὶ ἐπὶ τέλους γίνεται ἡσυχία. Καὶ μέσα στὴν ἡσυχία αὐτή, ἀκούεται ἡ ἤρεμη, χαϊδευτικὴ φωνὴ τοῦ Μητροπούλου:

— Ἀγαπητοὶ ἀκροαταί, ἀγαπητοὶ φίλοι, τὸ ἔργον αὐτὸ ἀπαιτεῖ τὴν μεγαλύτερη προσοχή, τὴν μεγαλύτερη συγκέντρωσι. Θὰ σᾶς παρακαλέσω νὰ ἀποφεύγετε τὶς ἐκδηλώσεις. Ὄχι γιατί εἶμαι ἀντίθετος πρὸς τὶς ἐκδηλώσεις. Ἀπ' ἐναντίας. Μετὰ τὸ τέλος τῆς παραστάσεως προσβῆτε εἰς οἱασδήποτε ἐκδηλώσεις. Θὰ μὲ βρῆτε σύμφωνον μαζί σας στὴν ἐλευθερία τῆς σκέψεως, ἀλλὰ μετὰ τὸ τέλος. Ὄχι κατὰ τὴν διάρκειαν τῆς παραστάσεως.

Θύελλα χειροκροτημάτων καλύπτει τὰ ὀλίγα πλέον σφυρίγματα στὴν πρωτοφανῆ αὐτὴ ἐκδήλωσι θάρρους ἐκ μέρους ἑνὸς διευθυντοῦ ὀρχήστρας. Ποτὲ ἄλλοτε δὲν ἀκούστηκε ἕνα παρόμοιο πρᾶγμα στὴν Σκάλα. Τὸ μάθημα ποὺ ἔδωσε ὁ Μητρόπουλος σ' αὐτὸ τὸ περίφημο «πούμπλικο Σκαλίτζερο» θὰ μείνῃ ἱστορικό. Τὴν ἐπομένη οἱ κριτικοὶ δὲν ξέρουν πιὰ τί νὰ ποῦν. Θ' ἀοχίσω ἀπὸ τὸ «Κορριέρε Λομπάρντο» ποὺ μὴ ξέροντας τί νὰ πῇ γράφει: «Ἀκούγονται στὴ σάλα βίαιες καὶ παράξενες κραυγὲς ὅπως π.χ. «Ντροπὴ σας ποὺ χειροκροτεῖτε», καὶ «Πάψε ἐσύ, σαλτιμπάγκο», ἀλλὰ στὸ τέλος ὁ Μητρόπουλος μπόρεσε νὰ λάβῃ τὸν λόγον. Καὶ εἶπε, περίπου, σ έ ά σ χ η μ α ἰ τ α λ ι κ ά....» Σημειωτέον, ὅτι ὁ Μητρόπουλος μιλάει θαυμάσια ἰταλικά. Ἀπὸ τὴν ἐφημερίδα «Ἰταλία» θὰ παραθέσωμε μιὰ παράγραφο: «Τὸ θερμό, συγκεκινημένο καὶ ἀσυγκράτητο τελικὸ χειροκρότημα, ἀντιμετώπισε τὸν διευθυντὴ τῆς ὀρχήστρας καὶ τοὺς ἐκτελεστάς, καὶ ἀπήλλαξε τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Σκάλας ἀπὸ τὴν δυσάρεστη θέσι, εἰς τὴν ὁποίαν εἶχε περιπλακῆ ἀπὸ τὴν θοουβώδη, ἀγενῆ καὶ περιωρισμένης ἀντιλήψεως συμπεριφορὰν μιᾶς μειονότητος, ἡ ὁποία ἀφοῦ ἐτάραξε τὴν ἐκτέλεσιν τῆς πρώτης καὶ δευτέρας πράξεως, ἐξηνάγκασε τὸν διευθυντὴν τῆς ὀρχήστρας νὰ καταφύγῃ εἰς μίαν ἀνήκουστον ὑπερράσπισιν. Ἀφοῦ ἐζήτησε σιωπήν, ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἀπηύθυνε μίαν σύντομη παράκλησι πρὸς τὸ κοινόν, προσκαλῶν αὐτὸ νὰ σιωπᾷ τοὐλάχιστον κατὰ τὴν διάρκειαν τῆς ἐκτελέσεως, τοῦ μελοδράματος αὐτοῦ ἀπαιτοῦντος μίαν ἀπόλυτον συγκέντρωσιν κλπ. Ἕνα τέτοιο παταγώδες μάθημα θεατρικῆς ἀγωγῆς τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Σκάλας εὑρέθη ὑποχρεωμένον νὰ τὸ δεχθῇ ἐν σιωπῇ. Ἕνα τράβηγμα τῶν αὐτιῶν, ποὺ τοῦ ἄξιζε καὶ ποὺ δὲν εἶνε καὶ τόσον κολακευτικὸ γι' αὐτό...»

Ὁ «Πόπολο» τοῦ Μιλάνου γράφει: «Ἡ διεύθυνσις ἦτο ἐμπιστευμένη στὸν μαέστρο Δημήτρη Μητρόπουλο, ἕνα εἶδος φαινομένου (ἂς μᾶς ἐπιτρέψῃ τὴν ἔκφρασι) ποὺ μπῆκε μέσα σ' αὐτὴ τὴν παρτιτούρα μὲ τὴν ξενοιασιὰ ἐκείνου ποὺ ὄχι μόνον ξέρει τὴ δουλειά του, ἀλλὰ ἔχει καὶ τὴν ἔκτη αἴσθησι, ποὺ τὸν θέτει ὑπεράνω κάθε δυσκολίας...»

Τὸ «Τέμπο ντὶ Μιλάνο» γράφει: «Ἂν δὲν ἀπατώμεθα, αἱ ἐπιδοκιμασίαι ἀπηυθύνοντο ἰδιαιτέρως πρὸς τὸν ὑπέροχο Δημήτρη Μητρόπουλο, ὁ ὁποῖος μετὰ τὸ τέλος τῆς δευτέρας πράξεως ἀπηυθύνθη πρὸς τὸ κοινὸν καλῶν αὐτὸ εἰς ἡρεμίαν καὶ συγκέντρωσιν».

Τέλος ὁ «Κορριέρε ντέλλα Σέρα» γράφει: «Γιὰ νὰ ποῦμε τὴν ἀλήθεια, δὲν νομίζουμε ὅτι τὸ κοινὸν τῆς Σκάλας ἄξιζε τὸ εὐγενικὸ μάθημα...»

Ἀλλὰ νομίζω, ὅτι τὸν καλύτερον χαρακτηρισμὸν τῆς καταστάσεως δίδουν οἱ λίγες αὐτὲς λέξεις ποὺ μοῦ εἶπε ὁ διευθυντὴς τοῦ Γραφείου Τύπου τῆς Σκάλας: «Σὰν Μιλανέζος, ντρέπομαι γιὰ τὸ χθεσινὸ θέαμα».

ΤΟ ΑΝΕΒΑΣΜΑ ΤΗΣ «ΗΛΕΚΤΡΑΣ» ΣΤΗ Ν. ΥΟΡΚΗ

ΜΙΛΑΝΟΝ, Ἰούνιος.— Μετὰ τὴν θυελλώδη πρεμιέρα τοῦ «Βῶτσεκ» καταλαβαίνει εὔκολα κανεὶς τὸ ἐνδιαφέρον ποὺ παρουσίαζε τὸ πρόγευμα τὸ ὁποῖ ον παρέθεταν εἰς τὴν Βίλλα ντ' Ἔστε στὸ Λάγκο ντὶ Κόμο πρὸς τιμὴν τοῦ Μητροπούλου ὁ Γενικὸς Πρόξενος τῆς Ἑλλάδος καὶ ἡ Ἑλληνικὴ Παροικία Μιλάνου. Ἦταν Παρασκευὴ μεσημέρι, ἑπομένην τῆς πρεμιέρας, καὶ οἱ ὀλίγοι προσκεκλημένοι δὲν ἔβλεπαν τὴν ὥρα νὰ ἀκούσουν ἀπὸ τὸ στόμα τοῦ Μητροπούλου μερικὲς κρίσεις γιὰ τὰ ἐπεισόδια. Ἀλλὰ μόνον κρίσεις ἐπὶ τῶν ἐπεισοδίων δὲν ἐξέφρασεν ὁ μαέστρος. Ὅταν ξεκινήσαμε γιὰ τὸ Κόμο ὁ Μητρόπουλος εἶπωσεν ὅτι εἶχε κάποια δουλειὰ στὶς διόμιση στὸ Μιλάνο καὶ παρεκάλεσε νὰ ἐπισπευσθῇ ὅσον τὸ δυνατὸν τὸ πρόγευμα. Ὅταν ὅμως γύρισε στὸ Μιλάνο ἦταν τέσσερις τὸ ἀπόγευμα καὶ ἔδειχνε μιὰ εἰλικρινῆ εὐχαρίστησι ποὺ βρέθηκε μέσα σ' ἕνα ἑλληνικὸ περιβάλλον.

Γιατί, τί τὰ θέλετε... Ὅσο καὶ ἂν ὅλος ὁ κόσμος τὸν ἔχει γεμίσει δόξα, ἡ Ἑλλάδα εἶναι πάντα βαθειὰ ριζωμένη στὴν καρδιά του καὶ εἶμαι βέβαιος ὅτι δὲν βλέπει τὴν ὥρα νὰ βρεθῇ ἀνάμεσα στὸ παληὸ ἐκεῖνο γνώριμο περιβάλλον μὲ τοὺς ἁπλοὺς ἀνθρώπους, μὲ τὴν ἀνοιχτὴ καρδιά, ποὺ τόσο τοὺς καταλαβαίνει καὶ τόσο τὸν νοιώθουνε.

Μιὰ ἀπὸ τὶς πρῶτες ἐρωτήσεις ἦταν φυσικὰ γιατὶ διάλεξε γιὰ τὴν μεταπολεμικὴ ἐμφάνισί του στὴν Σκάλα, ἕνα ἔργο σὰν τὸ «Βῶτσεκ».

— Δὲν τὸ διάλεξα ἐγώ, ἀπήντησε, ἀλλὰ ἡ Διεύθυνσις τοῦ θεάτρου τῆς Σκάλας, γνωρίζοντας καλὰ ὅτι τὸ ἔργο αὐτὸ εἶναι μέσα στὶς εἰδικότητές μου.

Γιὰ τὴν Σκάλα ἐκφράζεται μὲ τὸν μεγαλείτερο ἐνθουσιασμό. Θεωρώντας την τὸ μεγαλείτερο θέατρο Μελοδράματος τοῦ κόσμου, ἀσυγκρίτως ἀνώτερο ἀπὸ τὸ Μετροπόλιταν τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης. Γιὰ τὸν Μητρόπουλο ἡ Σκάλα δὲν εἶναι θέατρο, εἶναι Ναός. Τὰ μέσα ποὺ ὑπάρχουν ἐκεῖ δὲν βρίσκονται πουθενὰ ἀλλοῦ. Καὶ τὴν Σελήνη ἂν ζητήση κανεὶς θὰ κάνουν πάν' τὸ δυνατὸν γιὰ νὰ τοῦ τὴν φέρουν, χωρὶς νὰ ἐνδιαφέρεται ἡ Διεύθυνσις τῆς Σκάλας γιὰ τὰ ἔξοδα. Στὴν Ἀμερική, ποὺ ὑπάρχουν οἱ περισσότερες συμφωνικὲς ὀρχήστρες ἀπὸ ὅλον τὸν ἄλλο κόσμο μαζί, ἡ Ὄπερα συναντᾷ τεράστιες δυσκολίες, καὶ γι' αὐτὸ ὁ μαέστρος προτιμάει συχνὰ νὰ διευθύνῃ ἐλόκληρες ὅπερες σὲ κοντσέρτα, πρᾶγμα τὸ ὁποῖον ἔχει σημειώσει τερατώδη ἐπιτυχίαν. Αὐτὸ ἄλλωστε τὸ κάνει πλέον καὶ ὁ Τοσκανίνι.

Σὲ μιὰ ἄλλη ἐρώτησι, περὶ τοῦ ποιούς Ἰταλοὺς διευθυντὰς ὀρχήστρας προτιμᾷ, ὁ Μητρόπουλος μίλησε μὲ πολλὴ ἐκτίμησι γιὰ τὸν Βίκτορα ντε Σάμπατα. Ἐπίσης ὑπεγράμμισε τὴν μεγάλη ἐπιτυχία ποὺ σημείωσε στὴν Ἀμερικὴ ὁ νέος μαέστρος Καντέλλι, εἷς τὸ πρόσωπον τοῦ ὁποίου διαβλέπει μίαν δόξαν τοῦ μέλλοντος.

Μιὰ ἄλλη ἐρώτησις ἀναφερομένη εἰς τὰς προτιμήσεις τοῦ Ἀμερικανικοῦ κοινοῦ τοῦ δίδει τὴν εὐκαιρία νὰ τονίσῃ ὅτι εἰς τὴν Ἀμερικὴν δέχονται πολὺ εὐνοϊκὰ τὴν μοντέρνα μουσική, τόσο, ποὺ σὲ κάθε κοντσέρτο ὁ μαέστρος εἶναι ὑποχρεωμένος νὰ περιλάβῃ τοὐλάχιστον μία σύνθεσι συγχρόνου συνθέτου. Ὁ Μαλιπιέρο καὶ ὁ Ντάλλα Πίκκολα εἶναι δύο ἀπὸ τοὺς μεγαλειτέρους ζῶντας συνθέτας κατὰ τὸν Μητρόπουλο, ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ δύο εἶναι τελείως παραγνωρισμένοι στὸν τόπο τους. «Κανεὶς προφήτης στὸν τόπο του...», λέγει.

Μιὰ ἄλλη ἐρώτησις στὴν ὁποίαν ἀπήντησε μὲ πολλὴ διπλωματικότητα ὁ μαέστρος, εἶναι ἂν σκέπτεται νὰ κατεβῇ στὴν Ἑλλάδα. Οἱ τόσες ἀσχολίες του, οἱ τόσες ὑποχρεώσεις ποὺ ἔχει ἀναλάβει, δὲν τοῦ ἐπιτρέπουν νὰ ἀντιμετωπίσῃ τὴν πιθανότητα ἑνὸς ταξιδίου κατὰ τὴν προσεχῆ περίοδο. Τὸ πρόγραμμά του ἔχει καταρτισθῇ ἤδη μέχρι τέλους 1953 καὶ ἐνῷ περιλαμβάνει καὶ πάλι τὸν «Μάτζο Φιορεντίνο» δὲν περιλαμβάνει οὔτε τὴν Σκάλα οὔτε τὴν Ἑλλάδα. Τὸν χειμῶνα ὅμως τοῦ 1953—54 θὰ διευθύνῃ στὴν Σκάλα μίαν σχεδὸν ἄγνωστη Ἰταλικὴ Ὄπερα τὸ ὄνομα τῆς ὁποίας ἠρνήθη νὰ ἀποκαλύψῃ, καὶ ὕστερα δὲν ἀποκλείεται νὰ ἔλθῃ στὴν Ἑλλάδα. Παρ' ὅλα αὐτά, τὸ ἐνδιαφέρον ποὺ ἔδειξε γιὰ τὴν Κρατικὴ Ὀρχήστρα τῶν Ἀθηνῶν καὶ ἡ ἱκανοποίησις ποὺ ἐξέφρασε γιὰ τὸ γεγονὸς ὅτι τὸ Βασιλικὸ Θέατρο στὴν περιοδεία του στὴν Ἀμερικὴ θὰ δώσῃ τὴν Ἠλέκτρα τοῦ Σοφοκλέους μὲ μουσικὴ δική του ἀφήνουν βάσιμες ἐλπίδες ὅτι πολὺ πρὶν ἀπὸ τὸ 1954 οἱ Ἀθηναῖοι θὰ ἔχουν τὴν εὐκαιρία νὰ ἀποθεώσουν τὸν μαέστρο.

Ἡ συζήτησις δὲν μποροῦσε νὰ μὴν θίξῃ τὴν πολιτικὴ συμπεριφορὰ μερικῶν καλλιτεχνῶν κατὰ τὴν διάρκειαν τοῦ πολέμου. Ἐδῶ ὁ μαέστρος δὲν ἀπέφυγε οὔτε πρὸς στιγμὴν νὰ ἐκφράσῃ τὰς ἀντιλήψεις του.

— Ἄλλοτε ὁ καλλιτέχνης ἐθεωρεῖτο ὡς ἕνα πρόσωπο ἐστερημένο ἠθικῶν ἀρχῶν, καὶ οἱ μεγαλείτερες μεγαλοφυΐες ὅπως ὁ Λεονάρντο Ντὰ Βίντσι καὶ ὁ Μιχαὴλ Ἄγγελος ζήσανε περιφρονημένοι ἀπὸ τοὺς συγχρόνους τους. Σήμερα γιὰ νὰ εἶναι κανεὶς καλλιτέχνης μὲ τὴν πλήρη σημασία τῆς λέξεως, πρέπει νὰ ἀποτελῇ παράδειγμα στὸ λαὸ ὄχι μόνο ὡς καλλιτέχνης ἀλλὰ καὶ ὡς ἄνθρωπος, μὲ πνευματικὴ καὶ ἠθικὴ ζωή, ἄψογες, ἔτσι μόνον ὁ καλλιτέχνης μπορεῖ καὶ πρέπει νὰ συμβάλῃ γιὰ νὰ κάνῃ ἀπὸ τὸν πλανήτη μας ἕναν καλλίτερο κόσμο. Δὲν πρέπει κανεὶς νὰ κρίνῃ τὸν καλλιτέχνη μονόπλευρα, ἀλλὰ κάθε κρίσις πρέπει νὰ ἀφορᾷ καὶ τὸν ἄνθρωπο. Ἐγὼ προσωπικῶς καταδικάζω αὐστηρότατα π.χ. τὸν Μέγκελμπεργκ, ποὺ ὑπῆρξε προδότης τῆς πατρίδος του, ἔστω καὶ ἂν ὑπῆρξε μόνον πνευματικῶς καὶ ὄχι στὴν πρακτικὴ ζωὴ προδότης. Δὲν μπορῶ νὰ τοῦ συγχωρήσω τὸ γεγονὸς ὅτι τὴν ἡμέρα ποὺ μπῆκανε στὴν Ὁλλανδία οἱ Γερμανοὶ σήκωσε τὸ ποτήρι τῆς σαμπάνιας, Ὁλλανδὸς αὐτός, καὶ εἶπε ὅτι ἐπὶ τέλους ἦρθαν οἱ Γερμανοί... Δὲν εἶναι τὸ ἴδιο μὲ τὸν Φουρτβαὶγκλερ ὁ ὁποῖος μπορεῖ νὰ ἠνέχθη τὸ ναζιστικὸ καθεστὼς ἀλλὰ αὐτὸ τὸ ἔκανε μέσα στὴν πατρίδα του καὶ ἀσφαλῶς ἀπὸ καλὴ πίστι.

Τὰ ταξίδια του στὴν Ἰταλία δὲν παρέχουν κανένα οἰκονομικὸ ὄφελος στὸ μαέστρο. Ἀπ' ἐναντίας, οἰκονομικῶς εἶναι ἐπιζήμια, ἀλλὰ τὰ πραγματοποιεῖ γιὰ τὴν Τέχνη.

— Δὲν ἔχω κανένα σύνδεσμο στὴν ζωή μου. Κι' ἔτσι μπορῶ νὰ ἱκανοποιήσω αὐτὲς τὶς ἀπολαύσεις μου. Γιὰ μένα σκοπὸς τῆς ζωῆς μου εἶναι νὰ συμβάλω στὴν πρόοδο τῆς τέχνης καὶ νὰ ὁδηγήσω ὅσο μπορῶ τοὺς ἀνθρώπους πρὸς ἕνα κόσμο πιὸ καλὸ καὶ σὲ μιὰ κοινωνικὴ δικαιοσύνη πιὸ προοδευτική. Φυσικὰ γι' αὐτὸ δὲν εἴχαμε ἀνάγκη νὰ περιμένωμε τὸν κύριο Στάλιν νὰ μᾶς τὸ πῇ. Ἐδῶ καὶ δυὸ χιλιάδες χρόνια ἕνας κάποιος Κύριος εἶπε. «ἀγάπα τὸν πλησίον σου». Αὐτὴ ἡ ἐντολὴ ἐμένα μοῦ φάνηκε πάντα πάρα πολὺ δύσκολο νὰ τὴν ἀκολουθήσω, ὅσο καὶ ἂν προσπάθησα, ἀλλὰ νομίζω ὅτι θὰ ἔπρεπε τοὐλάχιστον νὰ μπορῇ κανεὶς νὰ πῇ: «σεβάσου τὸν πλησίον σου» καὶ πιὸ πολὺ: «μίσησε τὸν πλησίον σου». Ὁ καλλιτέχνης πρέπει νὰ σταματάῃ σ' αὐτὰ τὰ δόγματα καὶ νὰ μὴν ἀναμιγνύεται ὑπερβολικὰ οὔτε στὸ πολιτικὸ οὔτε στὸ κοινωνικὸ πεδίον. Ἂς πάρωμε τὸν ἄφθαστο καλλιτέχνη Σαρλώ. Ἔχασε ὅλη του τὴν δημοτικότητα γιατὶ θέλησε νὰ ἀναμιχθῇ ὑπερβολικὰ σὲ θέματα πολιτικοκοινωνικά, ἐπιτυγχάνοντας ἀντίθετα ἀποτελέσματα. Ὁ «Κύριος Βερντοὺ» εἶναι ἀναμφισβήτητα ἕνα ἀριστούργημα, ἀλλὰ γιὰ τοὺς νέους εἶναι ἕνας κίνδυνος. Εἶναι πολὺ περισσότερο βλαβερὴ αὐτὴ ἡ φιλοσοφία, ἀπὸ ἕνα φίλμ γκάγκστερ μὲ ὅλους τοὺς δολοφόνους του.

Ἡ συζήτησις κατόπιν ἐστράφη στοὺς Ρώσσους μουσικούς. Ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἔχει διευθύνει δυὸ φορὲς κοντσέρτα στὴν Ρωσία, τὸ 1934 καὶ τὸ 1935. Εἶναι θαυμαστὴς ἔνθερμος τῶν Ρώσσων μουσουργῶν ἀλλὰ ἀναγνωρίζει ὅτι δὲν μπορεῖ νὰ γίνῃ τίποτε τὸ μεγαλοφυὲς κάτω ἀπὸ τὸ κομμουνιστικὸ πέλμα. Ἀναφέρει τὸ παράδειγμα τοῦ μεγάλου Ρώσου συνθέτου Σοστάκοβιτς, τοῦ ὁποίου ἡ μεγαλοφυΐα ἐγονάτισεν ἀφ' ὅτου τὸν διέταξαν νὰ συνθέσῃ μουσικὴν ἐπάνω στὰ ἀχνάρια τοῦ Κόμματος. «Ἡ Εὐρώπη βαδίζει ἀσφαλῶς τὸν δρόμο τῆς κοινωνικῆς δικαιοσύνης, μὲ μεγάλα πραγματικὰ σοσιαλιστικὰ βήματα, οὐαὶ ὅμως καὶ ἀλλοίμονον ἂν σ' αὐτὸν τὸν ὡραῖο δρόμο συναντήσῃ τὸν μπολσεβικικὸ Ἰμπεριαλισμό».

Ἡ συζήτησις μὲ τὸν μαέστρο ἦταν μιὰ πραγματικὴ ἀπόλαυσις. Δὲν ὑπάρχει θέμα ποὺ νὰ μὴ τὸν ἐνδιαφέρῃ. Ὅταν κανεὶς τοῦ λέγει κάτι, πολλὲς φορὲς δὲν ἀπαντᾷ ἀμέσως τόσο ποὺ νομίζει κανεὶς ὅτι δὲν τὸν ἄκουσε. Ὕστερα ὅμως ἀπὸ λίγα λεπτὰ καὶ μετὰ διάφορα θέματα ἐπανέρχεται στὴν ἐκκρεμῆ ἐρώτησι καὶ τὴν συζητεῖ. Ἕνα τσιγάρο διαρκῶς στὸ στόμα, κατὰ προτίμησιν Ἀμερικάνικο, ἀκόμη καὶ ὅταν τρώει. Ὕστερα ἀπὸ κάθε πιάτο ἀνάβει ἕνα τσιγάρο. Τρώει λίγο καὶ συζητεῖ εὐχάριστα. Καὶ ἂν κανεὶς τοῦ πῇ μὲ τρόπο ὅτι εἶναι... στραβόξυλο, διαμαρτύρεται ἐντόνως βεβαιώνοντας ὅτι βρίσκεται σὲ ἀγαθὲς σχέσεις μὲ ὅλους καί, φυσικά, καὶ μὲ τοὺς δημοσιογράφους. Καὶ γιὰ νὰ μοῦ τὸ ἀποδείξῃ παίρνει δυὸ φωτογραφίες καὶ τὶς ὑπογράφει γιὰ τὴν «Βραδυνή».

ΥΜΝΟΙ ΤΩΝ ΙΤΑΛΩΝ ΚΡΙΤΙΚΩΝ

ΡΩΜΗ, Ἰούνιος. (Ἰδιαιτ. ὑπηρ.). — Οἱ μεγαλύτεροι μουσικοκριτικοὶ τῆς Ἰταλίας ἐκφράζονται μ' ἐνθουσιασμὸ γιὰ τὸν Δημήτρη Μητρόπουλο, ὁ ὁποῖος ἦτο μεταξὺ τῶν διασημοτέρων διευθυντῶν ὀρχήστρας τοῦ κόσμου ποὺ ἔλαβαν μέρος στὸ ἐφετεινὸ μουσικὸ φεστιβὰλ τῆς Φλωρεντίας.

Ὁ Λεονάρντο Πιντσάουτι γράφει τὰ ἑξῆς: «Ὁ Δημήτρης Μητρόπουλος, ὁ διάσημος μαέστρος ποὺ διηύθυνε αὐτὲς τὶς τελευταῖες μέρες εἶναι μιὰ ἐξαιρετικὴ φύσις. Τὸ νὰ συγκρίνῃ κανένας τὴν τεχνικὴ αὐτοῦ τοῦ μεγάλου μαέστρου μ' ἐκείνην τῶν δύο ἢ τριῶν ἄλλων ποὺ βρίσκονται στὴν ἴδια γραμμή, εἶναι ἀνώφελο. Καὶ τοῦτο κυρίως γιατὶ ἡ τεχνικὴ ἔπαυσε νὰ θεωρῆται ἀπὸ τὴν κριτικὴ ὡς ἕνας παράγων ἐκφράσεως.

Ἠμποροῦμε νὰ ποῦμε, βέβαια, ὅτι ἔχουμε ἐνώπιόν μας ἕνα ἀληθινὸ «φαινόμενο» θαυμαστῆς ἑτοιμότητας καὶ πνευματικῆς διαύγειας ποὺ δὲν εἶναι πιὰ ἀνθρώπινη. Ἀλλὰ ἐκεῖνο ποὺ ἐνδιαφέρει εἶναι ἡ προσωπικότης τοῦ ἐρμηνευτῆ, περιωρισμένη, ἂν θέλετε, ἀλλὰ φοβερὰ ἐκδηλη.

Ὁ Μητρόπουλος στὴ Φλωρεντία, διηύθυνε τὴν «Τρίτη Συμφωνία» τοῦ Μπετόβεν καὶ τὴν «Πέμπτη Συμφωνία» τοῦ Προκόπιεφ, τὴν «Εἰσαγωγὴ σκέρτσο καὶ φινάλε» τοῦ Σοῦμαν, τὸ «Κοντσέρτο ἀριθ. 4 γιὰ πιάνο καὶ ὀρχήστρα» τοῦ Τζιὰν Φραντσέσκο Μαλιπιέρο καὶ τὴν «Συμφωνία ἀρ. 1» τοῦ Γουσταύου Μάλλερ. Ἡ ἐκλογὴ αὐτῶν τῶν προγραμμάτων (ἴσως τὴν «Τρίτη» τοῦ Μπετόβεν τὴν περιέλαβε γιὰ νὰ συμμορφωθῇ πρὸς τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν τῆς ἐπιμελητείας τοῦ Δημοτικοῦ Θεάτρου), δίνει ἀμέσως τὴν ἰδέα ἑνὸς περιβάλλοντος. Εἴμεθα ἔξω ἀπὸ μιὰ κλασικὴ ἀντίληψι. Νέα προβλήματα ἀντιμετωπίσθησαν μέσα στὸν ἐγκέφαλο τοῦ ἐρμηνευτοῦ ποὺ ἔφθασε στὸ νὰ διαλέξῃ τὶς πιὸ ταραγμένες καὶ τὶς πιὸ φλογερὲς στιγμὲς τῆς ἱστορίας τῆς μουσικῆς. Ὁ ἦχος, τὸ χρῶμα, ὁ ρυθμὸς ἔγιναν αἰσθητοὶ μὲ μιὰ διονυσιακὴ μέθη, μὲ τὴν χαρὰ ἑνὸς τεχνίτη, «θαυμασίως τσελλοῦ», γιὰ τὸ ἔργο ποὺ ἔνει δημιουργήσει. Ὁ τεχνίτης αὐτὸς μᾶς δίνει μιὰ φυσικὴ αἴσθησι γεμάτη ἠλεκτρισμὸ τοῦ μουσικοῦ διαλόγου ποὺ πότε εἶναι τεταμένος σ' ἕνα εἶδος ἠνιτικοῦ σπασμοῦ καὶ πότε συγκρατημένος σὲ πυρετικὲς δονήσεις. Ἀλλὰ ἐνῷ γι' ἄλλους «διονυσιακοὺς» διευθυντὲς ὀρχήστρας, ἡ ἀφομοίωσις μὲ τὴ μουσική, μοιάζει μὲ μιὰ βαθμιαία ἀπώλεια συνειδήσεως, ἐκεῖνο ποὺ κάνει ἐντύπωσι στὴν τέχνη τοῦ Μητροπούλου, εἶναι μιὰ ἀλιγγιώδης διαύγεια, ἕνας θαυμάσιος αὐτοέλεγχος. Ὁ Μητρόπουλος «αὐτοενδοσκοπεῖται» μὲ μίαν καταπληκτικὴν ἑτοιμότητα καὶ ἀπὸ τὴν συνενῆ αὐτὴ ἐνδοσκόπησι γεννιέται μιὰ χαρὰ τρομακτικὴ ὅλως διόλου νέα, ἀσίγαστη.

Ἔτσι ὁ ἑρμηνευτὴς Μητρόπουλος αἰσθάνεται γενικὰ περισσότερη ἄνεσι στὸ μουσικὸ κλῖμα τῆς μουσικῆς δημιουργίας τῶν τελευταίων ἐξήντα ἢ ἑβδομήντα χρόνων. Καὶ ἡ «Τρίτη» τοῦ Μπετόβεν παρ' ὅλο ποὺ τὴν διηύθυνε μὲ σταθερὴ θέλησι καὶ μὲ διαυγῆ ἑρμηνεία, φαινόταν σὲ ὡρισμένες στιγμὲς σὰν νὰ αἰωρεῖτο κάτω ἀπὸ τὸ χέρι ἑνὸς τεχνίτη θαυμασίως σκληροῦ. Καὶ κάποτε μᾶς ἔκανε νὰ σκεφθοῦνε σὲ μιὰ ρωμαντικὴ προβολὴ τῶν ἀξιῶν τοῦ «ἐξπρεσσιονισμοῦ».

Ἀλλὰ ὁποιες εἶδε καὶ ἂν ἄκουσε τὸν Μητρόπουλο νὰ διευθύνῃ καὶ νὰ παίζῃ ταὐτόχρονα ὡς σολίστ τὸ «Κοντσέρτο ἀρ. 4» τοῦ Μαλιπιέρο, ὁποιος ἔζησε πρὸ παντὸς τὴν συγκίνησι ποὺ παρήχθη ἀπὸ τὴν ἑρμηνεία τῆς «Συμφωνίας ἀριθ. 1» τοῦ Μαλλερ, ἐδοκίμασε, χωρὶς ἀμφιβολία, σχεδὸν ἕνα αἴσθημα καταπλήξεως γιὰ τὴν τέχνη αὐτοῦ τοῦ μαέστρου ποὺ εἶναι βαθύτατα μουσικός.

Στὴ Φλωρεντία τὸν εἴχαμε ἀκούσει πρὸ δύο ἐτῶν στὴν «Ἠλέκτρα» τοῦ Στράους καὶ στὸ «Ρέκβιεμ» τοῦ Βέρντι. Τὸν ξανακούσαμε αὐτὲς τὶς μέρες σὲ δυὸ συναυλίες μ' ἕνα πρόγραμμα διαλεγμένο μὲ μεγάλη ἐντιμότητα. Καὶ βλέποντάς τον ἀκόμη καὶ ὑπὸ τὴν ἰδιότητα τοῦ πιανίστα (ἕνα πιανίστα εὐφυέστατο καὶ χωρὶς τεχνάσματα διοροτούζου), θυμηθήκαμε ἐκείνη τὴν μακρυνὴ ἐποχή, τὸ 1933, ὅταν ὁ Μητρόπουλος παρουσίασε στὴ Φλωρεντία ὡς διευθυντὴς καὶ ὡς πιανίστας, τὸ «Κοντσέρτο γιὰ τὸ ἀριστερὸ χέρι» τοῦ Ραβέλ. Τότε τὸ κοινὸ τὸν ἐσφύριξε!

Τὴν προπερασμένη Κυριακὴ τὸ βράδυ, τὸ ἴδιο κοινό, τὸν ἐγειροκρότησε ἐνθουσιωδῶς στὸν Μαλιπιέρο καὶ στὸν Μάλλερ. Κι' ἔπειτα, πρέπει νὰ ποῦμε ὅτι διαπιστώσαμε μιὰ μεγάλη πρόοδο καὶ δὲν μποροῦμε παρὰ νὰ χαροῦμε γι' αὐτό. Ἀλλὰ ἡ πνευματικὴ πρόοδος τοῦ κοινοῦ συντελεῖται μόνον μὲ τέτοιους καλλιτέχνες. Οἱ «εὔκολοι», οἱ μαέστροι «ποὺ τὰ κάνουν ὅλα», θὰ ἔκαναν καλὰ ἴσως νὰ σπάσουν τὴν μπαγκέτα, ἂν δὲν τὴν ἐροῦσαν ἀκόμη.

Ἕνας ἄλλος κριτικός, ὁ Ρ. Πάολι, ὁμιλεῖ ἐπίσης γιὰ τὸν διονυσιασμὸ τοῦ Μητροπούλου καὶ ἀφοῦ ἐκφράζει ὡρισμένες ἐπιφυλάξεις γιὰ τὴν ἑρμηνεία τῆς «Ἡρωϊκῆς» τοῦ Μπετόβεν, τονίζει ὅτι στὸ δεύτερο μέρος τῆς «Πέμπτης» τοῦ Προκόπιεφ, ὁ Μητρόπουλος ὑπῆρξε εὐτυχέστατος, στάθηκε ἱκανὸς νὰ ὑπογραμμίσῃ κάθε πρόθεσι τοῦ συνθέτη καὶ χειροκροτήθηκε μ' ἐξαιρετικὸ ἐνθουσιασμὸ τόσον αὐτὸς ὅσον καὶ ἡ ὀρχήστρα.

Ὁ Βιρτζίλιο Ντόπλικερ, ἐξ ἄλλου, χαρακτηρίζει τὸν Δ. Μητρόπουλο, ὡς ἕνα ἀπὸ τοὺς τέσσαρες μεγαλύτερους διευθυντὲς ὀρχήστρας, ποσικισμένον μὲ ἕνα ταλέντο ἰσχυρὸ καὶ πρωτότυπο. «Οἱ ἀκροατὲς τοῦ Μητρόπουλου — συνεγίζει ὁ Ντόπλικερ — ἔδειξαν πλήρη κατανόησι, μὲ θερμότατες ἐκδηλώσεις στὸ τέλος κάθε ἔργου καὶ μὲ ἀποθεωτικὰ γειροκροτήματα στὸ τέλος τῆς συναυλίας».

Ἕνας ἄλλος Ἰταλὸς κριτικός, τέλος, ποὺ ὑπογράφει μὲ τὰ ἀρχικὰ Τζ. Φ., τελειώνει ὡς ἑξῆς τὸ μουσικοκριτικό του σημείωμα: «Ἡ ἐπιτυχία αὐτοῦ τοῦ μεγάλου μαέστρου στὶς δύο συναυλίες τῆς Τρίτης καὶ τῆς Κυριακῆς ὑπῆρξε μεγάλη. Ὅλα τὰ ἔργα τοῦ προγράμματος ἔγιναν δεκτὰ μὲ ἐνθουσιαστικὲς ἐκδηλώσεις ἀπὸ τὶς ὁποῖες ἕνα ποσοστὸν δικαιοῦται καὶ ἡ ὀρχήστρα τοῦ Μουσικοῦ Φεστιβὰλ τοῦ Μαΐου».

Ὁ Δημήτριος Μητρόπουλος εὑρίσκεται τώρα εἰς τὸ Μιλάνο γιὰ τὸ ἀνέβασμα τῆς ὄπερας «Βῶτσεκ» τοῦ Ἄλμπαν Μπέργκ τὴν ὁποία ποσκειται νὰ διευθύνῃ εἰς μίαν σειρὰν παραστάσεων.

ΤΟ «ΒΟΤΣΕΚ» ΤΟΥ ΑΛΜΠΑΝ ΜΠΕΡΓΚ

ΜΙΑ ΤΡΙΚΥΜΙΩΔΗΣ ΠΡΕΜΙΕΡΑ ΣΤΗΝ ΣΚΑΛΑ ΤΟΥ ΜΙΛΑΝΟΥ

ΘΡΙΑΜΒΕΥΤΗΣ Ο ΜΗΤΡΟΠΟΥΛΟΣ

Ἡ Ἰταλικὴ κριτικὴ ἐξακολουθεῖ νὰ ἀσχολῆται μὲ τὴν... τρικυμιώδη παράστασι τοῦ «Βότσεκ» στὴν Σκάλα τοῦ Μιλάνου. Ὁ δημιουργός του, ὁ Γερμανὸς συνθέτης Ἄλμπαν Μπέργκ δὲν εὑρίσκεται δυστυχῶς ἐν ζωῇ διὰ νὰ ὑπερασπίσῃ τὸ ἔργον του, τὸ ὁποῖον ὅπου κι' ἂν παίζεται δημιουργεῖ συζητήσεις καὶ ἀφάνταστο καλλιτεχνικὸ ἐνδιαφέρον. Ὁ Μητρόπουλος συνεχίζων τὴν ἐκτέλεσιν πρωτοπορειακῶν ἔργων εἶχεν ἀνεβάσει τὸ ἔργο αὐτὸ πέρυσι στὸ Κάρνεγκυ Χώλλ, ὡς Ὀρατόριο. Δηλαδὴ χωρὶς σκηνικὰ καὶ κοστούμια. Ἡ ἐπιτυχία ὑπῆρξε μεγάλη καὶ ἡ Ἀμερικανικὴ κριτικὴ ἐτάχθη ἀνεπιφυλάκτως ὑπὲρ τῆς ἀξίας καὶ τοῦ συνθετικοῦ ἐνδιαφέροντος τοῦ ἔργου τὸ ὁποῖον ἐχάρασσε νέους δρόμους καὶ ἄνοιγε νέους ὁρίζοντας εἰς τὴν τέχνην τῆς ἀντιστίξεως.

Ἡ ἐκτέλεσις στὴν Ἀμερικὴ ἔδωκε ἀφορμὴ ὥστε νὰ ξαναθυμηθῇ τὸ «Βότσεκ» καὶ ἡ Εὐρώπη. Παίχθηκε στὸ Παρίσι, στὴν Ἀγγλία καὶ ἀλλαχοῦ. Τελευταίως τὸ ἀνέβασε τὸ θέατρο τῆς Σκάλας καὶ ἐκάλεσε πρὸς τοῦτο τὸν Μητρόπουλο. Ὁλόκληρος ὁ πλούσιος καλλιτεχνικὸς ἐξοπλισμὸς τοῦ δοξασμένου θεάτρου μαζὶ μὲ τοὺς καλλιτέρους Ἰταλοὺς καὶ Γερμανοὺς τραγουδιστάς, ἐτέθη στὴν διάθεσι τοῦ Μητροπούλου μὲ ἐπικεφαλῆς τὸν σκηνοθέτη Χέρμπερτ Γκράφτ. Καὶ ἡ πρεμιέρα ἐδόθη τὴν 5ην Ἰουνίου.

Τὸ ἔργο ὡς ἀνεμένετο προεκάλεσε θύελλα καὶ εἰς τὸ τέλος τῆς δευτέρας πράξεως ξέσπασαν οἱ πρῶτες ἀποδοκιμασίες. Μὰ ταυτοχρόνως καὶ οἱ πρῶτες, ἐκρήξεις ἐνθουσιασμοῦ. Δὲν χρειάστηκε πολὺ γιὰ νὰ διχασθῇ τὸ κοινὸ τῆς πρεμιέρας καὶ νὰ ἀκουσθοῦν τὰ πρῶτα σφυρίγματα. Ἡ νεολαία ἔχουσα μαζί της καὶ ἕνα σοβαρὸ ποσοστὸ ἄλλων ἀκροατῶν ἐπεδοκίμαζε τὸ ἔργο μὲ ἐνθουσιασμὸ καὶ πίστι στὴν ἀξία του. Ἀπεθέωσε τὸν μαέστρο καὶ τοὺς ἐκτελεστάς. Ἡ παλαιὰ ὅμως φρουρὰ τῆς Σκάλας, αὐτὴ ποὺ ἔχει γαλουχηθῇ μὲ τὰ νάματα τοῦ πιὸ ἀγνοῦ Μπελκάντο, ἀμύνετο τοῦ πατρίου ἐδάφους μὲ ἀσυνήθη φανατισμό.

Ἡ συμπλοκὴ διεγράφετο ἤδη εἰς τὸν ὁρίζοντα τῆς Σκάλας ὅταν ὁ Μητρόπουλος πῆρε τὴν μεγάλη ἀπόφασι... Ἐβγῆκε στὸ προσκήνιο καὶ τοὺς μίλησε Ἰταλικά.

MUSICA

LA PREDICA DI MITROPOULOS ALLA PRIMA DEL WOZZECK

Un giorno alla Scala il campanello avvertirà il pubblico che è il momento dell'elevazione

di Emilio Radius

ALLA SCALA, tra un atto e l'altro del Wozzeck di Alban Berg, il maestro concertatore e direttore Dimitri Mitropoulos ha fatto una predica agli spettatori: pessima idea, perché il direttore di orchestra, oscuro o famoso, deve stare al suo posto e non pretendere di dare lezioni; e per dire le cose proprio come stanno, ne abbiamo abbastanza di questi dittatori della bacchetta che fanno ognuno il Gran Maestro di una sua setta musicale. Il pubblico della Scala paga, in buona parte sostiene il teatro con gli abbonamenti; ed ha quindi il diritto di disapprovare a sipario calato.

Del resto, se una parte del pubblico zittiva e fischiava, gli altri applaudivano con calore e dicevano volentieri che il Wozzeck è un capolavoro, e precisamente il primo capolavoro del nuovo teatro di musica, composto nel 1920 e rimasto finora unico. Nei giorni scorsi sono poi state scritte dagli storici della musica, dai musicologi e dai critici cose tanto dotte ed ardue che qualcuno gradirà forse un corto discorso alla buona.

Il Wozzeck, opera definita espressionistica, è in realtà un nero dramma che si serve di tutti i mezzi di espressione nuovi e vecchi, non escludendo neanche la melodia. Sarebbe un errore parlare di composizione dodecafonica o sistematicamente atonale. Zone o correnti atonali vi si alternano a zone o correnti tonali. L'importante è la manifestazione del dolore e dell'angoscia: a questo scopo viene usata ogni risorsa e tutto viene sacrificato, a cominciare dalla musica, la quale fa non di rado l'impressione del commento di un ossessivo film d'arte.

Prima di vedere quale sia il valore della musica, bisognerebbe perciò domandarsi che cosa valga il dramma in sé; e far notare come si sia esagerato nel lodare i famosi frammenti di Büchner, scrittore del secolo scorso in cui si è voluto scorgere ad ogni costo un precursore dei nostri poeti ed artisti maledetti o bruciati. Non si è arrivati a scrivere che solo Büchner fu tormentato a quel modo nell'Ottocento? Come se l'Ottocento fosse tutta una « belle époque » e non il secolo di maestri del dolore come Leopardi, Schopenhauer, Wedekind, Ibsen; e non avesse in Dostoievski il fiume da cui derivano tutti i canali e i fossi che irrigano oggi la coltivazione dei dispiaceri.

Büchner era tedesco, visse solo ventiquattro anni, fu infelice ed ebbe il gusto dell'infelicità, lasciò con la storia del soldato Wozzeck un'opera incompiuta, aperta, nella quale un musicista della stessa vena poteva versare liberamente i suoi umori; ed ecco appunto i motivi per i quali egli andava particolarmente a sangue ad Alban Berg. Scrittore e musicista si avvinghiarono così come sull'orlo di un burrone. L'opera dell'uno si addice veramente all'opera dell'altro. Ambedue avevano avuto dalla natura un temperamento tragico, una sensibilità diffusa e sempre dolente, un ingegno che non aveva paura del grottesco.

Non si è riflettuto abbastanza sul fatto che nel Wozzeck la maggior parte degli effetti straordinari sono ottenuti mediante la lacerazione di forme tradizionali che l'autore ha usato poco prima, cioè mediante un accostamento repentino e breve, soprattutto breve, di due sistemi opposti. Per conseguenza il Wozzeck è un capolavoro che si consuma, affidato tutto alla sorpresa, alla rapidità delle quindici scene, alla cupa varietà delle voci e degli strumenti, alla frattura del canto spiegato e dei recitativi, alla continua violazione di qualche cosa che resta o restava venerabile o rispettabile. Al solito, Berg come ribelle è una grossa figura, ma come fondatore di una nuova religione ha trovato pochi seguaci.

Si suole dire che il teatro musicale contemporaneo viene dalla corruzione del teatro postwagneriano; e quasi nessuno osa più discutere tale affermazione; ma le fuggevoli scene del Wozzeck, parenti delle tragedie liriche in due battute scritte specialmente in Francia, non vengono piuttosto dai sanguigni quadri del Boris e da quei quadri del Falstaff dove un Verdi che non credeva più all'onnipotenza del canto ne fa di quando in quando la parodia? Un simile assunto sembrerà balordo solo a chi non conosca né sospetti l'amarezza, lo scoramento, la sfiducia dell'ultimo Verdi verso la tradizione melodrammatica e riguardo alle possibilità di una rinascita del teatro d'opera. Comunque nel Wozzeck si sente il comico inacidito in grottesco e il grottesco caduto nel lugubre.

Puccini, che era un cautissimo rivoluzionario, scrisse a modo suo un piccolo Wozzeck, un Wozzeck armonioso nella sua crudeltà, audace nel suo equilibrio; ed è il Tabarro, che doveva essere rappresentato, sempre per prudenza e per non angustiare troppo la gente, con Suor Angelica e con Gianni Schicchi. Ma chi è Puccini per gli adoratori di Berg?

THIS I BELIEVE:

Moral Purpose Must Back True Artistic Achievement

By DIMITRI MITROPOULOS
Conductor, New York Philharmonic

VERY EARLY in my life, an important event took place: the discovery in my impressionable youth of the personality of St. Francis. Since that time, my main ambition has been canalized into a strong desire to serve my neighbor by putting at his disposal the fruits of my knowledge, the results of my studying and the development of my innate talent and the development of my skill as a performer, plus my love!

My dream has always been to master myself for the sake of serving better and being of more use to my fellow man.

MY CONCERN and love for him made me realize an additional responsibility which my fame as an artist brought to me, and that is my responsibility as a human being toward those of my fellow men who might look to me for guidance. Soon after I had the privilege to come to this country I realized how important it was to become an example, and I will mention two events which have reinforced this belief.

Some years ago, during the war, I heard that the blood bank of the Red Cross which served in Minneapolis and its vicinity badly needed assistance. Naturally, they were not able to pay for all that they needed, so I decided to take my vacation by accepting the responsible job of blood custodian. I was driving in a truck to various towns within 100 miles of Minneapolis and taking charge of setting up the mobile unit in each town.

THE RED CROSS administration thought it advisable to advertise the fact that I was working for them, in order to attract public interest. It went to the point where some people probably thought that I was going to entertain them with music during the bleeding, which I certainly would not have refused to do, in spite of the amount of work I had to do, if the doctors hadn't forbidden such an enjoyable treatment because they wouldn't be able to hear the pulses of the patients.

The next event was during the time I was conducting the Robin Hood Dell orchestra in Philadelphia, and also during the war. There was a terrific scandal there of misguided youths in the high schools mistreating and insulting Jewish boys. Nobody seemed to be able to stop this tragic epidemic, neither the teachers in the schools nor the preachers in the churches. Finally, Mr. Samuel, at that time the mayor, had the inspired idea of bringing a popular movie star to speak to the various schools, an event which stopped, like a miracle, all those tragedies.

From that I developed the theory that all

Love thy neighbor

people who have the chance to enjoy the responsibility of being famous, regardless for what reason or in what profession, can be of a terrific help in this confused world of today by setting an example of sound moral thinking and integrity as human beings as well as in their profession. I came even to the point of realizing that any skill of any kind, physical or mental, or any artistic achievement, unless it is based on a moral purpose, cannot claim to have any value or any plausible reason to exist.

LA révélation scénique de Wozzeck, le chef-d'œuvre émouvant d'Alban Berg, a constitué l'un des événements les plus marquants du Festival consacré à l' « Œuvre du XX^e^ siècle ». L'édition phonographique arrive à point pour consolider cette victoire d'un art audacieux et téméraire, mais appuyé sur les bases rassurantes du pathétique éternel des grands sentiments humains. Certes, la langue musicale de cet élève de Schœnberg a de quoi déconcerter une oreille timide. Les dissonnances, les brutalités, la violence des accents, les touches rapides, cruelles et désordonnées d'un orchestre qui cingle le tympan et réagit à chaque détail du dialogue, avec une sensibilité d'écorché, peuvent scandaliser et rebuter beaucoup d'auditeurs mal préparés à ce style exceptionnel, mais si l'on se laisse entrainer docilement par cette vague de lyrisme on ressent une émotion d'une qualité rare. C'est là qu'on s'aperçoit que la technique la plus hardie vaut ce que vaut la sensibilité de celui qui en fait usage. La sincérité communicative des sentiments d'Alban Berg rayonne à travers des agrégations sonores qui devraient, théoriquement, dresser un mur infranchissable entre la scène et la salle.

C'est que ce musicien est un être vibrant et généreux, accessible à la pitié et à l'émotion en présence d'une tragédie qui se déroule entre de pauvres êtres sans défense. Son cœur trouve des accents poignants qui gardent leur force persuasive dans toutes les langues. Et l'on constate que son orchestre, si rude en apparence, est aussi sensible que lui et ne se convulse au cours de l'action que parce que les péripéties du drame l'indignent et le révoltent. Cette musique est la voix de la conscience humaine : elle proteste sans cesse contre la méchanceté et l'injustice, contre le triomphe du mal sur le bien. Et ses cris déchirants ne sont que trop justifiés en présence des spectacles odieux que lui offre le monde abject, que lui dépeint le scénario de Georges Büchner.

Toutes ces nuances apparaissent clairement dans l'enregistrement intégral que l'on vient de nous donner de cette extraordinaire partition. La réalisation scénique n'est pas indispensable à l'intelligence du texte et à la compréhension de la partition, mais il est, tout de même, bien fâcheux que le cartonnage qui contient ces deux disques enregistrés en allemand ne comporte pas la notice explicative qui accompagne d'ordinaire les « long playing ». A ceux qui n'ont jamais assisté à une représentation de Wozzeck, elle rendrait de précieux services. D'autre part, elle nous permettrait de rendre justice aux interprètes — tout à fait remarquables d'ailleurs — que l'étiquette énumère sans nous révéler leur prénom et sans nous permettre de deviner leur emploi dans la distribution. Nous apprendre que ces disques ont été enregistrés par « R. Herbert, M. Harrel, E. Farrel, F. Jagel, J. Mordino, D. Lloyd et E. Eustis » ne nous donne pas la possibilité de décerner des éloges circonstanciés aux artistes américains qui ont incarné la prostituée, son lamentable amant, le bellâtre, le commandant-fantoche et le sadique médecin. Tout ce qui nous est permis c'est de féliciter Dimitri Mitropoulos et la Philharmonic Symphonie Orchestra de New-York de cette magnifique exécution que la gravure nous transmet avec une fidélité et un relief excellents.

17,500 Attend Opening Stadium Concert; Mitropoulos Conducts; Anderson Sings

By PAUL AFFELDER

After a one-night delay, owing to inclement weather, the Lewisohn Stadium concerts launched their 35th season last evening. Evidently, the postponement from Monday night had no adverse effect upon the attendance, for there was on hand a pleasingly large crowd of 17,500.

The Stadium Symphony Orchestra — alias the New York Philharmonic-Symphony — was under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos, who opened the proceedings with a performance of the National Anthem. So that we would all know we were not in Carnegie Hall, this was immediately followed by the Stadium's theme song—a DS-6 roaring through the skies fortissimo. Thus was the season officially set in motion.

The orchestral portion of the program was concerned with the overture to Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," played in an unnecessarily sluggish manner; the "Dances From Galantaz" by Kidaly, interpreted in the true Hungarian spirit, with plenty of zest and rhythmic variety, and the suite from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," which found the orchestra phrasing beautifuly, but which lacked the necessary sweep, vigor and Viennese spirit.

Marian Is Soloist

Marian Anderson, the noted contralto, was the evening's soloist, singing two arias and a group of Negro spirituals, all with orchestral accompaniment. We found her at her best in the exquisite 17th century "Lamento di Arianna" of Claudio Monteverdi. Her tone production was smooth and even, and her phrase-lines were well sustained and intelligently planned. Here, too, Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra accorded her a first-rate accompaniment. But in the aria, "O Don Fatele," from Verdi's "Don Carlo," as well as in the three spirituals, "De Gospel Train," "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child" and "Every Time I Feel the Spirit," Miss Anderson seemed to have trouble with her once thrilling low tones, which often sounded hoarse and out of tune, while the orcnestral background sounded as if it had not been rehearsed. In response to the applause, there were several encores

No stadium opening would be complete without the traditional intermission speeches. These were provided by Mayor Impellitteri Dr. Harry Wright, retiring president of City College, and of course, the beloved and inimitable "Fairy Godmother" of these concerts, "Minnie" Guggenheimer.

Concerts Open At Stadium

By MILES KASTENDIECK

STADIUM concerts are with us again. Postponed one night because of rain, they opened at Lewisohn Stadium last night for their 35th season. The evening was perfect, the crowd of 17,500 good, and the program attractive. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted the Stadium Symphony Orchestra, and Marian Anderson returned as soloist after an absence of five years. Airplanes as usual supplied percussive variations on all the themes.

It was a pleasant but hardly an exhilarating occasion. Mitropoulos dwelt too lovingly over many lovely phrases, pacing the music too deliberately. Each piece sounded just a little longer than it should have. Miss Anderson sang more impressively than beautifully.

An operatic note characterized the program. It began with Wagner's Overture to "Tannhaeuser." Miss Anderson sang Monteverdi's wonderfully moving Lamento di Arianne" and Verdi's famous "O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos" as well as a group of spirituals. Kodaly's dances from "Galanta" and Strauss's Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" completed the listing.

The most drama in the concert came from the emotional quality of Miss Anderson's voice. With the Tannhaeuser slowed to funeral pace and the Rosenkavalier more nostalgic than youthfully exuberant, the dramatic element of this music became side-tracked. It remained for Miss Anderson's personality to give the concert a definite profile.

Mitropoulos, Marian Anderson Open Stadium Concert Season

By Francis D. Perkins

The thirty-fifth season of concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium, which would have opened Monday had the weather been drier, began Tuesday night with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting the Stadium Symphony Orchestra and Marian Anderson, contralto, as the soloist. Ideal weather had replaced Monday's damp heavens, and the audience was estimated at 17,000. Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri, appearing for the second time in his ex-officio capacity as honorary chairman for this series, and Dr. Harry N. Wright, the retiring president of the College of the City of New York, spoke at the end of the intermission; both were introduced by Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, whom the Mayor described as "New York City's beloved Minnie, who does a man's job as only a woman can do."

Both speakers, in addition to praising Mrs. Guggenheimer's services in connection with these concerts, emphasized their public and cultural value; the Mayor also paid verbal tribute to the late Adolph Lewisohn, donor of the Stadium, and his son, the late Sam A. Lewisohn, who had been an honorary chairman for this series. Dr. Wright said that City College had always enjoyed cooperating with Mrs. Guggenheimer and her colleagues, and that it regarded itself as a part of the Stadium Concerts organization.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra, which is composed mainly of the Philharmonic-Symphony musicians whom he conducts during the indoor music season, began the concert with "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser." Miss Anderson sang Monteverdi's "Lamento di Arianna" and, after the orchestra had played a suite from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" and Zoltan Kodaly's "Dances From Galanta," returned the Strauss suite.

17,500 AT STADIUM AS SEASON STARTS

Marian Anderson Soloist for the Opening Concert—Mayor Makes a Brief Speech

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The outdoor concerts at Lewisohn Stadium, which have regaled and stirred New Yorkers and visitors to the big city since 1918, began their thirty-fifth season last night. They began one evening later than scheduled, since Monday's opening was rained out, but as Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, the cheerful chairman of Stadium Concert, Inc., observed, probably it was for the best. The rain forced the postponement of an opposition attraction, the Robinson-Maxim fight, to tonight, giving the Stadium and culture a clear field.

Whether a fight would have had any influence on Stadium attendance or not is matter for speculation. There was no need to speculate last night over the continuing affections the public has for the Stadium concerts. The official count was 17,500, and since the amphitheatre was filled, there was no doubt that this was an honest count.

The Stadium Concerts Orchestra—if you are not in on the secret, it can be whispered that it is essentially the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra — was conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, principal conductor of the Philharmonic. The soloist was Marian Anderson, whose personal history has close association with the Stadium. Here she sang on Aug. 26, 1925, her first appearance in New York, after winning a city-wide talent contest. Here hse returned years later, when she had become a star performer, to pack them in time after time.

Since it was opening night, there were some formal observances, but not too formal. Mrs. Guggenheimer spoke with her usual breezy flavor. She introduced Dr. Harry N. Wright, president of City College, who spoke briefly. Then Mayor Impellitteri, honorary chairman of Stadium Concerts, Inc., read a short speech.

The Mayor's arrival was greeted by a scattering of hisses that were quickly drowned out in a burst of applause. He spoke of the history of the concerts, of the people who had contributed to making them possible and of their cultural value.

He mentioned the fact that Mrs. Guggenheimer had been associated with the concert series from the start. There were at least five persons in the audience who had attended the first Stadium concert on June 23, 1918, and on the stage, Louis Ricci, French horn player, was the only musician who had played there on that opening night.

Miss Anderson sang with her usual penetration of feeling. Her first contribution on the program, Monteverdi's "Lamento di Arianne," was the finest thing of the evening, both in the nobility of the music and the perception of the performance. Later on Miss Anderson sang "O don fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlo" and a group of spirituals.

Mr. Mitropoulos did not burden the exclusively orchestral part of the program with long or weighty works. There was Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" Overture to begin with, which neither conductor nor orchestra seemed to get much stirred up over. In Kodaly's Dances from "Galanta" and the suite from Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" there was livelier and more colorful playing.

Mitropoulos, Marian Anderson Open Stadium Concert Season

By Francis D. Perkins

The thirty-fifth season of concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium, which would have opened Monday had the weather been drier, began last night with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting the Stadium Symphony Orchestra and Marian Anderson, contralto, as the soloist. Ideal weather had replaced Monday's damp heaven, and the audience was estimated at 17,000. Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri, appearing for the second time in his ex-officio capacity as honorary chairman for this series, and Dr. Harry N. Wright, the retiring president of the College of the City of New York, spoke at the end of the intermission; both were introduced by Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, whom the Mayor described as "New York City's beloved Minnie, who does a man's job as only a woman can do."

Both speakers, in addition to praising Mrs. Guggenheimer's services in connection with these concerts, emphasized their public and cultural value; the Mayor also paid verbal tribute to the late Adolph Lewisohn, donor of the Stadium, and his son, the late Sam A. Lewisohn, who had been an honorary chairman for this series. Dr. Wright said that City College had always enjoyed cooperating with Mrs. Guggenheimer and her colleagues, and that it regarded itself as a part of the Stadium Concerts organization.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra, which is composed mainly of the Philharmonic-Symphony musicians whom he conducts during the indoor music season, began the concert with "The Star-Spangled Banner" and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhäuser." 17,500 See Lewisohn Opening

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The opening of the Stadium Concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium last evening was highlighted by the first appearance of Marian Anderson there since 1947. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted, as he will the rest of the week, excepting Saturday evening, and there was a happy crowd of 17,500 present.

The intermission ceremonies, usually entertainments in themselves at these concerts, thanks to the witty sallies of "Minnie," Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, had their share of the same. However, the two guest speakers, Dr. Harry Wright, president of City College, and Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri, confined themselves more or less to straight talk. Both, in short, defined the concerts as a noble and cultural institution of which this city might well be proud. Credit, of course, was given Mrs. Guggenheimer for her selfless interest in their maintenance.

Echo Annoys.

The lady, for her part, hurled one perfectly acceptable epithet at the echo that was besetting her words. And, in her typical airy manner, she exhorted all and sundry to be sure to come every night this week, and then some. She was noisily applauded.

Miss Anderson, solemn, a picture of total attention to her work, sang, for a starter, the Monteverdi "Lamento di Arianne," a beautiful piece, long and taxing and filled with a lordly dramatic quality.

Following the intermission she was heard in another great aria, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." In both pieces, I'm certain, Miss Anderson should have been more convincing, were the Stadium an enclosed concert hall. That she delivered them with intensity and musicianly finish and occasional fine tones was agreeable enough, considering the competition of plane motors overhead and unscheduled sounds from elsewhere .

Best in Spirituals.

She was at her best in the group of spirituals, which included "De Gospel Train," "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child," and others.

After opening proceedings with "The Star-Spangled Banner," the orchestra launched into an enkindling outdoor performance to the "Tannhaeuser" Overture. Breezy and enlivening were the dances from Kodaly's "Galanta," a not too exciting number for me, at any rate. The orchestra closed with a suite compacted from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," with the languorous charm of whose waltzes Mr. Mitropolous did not, at least in the open air, appear to be too congenial.

MITROPOULOS PLIES TRADE THREE WAYS

Conducts, Plays Piano and Offers Own Transcription at Stadium Concert

The unfamiliar work on last night's symphony concert at Lewisohn Stadium was Respighi's Toccata for Piano and Orchestra, with Dimitri Mitropoulos making strenuous gestures both at the keyboard and at his orchestra.

In addition to acting as pianist and conductor, Mr. Mitropoulos also was heard in the capacity of transcriber when he opened the concert with his own arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony completed the program.

The conductor's way with the "Eroica" is not exactly a new story. Last night Mr. Mitropoulos was in good form, with ensuing smooth, supple results. It was a rather streamlined "Eroica" that he presented, but one in good taste, noble in its aims.

His transcription of the Bach follows standard Stokowskian patterns: plenty of brass, the utmost in sonority, each instrument gauged for maximum effect. But do superorgan sounds equal one little old baroque organ?

As for the Respighi work, not much need be said. It attempts a re-creation of the baroque spirit by way of the "Chromatic Fantasy" up through a sort of contemporary neo-classicism. It is in several connected sections that give the feeling of an extended free fantasia. It has immense dignity and immense emptiness, and not any of Mr. Mitropoulos' devoted work could make up for its sterility. H. C. S.

First Class Stadium Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TRADITIONALLY, second nights at Lewisohn Stadium are symphonic. Such was the case as a result of the revised program presented last night. A performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony made it definitely so.

Bach's "Fantasia and Fugue in G Minor" opened the concert on an exalted plane. Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra supplied novelty. The evening was one of first-class music-making.

Without precedent was the initial sponsorship of the concert by the National City Bank. While such practice has been carried on in other cities, this season marks the first time that business and industry have agreed to sponsor certain Stadium concerts. A crowd of 7,000 reflected this new and welcome interest.

This turned out to be Mitropoulos night. The Bach was presented in his arrangement for orchestra. He was the piano soloist in the Respighi. His interpretation of the Beethoven revealed his outstanding musicianship as a conductor.

So refreshing was his opening of the "Eroica" that thoughts about the weather vanished at once. The performance quite absorbed the audience. It moved at too fast a pace, generally, but with a sense of authority inescapable.

Mitropoulos's brilliant pianism showed up the Respighi as little more than a vehicle for rhapsodizing in the first half and for display in the second. Few musicians of course perform the dual role of pianist and conductor with quite the bravura that Mitropoulos achieves.

In deference to the weather the Stadium Symphony played in its shirt sleeves. Its performance however, was quite up to full-dress standards.

Concert at Stadium

Mitropoulos Is Conductor, Pianist and Arranger

By Jay S. Harrison

Dimitri Mitropoulos, serving in the triple capacity of arranger, pianist and conductor, was the featured attraction at last night's Stadium Symphony Orchestra concert in Lewisohn Stadium. Respighi's Toccata for piano and orchestra saw the maestro conducting from the keyboard, and Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor was in an orchestration of Mr. Mitropoulos' own devising. Rounding out the reshuffled program was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony in E flat.

Mr. Mitropoulos, for reasons known to him and him alone, has chosen to act the missionary for Respighi's wayward work. He has played it before and last night's performance reinforced the impression that the Toccata is no more than a hapless potpourri lavish in the dispensing of useless thematic merchandise. It is by turns lordly and portentious, meek and mild, and its phrases echo and re-echo through cliches that were old when they were new. It is, moreover, not a toccata at all, for its spectacular moments are limited and its virtuoso passages few. It is a bland and useless work lacking shape, lacking form. It is music in sum, without substance.

Quite another story was the conductor's arrangement of the Bach Fantasia, for this is bright, brassy, sonorous and vibrant. Bach, as the world's greatest master of the climax, provides every orchestrator with a heyday, and Mr. Mitropoulos' woodwind and brass doublings at these points were masterful in the extreme. The music's lyrics interludes, of course, suffered in the vast spaces of the outdoor auditorium, but even in these surroundings the ear was able to detect subtleties to please even the most captious instrumental gourmet. It is a vigorous, flashing Bach Mr. Mitropoulos gives us; and though the orthodox may blanche, it is nonetheless music full of heart.

The staggering heat of the evening was undoubtedly responsible for whatever technical misdemeanors occurred piano and stringwise. Mr. Mitropoulos has never failed to throw sparks from the keyboard and last night provided no exception.

Mitropoulos Performs a Triple Play

By ROBERT BAGAR.

There was no baseball going on in town last night, but Dimitri Mitropoulos, presiding over the Stadium Symphony, up at Lewisohn Stadium, did pull off a musical triple play. He conducted, he played the piano and, further, he appeared as orchestral arranger of the Bach Fantasia and Fugue in G minor.

This was all very pleasing to the audience, whose love of music is solidly based, if they could listen to it in that dead-still heat.

Mr. Mitropoulos, as arranger, is not an uninteresting personality. For all the storminess of the brasses and the whopping bigness of the motion that he gave to the work, it had excitement galore in pure tonal effects. Not that Bach was much away from this version of his organ work, for the dips and rises, the exposure of the intricate mechanism, the standard touches were there in quantity.

Reaffirms Prowess.

As pianist, the Maestro has already made known a technical and interpretative prowess. And in his piano-baton account of the Respighi Toccata for Piano and Orchestra, all that was reaffirmed.

I had already heard him double in this work several years ago in the Plaza Hotel, at a Members' Concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society. On that occasion he was certainly amid surroundings more favorable—no humidity or record-breaking temperatures, and, best of all, he was indoors. Then I enjoyed his performance thoroughly, and the work, while uninspired, did appear to possess qualities that it lacked last night. The music itself had more sustained drive, more of a natural flow then, than it did this time.

Brilliant Playing.

Anyway, it can't be said the pianist-conductor failed to supply his Stadium devotees with stretches of brilliant playing. But the work did not give much impression of true substance or, for that matter, imagination or originality, or continuity.

Beethoven's "Eroica," borrowed from the canceled Tuesday concert and pressed into service last night, closed the session on many a note of dramatic import and elegant spirit.

Stadium 'Carmen'

Three Metropolitan Singers Head the Cast

By Francis D. Perkins

Bizet's opera "Carmen" was performed yesterday, minus stage action, for the third evening of the season at the Lewisohn Stadium. The cast singing with the Stadium Symphony Orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos' direction was headed by three Metropolitan Opera singers: Mildred Miller as Carmen, Richard Tucker as Don Jose and Frank Guarrera as Escamillo, with Elaine Malbin as Micaela and Marden Bate as Zuniga; the choirsters were members of the Schola Cantorum, trained by Hugh Ross, and pupils from the Joan of Arc Junior High School and P. S. 87 formed the children's parodistic chorus in the first act. The audience was estimated at 8,000; the figunre would probably have been larger if the temperature had been less discouraging toward intraurban travel.

The prevailing musical standard was high, in the performances in general and in the playing of the orchestra, which was remarkable for its tone quality and thorough lucidity, nicety of dynamic shading and interpretative responsiveness; it revealed fine points of the score which are quite often missed in the average stage performance of this familiar work. There was also an admirable balance and tonal proportion in the orchestra's support of the vocal soloists and the choristers. At timse, mainly in the first act, there seemed to be room for more dramatic momentum. This impression may have been an at least partial consequence of a feeling that here "Carmen" loses a little in a concert performance, during the opening episodes in which the action is being set. Dramatic conviction was greater in the second act, and notable in the third.

Miss Miller's voice seemed well suited to the music; it had color and warmth, and the tone quality was pleasing, despite a slight edge in certain upper notes early in the performance. Expressively, after some initial tentativeness, it became emotionally communicative. Miss Malbin, with some tonal unevenness, sang for the most part very commendably. Mr. Tucker's tonally ingratiating singing was both musicianly and expressively persuasive. Mr. Guarrera, with less persuasion, was in good voice; Mr. Bates' voice had good volume, if incomplete tonal focus. Jerome Sacks, Marcia Lang, Norma Bedrick, Earl Ringland and John McCollum completed the roster of a cast which, with the chorus, fared well in spite of the heat.

Of the airplanes which flew over the Stadium, two seemed to have it in for Miss Miller, invading the area during three of her arias. Another competing sound was provided by what seemed to be a group of local youth on a nearby roof top, but this was soon silenced.

8000 Defy Heat To Hear 'Carmen'

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The Stadium Concerts gathered all their forces together, engaged some outside ones, and chose one of the hottest nights of the year to put on Bizet's "Carmen" in concert form last evening at the Lewisohn Stadium. The conductor was Dimitri Mitropoulos, whose presence alone in the undertaking should have brought every opera lover in town to the City College arena. That some 8000 did make the trip to the place, and on such a night, warmed the hearts of some of us who felt that the performance, all in all, deserved a much better attendance.

The chief story, of course, was the conductor. An amazing man, this quiet, self-effacing musician. He is just about the most gifted operatic conductor around, excluding Toscanini.

As in previous experiences with Mr. Mitropoulos and repertory operas, things were heard last night in the score that rarely come to the surface. And I don't mean those two or three cuts that he opened for our benefit this time. Such were the clarity of his work, the marvelous effects he achieved, the esprit and finish, that often I caught myself ignoring the singers, in order not to miss anything that was going in the orchestra.

True, some of Mr. Mitropoulos' tempi differ a bit from accepted usage. But what of that, when everything that he did had meaning, aimed at some specific purpose, abetted the dramatic unfolding of the work?

With such a trio of remarkable artists as Richard Tucker, Mildred Miller—both of the Met—and Elaine Malbin, as Don Jose, Carmen and Micaela, respectively, there was the guarantee of first-class, musicianly singing. Nor may we omit from such considerations the masculine Escamillo turned in by Frank Guarrera.

The Carmen of Miss Miller is so spirited, so quicksilvery a vixen on the concert stage that I regretted we were not in an opera house to get the full potency of it. She is an American girl, but her Carmen is all French, and it is sung with poise, piquancy and many shades of meaning. Her voice is not voluminous, nor luscious, exactly, but it is most pleasing, and it is extremely well used.

Mr. Tucker's Don Jose, a quite polished characterization, added, together with his rich and sonorous tunes, much to the value of the performance. And Miss Malbin, a sensitive young artist with a fresh and pretty voice, did beautifully all through, especially in her third act aria. Also, I must say that Mr. Guarrera's tones were much better produced than they had seemed to be at the Met last season.

The chorus of children, gathered from the Joan of Arc Junior High School and PS 87 in New York City got a great big hand for their very nice singing.

'Carmen' in Concert Form At Lewisohn Stadium

By PAUL AFFELDER

A moderate-sized crowd braved the heat last night to hear a concert presentation of Bizet's Opera "Carmen" at the Lewisohn Stadium. They were rewarded by a few breezes and some fine singing by three of the principals in the cast.

Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted the Stadium Symphony Orchestra and the chorus of the Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, director, the title role was sung for the first time here by Mildred Miller, young mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera. Brooklyn's Richard Tucker, also of the Met, was the Micaela, while Met baritone Frank Guarrera sang the part of Escamillo. Lesser roles were in the hands of Marden Bate, Jerome Sacks, Marcia Lang, Norma Bedrick, Earl Ringland and John McCollum.

Miss Millers portrayal of the sultry cigarette girl was a pleasant surprise. Though further experience will undoubtedly imbue her singing of the part with greater depth and insinuation, her voice had ample warmth, her French diction was excellent, and above all, she sang with great understanding and sensitive musicianship. Far better to have a Carmen like this than one who "hams" with her voice as well as with her actions.

Rich, Dramatic, Intense

What can we say about Mr. Tucker that we haven't said before? His Don Jose was full of richness and dramatic intensity, while his tenor voice was gloriously rich and unforced all evening.

This was also the first time we had heard Miss Malbin sing Micaelea, and she infused the part with sweetness and clarity. Mr. Guarrera was a forceful Escamillo, though he tended to be unsteady on his extreme upper and lower tones. Of the other singers, only Mr. Oate sang with ample conviction and a firm tone. The others had their shaky moments.

That there was some shakiness in the performance is not surprising, in view of the fact that Mr. Mitropoulos chose to adopt a ridiculously slow tempo in most of sections, causing the work to lose most of its spirit. He may be thoroughly at home in an opera like "Wozzeck," but a well-known opus like "Carmen" seems to evade him. He even had a momentary lapse of memory during one of Don Jose's passages in the first act, and had to stop to regain his composure. Perhaps it was the heat—or the airplanes. His concert presentation also omitted all of the recitatives inserted by Ernest Guiraud for non-Parisian performances of the opera.

The slow tempo did serve one purpose, however; they allowed us to hear cleary all of the opera's wonderful details. After a hesitant start, the chorus sang with assurance, the orchestra played expertly.

RECORD REVIEW

Schoenberg's First Opera Real Drama

BY IRVING SABLOSKY

Unless it were made into a movie—which isn't likely—it's hard to see how Arnold Schoenberg's one-act hair-raiser "Er wartung" (Suspense) could be realized in the theater.

Yet it is a theater work through and through, as we can discover with excitement (and some imagination) in Columbia's new recording (12-inch LP).

DOROTHY DOW sings grippingly the role of the girl who encounters all manner of frights while searching for her lover in the forest and at last comes upon him—dead.

Dimitri Mitropoulos conducts the New York Philharmonic and the performance is a vibrant one.

There are many kinships between this first opera of Schoenberg and the first of his gifted disciple, Alban Berg—"Wozzeck." But Berg's is the more heroic in its proportions, more poignantly human in its effect.

"Wozzeck" is probably one of the most significant (and stirring) works of our day, and Columbia's complete recording of it—again with Mitropoulos conducting—is not to be missed.

Bizet's 'Carmen':

Best Concert of the Season

By MILES KASTENDIECK

IT must have been the weather. Bizet's "Carmen" was the bill at Lewisohn Stadium last night, but only 8,000 people turned out for the performance in concert form. They were lucky. They heard the first exhilarating performance of the Stadium season.

Part of the exhilaration stemmed from the superior singing of Mildred Miller in the title role and Richard Tucker as Don Jose. The rest of it came from an exciting revelation of the score by Mitropoulos and the Stadium Symphony Orchestra. The performance had its phenomenal qualities orchestrally.

After last night Miss Miller must be ranked as one of the most intelligent Carmens to appear in well over a decade. She has a beautiful voice, warm, vibrant, and flexible. She has exceptional musicianship.

But as aria succeeded aria she disclosed an unusual grasp of the role as well as the ability to project her understanding of it. Potentialities of greatness lurked in her performance.

Tucker sang magnificently. He must by now have qualified as the most exciting tenor this country has produced in this generation. He brought an old-time thrill on more than one occasion last night.

What Mitropoulos did with the score was not unexpected. He has rated as one of the most distinguished conductors of opera for years. The theatre is in his blood and his technical prowess gives him sure command of both musical and dramatic accents. It was sheer delight to listen to the music both with and without voices in this performance. He did Bizet a great service.

Mr. Guarrera, with less persuasion, was in good voice; Mr. Bates' voice had good volume, if incomplete tonal focus. Jerome Sacks, Marcia Lang, Norma Bedrick, Earl Ringland and John McCollum completed the roster of a cast which, with the chorus, fared well in spite of the heat.

Of the airplanes which flew over the Stadium, two seemed to have it in for Miss Miller, invading the area during three of her arias. Another competing sound was provided by what seemed to be a group of local youth on a nearby roof top, but this was soon silenced.

An Esthetic Rebuke To Opera Quipsters

By ROBERT BAGAR.

One evening, some years ago, there was a benefit performance of an opera at the Metropolitan. The cause was worthy, the cast a high-ranking one, the work especially popular that season, the audience large and fashionable.

As I walked into the theater, heading for my accustomed place, I was suddenly stopped by a remark I overheard. Some young and beautiful ladies, selling special programs for the event, were huddled together in the corridor, chatting gaily.

One of them said, "But opera is such an illegitimate art" (the word "illegitimate" is a substitution of your reporter's). I found it impossible to resist putting in this answer: "But think of its illustrious parents—drama and music!"

Blank Expressions.

And I departed, leaving behind me, as I remember it, a quintet of blank expressions on pretty faces. For all I know, I may have been exceedingly generous to that evening's presentation in the next day's editions of this newspaper.

Any person making a crack about the alleged low class quality of opera is, first of all, a thorough snob; secondly, quite uninformed, and, thirdly, therefore not to be followed sedulously in any expression of esthetic opinion.

Generally, a good answer to such flippancies, I've found is to point out that Mozart and Beethoven and Berlioz and, coming to our own time, Debussy, Ravel, Richard Strauss, Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Martinu and Hindemith, all men of intellectual attainments in all the musical forms, did not find the operatic beneath them.

Perhaps, there may be justification in dismissing as unworthy some out-and-out musical thriller of the Grand Guignol persuasion. If that is so, one is then not condemning the whole art, but one of its less deserving representatives. There are operas and operas, you know.

Striking Examples.

How can you blithely discard a Verdi, for instance, a composer, who for all the hurdy-gurdy quality of some of his tunes, overpowers with his musical speech, creates a score that transcends the abject poverty of imagination and poetry in many of the librettos presented to him?

Or discard a Puccini, blissfully dedicated to tunefulness, but of a very special, individual kind, when you consider the mellow charm and human warmth of a score like that of "La Boheme?"

Snobbery thrives in music, as it does in all other arts. And there are snobs who will not tolerate—purely pose and wilful ignorance, you know—other types of music, from the extreme modern to the "lowly" popular.

What I admire in some musicians of distinction whom we all know is their total lack of snobbishness. Dimitri Mitropoulos, Joseph Szigeti, Ernest Ansermet, are some. Their tastes are cultivated, wide and varied. I remember Mr. Mitropoulos saying once, in a radio program, that he thought Puccini was the greatest of all opera composers. The greatest! And he gave what I thought were excellent reasons.

The extraordinary sense of theater in Puccini, his unerring instinct, never a superfluous touch, everything just spic-and-span and right, and totally communicative.

Men like these, with their sophistication, learning, experience and eminence in the musical art, can afford to dispense with snobbishness, can keep their musical enthusiasms alive with constant inquiry and experiment. They can embrace all kinds of creative attitudes in music, granted the sincerity and artistic impulses that motivate them.

Should there be any place, then, for the quip-making—or the quip-copying—uninformed esthete, the intellectual shirker, really, except in the parlor at cocktail time, surrounded by his kind?

Ravinia Hears Mitropoulos in First of Series

BY SEYMOUR RAVEN

FROM ONE POINT of view, Dimitri Mitropoulos can be said to have underplayed his own opening night before the Chicago Symphony orchestra in Ravinia Park. Appearing Tuesday night after George Szell's four concerts of Brahms and with an all-Beethoven concert of his own in mind, Mr. Mitropoulos, director of the New York Philharmonic, chose to start his tour of duty with lighter fare, leaving Beethoven for his second concert tonight.

Mitropoulos

From another standpoint, which I heard expressed by a microscopic minority and which you can rule out immediately as unsound, Mr. Mitropoulos refused to "buck" a big political night on television and chose instead a policy of "anything goes" when he planned his July 8 program. I am sure a major conductor would rather call off a concert than take such an anti-artistic attitude. However, despite day time rain, evening chill, and political convention broadcasts, there appeared to be almost 1,500 music seekers at the concert.

Perhaps the best evaluation of Mr. Mitropoulos' first program is that one work made all the difference—Saint-Saens' dreary Symphony No. 2. Had another, and better, symphony been selected as the center of the program's gravity, the whole concert might have enjoyed greater elevation.

Between Brahms and Beethoven evenings, Mr. Mitropoulos could rightly have wanted to play a relatively unproblematic symphony, but when unproblematic is allowed to become synonymous with uninteresting, the result is obviously an error.

So much for that. Rossini's overture to "Semiramide," after a tentative beginning in orchestral intonation, took on high Rossinian spirit. And if public custodians of the Rossini crescendo [they are a cross between bird watchers and gas leak inspectors] weren't satisfied with Mr. Mitropoulos' handling of the matter, nothing will ever satisfy them.

Zoltan Kodaly's "Dances from Galanta" served very well to justify mounting public interest in modern Hungarian music and Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" Suite sounded as it always does when skilfully managed. But the Rossini, the Kodaly, and the Strauss were episodes of interesting performance rather than elements of organic program unity—for reasons explained above.

The Ravinia association has announced that the first four concerts set an attendance record for opening weeks. Szell's Brahms, four soloists, and perfect weather drew 16,130 listeners, breaking the 1950 record of 15,212.

Ravinia Gets Change of Pace in Mitropoulos

BY SEYMOUR RAVEN

Wasn't it Frederick Stock's benign little joke, when his massed violins played Paganini's "Perpetual Motion," to insert a momentary hint of Beethoven into the accompaniment? And wasn't it, moreover, a bit from the "Eroica" symphony? I mention this for the strangest of reasons, namely that the same orchestra, this time with Dimitri Mitropoulos as guest conductor at Ravinia, was visited by the spirit of Paganini while it played the "Eroica."

There was no mistaking the virtuosity of the performance Thursday night, nor the element of diabolism, as Mr. Mitropoulos featured this Symphony No. 3 in an all-Beethoven program. The deviltry appeared in a newly prominent flute passage in the fourth movement, in a dramatic pause [not in silence, but on the final tone of the slow movement], and in the calculated understatement by the horns in their tricky passages of the scherzo—so calculated and so understated as to become pointedly significant.

It is a remarkable orchestra that can play one way for George Szell one week, within a traditional orientation, and suit Mr. Mitropoulos' highly individual ideas the very next, and play effectively both times.

Scholars in the audience may have been most seriously concerned with Mr. Mitropoulos' quickening of tempo in the slow movement, the funeral march. Laymen may have wondered how you can quicken it and retain its funereal mood.

I guess that Mr. Mitropoulos intended to explore new emotions, new sensations of grief and of heroism, and if a change of tempo had to be his tool—why that was that. It made an interesting "Eroica," I must say, and who will deny that Mitropoulos has always been an interesting Mitropoulos! Given a sufficient interval of rest, I would like to hear this version of the "Eroica" again.

The soloist was Byron Janis, in the Piano Concerto No. 3. He played it as a young and talented musician might, with vigor, eager grasp of its occasional angularities, and an approximation of its joyous, altho minor modal, song. But the inner glow, which may be sensed in the performance of a Solomon, was still beyond Mr. Janis' understanding most of the way. That is why the coda of the third movement, which should come as a sudden release of energy and burst of excitement, came only as a train on schedule.

Mr. Janis had made the fairly common mistake of youth, that of releasing energy too early, of playing the piano too much of the way, when for a good while he should have been vibrating inside and moving less of the muscle of his hands.

The concert opened with the Overture to "Fidelio," and a handsome performance it was.

OLD SCORE, NEW TWIST

Mitropoulos Takes Beethoven for Spin

BY IRVING SABLOSKY

Next to performing unfamiliar music, Dimitri Mitropoulos seems most to enjoy taking old musical friends and turning them at all odd angles. He likes to flash lights on features his listeners might not have caught before.

That was his way—his purpose—in the program of Beethoven's music that he presented with the Chicago Symphony at the Ravinia Festival Thursday evening.

This was not the Beethoven we ordinarily meet. Instead of a broad epic tone, Mitropoulos found in it a pointed, electric concentration of sound. Instead of the irresistible forward drive of a heroic personality, he found its rhythmic force a release of taut nervous energy.

ALMOST NEVER was the expected allowed to happen. Tempos were unconventional to begin with and then always in flux. Unfamiliar details were underlined, familiar ones given new turns.

These things did not happen according to whim—be certain of that.

They are the product of an extremely vivid and individual imagination. They are communicated with such force of conviction that you cannot question the man's sincerity any more than you could doubt his utter absorption of the score. Nor could you remain unimpressed by his ability to inspire an orchestra to play for him.

THURSDAY'S performance of the "Eroica" Symphony, the shifting tempos robbed the opening movement of momentum.

The "Funeral March" was paced just too quickly to be a dead-march and just too slowly to be a quick-step—and so lost altogether its processional character.

The horns of the Scherzo sang a blithe song instead of flinging out a challenge and the Finale substituted virtuoso glitter for the radiance of a triumphant spirit.

A BAD PERFORMANCE? I would not say so. One would not cherish the reading, would not rush to repeat the experience—yet it was unfailingly alive and interesting, this curious "Eroica."

It had a kind of integrity that, while it was sounding, made it stick.

BYRON JANIS made his Ravinia debut in the evening's performance of the Third Piano Concerto.

He is a young pianist of rich gift—sensitive, ardent and of acute musical conscience.

His Beethoven was meticulously set forth. Though he is still searching for the core of the composer's style there was a shining enthusiasm about his playing that was infectious.

And in the slow movement, you could see that Janis is not far from discovering breadth.

All-Beethoven Program Stirs Ravinia Audience

Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.

By Felix Borowski

At Ravinia Festival Thursday evening Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra addressed themselves to a performance of three works by Beethoven. He is one of the few composers whose genius is able to stand up under the ordeal of a whole evening of one man's works alone.

On this occasion—as on others—the program comprised music long and universally admired, the Overture to "Fidelio," the Third Concerto for Piano, and the E flat major Symphony, called the "Eroica."

Few conductors have had the temerity to offer listeners any of the master's scores which fame has shrugged off. But when, next week, Pierre Monteux proposes to give Ravinia two dance dramas, Duka's "La Peri," and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," it would seem that a conductor well might imitate him by submitting Beethoven's Ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," to an eager house.

MITROPOULOS, HOWEVER took the safe course, and if he desired to prove that Beethoven occasionally wrote music that was not much more than moderately good, the Overture to "Fidelio," which opened the concert, was an excellent illustration. But we have seldom heard the work sound so brilliant or so convincing.

The C minor Concerto for piano was played by Byron Janis, one of the pupils of Vladimir Horowitz. This young artist possesses no ordinary talent, but it seemed in Beethoven's piece that it was not yet altogether matured. The opening movement was delivered correctly with agreeable tone and effective pedalling. It did not seem, however, that any inner revelation had been given to the pianist in the matter of interpretative subtlety.

Janis made a more poetic disclosure of the Largo, most particularly in the hymn-like subject with which it opens. Becoming better and better as the music progressed, he was at his best in the Finale,

THE "EROICA" SYMPHONY, which occupied the second division of the program, was the conductor's principal opportunity. He allowed the music to speak for itself and did little to inject alien ideas, beyond a slowing up of the tempo here and there, or providing more than usual bodily movement in direction.

The Funeral March was made poignant rather than dramatic, and in places the ultimate in pianissimo tone was attained. The Scherzo was beautifully set forth,

Lyrical Ravinia Concert Given By Mitropoulos

Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.

By Felix Borowski

Dimitri Mitropoulos opened Ravinia Festival's second week Tuesday evening with a program, played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which had interest and variety to recommend it, if somewhat on the light side.

As a curtain raiser the conductor selected Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," a composition which, until Toscanini showed that he was thoroughly in favor of it, long was regarded by conductors of serious music as worthy of nothing but contempt, or, perhaps, a band performance in a beer garden.

The director on this occasion may have been making a concession to summer music, but he is too fine an artist to do less than his best with "Semiramide." The piece, of course, is typically Rossini, tuneful in the early Italian manner, and scored with the sense of color and effect which placed its composer considerably ahead of his native contemporaries.

MITROPOULOS and his players gave an admirable reading, underlining the typical Rossinian crescendos with zest, and presenting in general a throughly Italian exposition of the music as a whole.

The principal, or at least the longest, feature of the program was the Second Symphony by Saint-Saens. It was interesting to hear a work so seldom played, which, if not remarkable for its power, is well written, and scored with expertness and even imaginativeness.

The opening movement was throughout based on a rhythmical motive which formed the fugato that was its opening theme. Only a clever craftsman could have done this with the effectiveness shown by Saint-Saens.

The other movements were less notable. The Andante was simple and pretty; the Scherzo was German in character, and the Finale a Tarantelle that was not unrelated to the Saltarello of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. Mitropoulos made the most of a work that is amiable in character, but which, probably, few of the listeners would wish to hear again.

IT IS SOMEWHAT regrettable, but inevitable, that Saint-Saens' music is fading. Performances of it are fewer every season, and even the piano concertos, once so popular, now are neglected by concert artists. The French master was more than a merely gifted musician, but perhaps it is too much to ask that one man can be at once—as he was—a composer, pianist, organist, astronomer, essayist, playwright, actor, poet and archeologist.

The second division of the program contained Kodaly's Dances from Galanta and the Suite made from music in Richard Strauss' opera, "Der Rosenkavalier." The score by Kodaly was well worth the extremely brilliant performance which the orchestra gave it.

AT RAVINIA, the new music was Ernst Dohnanyi's Concerto No. 2 for violin and violinless orchestra.

The soloist (with the Chicago Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos) was the violinist for whom it was written—the strikingly accomplished Frances Magnes, who performed it with genuine passion and a firm command of music and instrument that no fleeting mishap could obscure.

For Dohnanyi the violin is a sensuous, sinuous singing instrument. But, lacking real integrity of style, he shifts its song indecisively between the sharpness of a Bartok and the saccharine of a Kreisler.

The resulting work lacks force, and not even Miss Magnes' intensity with Mitropoulus' secure support (he conducted from memory!) could supply it.

Music's Charm Lost in Heat at Ravinia Park

BY SEYMOUR RAVEN

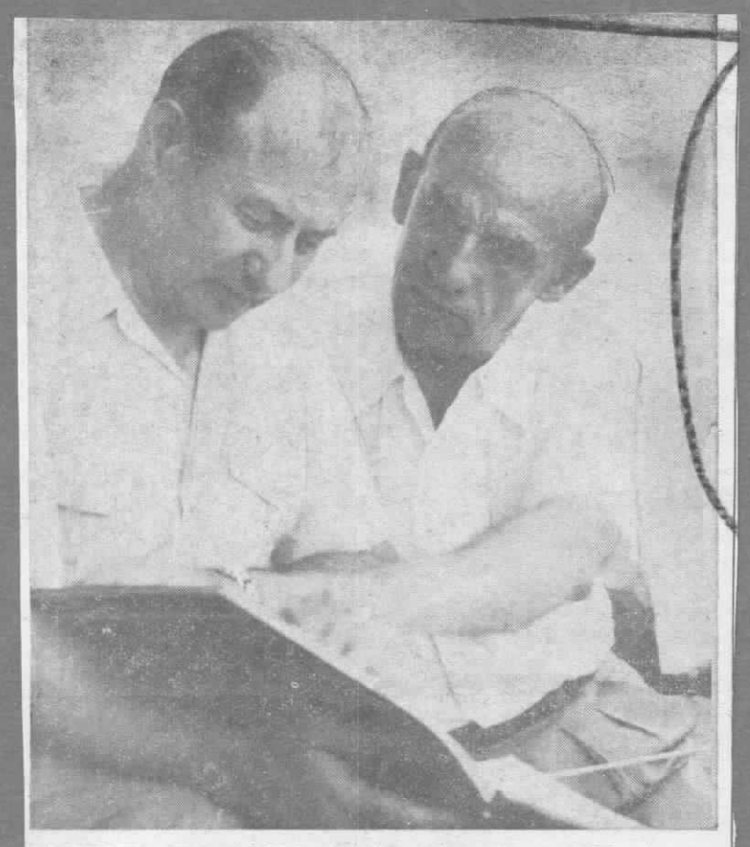
Following his Saturday program, which was built on variety [Dohnanyi's Second Violin Concerto, with Frances Magnes as soloist, and Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony as the features], Dimitri Mitropoulos took another track for the Ravinia concert Sunday afternoon. It was Mr. Mitropoulos' fourth and last concert as guest conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra this summer.

Mr. Mitropoulos' finale was two parts Cesar Franck and one part Respighi. That, music lovers, is no dionysian revel. And when the victims of Sunday's heat and humidity file their reports you will probably find general agreement that everybody—orchestra members, conductor, listeners, and critics—was far below par.

Only those who sat on the lawns, under trees, enjoyed some comfort. Inside the pavilion, some of the north shore's best dressed men doffed their coats and the working press loosened stringy neckties. Mr. Mitropoulos took it the hard way, not only conducting in full podium attire, but playing a piano solo. That was the Respighi, the Toccata for Piano and Orchestra.

As it turned out, the Respighi opus was a thumping piece, thickly scored and darkly colored, and Mr. Mitropoulos' coat turned to the color of perspiration gray. Placed between the two Franck works, the Respighi offered not contrast but an extra helping of melancholia, despite Mr. Mitropoulos' best natured efforts to make a decent show of it.

You do not need many guesses as to the identity of the Franck selections. One was the inevitable D Minor Symphony, the only symphony from this composer's pen. The other was the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue you often hear at piano recitals, given this time in the orchestral adaptation by Gabriel Pierne. Pierne was not of much help, for tho his orchestration was not dull, the material simply wasn't fit for orchestral treatment.



Simply call it an off-day, with an off-program to match.

Top Musicians Warmly Greeted In Area Debut

CHAUTAUQUA (UP) — Two highly - talented musicians made their debut with the Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra during the weekend.

In one of his rare appearances as a piano solist, Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, played the Respighi Toccata for piano and orchestra.

A capacity audience of 7500 in the open-air ampitheater greeted Mitropoulos with waving white handkerchiefs — the traditional Chautauqua salute. He was called back four times.

The second performer, to whom the Chautauqua salute could mean nothing, was violinist Ruben Varga of Israel. The 21-year-old virtuoso was blinded by an Arab grenade in Tel Aviv at the age of 11.

He played the Brahms violin concerto with the Chautauqua Symphony.

Varga served in the Hungarian underground as a messenger during World War II, while studying under a musical scholarship in Budapest.

Mitropolous, Autori Share Concert Honors

With deft, facile, effortless ease at the keyboard, Dimitri Mitropolous was the unquestioned star of the Saturday evening concert with the Chautauqua Symphony.

Playing the Toccata for Piano and Orchestra by Ottorino Respighi, the soloist offset the tremendous strength of the bravura passages with a lightness and delicacy of tone in the sing motifs as gentle as a wafting breeze. Yet in the interpretation there was the purity of intense passion, the singleness of purpose inherent in the asceticism of Mitropolous, the deep lyricism of the mystic in the melodic interplays between the piano and solo instruments of the throbbing orchestra.

Stirred to the core, the overflow audience did grandly respond with a resounding ovation that reverberated in great surging waves throughout the Amphitheater.

Franco Autori, conducting the orchestra, opened with his own arrangement of Debussy's brooding the Engulfed Cathedral. This music had been always a very difficult mood to comprehend and visualize, unless played and heard under almost impossibly ideal conditions. The conductor's own arrangement, plus his really personal reading of this work, did much to clarify the hidden subleties and beauties abounding in the score. This was a setting of mood, shimmering and cascading, yet overdrawn with a misty veil of illusion, most effective in the dimming twilight of the evening.

The famed Fourth Symphony of Tschaikovsky closed the concert. This particular work of the composer has always been an extrmely difficult one for a conductor to interpret within the bounds of moderation, yet I feel that Mr. Autori's reading was as close to the meaning of the symphony as could be achieved. It is a piece imbued with the inexorable fatalism which plagued Tschaikovsky all his life, and in it he poured all the capricious emotional facets of his disturbed nature.

Treated as such, it is a work of extreme, varying from the softest, most sibilant whisperings of the strings, to the terrifying thunders of the brosses. At times, Mr. Autori's conducting was cataclysmic, undoubtedly due to Tschaikovsky's seeming tendency to score for field artillery as well as full orchestra, and at one point in the last movement, the intensity of the conductor's own feelings led him to an upsurge of motion which resembled the launching of a rocket through the roof of the Amphitheater. This was thrilling music, excellently played and splendidly interpreted.

Before, during, and after the delicate pizzicato Third Movement, several members of the audience again felt the urge to leave, regardless of the interests of those who had come to the concert to hear rather than be heard. There were several greetings on the outer fringes of the Amphitheater, of friends who had apparently not seen each other since suppertime, accompanied by sounds which resembled the lusty voicings of the hounds in the swamplands seeking the long lost Chloe.

The inconsiderateness of these few, with their simpering posturings and banal gesturings, obviously designed to attract attention, is a sorry footnote to the glories of Chautauqua.

Mitropoulos Is Electrifying At Piano in Chautauqua

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

THE SAME ELECTRIC quality of personality that emanates from Dimitri Mitropoulos when he is conducting is felt when the noted conductor performs as a piano virtuoso. The Greek-born conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, appearing as pianist for the first time in these parts, was soloist with the Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening under the baton of his associate conductor in New York, Franco Autori.

THE CONDUCTOR-PIANIST was heard in the Toccata for Piano and Orchestra by Respighi, written in 1928, and described by the composer as being in the form of a classic toccata couched in modern harmonic terms.

Whether one might grow to cherish the work on more intimate acquaintance is a question. Certainly Mr. Mitropoulos played it not only with abundant and vitalizing virtuosity, but with infinite care and conviction. His conviction acted as persuasively, probably, on his listeners, as his playing.

He has the grand manner, with a rounded tone for the tender passages and a sculptured strength for the climaxes. The immediate impression of the work, however, is of much old-fashioned bombast, offset now and again by some lyric passages of simplicity and imagination.

There was an excellent fusion between the orchestral and piano parts. Mr. Mitropoulos, who usually conducts from the piano when he plays a concerto, often turned impetuously and unconsciously to the orchestra as if to emphasize an accent or a change in tempo. Mr. Autori, who is the only professional conductor under whom Mr. Mitropoulos has played, collaborated most sympathetically with his colleague. It was a prime example of teamwork.

THE EXCITEMENT engendered by Mr. Mitropoulos' dashing performance heightened as Mr. Autori led the orchstra through a brilliant reading of the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony. The conductor's fervent approach produced a highly energized interpretation, couched in heroic rather than nostalgic terms. The work's lyric aspects were not slighted, though, nor was clarity sacrificed for the powerful and dramatic climaxes.

Admissions of 266,700 were registered at the twenty-seven events of the 1952 Stadium Concerts season, which ended Sunday evening. Stadium officials announced an average attendance of 9,877 persons per concert.

Attendance at this year's concerts fell somewhat below that of the 1951 season, which averaged 10,831 listeners per concert and established an all-time high for the series.

The most popular event of the 1952 season, the Kern-Hammerstein night on July 12, attracted an audience of 19,000 listeners. Tied for second place in popularity were the twenty-first annual "Gershwin Night" and the tenth annual "Night in Vienna." In third place were the opening night concert, with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting and with Marian Anderson as soloist, and the all-Beethoven program of July 10, with Pierre Monteux conducting and Yehudi Menuhin as soloist.

Stadium Roundup

By Miles Kastendieck

New York

Stadium Concerts ended as they began—with a postponement. By coincidence these two events were the only ones rained out in the six-week season. In each case also they might have drawn larger crowds because Marian Anderson was soloist at the opening, and the annual Rodgers and Hammerstein Night concluded the series. The average attendance fell about 1,000 persons below the season's average a year ago. This drop, however, means little, since the Republican and Democratic conventions took place during the season.

With a record attendance set on the Stadium's first Kern-Hammerstein Night, the attraction of lighter programs might be definitely substantiated. Gershwin Night and Night in Vienna proved almost as popular, with Rodgers and Hammerstein Night not far behind. Only two concerts of serious music could compete with the attendance figures of these, the opening night with Miss Anderson, and the Beethoven program with Yehudi Menuhin.

An all-Menotti program, featured for the first time, did not draw so much attention as might have been expected.

Twelve conductors and 44 soloists appeared with the Stadium Symphony Orchestra during the season. Of these, 23 made debuts. Within a short span of six weeks such a schedule may offer variety, but it does not necessarily whet interest. Only two outstanding conductors appeared — Dimitri Mitropoulos and Pierre Monteux. They gave the series its finest musical performances, but these in themselves did not draw the largest crowds. The situation poses a nice problem. The season sagged in the middle, for all the conscientious, musicianly work of Mr. Smallens.

★ Music review

Hollywood Bowl

By MILDRED NORTON

One of the larger symphony audiences of the season turned up in Hollywood Bowl last night to give the eighth and final week of Symphonies Under the Stars a cordial sendoff.

The audience, which incidentally, boasted a heartening number of young people, extended a welcome equally cordial to the evening's distinguished young pianist, Rudolf Firkusny, who made his Bowl debut as soloist for the Brahms D minor concerto, and to Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, who made his third western visit the occasion for batoning an all-Brahms program that was completed by the "Tragic" Overture and the First Symphony in C minor.

MITROPOULOS

One of the most illuminating things about this annual practice of having guest conductors in Hollywood Bowl is the proof it offers of the degree to which a conductor's own temperament and musicianship condition the performance of any given work. This past summer, for some uncanny reason, we have seen a disquieting procession of qualified men mount the Bowl podium and give astonishingly erratic accounts of themselves and the music they have conducted.

This has not been confined only to the unseasoned, nor, unhappily, has it been confined only to the few. With a minimum of exceptions — I think of Caston and Steinberg and of Leinsdorf's second concert—every conductor this summer has succumbed to the same kind of podium megrims.

Almost to a man they have felt the need to distort and exaggerate the music, to reduce it in tempo to a dragging, spiritless caricature, and to inflate its dynamics to undue proportions. If they were unfamiliar with the Bowl this might be understandable. It is a huge and intimidating theater in which to propect the detail and intimacy of an art so impalpable as music. But most of this summer's Bowl guests have conducted there many times before, and with results that did them infinitely greater credit.

What has happened to so vitiate these summer visitors of ours? What has become of the vigor and cogency, the firm grasp of musical form and the sure propulsive drive which we have found elsewhere in their work and which have made so many of their performances stirring and memorable? These are not with them this summer, and whether this is a temporary thing or part of a creeping miasma that is settling on our podium scene is a question one is almost afraid to pursue.

I wish I could report that Mitropoulos had resisted this virus, but unfortunately he displayed the same deliberated symptoms as his precursers. His conducting of the overture was a study in caprice —an episodic, disjunctive, slackly conceived and erratically projected exposition of music that is inherently logical and ordered.

There are perhaps composers on whom a conductor can turn the force of his own Technicolor personality without doing irreparable damage to them and to his own status as a musician. But there are two, at least, which rebuff such treatment. One of them is Mozart and the other is Brahms—two men with a similarly impeccable sense of form and a scrupulous artistic conscience which governed every note they wrote.

Brahms, certainly, never set down anything in haste with the confidence that some yet unborn conductor would put it right in performance. The greatest service a conductor can do Brahms' music is to honor both its letter and its spirit. It asks nothing more; it needs nothing more. It speaks for itself, and as eloquently as any music that has yet been written.

Mitropoulos' desire to gild the lily wrought some excruciating effects in the C minor symphony, notably in the flaccid third movement, which was so pushed and pulled into unrecognizable shape that it sometimes came to a dead halt out of sheer agony, and in the stupendous finale, which alternated like a man with malaria, between chills and fever.

As it turned out, about the closest last night's listeners came to hearing Brahms was in the lucid and scholarly keyboard playing of Firkusny, whose rapport with this composer is only part of the close musical kinship he establishes with whatever music he performs. To the concerto he brought the same musicianly poise and courteous address that distinguishes all his playing, which is that of a man who both understands and respects the composer's thought, and of an artist who possesses the re-creative genius to give it life.

In the concerto's first movement, so distorted in tempi that its heroic character was all but lost, Firkusny's firm, assured keyboard passages gave the only inkling of the taut play of polyphonic forces that should have informed the movement. In the adagio, wherein Mitropoulos met the music for once on an equitable plane of serene and unforced measures, Firkusny's pure, pellucid tones carved the hymn-like first theme and the broad cantilena of the second with tenderness and infinite beauty, and in the finale the vigor of his piano passages managed, despite a lumpy orchestral assist, to affirm the movement's power and drive so convincingly that bravos greeted him at its conclusion.

This I Believe . . .

Four Inseparable Humanities Are Cited by Dr. MacCracken

This is one of a series of statements prepared for broadcast by people in all walks of life on the things they believe in. They are heard in a program presented by Edward R. Murrow over WCBS at 5:55 p. m. Monday through Friday.

By Dr. Henry Noble MacCracken

President Emeritus of Vassar College

I put my trust in art and science, democracy and religion. These are my four guardian angels, four cardinal virtues, four points of my life's compass. By the better use of them I hope to reach my desired haven. I wish I could call them, as the psalmist does, mercy and truth, righteousness and peace, four attributes of the Divine which later writers called the four daughter of God. In a way, even that could be done without exaggeration, for mercy or sympathy is the spirit of art; truth, one form of it at least, is synonymous with science; democracy makes justice or righteousness its idea;—and peace is of the essence of religion. But these older abstractions are goals or ends, while my faith is content with the means—the instruments or directives pointing to those goals. Once set by them on the right road, I try to keep my eyes on that road, and give only fleeting glances up to the hills from which my help may come. I am made that way.

The Inseparable Humanities

Please note that like the compass-points, my four bases are inter-related; indeed, they exist only as they are related to each other. None could exist without the other three. Even religion is not to be conceived without art, science, and democracy.

These are the real humanities, the foundation of every liberal education, the principles on which my life as a teacher is based. They are the true disciplines, co-ordinating the several divisions of learning into which the tree of knowledge has branched out in our time. Art is concerned with the expression of one's inner life; science with the expression of the natural universe; democracy with human relations; and religion with the will of the Creator. These, and all of them, are the proper studies of mankind.

Imperfect? Yes, perhaps they are, sometimes, but they do not fail me so much as I fail them. I have never attained even their imperfection. They deviate, as the compass does, from the true north. But that is no reason for throwing the compass away, and going only by dead reckoning. The material for their correction is to be found in history, and in the insights of today. We constantly correct them, and go on our way.

Freedom Is the Key

Sometimes religion has tried to do without science. Today it seems to me that we try to make democracy and science do all the work, so that our cities and our countryside are no longer beautiful, and our young people evade religion, and have no piece of mind. We cannot be complete without them all.

This and one word more. Freedom is the polarity of my compass, that attraction which in other ages was called "love, which guides the sun and the rest of the stars." Liberty, love; friend, freedom; these historical etymologies give us the clue to their essential meanings. My metaphysics cannot venture much further— but this I believe.

City Opera Season

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The New York City Opera Co. and its general director, Joseph Rosenstock, are to be congratulated on a most promising schedule of attractions for the season opening with "Tosca" on Thursday evening, Sept. 18, at the City Center. Tullio Serafin, distinguished batonist, conducts the inaugural performance.

The company boasts a repertory of 18 operas, the largest in its history. And among those are three new productions—Menotti's "The Consul," Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnole," and Bartok's "Bluebeard's Castle." Revivals include the aforementioned "Tosca," besides "Aida," and "Carmen." All this is addition to the City Center familiars of last season, in a season to run no longer than six and one-half weeks.

Especially welcome is Ravel's scintillating work, which—you may remember—was given such a thoroughly charming going-over by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony.

Lacked Trappings.

That performance, however, given in concert form, lacked nothing musically or vocally, for the soloists chosen by the batonist were most effective in their roles. But it did lack the trappings of the theater, where this one-act piece really belongs.

The Metropolitan has for a long time been unaware, apparently, of this fascinating Ravellian essay in light comedy. And such comedy; fresh, mordant, deliciously zany on the surface, but pointed straight on its course in the satirizing of humans and, incidentally, grand opera and its sumptious finales.

What a pity that Ravel did not write more operas! His pen was so remarkably well-equipped for it. His achievement with this work is one of those triumphs of restraint, on the one hand, and sparkling invention, on the other. One may only guess at how much more he might have done in the field of opera, which, for all its great figures and great masterpieces, has not been overpopulated by such bright and startling wits as Ravel's.

Brahms Work Well Played By Firkusny

By MARGARET HARFORD

A concert conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos generally bears the clear imprint of his own personality no matter what the program contains or who the soloist happens to be. Last night's concert in Hollywood Bowl was devoted entirely to the music of Brahms and Rudolf Firkusny was on hand to play the D Minor Piano Concerto with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra.

Mr. Mitropoulos, unorthodox and loftily aesthetic, is a highly interesting personality on the podium, although last night he seemed unduly concerned with pure tonal effects and a completely subjective view of things, particularly the First Symphony. And since Brahms is not entirely susceptible to pictorial treatment, the symphony turned up expansive, suave and full of beautiful sounds, but lacking in structural character to the point where, for the most part, it sounded quite shapeless. On a strictly technical basis, the orchestra provided Mr. Mitropoulos with some of the season's finest playing; the strings have seldom sounded glossier nor has the detail of a symphony been more minutely delineated.

Probably the evening's happiest blend of accomplishment came when Mr. Firkusny appeared to play the concerto. A poetic, intelligent musician and a pianist of admirable gifts, the Czech performer pulled Brahms back to home base with playing that was clean and clear and superlatively beautiful in the liquid melody of Brahmsian sound. Mr. Firkusny is a perfectionist with a firm sense of the proportion of music and everything he did seemed to fall logically into place in a tonal frame of great lyric beauty.

The Tragic Overture, which Mr. Mitropoulos took at a very leisurely pace, held some excellent playing as the evening's opener.

Brahms Concert

Mitrupoulos Masterful

Final Week of Bowl Symphonies

By OWEN CALLIN

The combination of a cool evening after the afternoon's devastating temperatures, an excellent conductor, fine soloist, an all Brahms concert and the fact that this is the last week in hte current Symphonies Under the Stars season served to draw an excellent crowd to the Hollywood Bowl last night.

Dimitri Mitrupoulos, who has established himself during the past years with the Minneapolis and New York Philharmonic Orchestras as one of our nation's finest conductors, took over the directorial task in the first of two concerts he will conduct this week.

Mitropoulos was his bombastic self, vehement in his direction and with stern discipline led his willing orchestra through Brahm's "Tragic" Overture, the Concerto No. 1 in D Minor and the Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

It is rather odd that such a vehemence can be associated with the conducting of Brahm's works, yet one must admire the tenderness which can progress from the Mitropoulos baton. The exquisite sweetness of the concerton and symphony which the conductor evoked was a tribute to his eminence in hte field of conducting.

Rudolf Firkusny, no stranger to Southland music lovers, fell in accord with the spirit of the evening and demonstrated that here, too, is a sensitive musician who can interpret and fulfill the message of Brahms' music.

The First Concerto, although perhaps pointed to by some as not quite indicative of Brahms' more natural self because of the influence of Schumann, is not the plodding work with which it is often tagged.

It began as a symphony, graduated into a two-piano sonata, and finally emerged in its present form. Firkusny, while not overlooking the Schumann influence, played it as Brahms intended the finally-completed work to sound.

Crowd Hails Bowl Concert

By Patterson Greene

WHETHER for Composer Johannes Brahms, for Conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos, for Piano Soloist Rudolf Firkusny or for the combination of all three, a larger-than-average audience assembled at the Hollywood Bowl last Tuesday night.

The all Brahms program reached the heights in Firkusny's performance of the D Minor Concerto.

A perceptive and inspired interpretation was backed by a technical equipment that dissolved mechanical difficulties and produced tones ranging from the elfin to the thunderous — all beautiful.

Contemplative throughout its first two movements, the Concerto never lacked variety of mood as Firkusny played it. Themes sang out in the infinite variety of forms into which Brahms has shaped them, and inter-voices lived happy lives of their own.

It was telling virtuosity placed respectfully at the service of great music.

It may have been lack of adequate rehearsal that kept the orchestra from realizing the potentialities of the Brahms score. Violins were suppressed to the point of expurgation, woodwinds were unduly prominent and not too accurate, and the brasses seemed timorously indetermined.

Mitropoulos asserted himself as a first-rate conductor in the C Minor Symphony.

One could have dispensed with the repeats, and there were times when the dramatic pauses took on the quality of stage waits. But there was beautifully detailed phrasing in the songful Second Movement, the Allegretto accomplished its transitions gracefully and the finale had had gravity and devoutness.

The "Tragic" Overture provided an unpromising opening to the program.

A New Musical Slant on Columbus

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Those admiring the discoverer of America—and who doesn't—are in for a jolt when Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic Symphony introduce Darius Milhaud's "Christopher Columbus" to America in November.

Milhaud's treatment of the hero is quite different from the version given pupils at school. This Columbus, according to Mr. Mitropoulos, is a tormented man of destiny, part sadist, part saint.

Tells of a Broken Man.

In fact, there are two Columbuses in the opera—the second one being his conscience. There is also a Narrator and a Chorus, whose job it is to advise the tortured explorer and comment on the action.

The opera begins at the low ebb of Columbus's career. Back in Spain from the New World, he is a broken man, shorn of glory. A mule is his only possession. Flashbacks, as in screen technic, give us the great adventure of his life. The finale is staged in Paradise.

Mack Harrell is to sing the part of Columbus in the Philharmonic's concert version of the opera, the libretto of which was written by Paul Claudel.

Queen Isabella's Role.

Dorothy Dow has been assigned the part of Queen Isabella of Spain. Eileen Farrell, originally announced for the role, has asked to be released, pleading "an act of God."

The gifted soprano, Mrs. Robert Reagan in private life and mother of a six-year-old son, is expecting her second child.

All-Brahms Event Gives Pleasure

BY RAYMOND KENDALL
Mirror Music Editor

Symphonies Under the Stars entered its final week in Hollywood Bowl last night with Dimitri Mitropoulos guest-conducting the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra.

It was an all-Brahms program, with Pianist Rudolf Firkusny playing the D Minor Concerto and the orchestra devoting itself to the "Tragic" Overture and the great C Minor Symphony.

In general, last night's was one of this season's most satisfying concerts. The vitality of sound which Mr. Mitropoulos coaxed out of the orchestra, the general unity of concept in the concerto helped to make it so.

True, the raggedness and out-of-tuneness in the upper strings must have discouraged Mr. Mitropoulos; this matter begins to go beyond the excusable stage, for it has become notably worse during the past two weeks.

Allowing for all the very real problems attendant upon playing outside, is it not reasonable to expect the talented gentlemen in the orchestra to demand better of themselves—even in the summer, even in the Bowl?

Rudolf Firkusny gave the concerto a superb reading. His pianism combines great technical skill with an emotional drive which is contagious. With the help of conductor and orchestra, the slow movement had a subdued dynamic range, an intimacy which one could scarcely believe possible; it had a chamber music quality, so finely was it exposed.

Dimitri Mitropoulos reaches for essentials without being distracted by interesting but less important subsidiary affairs.

He again wrought his own particular brand of magic by seeming to re-create these works through his intense feeling for their inner substance.

Program of Brahms Brings Throng to Bowl

BY ALBERT GOLDBERG

The popularity of Brahms remains like a rock among the changing tides of fashion, and consequently the hillsides of Hollywood Bowl were comfortably populated last night by an audience that heard Dimitri Mitropoulos conduct the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra in the "Tragic" Overture and the First Symphony, with Rudolf Firkusny playing the solo part of the D Minor Piano Concerto.

When the world and the music of Brahms were both younger one of the favorite arguments among sticklers for nomenclature was whether Brahms was a classicist or a romanticist. Now we casually accept the fact that he was both, for the sturdy strength of his music derives as much from its firmly knit architecture as it does from the warmth and the humanity that impart to its the character that is universally recognized as typical Brahms.

Impressionistic

But not until last night had one ever heard the music of Brahms treated in what may perhaps most accurately be described as an impressionistic manner. As one well knew from past experience with Mr. Mitropoulos' conducting, he is no respectar of tradition. No matter what he plays, the approach is highly individual and unlike that of any other interpreter.

His Brahms was no exception to the rule. There was seldom any regard for the classic line of either the overture or the symphony. All was purely subjective and personal in a style more peculiar to the conductor than to Brahms. Episodes were separated from the context and treated more for their sheer acoustical values than for their relation to the structure as a whole. There were constant wide variations of tempo, and the continual emphasis upon minor detail did less to illuminate the music than to stress the purely obvious.

This resulted in at least an interesting version of the overture, wherein the slow and measured tempo and the generally mournful mood served to point up whatever meaning may reside in the title.

Loose Episodes

But it quite obscured the majestic form of the symphony which became a patchwork of loosely integrated episodes that diminished rather than augmented the emotional message of the music. Nor did it assist the orchestra to accomplish the best playing of which it is capable, for the ensemble was often ragged as the players sought to adjust to the conductor's sudden changes of pace and unexpected retards.

The most orthodox Brahms of the evening was that offered by Mr. Firkusny in his playing of the concerto. He is a strong and intelligent musician, with a keen sense of continuity that seldom found firm support in the accompaniment, and with a feeling for the power and tenderness of Brahms that makes him one of the finest interpreters of this concerto.

His tone had the warmth and roundness for the music and his fingers made light work of the difficulties of the piece. But the work is as much a symphony as it is a concerto and the conductor's tendency to let the orchestral interludes fall apart again deprived it of the grandeur of line and structure that is one of its most distinctive qualities.

Mitropoulos Praised for Making 'Em Mad

High-voltage Dimitri Mitropoulos has successfully revived the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, Esquire magazine says in an October feature. While misspelling the former Minneapolis maestro's first name "Dmitri," Esquire says: "In three years under his direction the Philharmonic has become the nation's most interesting orchestra; it even makes people mad, which is the first sign of really fine musicianship." Mitropoulos' vigorous conducting is given much of the credit and Esquire's pictures of him exhibit that vigor.

There are some other exciting programs, like, for instance, the appearance of Dimitri Mitropoulos, whose picture graces our front cover, conducting the New York Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble—a group priding themselves on the fact that the maestro bestows great care upon them, rehearses with them, supervises their playing and sees to it that every one of them remains a soloist so their work does not degenerate into a smaller New York Philharmonic. With that group Mitropoulos will do, on November 16, the Nonett of Krenek—and we are glad that Krenek will have this unusual opportunity and particularly that New York audiences will have the opportunity to hear a work which as regards style and expressiveness deserves to be considered among the leading works of this generation. We should talk about the Shaw Chorale, about the exquisite madrigals of Gesualdo and Monteverdi and other old music that will be heard together with the other "new" performances — we should say something about the quartets and other chamber music combinations that are standbys of the New Friends of Music, but space forbids further comment. We can only hope to have communicated some of the enthusiasm we had in putting these programs together, preparing them, engaging the artists for them, that some of the inspiration of that labor has been carried over to the reader. And, going back to where we started; it is this kind of programming which we believe is important today. At this time it can only be artistically successful and financially sound in Europe and in New York City; but perhaps the time will not be far distant when our whole country is musically more demanding program-wise.

Rossi-Lemeni Scores Hit as Bowl Soloist

BY ALBERT GOLDBERG

Hollywood Bowl patrons last night had a foretaste of the coming San Francisco Opera season when Nicola Rossi-Lemeni, the company's brilliant discovery of last season, sang as soloist with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos.

This sample should have been enough to persuade all who heard him not to miss any of the three operas in which he will appear, for Rossi-Lemeni again asserted his right to be classed as one of the great artists of the day. The voice itself is an amazing instrument, immeasurably rich, limitless in strength and volume and with power to thrill by its very quality alone.

Fine Projection

And great as is the voice is the artistry with which it is controlled and projected. There is never a perfunctory phrase; each word is colored with precisely the right shade of dramatic meaning and though Rossi-Lemeni has already proved himself to be a magnificent actor, he has no need of gestures, costumes, or scenery to re-create the setting of anything that he sings.

The opening "Ella giammai m'amo" from Verdi's "Don Carlos" was a masterpiece of brooding introspection, and in quick contrast there was the contemptuous "Ecco il mondo" from Boito's "Mefistofele" with the voice slashing out its disdain of suffering humanity. As an encore there was another touch of the diabolical in Mephisto's Serenade from Gounod's "Faust."

Emotional Appeal

As all who heard him sing "Boris Godounoff" last season well know, there has not been another singer to equal Rossi-Lemeni's interpretation of the tortured Czar since Chaliapin, and the Monologue was again sung with tremendous eloquence and the most moving emotional appeal. Delving into the Chaliapin repertoire again for an encore, he sang Moussorgsky's "Song of the Flea" with such sardonic humor and such dazzling vocal splendor that a cheering audience would not permit the show to go ahead until it had been repeated.

Unpredictable

Mr. Mitropolos again demonstrated himself to be one of the most unpredictable of conductors. Kodaly's Dances from Galanta suited his rhapsodic style perfectly, and proved to be one of the most entertaining orchestral episodes of the season. The suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" also found the conductor in a most amiable and reasonable mood and received a strikingly beautiful performance.

But it is hard to explain the slow-motion version of the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" that began the program, or the willfully disjointed account of the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Capriccio Espagnole" that seemed to have as its main object a determination to overemphasize every unimportant detail.

Wins Plaudits Bowl Finale

By Patterson Greene

VITAL conducting by Dmitri Mitropoulos and dynamic singing by Nicola Rossi-Lemeni in the Hollywood Bowl last night brought to a close this season's Symphonies under the Stars (and the back of my hand to any churl who would refer to them as Symphonies under the Planes).

After tomorrow night's popular concert the Bowl will be turned over to the maintenance crew and the crickets, to reflect pleasantly on a summer of the most consistently good music that it has harbored in many a year.

Gigantic in height and threatening to become gigantic in girth, Rossi-Lemeni confirmed the impression he made a year ago when he sang Boris Godunoff at the Shrine; that he is one of the few exciting operatic figures of the generation.

OPULENT VOICE——

He can hold his opulent bass voice to a legato line, as he did in the great Dormiro sol from Verdi's "Don Carlo." He can likewise declaim powerfully and freely, remaining always within rhythmic and melodic bounds, as he did in the sardonic aria from "Mefistofele," in which Satan looks upon the world and finds it just about as bad as you and I think it is.

Continuing the satanic mood, he sang Mefistofele's serenade from "Faust."

In his second group was another serenade, this one from "Don Giovanni," along with the Monologue and Clock Scene from "Boris Godunoff."

With Mitropoulos providing ideal orchestral support, the young Italian basso earned and got the excited plaudits of a very large audience. Rossi-Lemeni is Italy's answer to America's George London. Or is it the other way around?

BRINGS NOVELTY——

Dmitri Mitropoulos dwelt lingeringly but devoutedly on the "Rienzi" Overture of Wagner and brought the spice of novelty to the evening in a set of Hungarian gypsy airs from the province of Galanta, made into a suite by Kodaly. It had melody, moody rhythms and prismatic orchestrations—including many beautifully played passages for the solo clarinet.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice and a suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" rounded out the program.

Mitropoulos Praises Dorati's Program List

PROGRAMS the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra will present under its conductor, Antal Dorati, conductor, during its golden jubilee season starting Nov. 1, have been given enthusiastic praise from an eminent source.

This was Dimitri Mitropoulos, the orchestra's former conductor and now musical director of the New York Philharmonic ortra, who commented in a letter to Arthur J. Gaines, manager here which discussed the program he will play here during a guest appearance in February.

"I must congratulate you indeed, either you or Mr. Dorati or both together, on this wonderful exhibit, this avalanche of outstanding events and programs," Mitropoulos wrote. "I don't think there is any place in the world today where the season of a permanent orchestra has ever offered such glorious programs. Indeed, I feel privileged to be listed to be listed in such wonderful company.

Mitropoulos

"I will certainly look forward to coming back to my old home city and greetings to you with whom I spent so many happy years," he concluded.

For his own program here Feb. 27, Mitropoulos suggested his arrangement of the Bach Fantasia and Fugue in G minor and the Schumann Symphony No. 2 in G major. These have met enthusiastic local support.

To round out the program, he suggested a number of other works which are still under discussion.

Symphonies to be offered on the various programs include Beethoven's No. 3 (Eroica) in E-flat, Mozart's No. 37 in G major, Paul Creston's No. 3 (Three Mysteries), Beethoven's No. 5 in C minor, Mahler's No. 1 in D major, the Honegger No. 5, the Dvorak No. 5 "From the New World"; the Haydn No. 97 in C major, the Charles Ives' "Holidays," Prokofieff's Classical in D major, the Bruckner No. 9 in D minor, Brahms' No. 2 in D major, the Mozart No. 41 (Jupiter) in C major, and the Bizet No. 1 in C major.

Scores of other compositions programmed include works by Wagner, Debussy, Richard Strauss, de Falla, Beethoven, Ravel, Hindemith, Stravinsky, Johann Strauss, Vivaldi, Satie, Rossini and others.

Season tickets for the subscription series of 18 concerts now are on sale at the symphony ticket office, 106 Northrop auditorium, University of Minnesota; the Downtown ticket office, Minneapolis; or the Field-Schlick office, St. Paul. Such tickets may be had at a saving of more than 30 per cent over tickets purchased for individual concerts. Prices range from $20 to $53.

PROGRAM TRENDS

Coming Philharmonic-Symphony Season Stresses Opera in Concert Form

By OLIN DOWNES

A STRIKING feature of our symphonic programs in late seasons, and especially those of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, has been the number of performances of opera in concert form. This recent trend may not be comforting to those disciples of the pure and the absolute in music who deem the forms of symphonic composition finer, more distinctive, more exalted than those other forms which derive more or less directly from the practices of the lyric theatre.

Or it may be an indication of something yet more serious, this being that modern instrumental music has in certain notable instances gone so far astray from the path of emotional expression that symphony patrons are pining unawares for the element of the dramatic in music. This craving for the dramatic and emotional may, in turn, explain why musical patrons and esthetes who would look down their noses at such outmoded tendencies as "romanticism" and "subjectivity" and programmism in the modern tonal art swallow unblushingly, yea, with avidity, the sentimentalities, theatricalisms and nineteenth-century excrescences which linger on, for example, in the more pontifical and inflated of the symphonies of Gustav Mahler.

But let it pass, let it pass. It takes all kinds of music, musical taste, even music critics, to make a world. The fact before us is a very interesting forthcoming season, as the programs indicate, with a considerable percentage of opera in the total of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society's 111th season.

The season begins on Oct. 16 with a program consisting in the first half of Beethoven and the rhapsodic and marvelous "Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss; and in the second half, three of the greatest scenes of Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunoff." The Coronation Scene of the first act; the monologue of Boris in Act II and the Farewell and Death Scene of Boris at the end of Act IV will be presented.

Bass Soloist

The version in preparation will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's of 1908. The soloist will be George London of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who later in the season will take the part in the Metropolitan première of the original Boris, the "ur-Boris," untinctured by Rimsky-Korsakoff's editing. This original version the Metropolitan will present with a new orchestration devised to meet the problem of Mussorgsky's ineffective instrumentation of his masterpiece. Mr. London will use his own English translation of the Russian text in the Philharmonic-Symphony performance. This should be at least a perceptive and vocally advantageous version of the Russian text, which Mr. London, American bass-baritone, sang at the Vienna Opera recently to the astonishment of Soviet officials who heard it.

On Nov. 6, 7, 8 and 9 Mr. Mitropoulos will give the American première of Darius Milhaud's opera, "Christoph Colomb," after the play of Paul Claudel. One may question in advance of the event whether this concert version of the work, with chorus and solo vocalists, may not prove to be the most advantageous way of presenting it, since it is a drama with many pages of ideas rather than action. But Henri Sauget, a notable proponent of Milhaud, declares that this is opera in all its elements, treated in a particularly individual manner by the composer; while Claudel, librettist as well as author, has emphasized the special possibilities, in the presentation of "Christoph Colomb," of the devices of the cinema.

Claudel's treatment of the theme is mystical, symbolic, philosophic, stemming essentially from the principles of Catholicism. The opening is anything but theatrical, and farthest from the conception of the discoverer of America which is conveyed in our schoolbooks. For Columbus, in Claudel's drama, is a haunted man of destiny, and a divided personality. One aspect of him is that of the dauntless adventurer, the man of will and deeds, the pioneer of a new age. The other is Columbus, alone with his conscience.

Mr. Mitropoulos has long had this work in mind for production. He witnessed its première at the Berlin Opera, May 6, 1930, under Erich Kleiber, where the work had an immense effect, though it does not as yet seem to have commended itself for operatic production on this side of the water.

A third opera, or part of an opera, to be heard at the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts under George Szell is Strauss' "Salome," from the last half, beginning with the Dance, to the end. Mr. Szell will have the assistance of Astrid Varnay, Blanche Thebom and Set Svanholm as soloists.

Guest Conductors

The other guest conductors of the season will be Bruno Walter and the young Guido Cantelli, returning to the Philharmonic-Symphony for his second engagement as guest leader. Mr. Walter will interpret, among other works, Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, Mahler's Fourth with Irmgard Seefried as soprano soloist, and "Das Lied von der Erde," with Elena Nikolaidi and Mr. Svanholm for solo singers. A third work on a grand scale involving the services of singers and chorus will be the Beethoven Missa Solemnis, which Mr. Mitropoulos will conduct in Easter Week.

Other new works which Mr. Mitropoulos, ever a champion, and an eloquent one, will present are Howard Ferguson's concerto for piano and strings, with Myra Hess as pianist; Frank Martin's Violin Concerto, with Joseph Szigeti; Paul Hindemith's 'Cello Concerto, when Edmund Kurtz will be the soloist; Bohuslav Martinu's 'Cello Concerto, Pierre Fournier, 'cellist; the first New York performance of Schoenberg's Violin Concerto, with the composer's disciple, Louis Krasner, as solo interpreter. Other works of the first eight weeks of the concerts will be Louis Gesenway's "Double Portrait;" Berg's "Three Orchestra Pieces;" Boccherini's Symphony in A major; and William Schuman's score of "Judith," composed for a ballet.

Mr. Cantelli will give the first American concert performance of G. F. Ghedini's "Concerto of the Albatross," after Herman Melville. A narrator delivers the lines of the novel in which Ishmael describes the first sight of the albatross.

Mr. Cantelli also gives the American première of Ildebrando Pizzetti's "Prelude to Another Day;" a "first performance" of another work that is more than three centuries old, "The Battle," by the sixteenth-century Venetian, Andrea Gabrielli.

With the opening of the season the Philharmonic-Symphony will begin its second annual "Friends' Fund" drive. The object of the campaign is to raise $150,000 toward the orchestra's yearly deficit; the long-range object is to make every New Yorker a "Friend" of the society and aware of the historic part it has played in making New York the musical center of the world, which today it is.

Old and New Music at the Philharmonic

Mitropoulos Will Mix the Traditional and the Modern Again

By JAY S. HARRISON

Dimitri Mitropoulos bounced out the elevator into the lobby of his hotel. It was midday. "Come," said he, "first we eat, then we talk." This, it turned out, was not quite the case, for no sooner had luncheon been ordered than Mr. Mitropoulos spoke. And this is what he said.

"You want to know what we are doing this year? I tell you. We are doing what we always do—playing the best contemporary and classical music we can find." And thus the musical director of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York launched into an outline of his prospective plans for the music season 1952-'53, which begins on Oct. 16 at Carnegie Hall.

"First," said the bald and wiry maestro, "we do Moussorgsky's 'Boris Godounoff,' at least half of it, with George London, (he is a famous bass, you know), as Boris." Following this, Mr. Mitropoulos discussed another opera, Darius Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb," which in concert form, will be presented in its American premiere on Nov. 6, 7, 8 and 9. "Ah," said the conductor, "wait until New York hears 'Columbus.' It is one of the great modern works, and we have great singers to sing it." Mr. Mitropoulos' enthusiasm aside, the Milhaud opera does indeed promise to be one of the outstanding events of the year. It is a two-part work, in twenty-seven scenes which has been described as containing elements of Greek drama, the mystery play, music-drama, expressionist technique, symbolism and modern newsreel methods.

Lunch and discussion moved apace and in the course of both it was revealed that Mr. Mitropoulos will also this year conduct all of the orchestral music from Berlioz' dramatic symphony "Romeo et Juliette" instead of the usual two or, at most, three numbers with which concert audiences are regularly regaled; and, as concert going draws to a close, Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" will be called upon to cap the season.

In addition to all else, the Philharmonic's impending music-making activity centers, to judge by advance reports, on the performance of little-known concertos. In Mr. Mitropoulos' own words: "What we are giving is many concertos which are not new but which have not become established as repertory pieces." Violin concertos, for example, by Schoenberg, Walton, Prokofieff, Martin, and Bartok are scheduled for presentation, and cello works by Martinu and Hindemith will be performed during the year before us. Quite likely, also, the pianists' repertoire is destined to be enlarged when Dame Myra Hess gives the American premiere of a concerto by her countryman, Howard Ferguson.

The end is not yet. Mr. Mitropoulos has mentioned that both Scriabin's "Poem of Fire" and "Poem of Ecstacy" may find their way onto the Philharmonic itinerary, and Alban Berg's "Three Pieces for Orchestra," the composer's sole essay in purely orchestral composition, will definitely make their domestic debut under the conductor's watchful eye. Directly thereafter, Mr. Mitropoulos will turn his hand to three works which he has himself commissioned from Marcel Dick, Arthur Berger and Louis Gesensway, the last named having responded to his commission with a work said to be a portrait of the two sexes. And to round off a season nowhere lacking in novelty, there will be a performance of a symphony by Peter Racine Fricker, one of the standard bearers of British atonalism. Other modern works to spice the season will be William Schuman's "Judith," Peter Mennin's Fifth Symphony, Karol Rathaus' "Symphony Concertante," Ernest Krenek's Variations on the Theme "I Wonder As I Wander," and the prize-winning work, as yet unselected, of the annual George Gershwin Memorial Award.

"I wish," said Mr. Mitropoulos by way of parting, "that you would tell your readers about an experience that happened to me this summer. Would you?" he asked.

Some months ago the conductor was requested by the La Scala Opera House of Milan to travel to Italy and prepare the first Italian performance of Berg's "Wozzeck." This he proceeded to do with the understanding that he be allowed six orchestral and four stage rehearsals, the same number required by Mr. Mitropoulos for his New York presentation of the work at the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts. To his dismay, however, at the end of the alloted time not even the first act had been completely ironed out. The reason, suggested the maestro; lay in the fact that the Philharmonic rehearsed intensively, without the bother of those side excursions into the realms of "Boheme" and "Traviata" with which the La Scala musicians were daily burdened. And as soon as the director of the company heard of Mr. Mitropoulos' plight he ordered (wonder of wonders!) that the opera house be closed for two weeks, with all scheduled performances cancelled, so that the La Scala orchestra might dedicate every moment of its time to the Berg score.

The final result, Mr. Mitropoulos told us, was an unprecedented success. True, at the beginning of the opera there were some audible hoots and catcalls from the gallery, but at the end of the first act Mr. Mitropoulos faced the audience and delivered a short lecture on (1) proper concert behavior, and (2) the greatness of "Wozzeck" as music and drama. From that point forward there was not a hint of trouble, and at the work's conclusion there was nothing less than hysterical applause. When asked how he had accomplished his minor miracle Mr. Mitropoulos shrugged and replied, "It was all very simple. I told my listeners about those signs that hung above the piano in the old, wild West saloons I have seen in the movies. You remember them, don't you? They read, 'Please don't shoot the pianist. He does the best he can.'"

Philharmonic Has Opening of 111th Season

'Boris Godunoff' Excerpts Directed by Mitropoulos; Greek Envoy Is Present

The Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra opened its 111th season last night at Carnegie Hall, an opening which has been for more than a century one of the city's major musical and social events each year.

Under the baton of Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the Philharmonic, the orchestra performed six excerpts from the Moussorsky opera, "Boris Godounoff." It was the first time the Philharmonic had played so much of this opera at one performance, having presented usually one scene or two in the past. Under Mr. Mitropoulos' direction, the Philharmonic has placed a greater emphasis on concert versions of operas, and this season will present another, Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb."

All of the 2,760 seats of Carnegie Hall were filled when the concert began. Although box holders enjoy private entrances, the remainder of the house is traditionally closed off as soon as the Philharmonic begins a concert, and no one is permitted to enter and thereby disturb the listening pleasures of those already seated.

Athanase Politis, Greek Ambassador to the United States, attended the concert, appearing at Carnegie in time to step back stage to greet Mr. Mitropoulos, who was born in Greece. Mr. Politis was a guest of Mrs. Lytle Hull, in Box 37. Mrs. Hull is a vice-president of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's board of directors and chairman of the Auxiliary Board.

Other boxholders who attended last night included Mr. and Mrs. David H. McAlpin, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, Mrs. John T. Pratt, and Mr. and Mrs. William Rosenwald. Two upper tier boxes were taken by fifteen wives of members of the orchestra.

SCHOENBERG'S ERWARTUNG

Robert Craft
evaluates a recent recording of this work and appends a note on Schoenberg in the theatre

BY my count, Erwartung (Columbia ML 4524; Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic, Dorothy Dow, Soprano) is the 19th Schoenberg work to have been released on LP records during the last three years. Six of that number, it is true, were transferred from 78 rpm records. Nevertheless, that 13 Schoenberg works should be made available in so short a time is amazing indeed. Now Columbia promises the second Chamber Symphony and The Survivor of Warsaw—both recorded in Europe—for release this fall.

It is conceivable that within a few years the more inaccessible masterpieces of Schoenberg's 12-tone period will be recorded: the Violin and Piano Concertos, the opera Von Heute auf Morgen, the choruses and cantatas, and the Accompaniment to a Film Scene. Until then it will be very difficult to make even a sketchy estimate of this most complex musician.

Erwartung (1909) fills in a lot of ground towards this estimate; but the big works that followed it, theatrical and otherwise, beginning with its companion piece Die Glückliche Hand (1909-13), must also be considered to understand Schoenberg's textual and theatrical intentions. Unfortunately, there are great lacunae in the attempt to read Schoenberg's evolution; his two "biggest" works, the oratorio Die Jacobsleiter (1917) and the opera Moses and Aaron (1932-3), are both unfinished. The prose poetry texts of both, and of Die Glückliche Hand, are by Schoenberg. A prose play called Der Biblische Weg, written and published between work on the unfinished scores, ought to be considered with them in a kind of trilogy which was to be Schoenberg's Ring, a gigantic work of his own visual, literary, and musical creation centering on his own form of Biblical belief.

One cannot call these texts libretti (the 'libretto' of Erwartung by Marie Pappenheim is unreadable trash), yet Erwartung, Die Glückliche Hand, and Moses and Aaron were definitely conceived as stage works. They bear almost no resemblance to any operatic works before or since; they have even less to do with the post-Wagnerian music-drama, from which they are supposed to derive, and might be taken as a criticism of it. Finally, they are in quite a different direction from the Wozzeck and Lulu of Alban Berg. They make extraordinary demands on stage techniques —Schoenberg 'composed' the lighting, the stage movements, and even the actors' expressions, as carefully as he did the music—and in the case of Moses and Aaron they are so extraordinary that, had it been finished, there would have been but little probability of its being staged. However, this does indicate that Schoenberg did conceive visually.

Dramatically, all of these works are almost formless. (The music is, of course, feverishly dramatic in the one sense, and with clear dramatic form in the other). Erwartung is exactly what it purports to be, an expressionist melodrama; it does have a dramatic incident; and, however absurd and revolting, its language is an interior monologue of "expectation." As expression, it would probably gain considerably in the theatre. But for all that, it is dramatically static. What, then, was Schoenberg aiming at? In my opinion, not at drama as we know it at all, but at a kind of spectacle, a visual dimension, merely, suggested by music. Moses and Aaron suggests cinematic collaboration; Die Glückliche Hand demands a co-ordination of lighting and music; but neither these nor Erwartung creates any dramatic interest. (Let me say that the Ode to Napoleon is the ideal Schoenberg "opera"; overture, recitatives, arias, etc. — all operatic forms though condensed and telescoped—and a real dramatic structure; it is a commentary on an opera in the form of an opera. Erwartung is also a commentary on a music drama with the drama assumed in a soliloquy. The difference is that Schoenberg has not yet accepted the assumption.)

LET there be no confusion between Schoenberg's intentions and the Wozzeck of Alban Berg. Wozzeck ought never to be played in concert; it begins and ends on the stage according to the classical laws of tragedy. Schoenberg's 1 Act opera Von Heute Auf Morgen is again an opera in disguise; if it weren't for the failure of its libretto it might be taken as a great parody of opera-buffa. It should be performed in concert — and was by Schoenberg himself in Berlin — because one can concentrate on this most wonderfully proportioned, musically perfect score.

Since they have been mentioned, let us say a little more about Die Jacobsleiter and Moses and Aaron. The first is an oratorio, the second a Biblical opera. Die Jacobsleiter is no more than a torso. Moses und Aaron is complete but for the last scene (the 2nd Act was performed in 1951, in Germany, Italy and England, as the Dance Round the Golden Calf). The two, together with Der Biblische Weg contain Schoenberg's curious philosophical beliefs — a mixture of wisdom and naivete. The man was so completely creative that he could not just accept the Bible, he had to arrive at it in his own way, though he uses exactly the same Biblical figures and symbols. Moses and Aaron is a search for spirit, the role of the spirit, spirituality. Its polemic between Moses-spirit and Aaron-mind, between Moses-thought and Aaron-word, would have amused Kierkegaard, but whereas the author of Fear and Trembling would have clothed these concepts for a vividly real struggle, Schoenberg only succeeds in keeping them too conscious symbols. Moses as spirit is destined to seek and to see the Promised Land, but he can never enter it. Boulez and the younger generation of dodecaphonic composers would perhaps interpret this as a symbol of Schoenberg himself, whom, they say, discovered the tone-row and the 12-tone technique, but failed to realize the new forms his discovery implied. For me it merely symbolizes his most searching mind, that it attained unanswerable questions, spiritual probings that could not, like Kafka's quest stories, and according to their nature, be humanly complete.

Musically, without Die Jacobsleiter, Schoenberg's whole evolution from Pierrot Lunaire (1912) to the serial technique used in works from 1922 onwards, remains a mystery. In 1944 he made an effort to revise and complete it, but the abandoned threads were too far from his present mind. One has only to compare the first page of the 1917 version with the same page revised in order to see how hopeless the task was. The original begins with a 6-tone ostinato in the cellos, repeated for 6 bars. The harmony above supplies 6 more tones to form a primitive 12-tone row. The revised version changes the ostinato figure so that 8 tones occur in a row that hints of the permutation that was to become so important. Also, the harmony above arrives at a 12-tone row much more quickly. Obviously Die Jacobsleiter could not be revised according to Schoenberg's later practice. He had gone too far from it musically, and his later concentrated style had left no place for a work of such vast proportions.

It is different with Moses and Aaron. As the last work of his European years, it is the longest 12-tone work, culminating the classical 12-tone period which began in 1923. The Dance Round The Golden Calf, which I heard in Rome last winter, and which is published in score form, will remain one of Schoenberg's greatest works.

ERWARTUNG was written, incredibly, in 3 weeks of 1909. It was not performed until 1924, however, when Wozzeck, which is supposed to be heavily in its debt, had been finished for four years. Berg knew Erwartung, of course, but just what relationship exists, if any, between specific passages in the two, is difficult to determine. The beginning of the stabbing scene in Wozzeck reminds us of bars 382-385 in Erwartung, for instance, but what is the significance of that? It is far more interesting to discover bits of Schoenberg's own later self in this score. At bar 331 of Erwartung, for example, there is a melody for piccolo and celesta, which, in its close chromatic tessitura and delicate orchestral setting—well-spaced clarinet, viola, harp, and contra-bassoon — suggests the opening of the exquisite 4th variation of Schoenberg's masterpiece, the Variations for Orchestra, op. 31. The concertante style, the detail, the richness and rapidity with which so many things happen, withal, the transparent exoticism, are features of Schoenberg's orchestra. Such magic as takes place in bars 15-20 of Erwartung is surpassed only by the last adagio in the same orchestra variations.

Schoenberg's orchestra owes only its size to Mahler and Strauss. But this size merely extends the possibilities of chamber music for Schoenberg; its detail, however minute, is structural. The "sound" is changing as fast as the harmony, which, for 1909 is changing quickly indeed, and your eyes dart all over the score. Schoenberg's music has a greater range of highs and lows than any other for which he has tapped new resources such as combining tuba and harp in their extreme low registers. There is a remarkable passage (bars 420-423) for 2 piccolos trilling a third apart, an octave above violins playing the same notes staccato and col legno, that has a hair-raising effect. It is an exotic orchestra, as we have said—how else can a page such as that following the words "ich suchte" be described—but it has nothing to do with the exoticism of the Russians, or of post-Wagnerism.

Harmonically, the first pages will seem to be chaotically free, a succession of chromatic chords, strange but not 'dissonant.' It is a harmony still built of piled-up thirds, but it begets lines and takes every opportunity to be contrapuntal. It is, in fact, contrapuntal in conception, as a third or fourth hearing will show. Melodically, its richness seems fragmentary and therefore bewildering. It coheres more and more with repeated hearings.

It is not quite fair to call this a record review and wait this long to say that I find Miss Dow's voice lacking in Gemütlichkeit, though her pitches are generally good and Mitropoulos, obviously, has not had enough rehearsal time to bring many passages out of the haze. However, it seems captious to criticize an effort that has made this music available. Let us hope that Mitropoulos will do Die Glückliche Hand next season. ●

SUMMER SEASON AT STRATFORD

Joan Littlefield writes from London on what was shown this year and what to expect next season

THE 93rd season of plays at the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre at Stratford-upon-Avon is, as usual, attracting visitors from all over the world. In the first twenty weeks, 220,000 people had paid for admission, and it is estimated that when the season ends on November 1, this figure will have risen to approximately 350,000.

Even more than in previous years, the accent is on production. Anthony Quayle, the theatre's director, boldly employs new designers and modern stage directors, and the result is a feast for the eye which pleases, and often astonishes, overseas visitors.

Only four of the five plays which make up this year's repertory are by Shakespeare. The fifth, Volpone, by a contemporary, Ben Jonson, is rarely performed, perhaps because its conglomeration of villains do not attract actors who like to play "sympathetic" parts. At Stratford, the production, by George Devine, is of the utmost magnificence. All the resources of the theatre's mobile stage are used to lend richness and pageantry to Jonson's Venetian tale of rogues and parasites; streets and palaces rise and sink, canals and gondolas slide neatly into place, and the use of color is bold and imaginative. Malcolm Pride, the 22-year-old designer, only recently finished his training at the Old Vic School.

Rogues Are Brought To Life

Sir Ralph Richardson, well-known to filmgoers, who leads the company this year, plays Jonson's evil Volpone the Fox with considerable gusto, though he lacks the satanic quality inherent in the character. Mosca the Fly, his fawning but ambitious parasite, is excellently played by Anthony Quayle. With stooped shoulders, servile hands and watchful half-veiled eyes, he is glib, loquacious and nimble. The supporting company brings the rest of Jonson's Rogues' Gallery vividly to life.

Of the four Shakespeare plays, the most successful is As You Like It, the most controversial Macbeth. The director, Glen Byam Shaw, has chosen to present As You Like It in Jacobean dress and to show the Forest of Arden first in winter. This makes an excellent contrast to the lovely spring settings of the latter half of the play. He has been well served by the designers who call themselves Motley, whose backcloths and drop curtains are delightful.

Margaret Leighton, a young actress of increasing power, plays Rosalind as a graceful teenager, many fathoms deep in love — a charming performance of youthful lyricism. Her Orlando, Laurence Harvey, has something of the college boy about him, while the Irish actress Siobhan McKenna gives more vitality than usual to Celia. The most distinguished performance comes from a newcomer to Stratford, Michael Hordern, who endows the melancholy Jacques with new life and even makes "All the World's a Stage" sound fresh.

"Macbeth" A Timeless Conflict

Macbeth is another matter. John Gielgud, who played the title role in London ten years ago, has directed the play and is responsible for the settings in conjunction with Michael Northen. A young Australian, Kenneth Rowell, has devised some unusual costumes.

Overture to Fidelio.....Beethoven
Also Sprach Zarathustra.....Strauss
Excerpts from Boris Godunoff.....Mussorgsky

By OLIN DOWNS

The first Philharmonic-Symphony Society concert of the season under Dimitri Mitropoulos last night in Carnegie Hall offered a program of exceptional possibilities: the Beethoven "Fidelio" overture; Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which is in some respects his most exceptional score, and excerpts from Mussorgsky's opera "Boris Godunoff," done with the assistance of the Schola Cantorum chorus and soloists of distinction in concert form.

As it turned out the music from "Boris" made the impression of the evening. The passages selected were the Coronation scene of the Prologue; the monologue of Boris, including the dialogue with Schouisky and the scene of the chiming clock of the second act; the Polonaise of the Polish act and the death of Boris from the final act. The program announced the performance of both scenes of the last act, but that of the Kromy Forest was omitted last night. The act will be given complete at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert Sunday afternoon.

One was impressed last night by the fact that "Boris Godunoff," with its wealth of magnificent music, nevertheless needs, as few operas do, the panoply of the stage for its communication. One would think that the grand coronation scene, with its choral masses and bell effects and towering ensembles, would carry completely on the concert stage. But Mussorgsky's sense of scene and movement and theatrical spectacle is so much a part of his music that the coronation episode was one of the less impressive passages on this occasion, capably as it was performed. Or was it that the performance lacked something of the sweep and grandeur of the amazing score?

George London sang the Boris role in his own English translation of the Russian text, and sang with nobility and high intelligence. It is a gigantic part, vocally and histrionically, and the demands of vocal sonority and variety of color are as tremendous as the great dramatic line of the opera. In John McCollum, the Shouishky, there was a tenor of signal ability and of a voice precisely the color for the part of that malignant plotter.

The Polonaise, with the superb effects of the chorus over the swinging rhythms of the orchestra, was an exciting moment. It was the final scene which, in all expressive details, overwhelmed us with its poignancy. But it cannot be said that Mr. Mitropoulos, a dramatic conductor by nature, and the uncomparable interpreter of "Wozzeck" and other modern operas, is best fitted in his style to the grand stride and opulence of Mussorgsky's art.

These were highlights of the evening. The performance of Beethoven's overture was mannered and over-sophisticated. It is a very simple overture, and it is the one appropriate prelude to the opening scenes of the opera "Fidelio." The "Leonore" overtures, composed with similar purpose, are symphonic poems that, especially in the instance of "Leonore No. 3," exceed the opera itself in imagination and structural power. The "Fidelio" overture, in much lighter vein, is indeed an Italianate piece in the Cherubini style, and had best, surely, be treated in that spirit.

The performance of "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was curiously bad. In an earlier season Mr. Mitropoulos, as memory serves us, did it much better. It sometimes happens that too much work, or too much reflection over a score, can injure the perspective of the interpretation. The piece last night was fussy, episodic. The magnificent coloring of Strauss' orchestration became gray and thick, poorly balanced, and the treatment of the themes episodic. The incandescent imagination that can make of this score—strangely compounded of marble and clay—a Dionysian ecstacy was almost completely lacking. Nor was it a revelation of Strauss' rhetorical intent to omit from the overwhelming climax the clanging tones of the great bell that signalizes Zarathustra's midnight chant.

But Strauss' sweep and Strauss' imagery are not, apparently, for Mr. Mitropoulos. One listened to him struggling last night with the Straussian ideas, forms, ochestral visions, doing his sincere best to be convinced by them and in turn to be convincing, and was merely certain that Mr. Mitropoulos didn't believe a word of it! The interpreter must be stirred beyond himself by dithyrambic poetry and vision of this score if he is to communicate its true greatness to his audience.

London as Boris

THE opening of the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts last night in Carnegie Hall was remarkable chiefly for the singing of George London in selected scenes from Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunov." The orchestra played well but not supremely so, about as usual, in fact. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted with his customary precisions and ecstasies. The Schola Cantorum was middling effective. Nothing but the singing of George London was in any way different from what we are used to hearing at these concerts.

That singing, as a matter of fact, was well above what we are accustomed to hear in any circumstance. So fine a bass voice handled with such art, so great a gift for drama and so subtle a care for diction have not been met up with by this observer since the death of Challapin. The sound is handsome, as indeed is also the person. The expressive projection is huge. The intensity is complete and controlled. The George London performance resembles surprisingly that of Orson Welles, if a singer's work can be imagined to resemble at all an actor's. It has the same ease and the same high voltage, and the bass timbres of both voices have a large admixture of brilliance from the presence of the upper partials. Nothing hollow, nothing mealy damps their ring.

The passages presented from "Boris Godunov" included the Coronation Scene, the monologue of Boris from Act II, his duet with Shuisky (sung with fine verbal clarity by Michael Rhodes), the Clock Scene, the Polonaise and the whole of Act IV. This listener could have taken more, since the work is lovely music, and the performance was full of solid values throughout. So was that of Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which had preceded; but the music of this piece is relatively commonplace. It did seem an intrusion beside the Moussorgsky. So did Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture (opus 72), which we all know quite well enough. Both could, I am sure, have been spared to the advantage of a whole evening with "Boris."

Operatic presentations in concert form are an especial gift of Mr. Mitropoulos. He reads their music with great care, and he animates their drama so powerfully as to make one forget that one is not in a theater. Actually the scenic paraphernalia of theaters seems cumbersome by comparison and destructive of illusion rather than a stimulant, when one goes from these admirable concert renditions to the opera house. Berg's "Wozzack," Strauss's "Elektra" and Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnol," heard at the City Center and Metropolitan Opera houses after a Philharmonic success, have suffered from their costumes and mounting. Later this season we shall hear George London at the Metropolitan in "Boris Godunov." If he is as impressive there as he was last night, the occasion will be gala.

'Boris' Excerpts Highlight N. Y. Philharmonic Program

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under its musical director, Dimitri Mitropoulos, launched its 111th season at Carnegie Hall last night. The ambitious opening program included Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture; the tome poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss, and extensive excerpts from Moussorgsky's opera "Boris Godounoff."

It was "Boris" that stole the show, and rightfully so. For Mr. Mitropoulos has a magic way with opera in concert form, and his traversal of the coronation scene, Boris' monologue, the duet with Shouisky and the "clock"—or "Hallucination"—scene from Act II, the Polonaise from Act III, and the entire final scene of Act IV was masterful and deeply moving. It was evident that he had spent long hours fusing his forces together and molding a powerful interpretation.

Singers Well Chosen

He was also wise in his choice of singers—George London in the title role, John McCollum as Shouisky, Michael Rhodes as Pimen, Whitfield Lloyd in the small part of the Czarevitch Feodor, and the Schola Cantorum, under the direction of Hugh Ross. The second Rimsky-Korsakoff edition of the score was used, and the work was sung in the English translation of Edward Agate, though Mr. London made his own translation of Boris' part.

It was Mr. London who dominated the entire performance. His delivery of Boris' music was exceptionally penetrating, powerfully dramatic, cleanly enunciated and always in the proper vein. It made us the more anxious to hear him sing the entire opera at the Metropolitan later this season. He was every inch a Czar, and his commanding style even had a certain Slavic quality.

Competent Support

Though Messrs. McCollum and Rhodes, with their lighter-textured voices, were overshadowed by Mr. London, this was as it should have been, and they carried off their parts most competently. It took the chorus a little while to warm to its task, but by the time it reached the Polonaise, its tone had become full and its attacks firm. The orchestra was in superb form throughout.

One didn't have to be told that most of the rehearsal time had been devoted to "Boris." The opening "Fidelio" overture was played with ample vigor, but toward the end seemed to be too hard-driven. And it was rather unfair to everyone concerned to program the Strauss tone poem. It made the program too heavy; and besides, it is a most complex work that must be rehearsed with an orchestra and conductor in mid-season form. There were many missing and erroneous notes last night, while in his attempt to bring out the inadequately prepared inner voices, Mr. Mitropoulos obscured the forest with the trees.

Philharmonic 'Godounoff' Constantly Absorbing

By ROBERT COLEMAN

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York repeated the concert version of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. This impressive novelty had been chosen by conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos to open the august organization's 111th session earlier in the week.

Since coming to the Philharmonic-Symphony, Mitropoulos has featured several concert versions of operas, including "Wozzeck," "Elektra" and "L'Heure Espagnol." And these have been, in our opinion, superior to full-dress productions later given at the Met and the City Center. The gifted batoneer is something of a prophet. He predicts, and makes, trends.

Having heard the incomparable Chaliapin as Boris, we cannot but be captious when others essay the role. His power of projection was tremendous. His voice was superbly suited to the character. He was Boris. But we cannot think of any young artist today who could lend such distinction to the demanding part as George London. He has a fine bass-baritone, his acting ability is superior to that of most singers, and he has the stature for the assignment.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's arrangement was used and the libretto was partly London's translation and partly that by Edward Agate. The condensed version includes the coronation scene, monologue of Boris, duet with Shuisky, the clock scene, Polonaise and the entire fourth act. This is such magnificendt music that we only wish Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" had been kept for another program, giving more time for Moussorgsky on this one.

Michael Rhodes, as Brother Pimen, displayed an excellent lyric baritone. It has resonance and carries beautifully. His phrasing, too, is commendable. You might jot Rhodes down in your reference book for the future. He is most promising. John McCollum used an admirable light tenor and good diction to advantage as Shuisky. Witfield Lloyd had little pportunity as Feodor to make much of an impression on the audience.

The Schola Cantorum ably complemented the orchestra and guest artists, though we have heard this group in better form on other occasions.

The Philharmonic-Symphony is always a delight to hear. It has become a cherished and indispensable institution. We should not take it for granted. We should support it to the hilt, for in these days it is the millions of music lovers rather than the few philanthropists who make the existence of such organizations possible. The philanthropists have to give most of their spare change nowadays to the tax collector.

When the board of directors signed Mitropoulos, they insured the Philharmonic-Symphony's high standards. He has vision and ability. He knows how to design interesting programs. If his concert version of "Boris Godounoff" was not exactly inspired, it was intelligent and constantly absorbing. Mitropoulos and London gave us a most stimulating and stirring afternoon.

Philharmonic Opens Season With 'Boris'

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

The New York Philharmonic Symphony opened its 111th season last night with a distinguished but unconventional program that was heard by the dressiest audience to decorate Carnegie Hall so far this season.

Moussorgsky's "Borris Godoynoff" requires a dramatic spectacle more than the Strauss "Electra" and the Berg "Wozzeck," works which Dimitri Mitropoulos, the orchestra's electrified musical director, conducted so brilliantly in former seasons. Nonetheless, the excerpts presented last night with George London, bass-baritone as major soloist, had compelling sections of orchestral magnificence and histrionic fervor, and Mitropoulos gave no less of himself than he had to the other concert-version operas. Yet there was not the consistent excitement which "Wozzeck" and "Electra" engendered. Musically "Boris" can't sustain itself in the powerful manner of these aforementioned works. Though its stark folk character certainly is an inspired expression of the Russian people, its long sections of recitative are frequently unbolstered by a complimentary orchestral fabric in the manner of some operatic works. And therefore for this and other reasons it needs its original medium more than certain other music-dramas. I found myself fervently wishing to see "Boris" once again in the opera house, incidentally, good illustration that Mitropoulos' decision to perform the work in this manner, despite its limitations, should be commended.

London Interprets Well

The total impression suffered too from the fact that despite London's intense and moving portrayal and despite his excellent enunciation of the English text, his voice is essentially too light for the role.

Moussorgsky wrote it for a bass, not a bass-baritone, Londons' timbre. One felt a lack of depth, even taking into consideration the orchestra's being on stage instead of in the pit.

John McCollum's Shuisky was an intelligent portrayal but his voice was also too lyric for this sinister conniving character who fiendishly stimulates the guilty Czar's abberations.

Together with the splendid job done by the orchestra must be mentioned the remarkably fine singing of the Schola cantorum in the choral portions. There was a stirring incisiveness which made their sections among the most impressive of the evening.

The other major work on the program was Strauss' tone poem, "thus spake Zarathustra" and never before has it seemed that the opening sections employing the brass so marvelously had sounded so lustrous or effulgent. Beethoven's overture to Fidelio in E Major, Op. 72, opened the program.

Philharmonic Opens Season With 'Boris Godounoff'

By ALBERT J. ELIAS

For the opening of its 111th season on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, the N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony busied itself for the most part with an abridged concert version in English of Modest Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff." Genuine vivacity and power marked much of this work, as conducted by the easily dramatic and graceful Dimitri Mitropoulos and as sung by the remarkably sonorous, clear and direct baritone, George London, in the title role. Here was nobility of voice and vocal style blending with a conducting style elegant in the ways of producing gripping tension.

These moments were enough to make me enormously happy that the Philharmonic's season was on. For while splendid orchestras may be worshipped as they come and go on their visits here, our own community's boys are so much more easy to love. And given the slightest encouragement from their work, we will, I think, show how rewarding we think they are—and, as the other evening, an audience will clap noisily and cheer lustily the orchestra, its conductor and soloists.

ELIAS

Presented minus the scenery and costumes and pomp of the stage spectacle, the Moussorgsky opera tried hard to come across, failed in many parts in being more than a gloomy narrative for baritone interspersed with jubilant shouts from the chorus or florid song from the tenor soloist. But the final scene presented the other evening, the death of Boris, was tremendous.

The Death Scene found Mr. London, although he had to stand around dressed in a tuxedo and with only a couple of feet to move about in, exerting all his vocal and dramatic powers. He has, first of all, just enough touch of humility to make Boris human, and enough dignity, of course, to make him imposing. Bearing a striking resemblance to Orson Welles, his looks are especially suited to the brooding and the terror and the sorrow of the part. And so in the finale, as Mr. Mitropoulos was getting every ounce of high-strung tension from the violins and the chorus, Mr. London, singing with vigor, serenity and beauty but simply standing there and letting his head slowly droop more and more as Boris died, made this a moving, thrilling moment. The most blase, having heard Mr. London sing with such richness, sonority and purity and act with such authority, could not but help be keen about seeing him later this season on the Metropolitan stage in the role of Boris.

John McCollum, tenor, sang brightly and fervently his small part, the Schola Cantorum, sang with general luminosity and force, although it was not equipped to project the English text with clarity. At least the translation Mr. London had made for himelf was clear and serviceable, but no English prose sailing across the footlights embedded in the luscious Slavonic sonorities and whisked about by Russian folk airs and projected, usually, by masses of choruses dressed to simulate peasants, will make you think of Russia.

The equal par with the voice that the orchestra has in "Boris" made the work a fine vehicle for the Philharmonic and Mr. Mitropoulos. Opening the program was Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra," the surging paen to Nietzsche's conception of Superman—lachrymose and schmalzy, stormy and serene, magnificent in its orchestration, pretentions and final lack of meaning. They were ample proof that the state of the orchestra and conductor was fine, that everyone was in his place—the only new wrinkle being a young lady seated at the organ.

Philharmonic's 111th Season:

London's Singing Gives Stature to Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

GEORGE LONDON launched the Philharmonic-Symphony on its 111th season in Carnegie Hall last night. Everything that preceded his singing in the excerpts from Moussorgsky's opera "Boris Godounoff" might be considered a prologue. With "Boris" the concert acquired stature.

Dimitri Mitropoulos had designed a curious program. It began with Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and included Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra." Since the performances of these proved too studied ,it remained for London to supply the dynamic element.

The orchestra played tensely, as though caught up short by the precision Mitropoulos asked. The result was a cryptic Beethoven and a dehydrated Strauss.

For that matter Mitropoulous' approach to Moussorgsky lacked the thrust to release the full glory of the "Boris" score. Preoccupied with detail, he appeared to overlook the nature of the pieces as a whole.

Held Spellbound

London held the audience spellbound. The richness of his voice and the communicative power of his characterization combined into a forceful performance. Years will enrich it, but last night it already had distinction. Quality shone through the beauty of his voice, his musicianship, and his projection of the role.

The remainder of the cast gave a fine account of itself. John McCollum, especially, proved himself a first-class musician and interpreter as Prince Shuisky. Here is a tenor worth noting. Michael Rhodes sang his brief role of Pimen well. Whitfield Lloyd sang her still briefer part of Feodor creditably. The Schola Cantorum, carefully prepared by Hugh Ross and Miguel Sandoval, could have profited by more body of sound and clearer diction.

Sung in English, the text came through indistinctly. London could be understood better than the others with McCollum doing almost as well. London sang his own translation; Edward Agate supplied the remainder of the text.

In general the concert moved too deliberately and too solemnly. With the orchestra so keyed to his every demand, the playing sounded more inhibited than it should have. As usual Mitropoulos showed his masterful musicianship but curbed the natural expressivity of the music.

Philharmonic Opens With Met Preview

By ROBERT BAGER.

The Philharmonic-Symphony inaugurated its 1952-53 season last night in Carnegie Hall with a preview, strangely enough, of what we may expect from one particular element of the forthcoming Metropolitan "Boris Godunoff." That element was the singing of George London, the future Czar, who produced the excitements of the evening virtually all by himself.

The program, after such familiars as the Beethoven "Fidelio" Overture and the Richard Strauss "Zarathustra" tone poem, went on to the elegances and the exclusive charms of the occasion—a sheaf of scenes from Moussorgsky's masterpiece. This was done in the Rimsky-Korsakoff version, sung in English with Mr. London as Boris; Michael Rhodes, as Pimen; John McCollum, as Shuisky, and Whitefield Lloyd, as Feodor.

Robust Voice.

The young Mr. London's well-made, robust voice, his virile manner, the dramatic power in the delivery of the text, the remarkable diction, his good looks, brought the tragic monarch all too convincingly before us. This, too, without stage trappings, in a concert hall! And we have yet to hear him in the stage role itself.

He is a musician's musician—singer or no singer. He omitted no musical or dramatic nuance in the brilliant achievement. Abetted by an able Shuisky in Mr. McCollum, his duet with this Prince of operaticunderminers was a treasure. And in his opening Monologue, in the Clock and the Farewell and Death scenes, he rose to stirring heights of communication.

Mystery Displayed.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra were far better in the Moussorgsky than they had been in the previous music, which emerged in a stilted manner, lacking continuity and, sometimes, quite apathetically. Once again the Greek maestro showed his mastery of an operatic score, even though there were times when the accents could have been more biting, closer to the earthy and barbaric.

The singing of the others was adequate. But the Schola chorus—perhaps, because it was spread in a semi-circle about the stage, rather than pose-massed—was not effective in the big moments.

The evening was definitely Mr. London's, you see, and how eagerly one does look forward to the Met's revival of "Boris!"

Philharmonic at Carnegie:

Mitropoulos Draws Raves

By MILES KASTENDIECK

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS pursued his individualistic way with the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. His program provided an unusual combination of works. His interpretations revealed the reflections of his unique musical thought. As a whole the concert created a curious state of mind in the listener.

The program began with Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D as orchestrated by Respighi, featured Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto, and ended with excerpts from Berlioz's "Dramatic Symphony, Romeo and Juliet." Its highlights were Zino Francescatti's playing of the Prokofieff and Mitropoulos' fresh treatment of the Berlioz.

Francescatti showed due apprecitaion of Prokofieff's melodic revelations in this concerto. Through beauty of tone he brought out their romantic appeal. Fiddling expertly, he coped suffessfuly with Prokofieff's figuration.

All his devout attention to bringing out the best in the work did not, however, make the music wholly endearing. It might have proved more fascinating with a little more bite in the orchestral playing.

The Berlioz found conductor and orchestra in their best interpretation of the season to date. They performed with fervor almost to the point of abandon. The sensitivity and the response of the players conveyed fully the individuality of Mitropoulos' insight into this music.

Some shifts in accent as in the scherzo, and emphasis of phrases as in the "Love Scene," marked a provocative approach to the score.

Between Respighi and Mitropoulos, the Bach became the victim of inflation. As a vehicle for virtuosity, it created little stir. Fortunately there was the Berlioz to bring the concert up to par.

London Scores In Phil-Symph Concert 'Boris'

By DOUGLAS WATT

A concert version, in English, of excerpts from Mussorgsky's operatic masterpiece, "Boris Godunov," was the main event last night as the Philharmonic-Symphony opened its 111th season at Carnegie Hall.

With Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting : d the Met's spectacular new bass-baritone, George London, on hand to sing the title part, there were both care and fireworks in the presentation.

This swift condensation of the opera opened with the Coronation Scene, went on to Boris' Monologue, his duet with Shuisky and the Clock Scene (all from Act Two), continued with the third-act Polonaise and ended with the complete fourth act, including Boris' Farewell and Death Scene.

London, who used a combination of his own translation and the one by Edward Agate, sang richly, powerfully and with excellent enunciation. Every word was clear, except at those moments when the power of the orchestra overwhelmed his voice.

Dramatic, Too.

In addition to singing superbly, London created a fairly convincing picture of the brooding monarch by thrusting out his lower lip, frowning heavily and gesticulating with troubled deliberation. Nevertheless, although his performance was masterly and commanding, both vocally and dramatically, it did not seem exactly inspired. It was thoughtful and beautifully executed, but scarcely incandescent. Maybe it will seem that way when the Met revives "Boris" in English this coming season; if, that is, London is slated for the lead, as well he might be.

John McCollum, the owner of a fine light tenor voice, made a first-rate Shuisky. He, too, sang expressively and clearly. Michael Rhodes, a lyric baritone, gave a fairly good account of Pimen's Narrative and a soprano named Whitfield Lloyd had a few lines to sing as the son, Feodor.

The large chorus of the Schola Cantorum sang the magnificent choral music with less vitality than the occasion demanded. The Rimsky-Korsakov orchestration was used.

During the first half, the orchestra was heard in Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture and Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra." The hall was filled.

Mitropoulos' Magic Is Highlight of Concert

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Three virtuosos worked towards beautiful harmony in Prokofieff's G minor violin concerto in Carnegie Hall last night.

The first of them was the actual soloist of the evening—Zino Francescatti. The second was the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, which rose to the stature of a collective soloist in accompanying Mr. Francescatti.

Third, and greatest of the three, was the conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos, whose power of keeping soloist, orchestra and music in tense and vibrant co-ordination was little short of miraculous.

Throb of Excitement.

Next to Arturo Toscanini—and perhaps not always next—I put this earnest and dedicated man who casts such artistic magic over one of the city's proudest possessions. Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic have grown into a single entity.

The Prokofieff was strong and lucid all the way. There was heaving drama in places, brilliant acrobatics here and there, and always the living throb of excitement, as if Mr. Mitropoulos had staked his name on every note.

Mr. Francescatti boasts a refined and thorough culture of the bow. The technique fitted the concerto like a glove and so did the style. If one looked for a bigger and broader style one looked for it in the wrong concerto, and perhaps from the wrong violinist.

Basic Classicism.

Just as exciting, though in different ways, were the reading of Bach's D major prelude and fugue (in Respighi's warm and voluminous arrangement) and five excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

The Bach number showed the basic classicism of Mr. Mitropoulos —the classicism that is firm and solid, grounded in a massive experience of music and enlivened by a richly modern outlook.

I shall always remember the Berlioz reading for its moonlit poetry and glow and the almost startling transparence of tone that Mr. Mitropoulos drew from the orchestra. It was a reading from life, tragic and romantic in feeling and haunting in beauty.

SYMPHONY OFFERS 'ROMEO' EXCERPTS

Philharmonic Plays Berlioz Work—Francescatti Gives Concerto by Prokofieff

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Zino Francescatti violinist. At Carnegie Hall.
Prelude and Fugue in D.....Bach-Respighi
Violin Concerto No. 2 in G minor....Prokofieff
Excerpts from Romeo and Juliet.....Berlioz

By OLIN DOWNES

The climax of the Philharmonic-Symphony concert last night in Carnegie Hall came with the playing of the five movements from "Romeo and Juliet," the "dramatic symphony" of Hector Berlioz. This was the most sensitive and poetical playing of the orchestra—which, indeed, could not have found in the other scores of the evening the opportunity to interpret music with such fineness, intensity and exquisiteness of feeling.

For Berlioz, on this occasion, towered high above the other composers on the program—if we admit that the grandiose Mussolini orchestration of Bach's D major organ prelude and fugue represents a composer who turns Bach to his own uses; and also if one still reckons the Prokofieff G minor violin concerto, played superbly by Zino Francescatti, as one of that composer's most effective pieces. Is not this lively and tuneful concerto beginning to fade? Was it not the performance rather than the work which instigated long and hearty applause? One must say that Berlioz towered far above every other composer on the program and that Mr. Mitropoulos appeared to find his highest inspiration in this music.

Gave More Than Usual

Mr. Mitropoulos gave the audience more of the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony than is customary. The passages performed were the instrumental introduction; the scene of Romeo in the garden and the sounds of the fete in the house of the Capulets; the Love Scene; the "Queen Mab" Scherzo and Romeo's Death. None of the choral passages or vocal solos were heard, which was no particular deprivation, for the vocal writing is the weakest part of a long score. It is the instruments that sing, with an eloquence that Berlioz never discovered for singers. But even as it was last night, even with instrumental excerpts alone, there was too much for the best advantage of the "symphony."

It was a commendable thing to give the audience a rare opportunity to hear the music of "Romeo's Death," but it cannot be said that this passage equals in value the music of the three familiar middle movements. They must always rank as among the finest pages Berlioz ever produced. And the best movement to end with is the "Queen Mab" Scherzo, however conventional such an arrangement may be. The movement that followed it last night, and ended the program is anti-climactic. Not all of the earnestness and devotion with which Mr. Mitropoulos invested its performance could alter that fact.

Otherwise this part of the evening represented a most moving communication of the orchestra.

Ended in Thunderous Note

We do not say as much for the uproarious Respighi transcription, in which everyone seemed to be having a fine time playing swiftly, loudly and confidently, ending the piece, of course, with one of those thunderous cadences which always serves handsomely for an effect. The orchestra played expertly, and Mr. Mitropoulos conducted with complete authority. But we like our Bach when he addresses us with his customary directness and simplicity and when his voice, coming from the instruments, sounds less strident, pretentious and bombastic.

It is curious today to realize that less than twenty years ago the Prokofieff G minor violin concerto was looked at askance by the more conservative. It has quickly emerged from that stage, and become a favorite piece with modern-minded virtuosos. It now gives the impression of a work too crowded with detail and over-industrious from beginning to end, and not as significant as much other of this composer's music.

Meanwhile, Mr. Franscescatti played the work as to the manor born, realizing its rythmical as well as its melodic and structural qualities; giving an interpretation which one believes would highly have gratified the composer had he been present.

Dimitri Mitropoulos featured excerpts from Moussorgsky's opera "Boris Godounoff" for the opening Philharmonic-Symphony concert. George London sang the title role so impressively that his performance dominated the evening. His voice was rich, his characterization powerful, and his musicianship exemplary. While he has yet to grow into the fullness of the role, he sings it even now with distinction. John McCollum further enhanced the performance by singing Prince Shuisky. The Schola Cantorum sang the choruses. The text was delivered, not too distinctly, in English.

Mr. Mitropoulos handled this concert version of opera in his characteristically masterful way. The orchestra, nevertheless, sounded somewhat inhibited; for the full glory of Moussorgsky's music remained unrealized. The same might be said for the conducting of Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture and Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra," wherein attention to detail tended to restrict expressivity.

Mitropoulos Conducts; Francescatti Is Soloist

By PAUL AFFELDER

Dimitri Mitropoulos assembled an interesting and varied program to begin the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra's second week of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. It comprised the Bach Prelude and Fugue in D Major, in Ottorino Respighi's orchestral transcription; the Prokofieff Violin Concerto No. 2 in G Minor, with Zino Francescatti as soloist, and orchestral excerpts from Berlioz' dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet."

Perhaps the all-around best performance of the evening was that of the poorest music—namely, the Bach Prelude and Fugue. Let us hasten to say that we find nothing wrong with Bach's original work as he conceived it for the organ; it is a magnificent showpiece. Nor do we object to good orchestral arrangements of Bach's music; properly treated, they can be absolutely thrilling.

But Respighi's "Orchestral Interpretation," as he dared to call it, is rough and bombastic, an independent study in orchestral sound, bearing absolutely no relation to the original organ work. Nevertheless, conductor and players did a brilliant job, particularly in the fugue, giving the music glitter and getting things off to a bright start.

That brilliance, blended with sweetness and suavity of tone and a flawless technique, was again displayed by Mr. Francescatti, whose interpretation of the lyrical Prokofieff Concerto was a joy from beginning to end.

Mr. Mitropoulos was with him every bit of the way, matching the violinist note for note. If anything, though, the orchestral accompaniment was too clean, too precise and lacking the necessary flow. This served only to show what weaknesses there are in the concerto—to make it come apart at the seams as it were. But, fortunately, it was the soloist who dominated the performance, and his playing was glorious at all times.

'Romeo and Juliet' Hailed

The really big work of the evening was the "Romeo and Juliet" music. This gigantic symphony for soloists, chorus and orchestra was represented by the introduction; Romeo alone—grand ball and fete at Capulet's house; the love scene, the "Queen Mab" scherzo, and Romeo's death, these comprising most of the purely orchestral portions of the score.

Here it was in the faster, more brilliant moments of the ball scene and Romeo's death that Mr. Mitropoulos and his players were at their best. Elsewhere in this rather uneven work, the conductor seemed to miss the point. He seemed to forget that this is highly romantic music, the work of a fiery, imaginative young man who was stage-struck—not only by Shakespeare but also by the lady who was playing Juliet in a Paris production — the lady whom he ultimately married.

As was the case in the Prokofieff Concerto, Mr. Mitropoulos was inclined to ignore the long-lined phrase in favor of small, relatively unimportant details. Thus, the love scene, which should have overflowed with passionate song, merely plodded along uninterestingly, and the "Queen Mab" scherzo, one of the most ethereal and inspired pieces of its kind in all music, sounded slow and earth-bound.

It was a pleasure, however, to note a decided improvement in the general quality of the orchestral playing over last week's somewhat shaky start.

Violin soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra

Gems From 'Romeo'

INSTRUMENTAL excerpts from Berlioz's dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet" made up the memorable part of last night's Philharmonic concert. A Bach Prelude and Fugue, the "big" D major for organ, orchestrated by Respighi, had begun it with vigor. And Gino Francescatti, playing the solo part in Prokofiev's Second Violin Concerto, had continued it with style. But the Berlioz, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, was the evening's kernel. The Love Scene, the Queen Mab scherzo and parts of Romeo's Death made me forget I was sitting in Carnegie Hall.

This work, which in its entirety takes a whole concert to play and mobilizes three vocal soloists, two mixed vocal quartets and two male choruses as well as the orchestra, is not all of a piece. It contains fine music and banal music. Ten years ago Toscanini gave us all of it, and it was a pleasure then to make its full acquaintance. For last night Mr. Mitropoulos had picked out five orchestral nut meats, and he offered them to us as a single course lasting forty-five minutes. If economy were the cause of the partial portion, one wonders whether so renowned a soloist as Mr. Francescatti had not cost very nearly as much as the full "Romeo" would have done.

Not that the artist was (or ever is) unwelcome. But Prokofiev's Second Violin Concerto, though competently scored and a busy work, is neither a work of very great intrinsic musical interest nor a particularly grateful one for the soloist. One could have wished (and this one did) to hear the great Frenchman another time, if in exchange he could have heard more of the Berlioz "dramatic symphony."

He would have sacrificed, too, with small regret Respighi's Bach transcription. For the skilled Italian orchestrator has misconceived the piece. Both the prelude and the fugue, especially the latter, are dainty works that go very fast and jump around all the time. To score them heavily in evocation of modern full-organ effects is to lose all their humor and half their notes. Even Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic musicians could not keep their textures clean or make their point. This work is rarely played by organists nowadays for a similar reason, which is that modern organs and the modern conception of this work (merely on account of its length) as a gigantic piece are equally incapable of making it sound. It is a joke, a scherzo on a comic theme. Speed and rhythmic clarity are its essence, not volume, not even in the great pedal cadenza with which it ends.

"Romeo and Juliet" made no such fuzzy roar. Its speeds were vertiginous, its colors clean, its harmonies harmonious, its feelings sweet, its dramatic intensities real. Perhaps these orchestral excerpts are more satisfying than the whole piece could ever be. Certainly they are the most perfect parts of it. All the same, once a decade, it would be nice to hear it all.

Martinu Premiere Played by Fournier

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the dynamic conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony, who likes controversial music, conducts it brilliantly, and makes his audiences listen whether they like what they're listening to or not, last night in Carnegie Hall led his ensemble in a program that should have pleased everybody, young, old, conservative or radical.

First, it was short, over by 10:30, next, it had two mellifluous compositions. One, a warhorse, The Brahms Second Symphony, (the best Brahms I have ever heard the Philharmonic's maestro direct,) preceded by a pleasing opening selection from the 18th century—Boccherini's Symphony in A Major.

Between these two, was a New York premiere — Concerto For Cello and Orchestra No. 1 in D Major by the Czechoslovakian composer, presently a New York resident, Bohuslav Martinu. The French cellist, Pierre Fournier, was the soloist, and judging from this performance, he ranks at the very top among soloists on his instrument.

The Martinu piece is exciting, well constructed, emotional music, moving with momentum and lyrical pulse, to and from climaxes, much in the manner of a Yankee-Dodger baseball game or a first-rate mystery thriller. That is, the excitement is the same in the latter two but for different reasons, of course, from Martinu's music.

But this is one source of this composer's strength. He has an elemental force which in his best music never relents from the opening measures to the end and yet contains much melodic beauty. Fournier with his superb equipment made the most of the composition, which, if not profound, remained consistently absorbing.

Opera in the Concert Hall

By VIRGIL THOMSON

OPERATIC excerpts and even whole operas are being successful these days in the concert hall. The phenomenon is not new, of course. Thirty and more years ago large chunks of Wagner were common on the orchestral programs, and so were vocal soloists singing celebrated arias from Italian opera. What is new about today's practice is the choice of operas used. Dimitri Mitropoulos at the Philharmonic and Thomas Scherman at the Little Orchestra Society, instead of giving familiar operas in concert form, give us works that are far from common even in the opera houses and in many cases wholly novel to the public.

In this way the concert repertory is amplified, and the rapidly growing appetite of our public for drama in music is being nourished. The success of certain operatic works at the Philharmonic may even have influenced the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House and the City Center to mount or to revive these later with complete staging. I am thinking in particular of Strauss' "Elektra," Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnole" and Berg's "Wozzeck." In any case, the public has had the advantage of hearing these operas lately in two productions; and the double view has given us all a fuller experience of these complex musical compositions than either performance singly could have done.

Competition for the Opera Houses

THIS double opportunity, however, while most valuable to the public, has not always been of advantage to the opera houses. "Elektra" at the Metropolitan, conducted by Fritz Reiner, suffered in no way from musical comparison with the Philharmonic performances. Nor were the set and costumes unpleasing. On the contrary, the Josef Urban décor for "Elektra" is one of the finer opera sets in existence. If the Metropolitan revival last season did not do wonderful business, it is just possible that the three concert performances given at the Philharmonic the year before plus a published recording, may have satisfied some of the same public interest that they stimulated. Nevertheless, "Elektra" ran to five performances last season, whereas in 1937-'38 it had only three.

This reviewer made a mistake recently in writing that these operas, all three of them, when heard at the Metropolitan and City Center after their Philharmonic successes, "have suffered from their costumes and mounting." They did not suffer from their staging; they suffered in their full theatrical panoply. In all three cases the musical performance had been the subject of much care; and in two cases, "Elektra" and "L'Heure Espagnole," the visual aspects seem to have been happy. (I say "seem," because I did not hear the latter work.) Even the "Wozzeck" visual presentation, which was not much admired last spring, was completely revised this year and has come out, one hears, more becomingly.

Theater's Low Visual Standard

ALL the same, it is not easy to compete, in full stage regalia, with a concert performance by Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic. It is not merely that three of the available audiences have already been partly used up. The fly in the honey pot is that today almost no stage presentation of anything musical is as satisfying to look at as to hear. Musical execution, particularly instrumental execution, is practised in America everywhere at a very high level. Stage direction and decoration, at least for the lyric stage, are less efficient and far less distinguished. The minimum cost of a "physical production," as it is called, is $20,000 at the City Center and $60,000 at the Met. And when you have spent that, what have you got? Scenery and costumes that even at their contemporary best, as in Eugene Berman's "Rigoletto" and "Amahl" and in Rolf Gerard's "Don Carlo," add little to the spectator's illusion. Handsome as they are, they are as much evocations of art history as they are backgrounds for a particular play.

The truth is that spectators nowadays get very little illusion out of elaborate sets and costumes. (Another truth is that contemporary stage directors and choreographers are for the most part pretty inept at dealing with the opera.) It is the duty of our opera houses to modernize opera production, and both our great houses proceed in that direction. But their progress is costly and slow. And meanwhile, no-sets, no-costumes productions work surprisingly well in our concert halls.

Illusion and the "No-Set" Decor

IT IS quite possible that the opera houses themselves may be moving sagaciously in that direction. After all, in the theater illusion is everything. The spectator must believe that a play or an opera is real life. Otherwise he won't weep. And you can often get more tears, more belief with little décor than you can with a lot. I don't see in my mind's eye "Aïda" with no décor, though the Toscanini broadcasts are there to prove me wrong. But "Wozzeck" can do, and does, with very little; and so could Puccini's "La Bohème," not to speak of Mozart's "Magic Flute," which is almost never comfortable in its clothing.

A no-set décor is, of course, a décor all the same. So is the Carnegie Hall stage with one hundred musicians on it dressed in their worker's uniforms and working under a conductor dressed up in the same uniform. There is always a décor. But the most successful ones for not interfering with illusion are not always the most ambitious artistically or the most costly. The City Center Ballets play half their repertory (the more successful half, too) in the sketchiest of curtains and clothes. I suspect that the success of this practice, added to the steady success nowadays of operatic works in standard concert décors, may have a lesson to offer the opera companies. Certainly we would all, I am sure, be willing to sacrifice part of the cumbersome opera presentation routine if by that means we could get to know and love more works.

A Glorious Rediscovery of Berlioz

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

It was during a splendid performance of the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony by the Philharmonic and Dimitri Mitropoulos last week that it suddenly struck me that we are in the midst of a rediscovery of Hector Berlioz.

I realized, too, that we were only a short year away from the 150th anniversary of the birth of the man whom most musicians and concertgoers would agree was the greatest composer ever produced by France.

Whether American conductors have been aware of the approaching anniversary or not, they have been acting as if it has been on their minds for one or two seasons. My own records indicate a vast increase in performances of Berlioz' music.

Movies in Prospect.

Interest has been widespread in writing circles, as witness the monumental two-volume study of Jacques Barzun and the reams of critical reaction it stirred up.

New biographies are under way, and even a movie or two may be expected.

I must admit I was slow in realizing there was a great deal of Berlioz' unperformed music that had every right to a respectable place in the working repertory. There are at least three almost wholly ignored overtures that I would like to hear at least once a season, not to mention one orphaned symphony.

The choral music of Berlioz was another terra incognita to me. I was frankly stunned by the power and beauty of "L'Enfance du Christ" when Thomas Sherman and his Little Orchestra presented it in Town Hall—stunned by what for me was a complete novelty, a confession I made to that stanch Berliozite, B. H. Haggin.

I had never had much interest in the operas of Berlioz, assuming that, while they contained many priceless fragments, they were deadweight as far as the stage went. Now I wonder if the Metropolitan couldn't present one of them with every expectation of success.

Excellent Performances.

Another thought that came to me during the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony was that this "rediscovery" of Berlioz was also due to the increasing excellence of performances of his music. Mr. Mitropoulos' reading of that magnificent symphony was the best propaganda possible for the genius whose memory is enshrined there.

It is possible that the movement back to Berlioz is partly motivated by a growing weariness among conductors and musicians with the endless repetition of the standard classics. A great hunt is on, no doubt, for new or, at any rate, long-forgotten or neglected material.

Just as the 19th century discovered the 18th century Bach, so the 20th century is discovering the 19th century Berlioz. It is comforting to think that a composer like Bela Bartok may be discovered one short century from now.

Music

Symphony Reaches Its Highest Level

By ROBERT BAGAR.

There was life and vigor and abundant meaning in the playing of the Philharmonic-Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos at Carnegie Hall last night. All through a program of music which made varying demands the orchestra was at about its best level so far this season in a purely instrumental concert. A few more such evenings and we shall be shouting huzzahs even before the proceedings begin.

Mr. Mitropoulos, nobly abetted by the Parisian cellist Pierre Fournier, offered a first New York performance of the Martinu Concerto for Cello and Orchestra No. 1, in D major. This work had something of a career with the Spanish cellist Gaspar Cassado. Later, in 1940, according to the composer, the piece was re-orchestrated, revised, and such, and it was in the second of the two versions that we heard it this time.

ere we have jazz-like syncopation, sudden bursts of chordal sounds interspersed with lyrical phrases of a romantic flavor, then quick rhythms and more syncopation. The first hearers, in 1935, must have been struck with its adventurousness, its complexities and departures from tried and true formulae. Strictly speaking, however, the complexities are not nearly that at all, but a variety of attitudes and humors and treatments. The situation is not one to spread confusion, though the listener may be pardoned his slight puzzlement on occasion.

There is a wealth of tenderness in the music. And of that—if you know your Martinu—you would surely expect a proper quota. Very often the music puts forth a dynamic presence. And it holds you, despite moments of seeming indecision.

Generous Applause.

Mr. Fournier and Mr. Mitropoulos, et al., collaborated beautifully in the piece. They all knew where they were going, if some others of us did not altogether know. There was much applause for all concerned at the end of the concerto.

The orchestra, just preceding, had done very good things with the Boccherini Symphony in A major, a work of modest aims, though quite entrancing at times for its intimacy and charm. Following the Martinu was Brahms, the Brahms of the very Brahmsian Second Symphony. And I can say with confidence that the German composer was everywhere present, thanks to the ioidmatic rendering given him by the conductor and his ever-alert musicians.

Philharmonic:

An Excellant Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

MITROPOULOS and the Philharmonic - Symphony playing Brahms might have eclipsed the rest of the program in Carnegie Hall last night. Their obsorbing performance of the Second Symphony did not, however, obscure the impression made by the first New York performance of Martinu's Cello Concerto.

The contemporary work held its own especially with Pierre Fournier as its exponent.

This music has life, its rhythmic vitality and melodic substance give it positive values. Coming upon it unknowingly, a listener might date it after Martinu's settling down in this country because of the syncopation of its first movement.

Interestingly enough, its suggestive American accent antedates his arrival by almost a decade. His innate sense of rhythm must have picked up the echoes of American jazz in Europe. He has handled the syncopation masterfully.

Like Fresh Air

The concerto serves the cellist as artist as well as virtuoso. It abounds in clever orchestration, but also has the passages that do not come off too successfully.

This performance might have further accented the brighter and gayer aspects of the score. Fournier made sure that the romantic stretches were alluring and negotiated the technical sections admirably.

Mitropoulos' way with Brahms is his own. It challenged the listener last night because of the sensitive responsiveness of the orchestra. Some shifts of emphasis of balance, and of shading let fresh air into this familiar music. The performance brought a peculiarly satisfying feeling of newness and of stability at one and the same time.

The program opened with the charming Boccherni Symphony in A, played more pleasantly and crisply than elegantly.

U. S. Debut This Week For Milhaud's 'Columbus'

By HENRI SAUGUET

(Mr. Sauguet is an authority on French music and one of France's leading composers.)

The text of Darius Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb," which Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony will present for the first time in America Thursday through Sunday at Carnegie Hall, is by Paul Claudel. It is an opera in two acts and twenty-seven scenes. The cast numbers almost fifty players, with some of the roles necessitating special interpreters and others performed by solo members of the chorus.

To the chorus itself is confided the most delicate role in the score. Through its comments, exclamations, lamentations and taunts it follows the cast of the drama throughout the action. It is present in each scene, associated with a speaker (who reads the life of the sublime voyager and prepares the action to come), and with the actors. In a note about the staging, at the top of his libretto, Paul Claudel says of his work that "it is like a mass in which the congregation never ceases to interpose itself." Thus, this "Christopher Columbus" is like a religious monument to the glory of the Genoese navigator who, as the poet comments through the voice of his hero, is "Christ-bearer—all that is spirit and all that is wings."

Mystic Processional

At the rise of the curtain we see a mystic processional which opens "The Book of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus, Discoverer of America," in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost; and throughout, the spirit of God is all-pervasive. Prayers are recited, psalms to the glory of the Lord are sung and the monumental work is concluded by a "Te Deum."

The score of Darius Milhaud responds marvelously to the religious needs of the opera and, as in his other works, the music becomes the very heart of the plot and its real life. The words are no more than a physical image, but the music reveals the intimate thoughts of the characters or the mysterious message from beyond. It is the soul of Columbus or of Queen Isabella; it becomes the fatal inspiration which guides the destructive passions of the mob; everywhere it reigns supreme.

Darius Milhaud, in "Christophe Colomb," has attained a profundity and grandeur even beyond that of his earlier "Protée" and "Orestes." The music of the score is as moving as it is ingenious. It is a fresco in which the smallest details have been treated with special care and art. The chorus, which represented a most difficult problem and one that had to be solved in an attractive and different way, reveals an audacious and sure genius, a mature talent, a thorough knowledge of essential and persuasive musical means. And here, even more than his other works, there is an extraordinary flowering of melody. The part of Queen Isabella, for example, which is the only feminine and tender role in the score, gives striking evidence of this.

Vibrant With Life

For these reasons the work is vibrant with life. It is at the same time the magnificent crown of the first phase of Milhaud's creative activity and the point of departure for his work to come.

In every way the music itself testifies to the mastery at which Darius Milhaud, even in 1928, the year of the work's completion, had arrived. The orchestra is not an abnormal, excessive one. It is the classic orchestra — the winds grouped by threes and without any other percussion than the kettledrums and usual accompanying battery. With the simplest means the composer attains the most elevated regions.

The details of the scenario, which tells the story of Columbus historically and mystically through a series of flashbacks, follows, in some instances, the plan of an oratorio. But it is not an oratorio any more than it is the kind of opera that had ever been written before. For here is a work by Darius Milhaud. It has a form, language and lyricism of its own. "Christopher Columbus", not only gave the composer a chance to write new music, it also allowed him to create a new stage formula and one which we may all claim for our own time.

FOURNIER 'CELLIST FOR PHILHARMONIC

Plays Martinu Concerto in Bow Here — Mitropoulos Directs Boccherini, Brahms Works

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Pierre Fournier, 'cellist. At Carnegie Hall.

Symphony in A	Boccherini
'Cello Concerto (first New York performance)	Martinu
Symphony No. 2	Brahms

By OLIN DOWNES

The tonic and the subdominant of a Boccherini Symphony in A major and the Brahms Second Symphony in D enclosed the novelty, and an important one, of the program of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society last night in Carnegie Hall. This was the revised version of Bohuslav Martinu's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, played by Pierre Fournier for the first time in this city.

Though this revision was not an original version of a work new to the audience, the occasion was nevertheless in the true sense of the word a première. The Concerto, by authoritative report, is a considerably different work in its present form from what it was in the old one. This difference appears to be not merely one of an editorial kind. It bears a profounder distinction. The present version has the impression of the years that have passed since the first performance of the Concerto in 1934. In the intervening time much has happened of a spiritual as well as practical effect of change.

The 'Cello Concerto has, therefore, two aspects of style where national characteristics are concerned. The vigorously rhythmed and accented opening movement gives more than a suggestion of American jazz. But the slow movement, the lyrical one, is profoundly affected by what might appear as recollections, or, let us say, nostalgic revery, of the homeland of the days before revolution, such days as those of which Dvorák, Mr. Martinu's great countryman, sang. This slow movement, for the writer, has the deepest poetry, the most compelling savor, of the whole work. The writing is first-class for the 'cello and offers the skilled executant all sorts of uncommon opportunities. Mr. Fournier availed himself notably of these, to the vast pleasure of the audience, which heartily applauded and recalled him.

Otherwise, a quiet night! Boccherini's A major Symphony is not one of his most surprising or unusual, though it is genial music, by a greatly given second-rank composer. Brahms' Symphony, vernal, poetic, exhilerating by turns, brought the evening to its culmination.

GESENSWAY WORK MAKES WORLD BOW

Philharmonic Offers 'Double Portrait' — Menuhin Plays Concerto by Mendelssohn

The world première of Louis Gesensway's "A Double Portrait" occupied part of the Saturday evening Philharmonic-Sympathy program. Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto was played by Yehudi Menuhin, and Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted the Bach-Resphigi Prelude and Fugue in D. Carried over from the previous concerto of the week was Brahms' Second Symphony.

Somewhat of a mystical program has been supplied by the composer of "A Double Portrait." According to Mr. Gesensway, the score "presents a portrait of a man and a woman in a social sense * * * It is also a reflection of a certain kind of thinking, feeling and actions * * *"

In its way, the "Portrait" is a rather strange piece. It has a dual opposition of themes (male, female), a nervous and restless flow, a mysterious recurring motivic fragment. Its harmonic language is modern in an academic manner. There also is a good deal of sensitivity and imagination, plus thoroughly sound workmanship. It can not be called an "important" work, but it does have a personality and profile of its own.

Mr. Menuhin gave the Mendelssohn a broad reading, plangent rather than refined. A few unsteady rhythms were perflexing. The violinist often momentarily lost the pulse by rapidly telescoping the end of a phrase. But his tone sang out, the orchestral coordination was excellent, and the crowded audience approved.

The raucous Bach-Respighi was a good orchestral showpiece, and Mr. Mitropoulos conducted it to the hilt, though hte speed at which he took the fugue resutled more in a tribute to the Philharmonic's virtuosity than to the musical line. not that Respighi left much of Bach after he got through with his transcription. John K. Sherman Writes Lively Story of Music-Sold Community in Action

USIC AND MAESTROS, The Story of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, by John K. Sherman (University of Minnesota Press, $3.75).

By NORMAN HOUK

RST CONCERT of the Minneapolis symphony orchestra as Thursday night, Nov. 5, 03, in the partly curtained off xposition building which stood til a few years ago across e river from the loop, near he end of the present Third renue bridge.

Emil Oberhoffer conducted d the first downbeat was for agner's Prelude to "Die Meisrsinger."

arcella Semrich, great olish coloratura, "imorted at great xpense," raced the ocasion as guest rtist.

By the time he curtain is aised on this stive and imortant scene, Sherman's Music and Maestros" has eached page 54, for the Mineapolis symphony did not pring up overnight like a surise mushroom in Minneapolis' arly cultural lawn. The pioeers of the community had rought music of a sort with hem and "music professors" ourished, sometimes briefly.

ORMANDY, former Minneapolis Symphony conductor, as he appeared to a cartoonist for Golfer and Sportsman, Virginia Safford's former magazine. Reproduced from "Music and Maestros."

One of the earliest homegrown organized musical efforts was a concert of the Minneapolis Musical society in 1872, which wilted under an early boxoffice frost.

Among the other musical groups which burgeoned later was the Filharmonix, male chorus, also somewhat addicted to mandolins. This was before the turn of the century. Almost exactly at the turn the Filharmonix lured young Emil Oberhoffer away from the Apollo club which he had been conducting. There were some hard feelings but the Apollo club had the last laugh, thriving to this day while the Filharmonix disappeared in the undertow of a greater musical movement.

UNDER OBERHOFFER the Filharmonix became the Philharmonic and started scaling musical heights. This required an orchestra, and after a couple of seasons of coping with amateur players who might or might not rehearse or play at the appointed time, Oberhoffer started propaganda for a full-time professional orchestra.

A group of leading citizens became interested in the idea and Elbert L. Carpenter, young lumberman who once had ambitions to become an opera singer, quickly forged into the lead. He was to serve as president of what evolved into the Orchestral Association of Minneapolis, sponsor of the symphony, until his death in 1945.

The well remembered long-time kingpin of the orchestral setup always guarded against the orchestra becoming a one-angel enterprise. That very first season had 54 guarantors and genuine community support has remained a major tenet.

Sherman's opening chapter, on the early music of Minneapolis, and the forces that gave rise to the symphony orchestra, will no doubt be as fascinating to the reader as it was to the author. The research involved kept leading him into new and interesting paths until he just had to call himself to a halt and get on with the story of the orchestra and its five great conductors, Oberhoffer, Henri Verbrugghen, Eugene Ormandy, Dimitri Mitropoulos and Antal Dorati.

I NEVER before read a book which took me so long to review as "Music and Maestros," for it was written literally under my nose and I've read passages here and there over the last couple of years. And I witnessed the travail involved in doing the research and the writing, and also the miracle that out of so much delving and hard work should emerge such a delightfully lively piece. That, of course, is always basically the author's task, and here it is accomplished with grace and polish.

For this is a book about people, full of anecdote and action. A conscientious chronicle of all the facts about the Minneapolis symphony might easily have been expected to be dull—unless Sherman wrote it. It isn't, and that wins the University Press a gold star for its perspicacity in picking him for the task.

The multitudinous facts which Sherman has set marching on nimble feet were culled from many sources. A lot of the enlivening insight, the revealing incidents, the amusing anecdotes came from interviews with upward of 80 persons who had something to do with the orchestra's career by playing in it or supporting it, or with persons intimately acquainted with those who did. Thus the recorded facts get a direct transfusion of red corpuscles from real people.

THEN there were the files of the Minneapolis public library, the Minnesota State Historical society and most importantly the voluminous scrapbooks of the Minneapolis Symphony files which preserve virtually everything ever printed about the orchestra from advertisements to critics' reviews.

All this embalmed type came up with juicy morsels as well as facts. One of Sherman's favorites is the one-man revolt against the Tschaikowsky Pathetique Symphony staged by Harlow Gale, critic for the Daily News until 1916. Oberhoffer's penchant for the dramatic, and public enthusiasm for the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Tschaikowsky Symphonies, led him to program them repeatedly, especially the Sixth or Pathetique, until Gale could stomach it no more. Whenever the Pathetique was played Gale stayed away from the concert—but wrote a review, a scathing one.

"Music and Maestros" easily beguiles the reader into going on and on, and the mere picking up of the book is made a pleasure by the distinguished book designing by Jane McCarthy of University of Minnesota Press.

THE BOOK has an index and there are appendices, one of them a "first," the complete listing of all the persons who have been members of the orchestra in its 50 seasons, plus conductors and guest conductors. There is a list of this "most-traveled" orchestra's out of town engagements, including the past season, a list of recordings, and an abridged repertoire through the 49th season compiled by Carlo Fischer.

Twenty-four pages of halftones picture all the conductors and many events in the orchestra's history, and a scattering of line drawings contemporary with the chapters they illustrate are included.

So solid reference virtues are included with entertainment and the book is a worthy complement, as well as compliment, to the Minneapolis Symphony's 50th season.

By OLIN DOWNES

A first impulse after a first hearing of Darius Milhaud's opera, "Christophe Colomb," given its first performance in New York in concert form last night by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, is to applaud Mr. Mitropoulos for his intrepidity and sovereign ability in venturing to give this immense and astonishing work at all.

A second one is to pay homage to Darius Milhaud's sincerity, daring, and frequently high inspiration in penning this very long and elaborate score. It is so long that it was impossible for a newspaper reviewer with a morning edition to catch to remain in the hall for more than a quarter of the second part of the work.

Therefore it cannot be discussed here with any definiteness, especially as it is so rich—unquestionably over-rich—in detail, to describe with any particularity at this moment. A third impression, which cannot be avoided, is of a score much too long, too literary and philosophic, and too crowded with detail, even to find a permament place in the repertory.

After Paul Claudel Text

This "opera" in two parts, after the text of Paul Claudel, is scored for immense forces, a big chorus, a mountainous orchestra, and seven solo singers. It is in no sense a conventional opera of action and set numbers. Nor does its plot deal with merely exterior events of Columbus' career and his discovery of America. It is a mystical and theosophic fantasy; outside boundaries of time, space or action; portraying two sides of Columbus' character: that of exterior manifestation and that of his inner nature and the voice of his conscience, in a mystical interpretation of Columbus' destiny and all it betokened to mankind.

This is really a mystery play in modern guise—a "Morality" by that extemporaneous poet of Catholicism, Claudel. The score is done by Milhaud and all the technic of harmony and counterpoint in devices old and new; those of plain tonal counterpoint, those of polytonality and atonality, and this with a bravura which compels astonishment and respect, and in the proportions of a huge signboard which, probably does reveal the work to the best advantage when it is shown, as was originally conceived by the composer for movies.

Mr. Mitropoulos mounted this opera-cantata, as it might be described, for concert production, with something of the scenic and ceremonious in the presentation.

Thus the narrator, who spoke most of the time, but sometimes merged speech into a singer's intonation, stood by a loudspeaker on a raised platform at the right. The orchestra played its stormy prelude and the chorus, members of the Schola Cantorum, marched in to its rhythm and seated itself high up and at the back of the stage. Some of its members occupied a right wing of the super-structure at the back, and some of these, in turn, when they had small solo parts to sing, stood on the steps at the right which led up to the singers' platform.

When Queen Isabella came she advanced from right rear of stage, in a Spanish costume with veil. Columbus sometimes turned to confront judges, accusers, rivals. He turned to address the mutinous sailors on the ship of discovery. There was a degree of processional and symbolic movement in all this which accorded well with the symbolic character of the complicated piece.

And the performance as a whole, though its principal singer, the Columbus of Mack Harrell, was not commanding enough in either the vocal or dramatic sense to make the most powerfully possible impression, was highly creditable to all concerned in an operation that was technically and musically difficult and dangerous.

The cast as a whole was a fine one. Most of the English text, though by no means all of it, came over. Sometimes the weight of Mr. Milhaud's musical apparatus, as for example, many passages when the chorus had persistent refrains that over-balanced the solo parts, was too heavy for the single voices, so that the pedestal dominated the statue. But as a whole a remarkable and dramatically spirited ensemble!

Miss Dow was a superb and rich-voiced Isabella. Mr. Scott "Columbus II," the introspective, self-communing Columbus, had real "innigkeit." Adolph Anderson, the Accuser, and David Lloyd in his double part, all admirably and thoughtfully co-ordinated. John Brownlee's Narrator was first class. It is not possible to claim with certainty that the chorus invariably sang in tune, because many of its passages were so cacaphonous that the intonation would hardly have mattered by the side of the broad dramatic effect, which usually came off.

Then there was the virtuosity of the orchestra. It is true that some of Milhaud's effects, such as the numerous whacking of drum, cymbals and other percussion instruments to punctuate pronouncements, and the many fortissimos which piled Ossa on Pelion of sound, became in places repetitious. But, as a whole, a remarkable feat, under Mr. Mitropoulous' baton, of solo and ensemble interpretation. At ten-forty we left for the office.

Menuhin and a Premiere

The premiere of Louis Gesensway's "Double Portrait" and the appearance of Yehudi Menuhin as soloist in Mendelssohn's violin concerto were features of Saturday night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos in Carnegie Hall. Besides zealously programming contemporary music, Mr. Mitropoulos shows his dedication to its cause by commissioning works on his own from time to time. "A Double Portrait" is one of these commissions. In its execution its composer has displayed both musicianship and fluency.

The social and psychological implications of the program note are so involved and generalized that trying to follow them may easily become a game to distract one from the musical continuity. Man and woman, we are told, are portrayed in this work "as children of society from the modern standpoint," and its drama derives from "intrigue, arrogance, hypocrisy and unconscious cruelty." A large order, this, for a work less than fifteen minutes in duration. The masculine character of the opening is clear from the athleticism and a primitive beat in the tradition of Prokofieff and earlier Stravinsky. (Latvian by birth, Mr. Gesepsway falls naturally into this tradition). But the principle of contrasting masculine and feminine themes is too old a one to lend itself to making any special point, and too much was left to the chance of individual guesswork to supply a specific content.

Though Mr. Gesensway is, by profession, a violinist in the Philadelphia Orchestra, contrary to the naivest expectation he kept the winds and an elaborate battery busy often more than the strings, which remain tacit for a long stretch in the middle. The effect in this section was none too happy, since the rapidly active winds at the back of the platform came across like a vague, distant rustle. The rapid contrapuntal figures of high strings, pizzicato, were too obviously calculated for bizarre effect. The notes became a scramble. But, in general, it was a competent work, if not too strong in imagination.

Mr. Menuhin was celebrating the 25th anniversary of his first orchestral appearance here, Nov. 25, 1927, when he played Beethoven's concerto with the New York Symphony. His Mendelssohn on Saturday had its moments. But at times what seemed to be insecurity gave unsteadiness to the pulse. One need hardly mention at this time his fine schooling and enormous gifts. These are such as to expect more distinguished and inspired playing than he is offering us in public these days. Mr. Menuhin repeated the Mendelssohn at yesterday afternoon's concert.

Milhaud Opera Gets American Premiere

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

In order to describe what took place at last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall I need a volume, not a column. Darius Milhaud's "Christopher Columbus" is listed as an opera but this is a faint word for what goes on. Complete, the work has 27 scenes, use of a film screen, a narrator, numerous singing characters—even a flock of doves—which, as you might expect, along with the screen and other adjuncts too numerous to mention, were omitted in last night's concert version, its American premiere.

But dispensing with the staging did not dispense with the complexity. I'm afraid this musical philosophical treatise—combining a dozen or more concepts and ideas all tossed around in a single hat—is harder to digest at one sitting than a mere proscenium, no matter how many levels and props are behind it.

Milhaud's work is written to the text of the play Paul Claudel wrote in 1927 while he was French ambassador to Washington, "The Book of Christopher Columbus," described by the author as inspired by a guiding idea of many of his works, "the Catholic love of the whole world."

Diversified Potpourri

The narrator reads from the play's text (expertly accomplished last night by John Brownlee) and the text, translated into English, also serves for the intricate choral music, for spoken lines by the chorus and for words sung by the many soloists.

Thus the life of the explorer unfolds in a mixture of the allegorial, historical, mystical and ethical, a diversified, conflicting potpourri which might be likened to a contemporary adaptation of a medieval mystery play.

What of the music? I need a volume for this too! Sometimes it's a combination of highly complex orchestral polytonal-polyphony (which roughly means, too much for most ears to listen to at one time) serving as a base for a mystical, poignant melodic style, both simple and complex.

You will also hear sudden, violent contrasts; dramatic stops and starts. You will hear sections of beauty alternating with long dull portions. You will hear too much bombast. But it's worth a trip to Carnegie just to observe the amazing Dimitri Mitropoulos achieve this tour-de-force of conducting the work from memory.

He expends himself too much on climaxes. If the work had been cut even further and performed with less overstatement, the results would have been more effective. Mack Harrell is excellent in the title role when you can hear him. And David Lloyd does a brilliant job of singing three different roles while hopping from platform to stairs to lower stage with the agility of Robin Hood. Dorothy Dow looked the part of Queen Isabella in her purple velvet gown and white mantilla but her voice was surprisingly shrill.

This "Columbus" lasted until 11:15. It's not an evening of relaxation but if you like challenges, this is it. The performance will be repeated tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon.

Philharmonic at Carnegie:

'Colomb' Just Too Much

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ONLY Dimitri Mitropoulos would have dared. But having ventured to give the first American performance of Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb" with the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night, he achieved a remarkable feat of presentation.

Twenty-two years after its premiere, the work still remains almost too much to take.

That there are beauty and strength in Milhaud's score cannot be denied. Unfortunately too much bombast and monotony dispel its finer moments. The percussive element is perhaps its downfall because the persistent drum beats level out what nobility of utterance may lurk in its pages. From the human angle, the drama appears dispassionate vocally. Only the choral writing attains emotional forcefulness.

What Paul Claudel achieved in his text imposed more than Milhaud could cope with in musical terms. The score is an extraordinary technical feat, but it lacks the sense of unity to weld Claudel's panorama of ideas into a significant whole. A first hearing proved heavy-going. Perhaps this study of Christopher Columbus is too completely literary to be leavened by musical projection.

Gives His All

Mitropoulos summoned all his intellectual grasp, his amazing ingenuity, and his technical mastery for this performance. He was most ably assisted by John Brownlee as narrator, Mack Harrell as Columbus, Adolph Anderson as the accuser, Dorothy Dow as Isabella, Norman Scott and David Lloyd in several roles.

A special chorus directed by Hugh Ross assumed the major burden of the work admirably.

As the evening wore on, people lost the threat in spite of an English translation. Since the music lacked the persuasiveness to hold their attention, they simply withdrew.

Discovering Too Much

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The news at the Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall last night was that America had at last discovered "Christopher Columbus."

The reference, of course, is to the two-act opera of Darius Milhaud, written in 1928 and first performed in Berlin in 1930, when a good part of the audience of the State Opera House joined in a barrage of whistles, jeering and catcalls.

Twenty-two years are a long time, particularly the last 22, in which matters far more offensive than Milhaud's music have crossed the stage of history. If there was any dissent last night it took the form of a failure to return after the intermission for the second part of the opera. The dissent was rather noticeable.

Milhaud's setting of Paul Claudel's version of the Columbus story is a little big of everything—cantata, oratorio, mystery play in the medieval sense, music drama—almost everything except opera, unless, of course, you stretch the term like a very large rubber band.

A Monstrous Blunder.

In any case, it was very hard to take in concert form. My hunch is that it would not be much easier to take in the original form, even with the dancing and costumes and film projections stretched across the back of the stage that went with the Berlin premiere.

Milhaud's music isn't bad at all; that is, what isn't sheer padding and time-marking contains striking lunges of power. There are stunning choruses, great monologues and, often, a fiece orchestral commentary. But the opera as a whole was a blunder, and a rather monstrous one.

Claudel envisioned Columbus as a man and a symbol, a mystic and a man of the world, a divided personality, half on earth and half in the clouds. The opera he and Milhaud wrote takes in the whole cosmos, not excluding the hereafter and the choir invisible.

It is one long travelogue, moving from Genoa to Cadiz, roaming the dark seas, landing on the West Indian coast, returning to Spain, and ending in the Kingdom of Heaven, which opens its doors to the maligned and impoverished Columbus.

Claudel packed too much of too many things into his book, and Milhaud, no slouch himself, wrote too much of too many different kinds of music. There is no central powerhouse to the score, no real focus, no direction, and few points of rest. There are purple patches, but they are part of one of the craziest quilts of modern music.

Too Long at Sea.

I should have objected less if Dimitri Mitropoulos had taken the liberty of piecing the good things together into a one-hour synthesis. As it turned out, Columbus was left too long at sea, and so was the audience.

I believe Mr. Mitropoulos deserves high praise for the courage and thoroughness of the undertaking. It was an act of faith and a gesture of devotion to a comrade-in-arms of modern music. The performance, in the English version of Arnold Perry, was persuasive in every way except as an argument in favor of Milhaud's ill-advised score.

Mack Harrell bore the brunt of Columbus's long and tedious monologues with heroic endurance, and Dorothy Dow revealed a warm voice and style as Queen Isabella. I would assign first honors, however, to John Brownlee, whose flawless diction as the Narrator was alone worth the trip to Carnegie Hall last night.

I still think Dimitri Mitropoulos is as exciting a conductor as you can find anywhere in the world today. And I am ready to grant Darius Milhaud every claim to first rank as a composer—that is, on any subject but the discovery of America.

It wasn't only Columbus' sailors who welcomed the cry of "Land!" last night.

Milhaud Opera in American Debut At Carnegie Hall

By DOUGLAS WATT

"Christopher Columbus," an enormously complex and difficult stage work lasting over two hours, was put on last night at Carnegie Hall in concert form by the vast resources the Philharmonic-Symphony Society is able to muster for such occasions. I didn't know what to make of it.

Based on a 1927 play by Paul Claudel, who was French ambassador to this country in 1930 when the musical version was produced in Berlin, it has an overwhelming score by Darius Milhaud. Parts of this score are stirring (the burden of the singing is carried by the chorus), parts lovely in their lyricism and other parts effective in their mysticism. But put them all together and what have you got, as the old song goes?

Lots of Confusion.

What we had last night, for all the epic grandeur of the work, was a mish-mash in which the text, presented in an English translation, could be understood only occasionally. This was partly because the large orchestra, on stage, obscured the solo voices much of the time, partly because the chorus work was blurred and partly because the work is so conceived that at times different voices are singing different things in different keys simultaneously while the orchestra is setting up a ground swell on its own. At times, Milhaud sounded as if he had just discovered America all by himself.

Another of the work's difficulties is that it tells no simple story. The poor, wretched, dying Columbus reflects on the career of the younger Columbus, more philosophically than dramatically much of the time. Two Columbuses, one for each aspect of the man, plays parts and often at the same time. Time and place are continually mixed up.

Of all the singers, David Lloyd, whose tenor was used for three roles, sang with the greatest clarity and expressiveness. Mack Harrell sounded fine at times but had a lugubrious time of it as Columbus the First. Norman Scott was Columbus the Second. Dorothy Dow sang beautifully as Queen Isabella but I couldn't get a word she uttered. John Brownlee served as narrator and did a rather poor job at it. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted.

A High Point In Modern Symphonics

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

There is a point in Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony at which the violins are climbing and shivering and a zylophone suddenly chimes in. It was at that point that last night's Philharmonic concert reached its peak.

The only word for Dimitri Mitropoulos and the orchestra in that passage is inspired. The mood was perfectly sustained, the playing was flawless and the audience paid the whole movement the compliment of its absolute and motionless silence.

For me that movement of Shostakovich's is not only the highest achievement of his career, but the high point of modern music. As a slow movement it ranks with the very best of Beethoven and Bruckner. And Mr. Mitropoulos conducted it as if he agreed.

Something to Wait For.

There were one or two other things on last night's program calling for comment. The rest of the Shostakovich symphony, for example. The performance was solid and eloquent, and both the orchestra and audience appeared to enjoy the sturdy march rhythms.

But the more I hear this symphony the more I find myself waiting for that Largo movement; since it comes third, I now resent the time it takes to unwind the other two. Frankly, I have stopped considering either of them very good Shostakovich or very good music.

Then, Mr. Mitropoulos made his weekly obeisance to new music—this time a concerto by a Swiss composer now living in Amsterdam by the name of Frank Martin. Joseph Szigeti joined him and the orchestra in introducing the work to America last night.

A Good Deal of Something.

It isn't much of a concerto, I'm afraid, though it is a good deal of something. What that something is was anybody's guess last night. There was some Ravel, hints of Debussy, a touch of Shostakovich—even, according to one Swiss critic, a belated wedding of Wagner and Brahms.

Mr. Martin knows his way about an orchestra—no doubt about it. There are great moments in each of the three movements, and a good deal of stormy weather deriving, so we are told, from a reading of Shakespeare's "The Tempest." But it takes more than great moments to make great music.

My hunch is the concerto might have made a better symphony or tone-poem. Even in such expert hands as Mr. Szigeti's, the violin seemed to be fighting a losing battle against the high seas of the orchestra.

I found Mr. Mitropoulos's arrangement of Bach's G minor fantasia and fugue much more to my taste, even if a little in lone with the current inflation among Bach transcribers.

Noisy and Grand

"CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS" is the second in Darius Milhaud's trilogy of operas about the new world. The others are "Maximilian" and "Bolivar." Only the last is an opera in the usual sense. The others are more strictly dramatic oratorios. "Columbus," the least theatrical of them all, lends itself best to concert production. It is sustained throughout, moreover, by musical interest and needs no action. It scarcely needs, even, for the text (by Paul Claudel) to be understood, so elaborate and so picturesque is its instrumental and choral writing. The insistence on high-range writing in the solo parts, plus a heavily charged orchestral accompaniment, makes it inevitable that a great deal of the text should be lost in performance. And so it was at last night's performance by the Philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos.

That was no fault of the singers, who were admirable artists—Dorothy Dow, Mack Harrell, David Lloyd, Norman Scott and Adolph Anderson, with John Brownlee narrating. Nor of the special chorus of sixty trained by Hugh Ross to perfection. The work is written that way, and nothing can be done about it. Nothing needs to be done, because it is a grand and wonderful piece, and primarily instrumental in character, especially when choral masses and solo voices are being treated in instrumental fashion.

Many persons present seem not to have cared for "Christopher Columbus," in spite of its extraordinary powerful execution. Fully half the orchestra seats, all full at eight forty-five, were empty when the concert ended at eleven fifteen. This listener found it fascinating throughout. He loved its complexity, its noise (seven men at the battery), its polyphony, its simultaneous tonalities, its utter abundance of everything. He was struck also by the fine quality throughout of its melodic material. Every slightest utterance is a tune and a good tune. Above all, the intense expressivity of the work, raised his spirits, made him feel good.

He enjoyed also the beautiful voice of Dorothy Dow, possibly the finest dramatic soprano of her generation. And he was dumbfounded by the virtuosity of her vocal technique and the absolute perfection of her pitch. David Lloyd worked handsomely too; and Mack Harrell, as always, was distinction itself. The chorus, for all the cruelty of the high ranges demanded, sounded better than the choruses we usually hear. It sounded as if all the voices in it were good voices. And certainly all those which sang small roles were. The dramatic animation of the whole performance was, of course, the work of Dimitri Mitropoulos. And it was huge. The work is a huge one and merits that.

One listener, at least, was grateful for acquaintance with a striking and powerful piece. And he considers its presentation to have been the finest yet offered by this conductor of any single dramatic work.

'SIX GREAT LADIES OF MUSIC' HONORED

Philharmonic-Symphony Board Directors Cited at Opening of 1952 'Friends' Fund' Drive

Floyd G. Blair, president of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, paid tribute yesterday to "The Six Great Ladies of Music," each of whom has served on the board of directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony for twenty-five years or more.

Mr. Blair spoke at a luncheon at the Plaza Hotel, which started the 1952 "Friends' Fund" drive of the Philharmonic-Symphony.

"Great ladies" honored at the luncheon are Mrs. William C. Breed, Mrs. Elbridge Gerry Chadwick, Mrs. Charles S. Guggenheimer, Mrs. Lytle Hull, Mrs. John T. Pratt and Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway.

Each received a silver card tray engraved with her name and the inscription, "in grateful recognition of twenty-five years of devoted service to the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York."

Mr. Blair was introduced by David M. Keiser, treasurer of the Philharmonic and general chairman of the "Friends' Fund" campaign. Mr. Keiser said that last year's drive had enrolled 3,000 new members and that this year's quota has been set at 10,000.

The presentation of "service awards" was followed by a parody of the "Floradora Sextet," written by Mrs. Meyer Davis, who was at the piano, and sung by Virginia Davis, Janet Preto, Rosemary Carlos, Anne Ellis, Doris Okerson and Loisann Oakes, assisted by John McCollum, tenor.

Luncheon guests also heard a group of songs by Ezio Pinza, accompanied by the Philharmonic's conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos. Because of a pre-luncheon mixup the piano's music rack had been misplaced and Mr. Mitropoulos played with the music spread out in front of him, jazz-band fashion.

Mitropoulos At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

MITROPOULOS went contemporary last night. He revived a modern symphonic masterpiece and introduced a new concerto at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. The former was Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, the latter Martin's Violin Concerto.

The Shostakovich engrossed the audience's attention. As the wonderful melodies of the first and third movements soared through modern harmonies, it recognized the true strain of Russian music. Here was its essence 15 years ago when the composer was at the peak of his career, and here is its present glory.

After a period of neglect this music undergoes revaluation wholly in its favor. It represents not only solid symphonic writing but also inspired creation.

Emerged Reborn

Mitropoulos made this all the more apparent by his somewhat deliberate tempos. He allowed the first movement to become too loud, he made the second too serious; but he released the beauties of the score through his responsive orchestra. It emerged reborn as a monumental work.

The Martin concerto rhapsodizes inconsequentially. Capably written, it gets nowhere in spite of flashes of fine writing. Joseph Szigeti worked hard to set it in its best light, but all his artistry could not relieve the dullness that persisted in creeping into each movement. The applause at the end of the performance must surely have been for him.

Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G Minor in Mitropoulos' arrangement, opened the program majestically and sonorously.

Mitropoulos Conducts An American Premiere

By PAUL AFFELDER

Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra performed the much-heralded American premiere of "Christophe Colomb"—or "Christopher Columbus"—by Darius Milhaud last night at Carnegie Hall.

No one has even been able exactly to describe this work. It was composed in 1928 as a musical setting of a play by Milhaud's friend and associate, Paul Claudel, then serving as French Ambassador to the United States. It requires the services not only of a conventional orchestra but of a narrator, a group of soloists and an all-important chorus.

The latter serves a four-fold purpose, participating in the action, commenting upon it in the manner of an ancient Greek chorus, giving out biblical quotations in a sort of rhythmic responsive reading, and adding to the orchestral sound.

Since Claudel not only presents the story of Christopher Columbus in a series of flashbacks, but also weaves a mystical and religious thread into the work, it has been variously described as an opera, an opera-oratorio, a Renaissance mystery drama, and so on.

Religious, Mystical Elements

The religious and mystical elements enter through the literal translation of "Christophe," meaning "Christ-Bearer," and "Colomb," meaning "Dove." In Claudel's boundless imagination, Christopher Columbus is the "Bearer of Christ guided by the Dove, which is the Holy Ghost."

The work is divided into two acts and 27 scenes, each treated by Milhaud as a separate musical entity. There is little or no musical relation between these scenes and, as far as we could tell after a single hearing, nothing to bind the whole together. The result last night was a musical hodge-podge—neither fish nor fowl nor good red herring.

Mr. Mitropoulos assembled a splendid group of soloists—John Brownlee, as the narrator; Mack Harrell, as Columbus; Dorothy Dow, as Queen Isabella, and Norman Scott, David Lloyd and Adolph Anderson in other parts. Also an exceptionally virtuosic choral group, directed by Hugh Ross.

But after doing what sounded like some wonderful training, he proceeded to drown out most of what was being sung in Arnold Perry's English translation.

The only one we could hear clearly was Mr. Brownlee, who was usually accompanied only by rhythmic percussion passages. What he was given to say sounded like a cross between "Peter and the Wolf" and "Uncle Somebodyorother" reading the Sunday comics over the radio. The only really impressive passages were those given out in rhythmic speech by the chorus during the long first act.

Szigeti Plays Martin Premiere

Dimitri Mitropoulos invaded the contemporary world of music again last night at his concert with the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall. The two works he performed—Frank Martin's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra with Joseph Szigeti as soloist and the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony—played in this aforementioned order—were like the lamb and the lion so far as the dent they made on my consciousness.

The Shostakovich Fifth is, of course, familar, but with each rehearsing its dominant mood of mystery, of remoteness, of loneliness, beckons with greater forcefulness. Its imaginative use of solo instruments is wedded to themes which for the most part are at once cryptic and absorbing—the major exception between the dance mood of the second movement.

Shostakovich's imagination is a forceful one; its lights and shadows catch fire inside us and, while we listen, we conjure up our own images, visual or aural. The symphony opens up much broader vistas than those envisaged by the Leningrad critic when the symphony was first heard there in 1937. He commended the composer for what he called a new more profound trend in his music and encouraged him to turn even "more boldly toward Soviet reality."

In spite of its subtle debt to Russian folk music, the core of the work's meaning is away from so-called "reality"; from the specific and tangible, the nationalistic. Listening to it is like reading Dunsany's "Dreamer's Tales." Solidly grounded, yet it reaches high beyond where fantasy reigns.

Mitropoulos and the ensemble gave the symphony a compelling performance with the exception of the conductor's determination to blast the ears with too much sound—evident throughout the concert.

Szigeti Plays Brilliantly

Szigeti played the American premiere of the Martin concerto with his usual keen apprehension of a work's significance and, even though the Swiss composer's piece suffered from having directly preceded the Skostakovich, it still made a positive impression if not a deep one. It is a fanciful concerto; has a sense of architecture throughout and is not without interest. But when it's over it hasn't stirred the emotions or left one with much to remember. It is like a pleasant interlude, momentarily enjoyed and forgotten once past. My curiosity was whetted enough, however, to wish to hear the composition again. But I doubt that it ever would impress me as a work of major dimensions. The Bach "Fantasia and Fugue In G Minor" arranged for orchestra by Mitropoulos opened the program.

Mitropoulos Here For Annual Concert

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor, will give its annual concert in Constitution Hall Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. It will be presented by the American University Concerts, managed by Patrick Hayes.

The oldest orchestra in this country and the third oldest in the world, it boasts 104 regular players and is proud of its record of having performed under the baton of many great conductors.

It is not generally known that Mr. Mitropoulos began composing at the age of 14 and had the ambition of becoming a pianist and composer. After the successful production of his opera "Sister Beatrice" to a text by Maeterlinck in 1919, Saint-Saens offered him a chance to study in France. However, his native Athens arranged to give the 23-year-old musician a scholarship to study in Berlin under Busoni. This led to his activities as conductor in the German capital and later to a double debut with the Berlin Philharmonic as conductor and pianist, substituting on short notice for Egon Petri in Prokofieff's "Third Concerto," which he learned in two weeks.

EAGLE

Program at Philharmonic Proves One of Year's Best

By PAUL AFFELDER

Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony did some of their best work of the season last evening at Carnegie Hall.

The program opened with Mr. Mitropoulos' own transcription of the Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G Minor by Bach. This is a full-bodied, sonorous treatment of the music, but the fantasia is often made to sound unwieldly because of a poor choice of instruments to play fast figurations. The handling of the fugue is more orthodox. Though we could not agree with everything the conductor did with the music, we certainly had to admire the one quality of the orchestra.

Joseph Szigeti was the violin soloist in the American premiere of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by the contemporary Swiss composer, Frank Martin. Written during 1950 and 1951, the work had its first performance last January. Time alone will tell, but after an initial hearing, we are inclined to agree with the Swiss critic who hailed this composition as a new and valuable addition to the standard repertoire.

Rich in Interest

It is not full of the kind of melodies one can whistle as he leaves the hall, but it has some fine thematic moments. What makes it outstanding is the sensitive harmonic treatment and refined instrumentation, for it is full of colorful chromatic passages beautifully scored.

Martin has done here what many of his colleagues have been striving to do for years: he has preserved that ever-appealing link with the romantic school without becoming the least bit conservative. The concerto is well organized, full of material to keep the listener interested and aware that the violin is at once an outstanding feature and an integrated part of the whole.

Mr. Szigeti gave a devoted account of the concerto, yet much of his playing was marred by unsteady bowing and edgy intonation. He was admirably supported by Mr. Mitropoulos.

But the crowning achievement of the evening was the performance of the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony. Time was when the music by this Soviet composer was all the rage. Things being what they are today, one hears fewer and fewer of his works. In a number of cases, this has been just as well, for not all of his compositions hold up after repeated hearings. The Fifth Symphony is a notable exception; in our opinion, it is the best thing he has ever written.

Our faith in this work was renewed last evening, as we reveled in its freshness, vigor and dramatic intensity. These qualities were brought out in superb fashion by the conductor, who gave us one of his finest symphonic interpretations.

We were inclined to disagree with his choice of deliberate tempi for the first two movements, yet he never allowed the music to drag at any time. What's more, he had his men playing with unusual precision, polish and sensitivity of phrasing. It was a most pleasant experience all around.

SZIGETI IS SOLOIST AT CONCERTO DEBUT

Violinist Plays Martin Piece With Philharmonic—Bach, Shostakovich on Program

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Joseph Szigeti, violinist. At Carnegie Hall.
Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. Bach-Mitropoulos
Violin Concerto (First American Performance) ..... Frank Martin
Symphony No. 5 ..... Shostakovitch

Dimitri Mitropoulos yesterday afternoon led the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall in a new violin concerto by the Swiss composer Frank Martin, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist. The performances of the concerto at this week's concerts were announced as being the first in America.

Herbert Peyser's admirable program notes quote the composer as saying: "I wanted to write a true concerto in three distinct parts * * * led and carried away by the solo instrument; the solo part is designed to show all the qualities of the violin and of the artist who plays it."

In this Mr. Martin has succeeded perfectly. The solo violin is never overpowered by the splendid thunders of the Philharmonic.

This, in the final analysis, is the result of Mr. Mitropoulos' judicious handling of the forces at his command; but the composer has taken care to put no obstacles in his way. The solo violin is not pitted against the full body of orchestra violins on equal terms.

Mr. Martin has loaded the dice in such time-honored ways as scoring the solo instrument arco against orchestral strings pizzicato; assigning it the upper octave in unisons; and omitting orchestral violins, the brilliant tone of the solo cutting through the more opaque sounds of brass and woodwinds.

The concerto is full of dazzling virtuoso passages calculated to appall a poor violinist and put a good one on his mettle. The slow movement makes good use of the solo instrument's expressive qualities.

If the concerto has a fault, it is that its three movements are lacking in variety. After two grave, reflective movements, one is ready for some excitement in the final Presto. Mr. Martin's concluding movement proved to be rather a sober-sided one. On the whole, however, the concerto is a soundly constructed piece that is unpretentious and does exactly what it sets out to do.

Mr. Szigeti was in fine form yesterday. His playing was admirably in tune and had more sensuous tonal beauty than this gifted artist usually permits himself. The technical demands of the concerto were met without apparent effort.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra began the concert with the conductor's orchestration of the "Great" Fantasy and Fugue in G Minor of Bach, and ended with a well-balanced reading of the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony.

Chamber Music

The Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble gave the first program of its second season in yesterday's concert of the New Friends of Music at Town Hall. The fourteen participating members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and Dimitri Mitropoulos, who conducted in the Krenek and Mozart works, had been busy earlier in the afternoon with the regular Philharmonic session at Carnegie Hall, but their playing was not that of apparently overworked musicians. The program, calling for various combinations of winds and strings, offered two works by composers of today and others ranging from the sixteenth to the eighteenth centuries.

Neither of the two contemporary works is new. Arthur Berger's quartet for woodwinds was composed twelve years ago, and has been widely heard; Ernst Krenek's "Symphonische Musik," Op. 11, dates from the middle 1920s. The quartet is appealing for its melodic inventiveness, its spirit and the skill and effectiveness of the composer's use of his instrumental resources; the latter is a means, not an end. Mr. Krenek is also skillful in the use of his instrumental palette; there is also ingenuity of construction, but the second movement, after an impressive beginning in a deeply pensive mood, continues in episodes which lack a sense of destination.

Johann Pezel wrote for municipal occasions in two German cities; yesterday's four examples of his "Tower Music" well illustrated the talents of the five Philharmonic brass players, who also fared admirably in Purcell's expressive funeral music and the still fresh and ingeniously wrought Canzona by Giovanni Gabrieli. The two modern works and the Mozart Divertimento also received performances of a consistently high standard.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the indefatigable conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony, turned up at the New Friends of Music concert Sunday afternoon in Town Hall, to conduct Ernest Krenek's "Symphonic Music for Nine Solo Instruments." Consisting of two long sections, this early work of the composer illustrates his most profound writing in the more lyric second movement, the Adagio. Taken as a whole, it is a cold, cerebral work, a composition of investigation rather than inspiration.

Metropolitan Opera Not Yet a Part Of New York's Intellectual Life

-5-

TWELVE years ago this commentator observed that the Philharmonic was "not a part of New York's intellectual life." Today that remark would not be true. It is still true, however, of the Metropolitan Opera. Both Edward Johnson and Rudolf Bing have aspired toward changing this situation, but so far no change has been accomplished. Perhaps it will be; we all hope so. But the Metropolitan, in spite of the sincere efforts of its recent directors, remains today what it has been for many years, a monument rather than a dynamic force.

The "Intellectual Audience"

BY "NEW YORK'S intellectual life" I mean everything that inspires, even briefly, the interest of our powerful "intellectual audience." This audience is not wholly musical; nor does it represent any social class. It is made up of book-readers and book-writers, civic leaders and stenographers, artists of all kinds and all the art consumers who have faith in the future. It is a critical audience, but a warm one; and it can make or break the prestige of any institution dealing in products of the mind.

Its dynamic character, its faith in tomorrow, is backed up by a better knowledge of the past than the non-intellectual audience has. You can't fool it by talking about "tradition," as you can often do with the less knowledgeable. It demands that the past be treated as a living thing and that today be considered as an honorable heir of the past and a gateway, the only gateway, to the future.

Enlightened Institutions

OUR musical institutions that enjoy the support of this audience are the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra (when Mitropoulos makes the programs), the New York City Opera and ballet companies, the Little Orchestra Society, the Ballet Theater, Martha Graham's dance troupe, the League of Composers and a half-dozen other societies devoted to the performance of advanced music, a similar group of societies devoted to the performance of eighteenth-century music on relatively authentic instruments, the Columbia University Festival of American Music, the Juilliard School as a concert- and opera-performing institution and our municipal radio station WNYC.

Other sources, including the professional theater, individual professional performers, the Young Men's Hebrew Association and the Museum of Modern Art, are capable of mobilizing our leaders of musical opinion. But their activities are not always sustained in a forward-looking direction. And this direction is the tone, the strength and the unity of what I call the "intellectual audience", which is New York's most precious artistic resource. Without it we would be a provincial center like Chicago or Milan and not the world's center of music that we are.

Productions

TYPICAL of the intellectual operation I am describing is the recent performance at the Philharmonic concerts of Darius Milhaud's celebrated opera "Christopher Columbus." This work has been in existence for over twenty years. It has been performed in Germany, France and Belgium. It has never been a popular success, and it has never been agreed to be an artistic failure. It is a monumental work by a world-famous master, and New York has a right to judge it. If recent judgments have not been wholly favorable, neither have they considered the Philharmonic to have done a foolish thing in giving it. New York is happy to have heard the work, whether we all liked it or not. And the Philharmonic's intellectual prestige has risen with the event.

The City Center has given us in one calender year a contemporary opera "The Dybbuk" and four famous works of this century—Wolf-Ferrari's "I Quattro Rusteghi," Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," Bartok's "Bluebeard's Castle" and Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnole." Earlier, Prokofiev's "Love of Three Oranges" and Debussy's "Pelléas et Mélisande" made history at popular prices. As for the ballet companies, they all do new works constantly. Their relation to their own time is perfect, and a huge audience of young people is their reward.

Prestige

PHILHARMONIC spokesmen used to maintain, and Metropolitan spokesmen still do, that their institution cannot afford at present a policy of intellectual distiction but that if and when more money became available they would be delighted to spend some of it pleasing the intellectual minority. All such statements assume that a directorship which has for years abstained from any such effort has the taste and its subscribers the experience to take part in the life of their time by merely changing their minds. We have no evidence that this is true. At the Philharmonic it took a new conductor to make the change, and that change is not yet complete. But the change has brought into the house for the more advanced programs a public not previously served by the Philharmonic, and it seems not to have caused any grave defection among the subscribers.

Making History

THE City Center's artistic direction has always been an enlightened one, and its whole public is made up of the lively young and the culturally ambitious. What its opera company needs is a little more animation and brilliance in the performance of standard works, something to attract to the house Italian-speaking opera lovers on Saturday and Sunday nights. These devotees of familiar works are a faithful public, and their patronage is most desirable. What the Metropolitan needs is the opposite, a public like that of the City Center, an intellectual audience capable of making the house less like a statue on a pedestal and more of a living force around the town.

Money does not produce intellectual distinction, nor does poverty prevent its exercise. Actually, in any given house one opera production costs about the same as another. The ones that make history are the ones that show choice, taste and solid imagination. And it does seem to me that making history is the only criterion that we can accept in judging the activities of our cultural institutions.

INTRODUCED at the New Friends Town Hall concert yesterday, the Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble immediately established itself as a welcome addition to the musical scene.

The brass quintet's playing of works by Pezel, Purcell, and Gabrieli enhanced the inherent purity of their music with sensuous tone. The woodwinds gave just the right touch to Arthur Berger's delightful Quartet in C.

Krenek's "Symphonic Music for Nine Solo Instruments" received a most sympathetic interpretation with Mitropoulos conducting.

14 of Orchestra, as Chamber Ensemble, Play in Town Hall After Carnegie Concert

After yesterday afternoon's concert of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall, fourteen members of the orchestra hurried down to Town Hall where, under the title of the Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble, they presented the first of the five concerts they are giving there for the New Friends of Music.

This group was organized last season so that its members could play chamber music and gain some additional individual fame. Dimitri Mitropoulos, the orchestra's musical director, has helped them from the start, and yesterday he again provided the leadership for them in the one piece that called for a conductor.

It was Symphonic Music for Nine Solo Instruments, a half-hour work by Ernest Krenek, one of the contemporary composers being featured this season by the New Friends. It is written for strings and woodwinds and was composed while Mr. Krenek was still in his twenties. It made the deepest impression of the concert, for it is a thoughtful and deeply felt work, and under Mr. Mitropoulos's leadership the men played with remarkable unison.

The other works were lighter in spirit and they were attractively played too. The five brass players did Suite No. 4 by Pezel. Purcell's Funeral Music for Queen Mary and Gabrieli's Canzona Per Sonare No. 2. The four woodwind players did Arthur Berger's Quartet in C major. And led by Leon Temerson as the first violinist, seven of the mplayed Mozart's Divertimento No. 7 (K. 205).

The ensemble's second season under its own banner at the Lexington Avenue Y. M. and Y. W. H. A. will open on Dec. 6. There it will play three concerts, with Mr. Mitropoulos assisting in each.

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY

Conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos; soloist, Joseph Szigeti, violinist.
Fantasia and Fugue in G minor ..... Bach, arr. Mitropoulos
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra ..... Frank Martin
First American performance
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47 ..... Shostakovitch

A violin concerto by the Swiss composer, Frank Martin, was introduced to this country by Joseph Szigeti and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos last night in Carnegie Hall. With Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony as its other extensive item, the program was one of contemporary music, except for the Bach organ prelude and fugue in G minor at the beginning, performed in the conductor's orchestral arrangement.

Mr. Martin, now sixty-two, has become known in this country only in recent years, but what has been heard here has marked him as a composer of unusual individuality and significance. The violin concerto was first played in Basel in January; Mr. Szigeti has introduced it to France, Holland and Great Britain. In its course of slightly over half an hour, it has three movements. Composed immediately after Mr. Martin's settings of Ariel's songs from "The Tempest," the concerto, according to his own note, retains some of their atmosphere, and also borrows a theme.

There are, indeed, some hints of this aspect of Shakespeare's play in parts of the concerto; a certain remote, mysterious imaginative atmosphere, prominent particularly at the beginning and end of the first movement and often in the andante, which is connected with the finale without an intervening pause. The style is individual and homogeneous, often lyric in character without sharply defined tunefulness, along with some contrasting dissonant elements. The actual range of color and mood did not seem wide, but there were finely wrought distinctions in both respects within these limits. The imaginative appeal varied; the finale brought a certain let-down, with a rather grayish sort of momentum; here there was no hint of Ariel. The scoring was notable in its balance between the solo violin and the ensemble; in concerted episodes, the violin part floated over the orchestra without being overborne by it. Mr. Szigeti played it both with skill and imaginative understanding, an interpretative atmosphere corresponding with that of the score.

The orchestra gave Mr. Szigeti admirable co-operation, and its performance of the Shostakovitch symphony was eloquent, vivid in color, sonorous, but clear in detail. In its first local performance in three and a half years, it gave an impression of considerable emotional intensity and variety, of outspoken melody and highly effective scoring—but also one of occasional longueurs, unevenness of musical ideas. The nostalgically Mahlerian quality of the second movement was emphasized in Mr. Mitropoulos' unhurried interpretation, and the finale suggested the influence of the march in Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony. The Bach transcription also found the Philharmonic in admirable form.

FESTIVAL OF MUSIC ATTENDED BY 15,000

$40,000 Spectacle at Garden Marks Federation of Jewish Philanthropies' 35th Year

An audience of 15,000 assembled at Madison Square Garden last night for the Festival of Music, presented at a cost of $40,000 by the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of New York to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of its founding.

The arena was transformed into a vast concert hall for the occasion, with a seventy-foot stage at the northern end and the suggestion of a proscenium achieved by means of white ropes stretched taut from ceiling to stage at either side and additional white ropes looped across the stage space as if they were the folds of parted curtains.

The boxes and the two side balconies were draped with blue and white bunting and cleanly focused cones of white light cut through the crowd-filled darkness to pick out the musicians, speakers and dancers who took their turn on the stage to appear before the members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, whose white ties and black tails completed the black and white scheme devised for the festival by Richard Rychtarik.

Dimitri Mitropoulos opened the program, conducting the orchestra in the National Anthem. Then Olin Downes came forward to welcome the audience and read a message from President-elect Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Message From the General

"I extend my congratulations to the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of New York on its thirty-fifth anniversary, which you are celebrating in so grand a fashion this evening," the message said. "Every New Yorker can well be proud of the splendid achievements of your member hospitals and social welfare agencies, which do so much for all of our fellow-citizens.

"I recall that two years ago I was privileged to address a gathering of Federation's volunteer workers and supporters. And I was deeply impressed by the devotion of these men and women to the health and well-being of the New York community. Such devotion cannot help but rebound to the welfare of our entire nation. I wish Federation continued success in all its efforts. Your work and the support the people of New York voluntarily give to you are wonderful examples of American democracy in action."

Mr. Mitropoulos' transcription of Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor was the first of the musical numbers. It was followed by the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, with Yehudi Menuhin as the soloist. The violinist was applauded so warmly that he returned to play an unaccompanied Bach Prelude as an encore.

After the intermission, Mrs. William J. Rosenwald, chairman of the festival, introduced Milton Weill, president of the Federation.

"Tonight highlights an important milestone in Federation's history," said Mr. Weill. "It celebrates three and a half decades of continuous service to the community in which all of us live and work. Our 116 agencies—hospitals, community centers, child care agencies, summer camps, homes for the aged and family guidance agencies—have often been pioneering agencies. At all times they try to meet with kindness and understanding the human needs that come to their doors.

May Be Annual Event

"Thus it is that tonight we have taken time out to celebrate our thirty-fifth anniversary, not with a profit-making or fund-raising event, but instead with this wonderful festival. I would tell you, incidentally, that this festival may well become an annual event to which, I hope, all of you will look forward."

A burst of applause followed the expression of this hope, clearly indicating that the audience was enjoying the type of program that had been devised by Leon Leonioff.

After Mr. Mitropoulos had led the orchestra in Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol, Leon Barzin took over the podium for the first of the ballet numbers, the Grand Pas de Deux from Minkus' "Don Quixote," which was danced by Alicia Markova and Andre Eglevsky.

Hilde Gueden, Metropolitan Opera soprano, then sang Musetta's Waltz from "La Boheme" and "Sempre Libera" from "Traviata." An encore was also called for from the Viennese singer, and she obliged with the Csardas from Johann Strauss' "Fledermaus."

Miss Markova returned to dance Pavlova's famous number "The Dying Swan" and the evening was brought to a close with the New York City Ballet Company presenting the ballet George Balanchine has based on Bizet's Symphony in C. Melissa Hayden, Nicholas Magallanes, Tanaquil LeClerq and Francisco Moncion were the featured dancers.

New York Philharmonic Displays Power, Virtuosity in Concert

By Alice Eversman

The New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, making what has become an annual appearance in Constitution Hall, played with consistent vitality and exuberance throughout the concert last night. The program gave the musicians plenty of opportunity in this direction and the conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos, is not one to seek calmness deliberately.

All told, there was a great display of power and, more rewardingly, of the virtuosity of the group. The precision of these musicians and their obliviousness to difficulties, either technical or musical, is one of the outstanding features of their performances.

With all the polish, the orchestral tone held real beauty and suavity only at intervals, although always clear and accurate. But it has a quality of excitement ranging through all the voices, particularly prominent last night in the fine playing of the woodwind and brass. These were called upon for special services in Mitropoulos' transcription of Bach's "Fantasia and Fugue, G Minor," with which the program opened. With their use, the conductor gave new color to several parts of Bach's great work, enlarging its horizons by a fresh concept of sound.

It was difficult to discover, however, the fundamental Bach quality in the brilliant orchestral arrangement where everything in the dramatic "Fantasia" and in the powerful "Fugue" was amplified in stormy fashion. The first to transfer the "Fantasia" to the larger medium of the orchestra, Mr. Mitropoulos has made a tremendous show piece out of the entire work, which by its very strength and opulence is overpowering. At the same time, the noble dignity of Bach, always present in his most dramatic effects, was not underscored, its place being taken by a theatrical bigness and a volume of sound never imagined by the composer from the organ. Not that there is anything against the use of the facilities of the modern orchestra to enhance the power and beauty of Bach's music.

Mitropoulos' transcription held many interesting and far-seeing ideas. In particular, the juxtaposion of the orchestra voices for expressiveness was original and often quite startling. The ensemble playing, however, was frequently strident, the violins sounding shrill, especially in the beginning.

Mr. Mitropoulos, who has the most active shoulders of any conductor, gained his effects in Beethoven's "Symphony No. 8, F major, Op. 93," mostly by their use and by descriptive gestures. The tempo was maintained about the same through the four movements, so there was no trouble on that score, nor was there for the fine nuances he developed at intervals. It all moved very fast, without differentiation for mood, and without time for the many intriguing instances of Beethoven's fantasy to be appreciated. Nor was there effort given to stressing the delicacy that highlights the symphony at moments in the emphasis placed on its more vigorous characteristics. The orchestra's performance was most skillful and notable throughout for its exactness and musicality.

The conductor has his individualistic approach to these giants among composers but it cannot be said that more is added to the understanding or the enjoyment thereby. He was much more thoughtful in his reading of Shostakovich's "Symphony No. 5, Op. 47," in which he tried to inject some depth. The concert was the second of the American University Concerts' Evening Series and was attended by a large, appreciative audience.

Philharmonic, Shostakovich Well-Teamed

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

The New York Philharmonic symphony came to Constitution hall last night under its present conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos, to be greeted by a large and gravely attentive audience.

This is the nation's oldest symphonic group, also its largest. But one cannot with confidence assert that it is the best. The sound of the orchestra is not without flaw. The fault seems to lie chiefly in the violins, divided, left and right, first and second, with the cellos lurking behind the firsts from which they emerge from time to time in timid foray. The violins are similarly masked by the second violins but are found assertive.

Effectiveness Reduced

In Constitution hall, at least, this so-called "classic" orchestra is less effective than the "modern" orchestra of Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland and may other important groups.

This is because the violins and, to a great extent, the other strings, form the heart of the orchestra.

The second violins, playing with the backs of their instruments to the listener, produce a tone that sounds coarse, whereas the firsts are by turns shrill and brilliant, but rarely sympathetic. Meanwhile, the 'cellos, weaker of tone, are quite generally overwhelmed, tho the violas penetrate the ensemble.

Thus it happens that while the soloists of the orchestra in woodwinds and brasses are of distinguished ability and attainment, their virtues seem isolated by the contrasting string quality.

This, at least, is the effect, in Constitution hall—an edifice not famous for its acoustics. Doubtless, this orchestra sounds better in Carnegie hall. In fact, having heard it there, I am sure of it.

Conductor no Showman

Despite this adverse impression of his acoustic judgment in orchestral values, one is disposed to describe Mitropoulos as a great conductor. His manner is active, but his gestures all have significance and are addressed to the players and not to the public. He is no showman.

Last night's program closed with the Symphony No. 5 by Shostakovich and, according to current American habit, this work eclipsed, in effect, the classics of Bach and Beethoven that had preceded it.

As it becomes familiar, the public learns to expect from this Shostakovich page elements of excitement, of drama, and of sardonic derision that do not appear in contemporary West music, and certainly are not to be found in the classics.

It may be noted especially that the second movement, which resembles a slow waltz, is an expression of bitterness and of sardonic and almost sadistic satisfaction. By no standards of beauty is it a subject for admiration, but it is enormously expressive and it excites and impresses at the same time.

The first movement spreads a misty pageant of sound from which gleams dull fires that burst, finally, into bright flame. This also is impressive.

Projected With Conviction

The performance was of a high order. Mitropoulos feels and understands this music and projects it with every accent of conviction. He likewise made the gay and difficult F Major symphony of Beethoven a study in beautifully planned nuance, taking occasion to exhibit the unusual talents of his French horn, bassoon and oboe players.

The concert opened with a transcription of Bach's Organ Fantasie and Fugue in G Minor from the pen of Mitroupolos. In this setting, the conductor proved again his knowledge of every orchestra resource which he employed with fine results and with due regard for the spirit, if not the tradition, of Bach.

Orchestra Superb in Last Work

By Paul Hume

The performance of the Fifth Symphony of Domitri Shostakovich last night by the New York Philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos was one of the great accounts of any such work in our experience.

The symphony will be 15 years old Thursday, dating from the time of its first hearing in Leningrad in 1937. It is familiar music, which in 15 years has not lost any of its original power of attraction, even though those years have exposed its lesser moments, as years show up the weak spots in many fine scores.

To this music Mitropoulos brought his superb gifts of understanding, of timing, and of dramatic statement. His control of what one advertiser in the program describes as "America's greatest orchestra" enables him to make the most accurately controlled dynamic and rhythmic gradations.

His knowledge of this, as of every score he plays, permits him a freedom of conception that underlines the music's structure. The first movement illustrated all that was to come in building the larger line of a work, never allowing a detail of the moment to be obscured, but never permitting it to obtrude itself unduly.

The orchestra's response was immaculate and filled with beauty, whether in quiet or tumultuous moments. There will be those who clai mthe drums were too loud; that is nothing more than the seating of the orchestra on the stage, which is identical with the pattern of the National Symphony, where the complaint is also heard. It all depends, in our tricky hall, on where you sit.

The sound of the Philharmonic in its finest moment is one of the most beautiful sounds in all music. It was frequently heard in the Shostakovich.

It is particularly painful to have to report that practically all of this excellent splendor was reserved for the second half of the concert. Opening the program was Mitropoulos' own transcription of one of the mightiest of all Bach works, the G Minor Fantasy and Fugue.

Mitropoulos is a remarkable pianist, conductor, and musician of the highest intellect. But he is not an organist, and he chooses to ignore certain principles of music written for the organ in arranging its music for orchestra. There are many reasons why his transcription is poor, per se, and ugly as sound. They never cease to surprise us.

His Beethoven Eighth Symphony suffered from a driving pace, overinsistence upon forced string tone, and heavily placed accents that make the work seem hardly more than bombast. But, brother, that Shostakovich!

Katina Paxinou, center, and the Greek chorus in "Electra"

By BROOKS ATKINSON

Anyone who wants to know how Sophocles' "Electra" should be acted is directed to the Mark Hellinger Theatre during the rest of this week. For the National Theatre of Greece has stopped by for a visit and, with Katina Paxinou in the leading part, it knows how to bring a venerable classic to majestic life. It opened with the first of two productions last evening.

Since Sophocles' "Electra" is nearly 2,400 years old, Broadway is a little out of touch with the style of Greek tragedy; and, since most Broadway savants do not speak either ancient or modern Greek, they may be forgiven for not knowing much about the spiritual content of those plays. The English translations, prepared by conscientious scholars, are not inviting. They are written either in labored doggerel or uninspired prose.

The Greek National Theatre's version is a translation into modern Greek by J. Gryparis. Like the original, it consists in some long periods of declamation. Since slaves did all the hard work in Greece in the time of Sophocles, people had more time for talk than most of us do today. Presumably the poetry of the current translation has a beauty that cannot be recognized by people ignorant of the language.

But the production and the performance have a stately beauty that anyone can admire. C. Clonis has transformed the huge stage into the entrance to the royal palace of Argos. Although the setting is enormous, it has a simplicity of design that keeps the production from appearing to be heavy. And the steps provide a wide, dramatic playing area for the chorus and actors.

Everything is dramatically imposing in the performance — the measured, full-toned acting laden with formal tragedy, the costumes and the lighting. But the orchestrated score composed by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the direction of the chorus are the contributions to this "Electra" that seem most nearly unique. Mr. Mitropoulos' score introduces the tragedy with some eerie string music and some baleful sounds from the kettledrums; it underscores the most dramatic episodes in the legend, and it provides some odes for the chorus to sing. Quite apart from its value as tragic music, the score helps to give the performance depth and eloquence.

This is the first production of a Greek tragedy in this theatregoer's experience that has known what to do with the chorus. Usually the chorus is a rather embarrassed line of confused maidens who wish they knew what they are doing. But the Greek National Theatre has drawn them straight into the heart of the performance as counsel on the one hand and audience on the other.

Their formal movement, their balanced grouping, their synchronized gestures to point up dramatic moments in the play, their awed orchestral chants and their grief-laden singing are extraordinarily beautiful and are a vital part of the performance. Remove the chorus from the stage, and this "Electra" would lose its spiritual magnificence. No doubt the ancient Greek dramatists regarded the chorus as an integral part of the whole tragic experience, as it is in Loukia Sakellariou's choreography and in Dimitri Rondiris' direction.

The pace of the performance is consciously deliberate, and most of the acting is reserved in style, though forcefully stated. As Electra, the vengeful daughter of the royal family, grief-stricken, resolute in her hatreds and loyalties, Miss Paxinou gives a powerful performance. It is a portrait of tragedy—grim and hideous, for Miss Paxinou always has the courage of her convictions and a voice resonant enough to express them.

As Clytaemnestra, A. Raftopoulou gives a royal performance full of royal authority, and with the stature of a queen. By way of contrast, Rita Myrat's Chrysothemis has the softness and timidity of a princess who is avoiding an epochal feud. The Orestes of Thanos Cotsopoulos, the Paedagogus of J. Apostolides and the Aegisthus of N. Hadziscos have weight and splendor; and the Chorus Leader by H. Zafiriou has the frightened alertness of a woman facing terrible decisions.

Now we know that Sophocles' "Electra" is more than a schoolbook myth. The National Theatre of Greece knows how to transmute it into a tragedy that still retains heroic stature after nearly 2,400 years of squalid history.

'Electra' Looks Great But Dialogue Is in Greek!

By ROBERT COLEMAN

By arrangement with ANTA, Guthrie McClintic presented the National Theatre of Greece to America at the Mark Hellinger Theatre last evening. The initial presentation was Sophocles' "Electra," in a modern Greek translation by J. Gryparis, with music by Dimitri Mitropoulos.

Katina Paxinou, known to many theatre and film patrons, is starred in the title role. Assisting her are Thanos Cotsopoulos, as Orestes; A. Raftopoulou, as Clytaemnestra; Rita Myrat, as Chrysothemis; N. Hadziscos, as Aegisthus; J. Apostolides, as Paedagogus.

It is difficult for one unfamiliar with Greek to evaluate properly acting in that language. Even more difficult than acting in French, for at least we can follow some of that. So in this instance we must rely more upon sight than sound for judgment.

From the standpoint of sight, this production looms as an impressive one. In effective scenery by C. Clonis and staged by Dimitri Rondiris, "Electra" becomes a series of vivid episodes. These are skilfully linked together by a chorus led by H. Zafiriou.

A number of the lines appear to be delivered in a singing, almost moaning voice, rather than in declamatory style. The movement is remarkably economical. Moods are achieved by the posture of the body rather than by hand and arm waving. We should say, after our visit to the Hellinger, that the National Theatre of Greece is well worth your consideration.

Incidentally, it is getting so that a drama critic nowadays must be an accomplished linguist to cover the theatre in New York. There is the Renaud-Barrault company from France at the Ziegfeld, and now the Paxinou-Menotis company from Greece at the Hellinger.

We would be kidding you if we pretended that we understood a great deal of the French or any of the Greek. So we can only tell you that they look more interesting than they sound. We think you might like to see them.

Somber Classic

Electra, Sophocles' tragedy presented by Guthrie McClintic at the Mark Hellinger Theatre. The production is under the auspices of the National Theatre of Greece. Katina Paxinou is featured. Dimitri Rondiris staged the play and Dimitri Mitropoulos wrote the music. Setting by C. Clonis. Costumes by Antonios Phocas.

Last week students of the theatre got a chance to see how a modern French company interprets old plays. This week, at the Mark Hellinger Theatre, the National Theatre of Greece is showing us how Sophocles' great drama of matricide, Electra, ought to look and sound. Spoken in modern Greek, the play is principally of interest to those who care about staging, costuming and the use of the Greek chorus. There is also the powerful emotional acting of Katina Paxinou, but only the speakers of Greek in the first night audience (and there were quite a number) could consistently relate expression to incident.

The Electra is definitely for those who have curiosity about the development of the theatre from classic antiquity. But with this reservation, there is much meat for a limited audience. The Greek theatre, at the time Sophocles wrote (he lived 497-406 B.C.), still depended as much on the chorus as on individual actors, having until recently not used actors at all as they are used today. The chorus of the present Electra, composed of women garbed in somber robes and head-dresses, remains the most eloquent aspect of the evening. Here we see reflected in slow rhythm the passions which race through the mind of the bitter Electra, as she determines to kill her mother. Clytaemnestra and her stepfather, Aegisthus. These movements are expertly directed, and no knowledge of Greek is needed to catch the import of the chants and prose commentaries spoken by the group. Dimitri Mitropoulos' score is helpful, too, setting the tone of the tragedy from the very beginning and reinforcing the atmosphere of disappointment and hate at intervals throughout the evening.

The others in the cast are all quietly expert in their way, but aside from A. Raftopoulou's Clytaemnestra, there are no really large parts. It might have been better from a casting viewpoint, incidentally, if an older woman had been chosen for Clytaemnestra, for the mother seemed in age a contemporary of her daughter, Electra.

The setting, representing the front of the palace of Atreus, is high and dim, clothed in sad colors appropriate to the action. The arrangement of steps before the palace entrance facilitates the disposition of the chorus very well indeed. Electra is an attempt to turn the clock back more than 2,400 years. Only the ancient Greeks themselves would be able to judge the success of this effort, but to this observer it seemed that all that serious and thoughtful direction and acting could do had been done.

STAGE

Katina Paxinou Great In Exciting 'Electra'

by Whitney Bolton

The theatre of Broadway, deep in the throes of coping with foreign languages, turns now from the players in French to the players in Greek and offers Miss Katina Paxinou, probably her nation's most distinguished actress, in an exciting production of the "Electra" of Sophocles. Guthrie McClintic, in an arrangement with ANTA, has brought the National Theatre of Greece to the Mark Hellinger Theatre and I, for one, am more than pleased that he did.

The language of the play is no major barrier to appreciation of its performances, its staging and its force. Miss Paxinou, the lady who won a Hollywood Oscar and could not again get another job in films, proving that the little golden godlet is a major curse in the plaster city, demonstrates here the ancient truism that mostly motion picture makers don't know what they are doing and have little concept of the acting riches in their own town. Why Miss Paxinou could not get a job in films after winning the highest honor that films can give is a mystery for which, I'm certain, there is no agreeable answer.

The best support for Miss axinou comes from Thanos Cotpoulos as Orestes, stalwart, rich voice and bearing, a vigorous gure of revenge. His acting is at best as he contemplates his ster's grief over not only the aying of their father but her lief that her brother, too, is dead. The impact of her grief on him is tremendous and, when he at last reveals himself and prepares to avenge their father's murder he arrives at a full color. Young and striding, he makes an interesting opposite to the tumbled, distraught Electra.

Costumes, Set Blend

Antonios Phocas has designed costumes with a view to the strength of a stage filled with sombre hues echoing the sombre hearts of the characters on the stage. His costumes are in tone with the brooding setting by C. Clonis, the palace of Atreus in monotone gray with flat, running walls and simple lines. Dimitri Mitropoulos has composed a score which augments the major scenes and provides fitting mood for the lamenting chorus of 15 voices.

Altogether this is an eminently respectable production, accomplished with devotion by its cost and most especially by its gifted star.

The modern Greek translation by J. Gryparis is described by those who speak Greek as being a sincere and honest work. I can only report that Miss Paxinou and her company provide an evening of theatre that its tragedy playing at its conceivable test.

After last night's performance at the Mark Hellinger, though I didn't understand a single word, I am prepared to swear that Greek is the most beautiful of languages. to their music. In fact, the production of Sophocles' "Electra" that has opened their too-brief engagement is like an austere, touching opera, in which the background music and the chorus' chanting and formalized movements are an important feature.

Frankly, I went last night expecting to admire though not particularly enjoy the foreign players and found their "Electra," which will continue through Sunday's matinee, a rewarding and fascinating experience. In recent years we've had memorable work by Judith Anderson in "Medea" and Laurence Olivier in "Oedipus Rex," but this new presentation of a Greek classic, for over-all impact and general excellence, is outstanding.

Expertly Staged

Everything's right under the knowing direction of Dimitri Rondiris, which is most evident in his imaginative, sympathetic treatment of the chorus, and everything fits together nobly. "Electra" at the outset creates an ominous feeling from the low-rumbling grandeur of Dimitri Mitropoulos' fine background score and the massive simplicity of C. Clonis' portico of an ancient palace, and then proceeds with authority and eloquence to explore the sorrowing tragedy of Sophocles' tale.

Miss Paxinou has done good work in our films and several Broadway productions, but nothing that she has done before over here touches the quality and resourcefulness of her current performance. Her Electra is a most impressive figure of spirit and grief, her richly timbred, beautifully modulated voice a constant pleasure. About the merits of the script itself, which was translated by J. Gryparis into modern Greek, I can't presume to say, being entirely unfamiliar with the language, but judging by the ease with which it is tossed off by all the players, he has performed his job well.

Electra's Hope

Although the Hellinger's playbill contains a synopsis, it would be wiser, to derive more enjoyment and meaning from the various scenes, to prepare yourself beforehand by reading a complete translation—Richard C. Jebb's is a good one. The story, which Eugene O'Neill borrowed for "Mourning Becomes Electra," as you undoubtedly know, centers around Electra's long dream that her brother, Orestes, will return from exile and slay their mother, Clytaemnestra, for having murdered their father, Agamemnon, with the aid of her lover, Aegisthus, who is also their uncle.

Generally, in modern-day productions of the Greek classics, the traditional women's chorus is far more likely to be an embarrassment than of value, but this time is an exception. They constitute one of the prime virtues of the performance and continually add to the emotional depth and impact of the story by their sensitive reactions to the unhappy events. Their diction, what I could tell of it, is impeccable and they have the most caressing of voices.

Fine Company

Like the French troupe, which has taken over the Ziegfeld, this is a well-drilled company of artists whose ensemble playing reflects the easy, assured teamwork that comes from playing together a long time, and they give Miss Paxinou excellent support. Thanos Cotsopoulos makes a manly and forceful Orestes, J. Apostolides a dignified Paedagogus, Rita Myrat a soft and appealing Chrysothemis, and A. Raftopoulou's queen is a sharp and crisp portrayal.

Next Monday the Greek players will open a week's engagement of Alexis Minotis in "Oedipus Rex." All lovers of the theater as an art form owe a debt of gratitude to Guthrie McClintic for sponsoring their local appearance.

MARK HELLINGER THEATER

The tragedy by Sophocles, in modern Greek, staged by Dimitri Rondiris, settings by C. Clonis, costumes by Antonios Phocas, choreography by Loukia Sakellariou, music by Dimitri Mitropoulos, presented by Guthrie McClintic, with the following cast:

Paedagogus	J. Apostolides

Electra	Katina Paxinou
Chrysothemis	Rita Myrat
Clytaemnestra	A. Raftopoulou
Aegisthus	N. Hadziscos

THIS is turning into international month along Broadway. With the Barrault troupe happily established at the Ziegfeld, Guthrie McClintic, in association with the American National Theater and Academy, has now brought us the National Theater of Greece in two of its most distinguished productions. The first of these, Sophocles' "Electra" in a modern Greek rendering by J. Gryparis, opened at the Mark Hellinger last night, and it offers the theater student an always distinguished, frequently vivid, insight into the tragic methods of the past.

The curtain rises on an enormously evocative image—the sombre, hauntingly lighted doorways of the palace of Atreus. Against a brooding musical background, the lamentations of Electra—longing for the return of a brother who will avenge their father's murder—are heard. Soon Sophocles' passionately embittered heroine, in the stunning person of Katina Paxinou, slips out from the dim recesses of the curse-ridden palace.

Miss Paxinou begins her work quietly. She has even a shade of tenderness to show toward the weak-willed Chrysothemis, the pliant and soft-spoken sister who cannot be brought to feel the need for vengeance. As the play moves forward, and Electra's hopes for retribution seem doomed to defeat, the actress increases her intensity. Her eyes flash fire as she deals with the murderous Clytemnestra, her lip curls above bared teeth as she fiercely contemplates taking the law into her own hands. To the psychological complexities of this demanding role Miss Paxinou brings a wealth of visual and vocal beauty.

It is possible to have minor reservations about last evening's performance of the part. There are times when Miss Paxinou seems to be remembering an earlier performance, rather than forging a fresh one out of the urgent inspiration of the moment. Especially is this true of those long passages in which Electra must listen, tormented, to the cynical defense which Clytemnestra sets up for the murder of Agamemnon. And there are other moments, including several in which Electra is left alone with the chorus, when the star's vocal usage tends to run toward plainsong rather than passion. But we are immediately compensated by the very moving form which Miss Paxinou has found for the episode in which she clasps her brother's ashes to her breast, and again by the furious exultation of her climactic triumph. In all, this is a performance of taste and stature, and we must be grateful for the opportunity we have of seeing it.

Miss Paxinou is tremendously aided by the vigor and resonance which Thanos Cotsopoulos brings to the role of Orestes, and it is in the showy recognition scene between brother and sister that the present production achieves its strongest emotional impact. The Clytemnestra of A. Raftopoulou is regal and insinuating; there is, though, an underlying softness about Miss Raftopoulou's work which keeps the clash between this demonic mother and her challenging daughter from achieving its full sting, its maximum venom.

Perhaps nothing in the production at the Hellinger is more illuminating than its use of the traditional Greek chorus. Both the extreme formality of this device, and its present-day unfamiliarity, tend to make it a stumbling block in most contemporary productions of Greek tragedy. Here there is a happy acceptance of its dramatic, rather than its merely musical value to the action of the play. Moving simply and fluidly, speaking in perfect unison, the chorus —under the choreographic guidance of Loukia Sakellariou—again and again adds urgency to the mounting tension, gives point and poignance to the sufferings of the principals by responding so sensitively to each new mood. This "Electra" finds genuine theatrical excitement in the chorus' sudden approach to the audience or in the apprehension with which it waits outside the Atrean palace while delayed justice is done.

Sophocles has been well served by an accomplished acting company, and Broadway has been well served by Mr. McClintic's determination that this impressive modern work, born of a magnificent earlier tradition, should be brought to these shores.

TWO·on·the·AISLE

By Richard Watts Jr.

The Greek Theater Offers 'Electra'

Tonight a play is going to open that will be acted in English, and it is likely to seem a little odd to us erudite and international-minded drama critics. Having improved ourselves in the French tongue through a couple of impressive sessions with Jean-Louis Barrault's brilliant company from Paris, we turned jauntily to modern Greek last evening, when the National Theater of Greece offered a version in that language of Sophocles' "Electra" at the Mark Hellinger, with Katina Paxinou appearing in the title role.

"Electra" is, of course, one of the great plays of world dramatic literature, and I wish I were in a position to tell you about the quality of the translation into modern Greek that has been made by J. Gryparis. All I can say is that the performance has both force and classic dignity and that Mme. Paxinou brings a dynamic power to her playing. It is, I think, good for us to see the work of the national theaters of lands that regard the drama as a noble art.

Mme. Paxinou is, of course, a familiar figure to American audiences, who have seen her on the stage in "Hedda Gabler" and "The House of Bernarda Alba" and in the films in "For Whom the Bell Tolls" and "Mourning Becomes Electra." I must admit that, in English, she has always seemed to me a passionate but curiously unbelievable actress. It is clear that she is far better equipped for the classic drama of her native land, and, as the embittered and vengeful daughter of Agamemnon, she is unquestionably a powerful and impressive figure.

Force and Authority

Looking strikingly like Judith Anderson and playing with some of that magnificent performer's elemental force, Mme. Paxinou dominates the stage with such authority that it is obvious the unfortunate Clytemnestra hasn't a chance against her. The very qualities that make Katina Paxinou unconvincing in the modern drama add to her impressiveness in classic Greek tragedy. She always seems just a trifle larger than life, and her ability to tear a passion to tatters in the grand manner equips her handsomely for the role of the Sophocles heroine.

'Electra'

The drama by Sophocles was presented last night in modern Greek at the Mark Hellinger Theater by Guthrie McClintic. It was staged by Dimitri Rondiris, the set was by C. Clonis, the costumes by Antonios Phocas, and the music by Dimitri Mitropoulos. The cast included Katina Paxinou, Thanos Cotsopoulos, J. Apostolides, Rita Myrat, A. Raftopoulou, N. Hadziscos, H. Zafiriou and Al Deliyannis.

Since "Electra" is a static play, despite the fluid movement of the women of the chorus, and, of course, a declamatory one, it does not make for the liveliest theatergoing in the world for audiences unfamiliar with modern Greek. Fortunately, however, its narrative is simple and elemental and is, I imagine, well-known to most people who go to plays, so it is by no means difficult to follow in the current performance, and the National Theater of Greece is clearly a distinguished organization worthy of the country and civilization it represents.

The production has been staged by Dimitri Rondiris with dignity and austerity, and the power of the drama is captured in the work of both the principals and the chorus. The proper quality is maintained in the setting by C. Clonis, in Antonios Phocas' costumes, and, particularly, in the effective background music composed by Dimitri Mitropoulos. There can be no doubt of the general impressiveness of the visitors from Greece.

'Electra':

Magnificently Acted And Produced

By JOHN McCLAIN

A SEGMENT of the National Theatre of Greece arrived in these parts last night and presented, under the auspices of Guthrie McClintic, an interpretation of "Electra" by Sophocles, delivered entirely in modern Greek.

Katina Paxinou, memorable from American movies, played the stellar role, and established the fact that she is a profound pantomimmist and a actress of depth and diversity.

She was surrounded by a company of extremely capable compatriots. It didn't seem to matter that the language, sounding like a series of sibilant toothpaste commercials, conveyed no meaning to the bulk of the audience.

It was, simply, a pageant of mood and motion, and it told the age-old story with as much impact as though it had been hot from the pen of Mickey Spillane.

Limited Appeal

All this was aided immeasurably by an offstage orchestra which supplied an unobtrusive accompaniment to the evening, and a chorus of shrouded ladies to reveal the principal characters in high relief. In stylized terms this is probably the best production of "Electra" you'll see in your time.

But in terms of entertainment for the average theatre-goer there are bound to be serious reservations. Not many of us speak Greek, few are familiar enough with the plot of "Electra" to follow it without the aid of some dialogue from the actors and it is not a story which will sustain itself simply as a charade.

It emerges, thus, as a magnificently produced and performed spectacle with a limited appeal.

Chorus of women: A. Bellou, A. Capellari, C. Capitsinea, V. Cassavou, I. Cofino, P. Condou, V. Deliyanni, M. Georgala, A. Gregorea, Th. Joannidou, R. Michalopoulou, C. Myrat, J. Vassalou, E. Vozikiadou.

This particular gift the Greek National Theatre bears to New York's Mark Hellinger Theatre. Sophocles' "Electra," is impressive, vigorous, eye-filling and non-commercial. Producer Guthie McClintic, who is presenting the troupe by arrangement with ANTA, deserves special kudos for making this experience in the theatre possible for those who take dramatic art seriously. They, together with New York's Greek population, should comfortably fill the theatre for the skedded eight performances.

The language barrier (it's in modern Greek) seems not such a handicap as non-French at Jean-Louis Barrault's current productions, for the Electra story is well-known, treating as it does the original "father - complex heroine," who is wrought up over her mother's murder of said father, and whose revenge is frustrated by her own weakness.

Katina Paxinou is superb as Electra, displaying all the intensity which marked her pic appearances as Pilar in "For Whom the Bell Tolls" and Christine, the mother, in "Mourning Becomes Electra." But Electra also offers here an opportunity for enormous emotional and vocal range, as she tongue-lashes her mother, weeps quietly to the chorus, is anguished when she hears her brother is dead, elated when he returns to kill their mother, and savage at the end, as she listens with satisfaction to the death cries of her mother.

Supporting company is uniformly tops—Thanos Cotsopoulos as a frank and likeable Orestes, a contrast to his complex-ridden sister; A. Raftopoulou as their harsh but fearful mother; Rita Myrat as their sister, who prefers pretty clothes to revenge; J. Apostolides as an apprehensive tutor; N. Hadziscos as the mother's swaggering lover, and H. Zafiriou, whose acting is a fine study in subtlety as the chorus leader.

Unlike the self-conscious chorus in "Medea," or the uncontrolled one in "Tower Beyond Tragedy," this group of 14 women and a chorus leader is a heavy production asset, their patterned movements providing a graceful frame for the tragic action.

Director Dimitri Rondiris has staged the production in classic style, with action and dialog paramount to "buiness" and technique.

Atmosphere of stark grandeur results from tasteful blend of C. Clonis' setting (facade of the palace upstage, its steps leading downstage, with level playing areas midway and on a built-up apron); Antonios Phocas' costumes in blues, golds and mauves, and artistic lighting supervised by Klaus Holm.

The melodiously inflected speeches of J. Gryparis' modern Greek translation (skillfully punctuated with silences) and Dimitri Mitropoulos' exciting background music add voltage to "Electra."

With the French currently having their innings at the Ziegfeld, the Greeks have temporarily taken over the Mark Hellinger drama-wise. Via the efforts of producer Guthrie McClintic, in association with the American National Theater and Academy, and the financial assistance of local Greek ship-owners, the company of the National Theater of Greece arrives for a two-week stand. Whether the venture will be a financial success would seem to depend largely on the interest and enthusiasm of those that know the language. But it can be reported from an initial sampling that the troupe offers a brand of theater gaited to lovers of the drama in any idiom.

For its first stanza, the company is presenting Sophocles' "Electra," translated into modern Greek by one J. Gryparis. Oddly enough, tho practically no word is understandable, the colloquial switchover loses nothing orally of the classic majesty of the original, and Dimitri Rondiris has staged it likewise in the classic form, with slight allowances for a more dramatic use of a female chorus and rugged background music to point up the dramatic impact of the tragedy. Also, the drama is played in its entirety without intermission which, while making for lengthy sitting, builds its fullest impact without interruption.

Katina Paxinou

This reporter has both moderately liked and disliked Katina Paxinou's work in English. However, in this title role and in her native tongue, he takes every thing back. As the self-tortured, vengeance-driven Electra, Madame Paxinou makes what must be an exhausting, elocutionary tour-de-force always vital and sometimes fairly stunning. No one needs to understand a word she is saying, voice inflection and a superb use of hands do the trick. It is a portrait that likely would have pleased old Sophocles himself.

The star gets excellent support from her fellows of the National Theater, some of whose first names are quaintly designated only by initials. Thus it can be reported that A. Raftopoulou makes an effective Clytaemnestra. H. Zafiriou is outstanding as the leader of an exceedingly well-drilled chorus, and J. Apostolides is sonorously fine as the tutor Thanos Cotsopoulos is properly rugged, avenging Orestes, and Rita Myrat's soft-fibered sister provides a sharp foil for Electra's stark hatreds.

Production-wise, as to settting, lighting and costuming, these Greeks have a word for it—fine theater. A reporter has a word for them—they're heartily welcome here.

Theater

Paxinou Is an Electric Electra

By WILLIAM HAWKINS.

Nobody who sees Katina Paxinou play "Electra" will ever forget how she made him feel. In a season increasingly filled with adventures and surprises, this presentation by the Greek National Theater, in its native tongue, is a rare and astonishing experience.

In its own style of grand simplicity, the offering is distinguished by the fact that if you could separate its visual, aural and emotional elements, each would stand without the other two in a purity of achievement all its own.

Elemental Emotions.

The Greek sparseness often seems harsh and chilly to us. Instead of doing things on the stage the characters listen, feel and express. Their deeds occur elsewhere, and we are met only by the resultant feelings.

The emotions of "Electra" are as elemental and irresistible as fire, air and water. The central figure despairs of avenging her murdered father, when she learns that her brother is dead and cannot help her destroy her villainous mother and uncle. Finally the brother returns, and Electra leads him to killing the murderers.

Electra is, of course, always the central figure of the play. Her devastating emotions are played out on the palace steps, where she learns hopelessness and later the ecstasy of revenge. The chorus echoes and intensifies and broadens her feelings, grouped across the broad steps around her.

Effective Chorus.

This convention of Greek theater, the chorus, is employed with vast effect here. Paxinou is shattering in her performance because she never depicts a superficial or entirely unleashed aspect of her pain. What she does is constantly battle the torture within her, so instead of showing it to you, she is making you feel it.

With all this elevated formality of expression, the actress remains utterly individual, and never becomes just a universal figure of pain or hatred or joy. The big significance of her emotion spreads out around her like ripples on water, in the reflected enlargement of her feelings in the chorus.

One expects Paxinou to cut loose and howl, to make people's hair stand on end. She does much better than that, by never releasing the violence of her character. So you are drawn into the whirlpool of her emotions as surely as if she slowly pulled you there by twisting a rope tied around your neck.

Brilliant Beauty.

The chorus in this production is remarkably well trained, as parades, half gestures, moans chants in perfectly phrased unison. It is certainly the second most important character of the play, and again that is true because of Paxinou and her relentless containment of the great tragedy's scope. She sometimes has the fleeting brilliant beauty of Garbo, and her voice seems limitless in tone and range.

The setting for the play has remarkable beauty in sturdy, simple lines, and the lighting follows the tragedy's moods with ingenuity. Twice during the play certain figures in the near dark seem to acquire a luminosity of their own. The Metropoulis score compliments the play's writhing frictions and gives a great deal of emphasis to its rhythms.

National Theater of Greece Seen in Classic Tragedies

By John Beaufort

New York

Thanks to the high-minded efforts of a number of people, New Yorkers have just been offered two weeks of Attic tragedy as played by the National Theater of Greece. The splendid performances of Sophocles' "Electra" and "Oedipus Tyrannus" have stimulated an attendance at the Mark Hellinger Theater which must have gratified the hearts and satisfied the most optimistic hopes of participants and sponsors, who have seen fit to extend the engagement for a week through the Sunday matinee, Dec. 7.

About three-quarters of the audiences have been Greek-speaking residents of this community. The remaining quarter has been made up of local theatergoers with, as Ben Jonson remarked disparagingly of Shakespeare, "small Latin and less Greek."

As far as most local patrons were concerned, the fact that the Sophoclean works had been translated into modern Greek for these productions offered about as much advantage as if they had been turned into Middle English. But theater enthusiasts have not allowed a want of Greek (classic or colloquial) to discourage them from flocking to the Hellinger in large numbers. There were standees at performances last week end. All of this is simply a further tribute to the performances of Katina Paxinou, Alexis Minotis, and their associates.

Remarkable Acting

The playing has indeed been remarkable. The high light of the fortnight's engagement has been "Oedipus Tyrannus," with Mr. Minotis as the king and Miss Paxinou (Mrs. Minotis) as Jocasta. Its prominence was due partly to its reputation as Sophocles' masterpiece, partly to the fact that its story is more familiar to most of us, partly to its greater variety of characters and to the action that accompanies the tragic events.

But accompanying all this was the fact that the stately design and flow of the production defied inattentiveness. From the opening scene of three lighted figures against a darkling background to the final exit of the blinded Oedipus, the performance vanquished, so far as possible, the barrier of language.

For its most recent "Oedipus" productions, New York has been indebted to visitors from abroad. The Old Vic acted the Yeats' translation with Sir Laurence Olivier starred. Later, the tragedy was done here in the richly florid style of Israel's Habima Theater. But the latest visitation has offered an opportunity to witness the interpretation contemporary Greek players give to their own ancient classics.

There were advance warnings that the acting style might prove too exaggerated for Broadway audiences. What has impressed this observer has been the heroic, larger-than-life quality of the acting; the dignity, the profound concentration, Mr. and Mrs. Minotis appear to have achieved successfully a compromise between the aloofness of the high tragic characters, as originally conceived, and the immediate realism of the twentieth century.

Role of Choruses

As the Minotis intended, the choruses form a kind of bridge between the remote, central figures and the spectator. The work of these ensembles has been a revelation. Their delivery of lines—whispered, declaimed, chanted, sung, spoken individually and chorally in a variety of volume and modulations—formed an integrated sound pattern the like of which is rarely heard.

The choral movements were guided with equal appreciation for the total concept. To this movement, the pleated robes, with their simplicity of design and muted colors, gave an effect of mobile, pliant human forces ready to be summoned into play at the instant demand of the action.

The male chorus for "Oedipus" was led by Thanos Cotsopoulos; the female chorus for "Electra," by H. Zafiriou. Both Mr. Cotsopoulos and Miss Zafiriou created a feeling of highly sensitized response, and both endowed the exposition with a deep awareness of tragic event and tragic mood.

Mr. Minotis, an actor of imposing force and dignity, surmounted the language handicap to an extraordinary degree in conveying Oedipus' mounting realization of his crime. Miss Paxinou, an impressive Jocasta, made much of the queen's discovery of the dreadful circumstance. The talents of an admirable supporting cast were brought into play in performances by N. Hadziscos (Creon), J. Apostolides (Teiresias), P. Zervos (the Shepherd), and St. Vocovitch (the Messenger).

If Miss Paxinou's Electra was somewhat less striking than her husband's Oedipus, it may well have been because the obstacle of language was more noticeable in "Electra." But there were some memorable moments. Not the least of these were provided by the low offstage cries (to Dimitri Mitropoulos' music) with which Miss Paxinou established the tone of the tragedy to come.

The setting for the productions was simple, spacious, and almost bare of ornamentation. The dancing, costuming, the dirgeful and percussive scores (Miss Paxinou composed the music for "Oedipus"), and other elements blended superbly to enhance the total effect of nobility and doom.

Thanks are due, therefore, first of all, to the Athenian visitors; next, to Guthrie McClintic, who has presented the plays in association with the American National Theater and Academy, and to the Greek Shipowners of New York, who provided transportation here for the company of some fifty people.

Like the Greek players, the Madeleine Renaud - Jean - Louis Barrault Company from Paris continue their local triumph. The effective pictorially as it is vocally. This rates a bow to the director, Dimitri Rondiris.

Background music is the composition of the noted conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulis, and C. Clonis designed the palace set that provides a perfect background for the action.

Guthrie McClintic, the Broadway producer and director, is presenting the company by arrangement with the American National Theater and Academy.

Greek Theatre Offers 'Electra'

By JOHN CHAPMAN

The National Theatre of Greece began a two-week stand at the Mark Hellinger Theatre last evening with a performance of Sophocles' "Electra" in modern Greek. Katina Paxinou intoned the title role.

My report, submitted herewith, can be only two-thirds complete—for, since I don't know the Greek tongue, I can tell only about what struck my eye and ear and nothing concerning what struck my mind. (Things did strike my mind, such as the notion that Mme. Paxinou suffers almost as much as Margaret Sullavan does in "The Deep Blue Sea," but these are irrelevancies.)

Excellent Chorus

"Electra" is mounted in a handsome setting of the front of a palace and all the steps leading down from it or up to it. Here Electra appears, to tell of her classic griefs and hopes of revenge. She is attended and listened to by an extraordinarily well-disciplined chorus of 16 young ladies whose groupings, poses and chants are remarkable for their grace and rigid formality. There is practically no physical action—for Mme. Paxinou seems content not to stir things up the way Judith Anderson would.

Mitropoulos Music.

To one like myself, completely ignorant of the language, the greatest pleasure of the performance is what falls upon the ear—for Dimitri Mitropoulos has composed for the production some baleful and fascinating music as a background for the drama and the choruses. And Mme. Paxinou has a voice of great range, color and intonation. She has need of it, for this translation by J. Gryparis is largely a monologue running about an hour and three-quarters.

Next week, the National Theatre of Greece will offer "Oedipus Tryannus" with Alexis Minotis, Mme. Paxinou's co-star, in the title role. Minotis was not in the cast of "Electra."

KATINA PAXINOU HEADS GREEK CAST IN 'ELECTRA'

NEW YORK, Nov. 20 (U.P.)—The foreign invasion of Broadway, with a French troupe already in successful possession of the Ziegfeld Theater, continues with the Greek flag being firmly planted at the Mark Hellinger Theater.

The National Theater of Greece company, headed by the well-known Katina Paxinou, has started a limited engagement with a rousing and moving presentation of Sophocles' classic tragedy, "Electra."

Now the regular New York playgoer knows even less Greek than he does French, but there were a lot of them in the Hellinger opening night along with what must have been a full turnout of Greek-American society, most of whom undoubtedly understood what was being said on stage.

In Modern Greek

This production is played in a modern Greek text by J. Gryparis, a translation from the ancient tongue of the original. It is easier for the non-Greek playgoer to follow than many of the productions of the Renaud-Barrault French troupe because the latter are largely unfamiliar, whereas "Electra" is a well-known story to which most regular playgoers have been exposed several times in English versions.

Miss Paxinou also is no stranger as a performer in English. She has appeared on Broadway in recent years in Ibsen's "Hedda Gabler" and Lorca's "The House of Bernarda Alba." She also has given outstanding performances in such Hollywood movies as "For Whom the Bell Tolls" and "Mourning Becomes Electra."

The star is a tragedienne of the first rank and her performance in the title role of "Electra" is a gripping experience. Her voice is a thing of distinction and she has the grand manner that such a text and role require.

Thanos Lauded

Thanos Cotsopoulos is outstanding as Orestes, the brother of Electra who comes back from exile in answer to her prayers for vengeance against their mother, Clytaemnestra, who, with her paramour, Aegistheus, murdered the children's father, Agamemnon.

The rest of the company give an excellent account of themselves and the work of the traditional Greek chorus is as

It is a great thing to have seen and heard Katina Paxinou in the title role of Sophocles' "Electra" at last. Guthrie McClintic, in association with ANTA, has made this possible in bringing the National Theatre of Greece to the Mark Hellinger for 15 performances of this play and of "Oedipus Tyrannus." Shortly after the outbreak of the last war Mme. Paxinou was journeying to America and the ship on which she was sailing was sunk by the Nazis. She lost her luggage which contained her prompt-books. Morris Gest proposed to star her in the part she is now playing, but there was no script. However, she came to the Theatre Collection of the New York Public Library, examined our various editions in modern Greek and from them and from her own memory constructed her prompt-book. Gest never made his production so we had to wait for 12 years to see this truly great portrayal and the wait was worth it.

In majestic setting by C. Clotis, beautifully lighted, in striking costumes designed by Antonios Phocas, this drama provides a moving and impressive evening. The orchestral background by Dimitri Mitropoulis was well conducted by George Lykoudis. In support of Mme. Paxinou is a beautifully integrated company. Thanos Cotsopoulos makes a handsome and convincing Orestes. N. Hadziscos as Aegisthus, A. Raftopoulou as Clytemnestra and, especially H. Zafiriou as the leader of the chorus were outstanding under the bold directorial baton of Dimitri Rondiris, who has so beautifully staged this nearly operatic drama.

I recall with pleasure another "Electra" I saw in the season of 1930-31 when Marika Cotopouli played the title role at the then New Yorker Theatre with her Greek company. Katina Paxinou was the Clytemnestra and her co-star of this brief season, Alexis Minotis, was the Orestes. I was fascinated then with the graces and majesty of Greek classic playing. I still am.

By Arthur Berger

When Louis Krasner introduced Schoenberg's Violin Concerto of 1936 to New York at Saturday night's Philharmonic - Symphony concert and repeated it yesterday afternoon he appeared in a stoic and pious role that commands deepest respect. This was not the kind of work to win a soloist the usual accolades of the audience at large, yet its execution is a feat involving a virtual extension of violin technique, and Mr. Krasner undoubtedly renounced many hours of musical and extra-curricular recreation to prepare it.

If musical life is to retain its artistic character, if concerts are to broaden one rather than be a sedative for jaded nerves, bold gestures like those of our Philharmonic conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos, are essential. Even those who sat restlessly through the Schoenberg seemed to sense something awe-inspiring and historic in the occasion. The tenuous quality of all but a handful of measures, the uncommon gentleness of an orchestra used like a chamber ensemble, discourages the unwilling listener as much as the contemporaneity baffles him. The twelve-tone procedures are strict, but have some of the milder harmonic effect, even tonal suggestions, characteristic of Schoenberg's last works. Fragmentation within a subdued frame is, rather, its distinction, and this we must accept to enjoy its essence.

It is a finer work than Berg's concerto, which Mr. Krasner also introduced to us in the '30s. The skips embracing harmonics are more daring than skips we usually encounter in a comfortable, normal range in rapid violin passages. Like Liszt's keyboard jumps, they are not unidiomatic to the instrument, but merely follow one another relentlessly, giving little chance to prepare for them. Mr. Krasner premiered the work in Philadelphia in 1940, but with all works having something new to say, a premiere is like a rehearsal, and he has labored further on it ever since. Such works also, for us to get to know them really well, require performance by a number of artists, each of whom brings out a different facet of the composer's conception. It is hoped this concerto will have this fortune.

Kirchner's New Work Is Mercurial

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Generally, it is the large groups of performers—orchestras, choirs, opera companies—that give us the new compositions. And, with the exception of one or two specialists, shall we say, in the field of novelty, the sole performers, from great to tyro, give new music the well-known go-by.

It was particularly interesting, then, that in his violin recital at Carnegie Hall last evening Tossy Spivakovsky should present the world premiere of Leon Kirchner's Sonata Concertante. The composer himself, incidentally, played the piano part.

Unmistakable Quality.

This Kirchner piece, far from being a merely workmanlike production, has unmistakable quality, purpose and direction. In its rather mercurial way it also has moods, emotional things to express, though such things, you may be sure, do not occupy all of the work's content.

A piano part that is filled with restless, galloping activity, seems to create the atmosphere in which the violin, bow tender, now abrupt, now toying with arabasquerie, presents, on the whole, the dominant voice. Yet sometimes the positions are almost reversed.

Of course, there is dissonance aplenty in the music. What, after all, would one expect? And there again we have an element that grows quite naturally out of the general scheme, an integral part of it.

Cordial Applause.

I don't know how many in the audience liked the work, though the applause seemed cordial at its conclusion. I know that I found it provocative, at least. It is a work that I should certainly wish to hear again.

Mr. Spivakovsky, possessor of fine violinistic equipment, did himself honor in this music. His other composers were Handel (Sonata in A major), Brahms (Sonata in G major), Stravinsky (Pastorale) and Paganini.

In the Brahms the violinist displayed more beauties of tone and phrasing than you can obtain in an ordinary month of violin listening. He also got feeling into the rendering, but that he parceled out in small fragments. The Adagio and last Allegro of the Handel suffered occasionally some static passages, I thought, but never an inelegant moment. Arthur Balsam accompanied the other items.

The Philharmonic - Symphony programs of Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon offered Louis Krasner as soloist in the Schoenberg Violin Concerto. Under Dimitro Mitropoulos' painstaking direction and Mr. Krasner's explicit rendering the work came off well.

It is a considerable work, boasting a very attractive middle section, reflective, touched with a lovely sentiment, skillfully wrought.

SYMPHONY OFFERS BACH ORGAN WORK

Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra.....Franck

By OLIN DOWNES

One of the best of all the orchestral transcriptions of Bach that we know, Leo Wiener's instrumentation of the C major organ Toccata and Fugue, opened the Philharmonic-Symphony concert, directed by Mr. Mitropoulos, last night in Carnegie Hall. This arrangement is scored by a rarely competent, informed, and self-respecting musician, in a way that does not disguise or upholster the grand creation, but reveals and illuminates its essence.

There is the frequent suggestion of organ pipes and registration, but this is no cheap imitation. It is a transposition in orchestral terms that are wholly appropriate and very impressive of Bach's instrumental thought. The score misses no significant detail or climax, but it exaggerates nothing and it glorifies the monumental conception.

To this it may be added that the finest performance we have heard of this transcription is the one that Mr. Mitropoulos gave it on this occasion. His incredible memory, his unique intellectual power as a musician, were only the means by which he communicated his grasp of Bach's mighty architecture and transmitted it with superb vitality, rhythm and beauty.

It would be easy for confirmed Schumannites, and those who hold the Fourth Symphony close at heart, as this writer does, to find points of difference with Mr. Mitropoulos reading. They could call the main body of the first movement over - deliberate, and question a heavy-paced scherzo and some unprecedented accents and phrasing in the finale. The predominating fact is Mr. Mitropoulos' evident feeling for the symphony, his fresh and eloquent approach to it, which is his own conception of what is actually a romantic love-poem and not one that follows the commonly established model.

It has been rarely indeed that the introduction has been played with such intimate and romantic emotion. The tempo of the main body of the movement, if on the deliberate side, was also one that enabled the conductor to squeeze the last drop of juice from the melodies, and to introduce with particular significance the second lyrical theme, which does not appear until three-quarters of the first movement are over.

In the exquisite romanza the interpreter chose, not too wisely, to minimize the ornamental passages, very lyrical and appealing, of the first violin; and he did the same thing in the middle part of the scherzo, preferring the big melodic lines of these movements to the decorative detail that is so exquisitely characteristic of Schumann. Putting all the reservations in the foreground, it remains that the symphony as a whole was read with a searching eloquence and understanding of its poetry. It also reminded us, although Mr. Mitropoulos minimized some details of orchestration, of the fallacy that has so long been current—the cliche about Schumann's inept and opaque instrumentation.

Schumann's orchestral style is not invariably expert, but it always is characterized by unique effects of a charm and poetry no other composer has paralleled. Mr. Mitropoulos revealed most of these places, and clarified some that are commonly passed over by other conductors. Above all the reading was integrated with inescapable logic, and the conviction of an individual understanding of the work; there were no loose ends, and none of the special effects, advisable or otherwise, were accidental or unrelated. A moving performance of an enduringly lovely and poetical symphony!

The concert marked the first appearance in New York of the young French pianist, Lelia Gousseau, in the first performance here of Albert Roussel's C major Concerto for piano and orchestra. Miss Gousseau played this concerto in 1939 at the first competition for the Roussel Prize. She won the prize with it. She is an athletic and assured performer, with formidable wrists and octaves, fully confident and competent to meet the greatest crashes of the orchestra with equal power.

But her chords are sometimes hard and the tone metallic in such passages. Her playing has more of rythmic impact and "go" than it has sensitiveness or imagination. And perhaps her qualities are well suited to the Roussel concerto, which is a cerebral and manufactured piece, and not one of Roussel's representative works.

Miss Gousseau also played the Cesar Franck "Symphonic Variations," again efficiently, and with more variety of tone color than was possible in the Roussel work. She was cordially received by the audience.

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Gousseau Plays Roussel Concerto

The Philharmonic-Symphony played a first New York performance of a piano concerto last night in Carnegie Hall that bids fair to enter the repertory as one of the "standards," and not because of being "popular" in idiom either. This incredible—or so it would seem for a contemporary piece—music is by the Frenchman, Albert Roussel, his only piano concerto, completed in 1927 and first introduced to this country in 1928 by the then indefatigable champion of modern music, Leopold Stokowski, with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia.

Why this likable composition didn't get what it deserved in succeeding years, at least locally, could be explained in various ways, all requiring too much space to be discussed at the moment. I for one am grateful that after seeing the light of day in our neighboring city 25 years ago, it finally made its way here under the discerning aegis of Dimitri Mitropoulos and a convincing lady-pianist, one Lelia Gousseau, tall, strong, independent and dynamic, who performed the short work with a controlled nonchalance which was just what it needed.

The first movement alternates heavy chordal pasages with a delectable waltz tune; the second uses as a foil relentless reiterated notes and chords in the piano against melodic movement, now mysterious, now soaring, in the orchestra. The two modes of expression continue simultaneously. Suffused with harmonic complexity, the total effect is tantalizing and fascinating. The final movement introduces a subtle, conversational melody that, like a wise woman, knows when it's said enough, and leaves off just in time. In fact, the entire concerto is provocative in this respect. Short and to the point, it's both witty and discerning in the best French manner.

Plays "Symphonic Variations"

Miss Gousseau also gave a stunning performance of Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra. Initially, she didn't seem to project the poetic mood of the lovely main theme, and her conception appeared to be driving rather than subjectively poignant as its mood demands. But soon she caught more of the work's essence and all in all gave a sensitive and technically expert rendition.

Krasner, With Philharmonic, Performs Difficult Violin Concerto by Schoenberg

A week-end switch presented a new program line-up for the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Louis Krasner was soloist yesterday afternoon and Saturday night in the late Arnold Schoenberg's Violin Concerto, while Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted the orchestra in Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" Overture, Boccherini's delicious little Symphony in A and the popular "Galanta" Dances by Kodaly.

The seldom played, three-movement Schoenberg work, composed in 1936, poses as difficult a collection of musical and technical problems as there is in the repertoire. The writing is on Schoenberg's most uncompromising level, and it will require more than one hearing to establish its logic. The effort may not be worth it in the end.

The dissonant idiom employed by the composer does not sound nearly as forbidding today as it did fifteen years ago. But the lack of warmth, the cerebral frigidity and the obsession with technique rather than with communication all add up to a concerto that the professional can study with interest, but that nearly every listener will find altogether unrewarding.

Yet, this does not negate the service that Mr. Mitropoulos has done in programming the work. Likable or not, such music has to be heard. It may be the music of the future, just as this critical evaluation may be light-years beside the mark.

Mr. Krasner, a specialist in this sort of music, played with sheer devotion and with some amazing technical achievements. The only thing lacking in his performance was a more brilliant projection of solo instrument against orchestra. Greater temperament on his part would have supplied the excitement inherent in any such concerted work.

Mitropoulos At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

VARIETY characterized Mitropoulos' program for the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. The performances however, would have profited by greater differentiation among the styles represented. The evening was one of spasmodic pleasures.

Mitropoulos again did a service in giving the first New York performance of Roussel's only piano concerto. A quarter century has elapsed since its completion, and perhaps a quarter century may well elapse before it is necessary to hear it again. Yet it was time that it was heard.

The atmospheric adagio holds attention much more than the thump-thump and rhythmic drive of the other two movements. Excessive use of the piano as a percussive instrument tends to date the score. For all its originality, skill, and orchestration the music leaves a negative impression.

Makes Debut

Leslia Gousseau made her debut here playing the solo part. This is something of a technical tour de force to which she was quite equal. The more ingratiating Franck "Symphonic Variations" disclosed her musicianly accomplishments though some hardness of tone did not quite fit the character of the piece. She won the audience's favor.

The program opened with a solid performance of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C. Schumann's Fourth Symphony encountered a distillation of some of its romanticism in Mitropoulos' individualistic reading. Falls' Three Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" rounded out the evening. The orchestra played sumptuously in lyrical passages and crisply otherwise.

Its response to Mitropoulos is remarkable.

Improved Philharmonic

LELIA GOUSSEAU, making her New York debut, was the piano soloist of last night's Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall. She played the Roussel Concerto, also new to New York (though) composed a quarter-century ago), and the Franck Symphonic Variations. There was plenty of opportunity in these two ample works to display, as far as any pianist playing with orchestra can, her virtues of technique and musicianship. Miss Gousseau seems to have some finger agility, modest standards of marksmanship, a lovely tone in mezzoforte playing but no great power and no unusual poetry. This estimate is offered with reserve, since concerto playing is no fair test of any pianist. She may be better than she sounded to me last night.

Mr. Mitropoulos, who conducted, was in fine form, especially in the Bach Toccata (with Adagio and Fugue) orchestrated by Leo Weiner, that began the concert. His reading of Schumann's lovely Fourth Symphony was animated by vigor too, and warmed by a clear flame. By the time the de Falla Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" came on, the conductor had lost his flame; and the music went rackety in the old Philharmonic way.

The Philharmonic's new way, the Mitropoulos way, is to play with more care for musical sound than has previously been the preoccupation of this orchestra. I suspect that this result originates on the conductor's part in a care for the intellectual and poetic communication of twentieth-century music rather than in any sensuous devotion to orchestral timbres. But the precision which he brings to works that inspire his full mind (and it is a tremendous mind) inspires the orchestra to lend its full attention to what they are doing. And as a result, the Philharmonic, under his leadership, sounds more and more like the fine musical instrument that it is and less and less like a passing subway express.

This conductor's fall season is now over, and the programs announced for the next few weeks will return to plugging standard repertory. There ought to be a place for familiar works in the year's lay-out. But less and less these days can any conductor keep his mind or his musicians' minds on them long enough to get through them without brutality. A heavy diet of them always ends by injuring the orchestra, just as a large proportion of contemporary music in the programs improves an orchestra. Mr. Mitropoulos, in any case, has improved the Philharmonic, and I think the modern music he plays is at the bottom of that change. I would add "Metropolitan Opera please note" if I thought that institution had any confidence in my judgment. This last remark is a sideswipe: let it pass.

French Pianist Debuts Here; Philharmonic's 110th Year

By LEONARD MEYERS

Miss Lelia Gousseau, pianist from France, made her first appearance in this city last night as guest soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos. She was heard in two works: the first New York performance of Albert Roussel's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in C Major" and the "Symphonic Variations" by Cesar Franck.

Music Lacks Mood

The Roussel concerto is a work of just under 15 minutes, in three movements. I didn't find the music particularly interesting, nor the performance of it very stimulating. The longish slow movement was turbid and mystical, without evoking for me any mood. Miss Gousseau, moreover, didn't seem to me to have the requisite power to balance the heavy orchestra, particularly in the first movement.

The performance of the Franck piece too, lacked color and vitality. Only in the last section did Miss Gousseau seem to communicate with the audience. While she has abundant technique, I doubt that an American pianist of similar abilities would have occupied the soloist's chair last night.

In the first half of the program, Mr. Mitropoulos conducted the orchestra in a warm, sunny and romantic reading of Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D-Minor. Other music on the program included the "Toccata and Fugue in C-Minor" by Bach and three dances from DeFalla's "The Three-Cornered Hat."

110 Years Old Sunday

This Sunday the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra will celebrate its 110th anniversary. The first concert took place on Dec. 7, 1842. Warm congratulations are due this fine organization for its long and distinguished record.

Why Not Mitropoulos For Podium at Met?

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The announcement that George Szell and Pierre Monteux will conduct opera at the Metropolitan next season has occasioned much interest, of course.

Both have already conducted at the Broadway temple of opera, Szell holding forth there from 1942 to 1946 and Monteux from 1917 to 1919.

Now from a number of sources I hear the question: "Why doesn't Dimitri Mitropoulos make some guest appearances at the Met?"

Buzz of Speculation.

That is a good question. Why doesn't he? Certainly every one of his concert performances of opera has met with extraordinary success. As far back as several summers ago, when he conducted the concert-form "Butterfly" at the Lewisohn Stadium, there was a great buzz of speculation whether he might not one day conduct at the Metropolitan.

The following summer at the same place he did remarkable things with "Tosca," and again great acclaim, but no Metropolitan invitation. Or was there?

Mr. Mitropoulos' operatic accomplishments with the Philharmonic-Symphony were no less amazing in works off the beaten track, works like Milhaud's "Les Choreophores" and "Christophe Colombe," Ravel's "L'heure Espagnole," Strauss' "Elektra" and Alban Berg's "Wozzeck."

A mere glance over the list reveals, at least, that he is an exceptionally versatile conductor of opera and, apparently, completely at home in any idiom.

Your reporter himself, not wishing to ask too much of the gods, would be satisfied to witness a daily bread opera conducted by Mitropoulos—a "Butterfly," an "Aida," a "Tristan," not, however, a concert performance. I know what he can do with that kind. The performance in the theater, the Metropolitan, is what I should like to experience. And there are many more like me.

Opera Translation Involves More Than Word Meanings

By ARTHUR BERGER

Arguments are forming on the lips of many an opera devotee in anticipation of the Met's two versions of "La Boheme," which will bring into the open the subject of translation. The Howard Dietz English version will alternate, after its premiere Dec. 27, with performances of the Puccini opera in the familiar Italian, the first of which is scheduled for Feb. 12. The debate is expected to become nation-wide, since the Saturday afternoon radio audiences, after hearing the Dietz translation at its first performance, will have a chance to compare the rival Italian original on Feb. 21.

Before sides are taken and the heat of polemics blurs issues, it may be well to consider that we deal not simply with a cleavage between supporters and opponents of opera translation, but also with an abundance of inadequate translation. Translating anything is less rewarding than expressing oneself, and the best people do not often give up their time for this essentially selfless occupation. Yet the translator of poetry or its equivalent must not only convey connotative meanings, but also the feeling inherent in the sounds and associations of words. For this he must have a poetic gift comparable with the originator's and must be able to put himself in the other's place.

Challenge of the Vowels

With opera or song there is further complication, since the choice of a note is often determined by the vowel or meaning, and if the vowel is changed, or the number of syllables are increased or the word comes out in a different part of the sentence, some of the intention is obscured. It is best for the composer to sit beside the translator, and even so the challenge makes the task of converting Marx Brothers puns into foreign terms seem by comparison a simple recreation. But the French rally around the Marx Brothers, much as the dialogue may elude them, and they hear that Wagner opera with the awesome title, "Goetterdaemmerung," as the sweetly sounding "Crépuscule des Dieux." The score of "The Rake's Progress" of Stravinsky has been published straight away with German as well as English text, since performances of it as "Der Wuestling" were scheduled in Germany before its completion.

The performance of opera in the native tongue has long been the norm in Europe, but by stating this fact we are neither advocating it nor rejecting it as a policy here. This is a matter to cope with later, if the debate should ever come to such extremes. Mozart accepted the inevitability of his Italian operas being sung in German in his native land, and his main worry was that the translations be faithful. The project of insuring this where "Don Giovanni" was concerned by making his own German translation was intercepted by his death. Gluck collaborated with French librettists for the Parisian adaptations of "Orpheus" and "Alceste," and whatever may be said against the revisions he made because of the available singers, both operas are for many of us lovelier to hear in French than in Italian.

A Change of Character

Composers have not been unaware of the advantages of foreign audiences understanding their texts. When Schoenberg heard that Dimitri Mitropoulos was to present his little monodrama, "Erwartung," with the Philharmonic-Symphony, the composer set about to have an English translation made, but, as in the case of Mozart, he died before carrying out his plan. If many listeners were unhappy that they could not follow this monodrama word by word, others would undoubtedly have been unhappy hearing it in English, for with the translation of Berg and Schoenberg we get at the core of the most serious problem, namely, the change of character that the substitution of a new language brings in its wake, however expert the translation. The City Center judiciously eliminated the slides and some "Sprechstimme" in its English version of "Wozzeck," for they are ill-suited to our language, as Schoenberg's "Ode to Napoleon," clearly demonstrates.

The problem of translation, besides getting it done well, is to find some way of achieving the original aura that disappears when the language changes. The dignity and elegance that performers maintain when they sing Mozart in Italian, for example, fall away when they sing in English. They drive home the humor, parody the original subtle satire. To some unseasoned operagoers, it was a delight to find the Met's "Cosi fan tutte" as congenial as Gilbert and Sullivan. The underlining of every word, since it must be understood, may be as much responsible as overplaying the humor or as the quality of the translation. But some translations force this approach from the singer. I defy any soprano to sing "I have lost it" in the City Opera's "Figaro" as tenderly as Da Ponte's "L'ho perduta."

Issues To Be Faced

In the light of nineteenth-century bowdlerizations of plays and operas at every revival, our productions are a model of authenticity. The interpolations of grandiose dialogue in "Don Giovanni" in nineteenth-century Germany had a ridiculous effect. Our Mozart tends in the other direction of making too light of things. The case of translation cannot be properly aired without facing these broader issues. For if singing in English is one aspect of bringing a production up to date and adapting it to our milieu, to what extent is this acceptable, and how far may one go and at the same time preserve the artistry and general quality of the original? Of adaptations in recent memory Marc Blitztein's version of Weill's "Threepenny Opera" comes closest to setting an example.

French Pianist Makes Carnegie Hall Debut

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A French conerto and a French pianist made their joint debut on a Philharmonic program in Carnegie Hall last night.

Since the pianist was a lady, and a very charming one at that, we shall start with her. Lelia Gousseau is her name, and she played the late Albert Roussel's C major concerto as if it deserved the gracious and wholehearted attention she gave it.

But the concerto was a disappointment. It had almost everything in its favor—the skill of a master, good orchestration, a congenial piano part, and enough fluent cleverness for four other French concertos. What it lacked was heart and suspense.

The Late '20s.

It is one of those concertos in which the piano is saying something all the time and the orchestra isn't exactly silent, but both wind up proving very little of any consequence.

The concerto dates back no farther than the late '20s, yet it is oddly outmoded, as if Roussel, this once at least, had gathered together a great many of the more trivial aspects of his art and mistaken their triviality for genius.

Miss Gousseau joined Dimitri Mitropoulos and the orchestra in a glib and vigorous rendering of the concerto, all of which could not conceal its emptiness and its curiously premature aging.

Cesar Franck.

More to the point—for soloist, conductor, and orchestra alike—was Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. There they were all discoursing beauty and warmth and drama—in a word, music.

Miss Gousseau was almost another pianist in that work—a pianist of feeling and finesse, of dynamics carefully scaled to the expressive demands of music with some genuine emotion to it.

Even Mr. Mitropoulos seemed happier there, as he did in the music by Bach, Schumann and De Falla that completed the program.

MITROPOULOS AGAIN WILL DIRECT N.Y. ORCHESTRA

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York has announced the re-engagement of Dimitri Mitropoulos as musical director of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. The appointment was unanimously approved by the board of directors. Mitropoulos was first appointed musical director two years ago.

The board also announced the re-engagement of Bruno Walter, George Szell and Guido Cantelli as guest conductors, and the addition of Andre Kostelanetz for the first time as guest leader. Franco Autori has been re-engaged as associate conductor for the fifth consecutive year.

In addition to its subscription series for 1953-54, the Philharmonic-Symphony announces that three special nonsubscription concerts on Saturday nights at Carnegie Hall will be under the direction of Kostelanetz. These concerts are in addition to the two series of Saturday evening concerts, each of eight concerts, which are currently about 90% sold out by subscription.

The 112th Philharmonic-Symphony season will open Oct. 8, 1953. Its subscription series at Carnegie Hall will consist of 28 weeks, including two series of Thursday evening concerts, 14 each; two series of Friday afternoon concerts, 14 each; two series of Saturday evening concerts, eight each, and two series of Sunday afternoon concerts, 14 each.

Mr. Mitropoulos will conduct during the first half and the final part of the season. In mid-winter he will conduct opera at La Scala.

Philharmonic Marks Its 110th Birthday

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The Philharmonic celebrated its 110th birthday in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon by performing the feature work of its very first concert—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The date of that ancient event was Dec. 7, 1842, the place a small auditorium on lower Broadway. The number of men in that orchestra was 63. Today the orchestra is larger, and so are the hall and the audience. What was then the bold dream of a huddle of civic-minded men is now an institution. It was good to hear its board president, Floyd Blair, in a broadcast talk with James Fassett, proudly mark another milestone in its long journey.

Dimitri Mitropoulos gave the Beethoven Fifth a reading that was a compliment to both composer and the occasion. The visiting French pianist, Lelia Gousseau, was back again to reinforce Thursday night's impression with a solid performance of Saint-Saens' Fourth Concerto.

Since yesterday was the 11th anniversary of still another Dec. 7, the program ended on a commemorative patriotic flourish with that monarch of all marches, Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Mitropoulos in Hospital Due to Physical Fatigue

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, entered a hospital in New York yesterday for a rest and physical examination. He was said to be suffering physical fatigue caused by his heavy conducting schedule during the last year. His condition was reported good. Officials of the Philharmonic declined to reveal the name of the hospital.

Mr. Mitropoulos' conducting schedule has been almost continuous for a year. Soon after the Philharmonic's 1951-52 season ended last spring, he went to Europe to conduct at La Scala and the Florence May Festival, returned to open the Lewisohn Stadium season, appeared at the Hollywood Bowl and, since the Philharmonic's present season opened on Oct. 16, has conducted twenty-eight concerts as well as recording sessions, rehearsals and guest appearances with other organizations.

Mitropoulos to Take Leave

The seemingly indefatigable Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Philharmonic-Symphony's brilliant musical director, has found that even he is human. Taken ill after his last Carnegie Hall concert, Dec. 7, his doctor has pronounced him physically exhausted, and has ordered him to rest. The conductor is in a hospital after which he plans to go south.

Originally scheduled to return to his orchestra for six weeks beginning Jan. 8, he now will be back only for his late spring stint, the final four weeks in April.

Maestro collapsed from nervous exhaustion Dec. 9, two days after his last stint with the orch, and has been resting in a N. Y. hospital since.

He'll be out in another week, when he heads south for a further rest. He's been conducting in N. Y. and elsewhere practically without interruption since October, 1951. Mitropoulos will be back with the N. Y. Philharmonic in April.

Meantime, batonist's January-February chores will be taken over by George Szell, Bruno Walter, Vladimir Golschmann and Efrem Kurtz. He's missed a couple of Dallas Symph guest-baton dates as result of his illness.

MITROPOULOS CUTS CONCERT SCHEDULE

Cancels 6 Weeks of Music in January, February to Rest —Guest Leaders Listed

Dimitri Mitropoulos, physically exhausted after more than a year of continuous activity both in this country and abroad, has canceled six weeks of scheduled concerts with the Philharmonic-Symphony in January and February, the Philharmonic announced yesterday.

On the advice of his physician, Mr. Mitropoulos, after his concert with the Philharmonic on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 7, was taken to a hospital, where he is resting. The conductor plans to go south early in 1953.

Mr. Mitropoulos plans to return for the last four weeks of the Philharmonic season in April. For the midwinter concerts his place will be taken by George Szell, Bruno Walter, Vladimir Golschmann and Efrem Kurtz.

Mr. Szell, who was to have ended his current guest engagement with the Philharmonic concert of last Sunday, will remain for two more weeks. He will conduct the Pension Fund concert of Jan. 12 at which Vladimir Horowitz will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his American debut.

Mr. Walter has agreed to take another week in addition to the four to which he is committed. Of the remaining three weeks, Mr. Golschmann will direct two and Mr. Kurtz one.

Both Mr. Szell and Mr. Golschmann are forfeiting their winter vacations to appear with the Philharmonic. Mr. Kurtz' appearance here is being made possible by postponement of a Houston Symphony concert that he was scheduled to conduct.

Mr. Mitropoulos ,has been conducting almost without interruption since October, 1951. After the 1951-52 Philharmonic season, during which he also conducted in other cities, he flew to Italy for the Florence May Festival, then returned to open the Lewisohn Stadium season.

A Holiday Tribute To Mr. Mitropoulos

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

It is painful at this time to think of Dimitri Mitropoulos in the hospital—this dedicated man who was giving himself so unsparingly to his work that his doctor has now ordered a six-week rest.

I am sure all music-lovers join me in this open holiday card to Mr. Mitropoulos. I have always been impressed by the wholehearted devotion to art so typical of our best musicians, whether pianists, singers, or conductors. But I have never run into anything like the sense of dedication that guides Mr. Mitropoulos.

Those close to Mr. Mitropoulos know the intensity and thoroughness that have gone into every number, every rehearsal, every concert that he directs. This had been going on uninterruptedly for months.

To Mr. Mitropoulos music is not just music. It is a religion, an intense and personal creed that he preaches with a missionary fervor.

And this is one of the touching things about this Greek-born scholar and master musician: he is humility itself in a position that would lure lesser spirits into a pardonable pride and arrogance. I honestly believe that deep down in this man's nature, he does not put himself above the least important member of the orchestra.

Indeed, there is no "least important" category in Mr. Mitropoulos's philosophy of music. I have heard him say that he would be happy to serve music in any capacity—if only as the man who taps, perhaps three times in the course of a concert, on the triangle. He has given every member of the Philharmonic a feeling that he is as necessary to the music as the next man—not excluding Dimitri Mitropoulos.

This same attitude extends to composers too. Great interpreters —pianists, violinists, conductors— are impartial toward the music they play, or rather they are partial in the same degree to everything they play. They show all composers the unqualified courtesy of equal treatment. They pay them the compliment, even the less gifted of them, of performing their music as if they are all on a level with Beethoven.

Mr. Mitropoulos has done that for the moderns and for those who, like Mahler, must still struggle for existence in the seasonal repertory.

That, I suppose, is the creative artist in Mr. Mitropoulos. He becomes the composer's other self, going over every step of the composer's creation as if it were his own, suffering the anguish and frenzy of bringing it to life, and then stepping aside to give the music and its maker complete right of way.

THE DANCE: CHORUS

Theatrical Synthesis of Classic Greece And Sources of Its Power

By JOHN MARTIN

THE recent season of the National Theatre of Greece, for all its brevity, was both a heartening and a revealing experience; heartening in that it showed us that the potent magic of that heroic synthesis we call theatre can be evoked today as surely as it was more than two millenniums ago and by the very same means; revealing in that, by a combination of intent and circumstance, it threw light upon some truths about the relationships between various elements in this great synthesis which have long been forgotten and, indeed, seldom known.

In their productions of the "Electra" and the "Oedipus," Katina Paxinou and Alexis Minotis and their colleagues in no wise attempted an archaeological reconstruction of the classical theatre; bookishness would have killed their approach. The essential thing of antiquity that they invoked was the awareness, perhaps in their racial heritage, that the classical theatre was in its very essence a theatre of performance. Not by accident was the word "drama" applied to it, for drama is a word of action; it says nothing of fine writing or interpretative reading, but means something done, something performed.

Words Without Movement

In the terminology of the contemporary theatre we have kept many words with this same implication—drama, acting, play, chorus, orchestra—but little by little we have read the movement out of them and left chiefly literary, musical and elocutionary residues. In doing so we have separated ourselves from a just enthusiasm for the ancient theatre of the Greeks. The few plays that remain to us in print, and the even fewer that we see put upon the stage, generally strike us as being, of all things, wordy, for the simple reason that we treat the texts as self-sufficient artifacts. Actually they are nothing of the sort; they are merely something to be performed. Their twofold function is to stimulate the performer into creativeness and to provide a formal frame to contain his creation.

Balanchine has said of music for the ballet that it is a "floor for dancing," and the text of drama serves a comparable purpose. It is the music of the drama, a floor for that broader kind of dancing which includes the full use of all the resources of the body, including the voice. This total body is the instrument of the classic chorus, and the chorus is the soul and substance of the ancient drama.

If the text of Sophocles employed by the Greek National Theatre had been translated into English, we should all have been the losers, for we should have struggled to understand it, and allowed the performance to slip past us unnoticed. To better ends, the performers understood the text for us and translated it into the extra-rational terms of artistic experience, which in the theatre operates whole and only in terms of the immediacy of creation.

Even if the text had been in English, we should have understood little of it, for the words are full of poetic and religious allusions that elude the ear. One wonders how much the audiences in the vast amphitheatres of long ago understood, especially of the choric odes, which in many of the plays are far from simple even under diligent study. But the dramas were conceived on hieratic themes already deeply familiar to all the spectators, and what they expected was not narrative unfoldment but emotional purgation, excitement, exaltation.

When in the recent presentation of "Oedipus" (to take a striking example) the chorus of men, handsomely garbed, wigged, bearded, beautifully voiced, at a moment of high tension broke into song and moved in absolute unison into the simple measures of a dance—call it kolo, hora, pas de bourrée, what you will—one had a vivid experience of this emotional purgation, excitement, exaltation.

Ages ago, before the dithyramb was ordered into a form, when a company of simple and passionate men danced and sang in unison their otherwise inexpressible reactions to certain aspects of their common life, it is easy to understand how the body of mass emotion should have become so tangible as to be personified by them into the presence of a god whom they named Dionysos. Since we are less mystic and more analytical today, we name it rather "performance," but recognize it equally as magic.

Choric Concept

To be sure, this ecstatic quality has long since passed out of the drama. It began to be refined out of existence when oratorical and non-choreographic actors were added one by one to take precedence over the chorus, and as it faded it took the drama with it into decline. That the National Theatre was able to restore so powerful an element of it is one of the theatrical marvels.

Because the conception of the productions is basically choric, the entire vocal aspect of the performance assumes a form akin to that of dance. After all, the ultimate basis of music for dancing consists of what the dancer himself would sing as he moves, and that is perhaps a possible description of the way in which speech and chant and song are integrated here.

The rhythm of the scenes flows from almost colloquial speech accompanied by almost colloquial gesture; to semi-intoning and a more abstracted gesture where the action becomes more elevated; and into actual song and dance where emotion transcends rational expression and cannot be contained. Here, of course, is where the chorus takes over completely.

One must, however, redefine dance in a measure, for both the men of "Oedipus" and especially the magnificent women's chorus in "Electra" made clear that standing perfectly still can be a part of moving. The modifying tensions of fifteen concentrated bodies under the spell of a heroic dramatic conflict constitute the basis of an absorbing dance, and any slightest deviation from this consuming stillness becomes a movement of high significance. What Agapi Evangelidou has done to build her choruses in these terms, employing generally spare and simple gesture, echoing the uncanny tonal unison of her speaking dancers, is truly superb. As drama is more than words, so dancing is more than complex kickings-up of heels.

For the "Electra" Dimitri Mitropoulos composed some beautiful and functional music, far less observant of the antique modes and traditional instruments than Mme. Paxinou's simpler music for the "Oedipus." But most of the music is actually the vocal text. When in the Messenger's speech in "Electra" Mme. Paxinou makes an obligato of cadenced wailing, here is music indeed that is pure drama. Throughout the role she uses her glorious voice not alone for its qualities of nobility, but for snarling and whining, far extending the range of normal speech in pitch, in timbre, in rhythm.

In the matter of décor, the Greek drama is inherently weak in its own right, for these externals are no part of the performer's art. The National Theatre has handled it admirably, however, with a single setting designed by C. Clonis for both plays, neither realistic nor antiquarian, but in the Appia tradition. It was wonderfully lit by Klaus Holm.

For the fresh insight into both drama and dance, as well as for a rare esthetic enrichment, one can be no less than humbly grateful.

At this moment, upwards of a hundred million Americans are earnestly turning their eyes inward, searching for precisely the correct New Year's resolution.

The most universal wish was beautifully expressed by Dimitri Mitropoulos, noted symphony conductor:

"I wish for the New Year that hate be eliminated from the world, that people return to God, for we have forgotten His kindness, His tolerance, His understanding. I wish for a universal language of the spirit as there is, in music, a universal language of art."

AMEN, AND HAPPY NEW YEAR TO YOU!

ΠΩΣ ΕΙΔΑ ΤΟΝ ΜΗΤΡΟΠΟΥΛΟ

ΤΟΥ ΚΑΘΗΓΗΤΟΥ κ. Γ. ΛΥΚΟΥΔΗ

Κατὰ τὶς πολύωρες συζητήσεις ποὺ εἶχα στὴ Νέα Ὑόρκη μὲ τὸν βιογράφο τοῦ Μητροπούλου, τὸν κ. Στάνλεϋ, βρεθήκαμε ἀπόλυτα σύμφωνοι σὲ πολλὰ βασικὰ σημεῖα σχετικὰ μὲ τὴ σταδιοδρομία τοῦ μεγάλου Ἕλληνος μαέστρου, ἀλλ' ἰδιαίτερα ἀνεγνωρίσαμε καὶ οἱ δυὸ πῶς στὴν καρριέρα του, ὅπως ἐξ ἄλλου καὶ στὴν καρριέρα ὅλων τῶν μεγάλων καλλιτεχνῶν, ἐκεῖνο ποὺ ἐνδιαφέρει εἶναι ὁ τρόπος μὲ τὸν ὁποῖο κάθε μεγαλοφυΐα ἀντιδρᾷ στὴ μέθη τῆς ἐπιτυχίας. Ὁ Μητρόπουλος, μὲ μιὰ συνεχῆ ἀνανέωσι, χωρὶς ποτὲ νὰ λογαριάζῃ ἐπαίνους καὶ χειροκροτήματα, κατώρθωσε πάντοτε νὰ παρασύρῃ τὸ κοινὸ καὶ νὰ ἀποκτήσῃ τὴν ἀμέριστη συμπάθειά του. Εἶναι ἡ ἐργασία του, ἡ ἀκατάπαυστη ἐργασία ποὺ ἀξιοποιεῖ τὰ μεγάλα του μουσικὰ χαρίσματα, καὶ ἡ πεῖρα ποὺ τοῦ ἐξασφαλίζουν, μὲ τὴν πάροδο τοῦ χρόνου, τὴν ἐπαγγελματικὴ ἀνωτερότητα καὶ τὸν τοποθετοῦν στὴν κορυφὴ τῆς Τέχνης, σὰν ἕνα φάρο ποὺ φωτίζει ὅλους ἐκείνους ποὺ διεκδικοῦν τὴ δόξα καὶ τὴν ἐπιτυχία.

Ὁ κ. Δημ. Μητρόπουλος

Ὕστερα ἀπὸ δέκα τὸν δρᾶσι τὸν κρακατέσσερα χρόνια, ποὺ ἡ καλλιτεχνικὴ τάξι μακρυὰ ἀπὸ τὴν πατρίδα του, δεκατέσσερα χρόνια πού, παρὰ τὸν εὐγενῆ συναγωνισμὸ τῶν Τοσκανίνι, Στοκόφσκυ, Μπροῦνο Βάλτερ καὶ Κουσεβίτσκυ—γιὰ ν' ἀναφέρω μόνο τοὺς κυριώτερους — κατέληξε στὴν ἀπεριορίστου διαρκείας ὑπογραφὴ τοῦ ἐφετεινοῦ συμβολαίου μὲ τὴν Φιλαρμονικὴ Ἑταιρία τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης, εἶχα τὴν εὐτυχία νὰ τὸν ξαναδῶ στὶς 14 τοῦ παρελθόντος Νοεμβρίου στὸ Κάρνεγκυ Χώλλ, καὶ νὰ παρακολουθήσω ὑπὸ τὴν διεύθυνσί του τὴν ἐκτέλεσι τῆς Πέμπτης Συμφωνίας τοῦ Σοστάκοβιτς. Δὲν πρόκειται σήμερα, μὲ τὸ καθωρισμένης ἐκτάσεως ταπεινὸ αὐτὸ σημείωμά μου, νὰ κρίνω τὸ ἔργο καὶ τὴν ἑρμηνεία του. Ἦταν φυσικὸ γιὰ μένα, ὅταν πρωτοβρέθηκα στὴν πανώρια αὐτὴ αἴθουσα, νὰ μὴν ἔχω τὴ δύναμι νὰ παρακολουθήσω ἀμέριμνα τὴ μουσική. Ἡ... θέα τοῦ Μητροπούλου ἐκυριάρχησε καὶ τὸ ὅ,τι ἄκουγα χρειάσθηκε ἀρκετὴ ὥρα γιὰ νὰ μοῦ δημιουργήσῃ τὸ συναίσθημα τῆς πραγματικότητος καὶ νὰ πιστέψω πὼς ὁ ἄνθρωπος αὐτὸς μὲ τὶς ἀπέριττες κινήσεις, ὁ καλλιτέχνης ποὺ μὲ μιὰ ἀφάνταστη ἀφέλεια ἐπετύχαινε τοὺς πιὸ ἀσύλληπτους χρωματισμούς, ὁ ψύχραιμος αὐτὸς ὁδηγὸς ποὺ ἔχει τὸ μυστικὸ νὰ παρουσιάζῃ τὰ δυσκολώτερα σημεῖα ἑνὸς ἔργου μὲ τὴν ἴδια ἀμεριμνησία ποὺ ἔχει ὅταν καπνίζῃ, ὁ μάγος αὐτὸς ποὺ ξέρει νὰ βγάζῃ ἀπὸ τὰ σπλάγχνα τῆς ὀρχήστρας του τὶς πιὸ μεγαλόπνοες ἐκφράσεις, ὁ ὑπέροχος μουσικὸς - ἄνθρωπος, ποὺ δὲν παραλείπει ποτὲ νὰ εὐχαριστήσῃ καὶ νὰ συγχαρῇ δημοσίᾳ τοὺς πανάξιους ἐκτελεστὰς τῆς ὑπέροχης αὐτῆς ὀρχήστρας ὅταν τὸ ἀκροατήριο τὸν ἐπευφημῇ, ἦταν ὁ δικός μας Μητρόπουλος. Δὲν φαντάζομαι νὰ εἶναι δυνατὸν σὲ ἄνθρωπο νὰ φθάσῃ σὲ μεγαλύτερη τελειότητα στὴν εἰδικότητά του. Ὅταν μετὰ τὴ συναυλία ἔτρεξα νὰ τοῦ ἐκφράσω τὴν εὐγνωμοσύνη μου γιὰ τὴν ἀνέκφραστη χαρὰ ποὺ μοῦδωσε, ξαναβρῆκα τὸν φίλο ποὺ μέσα στὰ παιδικά του μάτια βλέπει κανεὶς τὴν καλωσύνη, τὴν ἁπλότητα, τὴ συστολὴ ἀλλὰ καὶ λίγη... μελαγχολία. Πῶς γίνονται αὐτὲς οἱ δοκιμὲς καὶ μὲ ποιὸ ὑπέροχο πνεῦμα συναδελφικότητος καὶ συνεργασίας ὁ ἄνθρωπος αὐτὸς μεταδίδει τὶς θελήσεις του εἰς τὸ διεθνὲς αὐτὸ μουσικὸ συγκρότημα ποὺ λέγεται Φιλαρμονικὴ Ὀρχήστρα τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης, εἶναι κάτι ποὺ γιὰ νὰ περιγράψω θὰ ἔπρεπε νὰ καταφύγω σὲ τεχνικὲς μακρολογίες ποὺ θὰ ἐκούραζαν τοὺς ἀναγνώστας μου. Γιὰ νὰ ἔχω ἀπὸ τοὺς μουσικούς μου τὶς ἀπαιτήσεις ποὺ ἔχω, πρέπει, ὅταν ἔρχομαι στὴν πρόβα, ὁ μουσικὸς νὰ συναισθάνεται ὅτι κατέχω τὸ ἔργο ποὺ πρόκειται νὰ ἑρμηνεύσω, ὄχι μόνο στὸ σύνολο, ἀλλὰ καὶ στὴν παραμικρὴ τεχνικὴ λεπτομέρεια τοῦ μέρους ποὺ ὁ κάθε μουσικὸς τῆς ὀρχήστρας πρόκειται νὰ ἐκτελέσῃ».

Ὕστερα ἀπ' αὐτὰ τὰ λόγια νομίζω πὼς ἐξηγοῦνται οἱ διάφορες φῆμες, εἰδήσεις καὶ πληροφορίες, πὼς ὁ ἄνθρωπος αὐτὸς πρέπει νὰ πάρῃ μιὰ ἀναπνοὴ γιὰ νὰ μπορέσῃ νὰ ἐξακολουθήσῃ τὸν ἰλιγγιώδη δρόμο του καὶ νὰ ὑπηρετήσῃ ὅπως ὑπηρετεῖ τὴν Μουσική.

Mitropoulos, Ill, Unable To Conduct In Mill City

Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra and scheduled to guest conduct the Minneapolis Symphony here Feb. 27, will not appear.

Illness has sent him to a New York hospital and doctors have forbidden him to resume duties of any nature until late in April or early in May.

Arthur J. Gaines, manager of the orchestra here, said every effort is being made to secure an outstanding conductor to take Mitropoulos' place.

Mitropoulos, who directed the Minneapolis orchestra from 1937 until 1949, will be replaced for the remainder of the season in New York by guest conductors hurriedly called into service.

The stroke of fate which will keep the man who won such affections in the hearts of local music lovers from appearing here is a deep disappointment, Mr. Gaines said.

Mitropoulos in Hospital; Will Miss Concert Here

Illness will prevent Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, from conducting the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra here Feb. 27.

This was reported today in New York, where the conductor was hospitalized. Doctors have forbidden him to resume his work until late April or early May.

Arthur J. Gaines, manager of the orchestra here, said an outstanding conductor will be engaged to take Mitropoulos' place.

The conductor, who directed the Minneapolis orchestra from 1937 until 1949, will be replaced for the remainder of the season in New York by guest conductors.

His concert here was to have been one of the two big features of the orchestra's golden jubilee season now in progress.

The other feature will bring to the podium at Northrop auditorium Friday night Eugene Ormandy, now conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, who preceded Mitropoulos as director of the orchestra here. Ormandy reigned from 1931 to 1936.

Mitropoulos Ill of Exhaustion

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, is ill of nothing more than exhaustion. He now is resting in the south and will return to the podium April 2 and conduct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

He conducted last Dec. 7 and was to have returned for six weeks beginning Jan. 8, but after his last concert, he fell ill and couldn't go on. Other conductors came to the rescue. George Szell, musical director of the Cleveland Orchestra, extended his guest conductorship for two weeks, passing up a scheduled vacation in Nassau.

Bruno Walter agreed to add one week to the four-week guest conductorship to which he was committed. Vladimir Golschmann, musical director of the St. Louis Symphony, took two weeks of Mitropoulos' schedule, and Efrem Kurtz, musical director of the Houston Symphony took one.

Mitropoulos had been conducting with little interruption since October, 1951. Last summer after the close of the Philharmonic-Symphony's season, he flew to Italy to conduct at the Florence Festival and to introduce Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," at La Scala, Milan. Then he flew home to conduct at the New York stadium concerts, in Philadelphia's Robin Hood Dell, in Chicago's Ravinia Park, and in the Hollywood bowl.

Ἡ ὑγεία τοῦ Μητροπούλου

Χθεσιναὶ πληροφορίαι ἐκ Νέας Ὑόρκης ἀναφέρουν, ὅτι ἡ ὑγεία τοῦ Ἕλληνος ἀρχιμουσικοῦ Μητροπούλου, ἐβελτιώθη σημαντικῶς καὶ ὅτι τὴν παραμονὴν τῆς Πρωτοχρονιᾶς ἐξῆλθεν ἀπὸ τὸ νοσοκομεῖον καὶ ἐγκατεστάθη πάλιν εἰς τὸ ξενοδοχεῖον του. Οἱ ἰατροί του συνέστησαν ἀνάπαυσιν καὶ ἡσυχίαν καὶ δὲν ἀποκλείεται νὰ ἀναχωρήσῃ ἐντὸς τῶν ἡμερῶν διὰ τὴν Φλώριντα. Ἐπίσης ἀπηγόρευσεν τὰς ἐπισκέψεις, διότι ἐὰν ἐπετρέποντο, εἶναι τόσαι αἱ αἰτήσεις συναδέλφων, φίλων καὶ θαυμαστῶν καθὼς καὶ σημαινουσῶν προσωπικοτήτων ποὺ θέλουν νὰ τὸν ἰδοῦν, ὥστε καὶ τὸ ἓν δέκατον ἐὰν ἱκανοποιεῖτο θὰ ἀνετρέπετο ἡ ἐφαρμοζομένη θεραπευτικὴ ἀγωγή. Κατόπιν τούτου, ἀπεφασίσθη νὰ ἀποκλεισθοῦν αἱ ἐπισκέψεις ἄνευ ἐξαιρέσεως. Εἰς τὰς ἀποστελλομένας εὐχὰς καὶ τὰ ἄνθη, ἀπαντᾶ ἡ γραμματεύς του. Szell Leads Philharmonic —But in a Very Dull Way

By LEONARD MEYERS

Conductor George Szell is reputed in musical circles to be quite a disciplinarian. But he achieved precious little discipline last night when he conducted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, replacing the orchestra's regular musical director, Dimitri Mitropoulos. Along with the ragged playing, there was a heavy-handedness and lack of poetry that made the concert uniformly dull.

The program opened with a pedestrial performance of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival Overture." This was followed by the "Symphony No. 88 in G" by Haydn.

Here Mr. Szell employed the full forces of the philharmonic strings, giving the piece a thick and muddy quality. And here, too, the lack of tonal beauty of the orchestra's string section was lamentably apparent.

The first half of the program was concluded with the tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Mr. Szell demonstrated his inability to conduct Strauss as he had done several weeks ago with the same composer's "Salome." The orchestral balances were poor and the tempi rather erratic.

Curzon Plays Brahms

The second portion of the program was given over to Brahms' "Concerto No. 2 in B-Flat" with the British pianist Clifford Curzon as soloist. Mr. Curzon, who has often demonstrated his sensitive abilities in concerts and recitals in this city, was last night not in his usual form for the first half of the concerto. He seemed to take up the conductor's heavy approach and banged his way through the first two movements.

In the third movement, with the lovely cello accompaniment, there was some sensitive and poetic playing. The last movement, too, was graciously played. It seemed the style of playing in the last two parts was determined more by Mr. Curzon's approach than Mr. Szell's.

Mr. Mitropoulos, who is ill from overwork, is reported improving and will return for the orchestra's four final weeks. He is sorely missed. For although one may disagree with some of his interpretations, he is a vital musician and a stimulating conductor.

A Mitropoulos concert may be many things, but it is never dull. Alas, Mr. Szell's was very much so.

Haieff, Poulenc and Hindemith Get Awards for Symphonic, Choral and Chamber Works

The New York Music Critics Circle yesterday named Alexei Haieff's Piano Concerto, Francis Poulenc's "Stabat Mater" and Paul Hindemith's Septet as the best musical compositions of 1952 in the respective categories of symphonic, choral and chamber music.

No opera was considered worthy of receiving the Circle's annual award for a stage work, but a special citation was voted to Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony for the presentation of Darius Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb," a work that had waited twenty-two years for performance in America.

Lauriers américains pour Francis Poulenc et Darius Milhaud

Le Stabat Mater de Francis Poulenc, donné en première audition voici deux ans au Festival de Strasbourg et qui fut joué en avril dernier au Carnegie Hall, vient d'être couronné par l'Association des critiques musicaux de New-York pour ses chœurs.

Aucune récompense n'a été accordée dans la section opéra, mais une mention spéciale a été décernée à Dimitri Mitropoulos et à l'Orchestre philharmonique de New-York pour leur enregistrement du Christophe-Colomb de Darius Milhaud et Paul Claudel.

4 Masters Take Over Carnegie

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

It was masters' hour in Carnegie Hall last night—four symphonic masters, one master of the keyboard, and Maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos to bring them all together with the masterly Philharmonic-Symphony.

The pianist was 22-year-old Friedrich Gulda, the Viennese virtuoso who caused a minor immigration snarl and a major musical upheaval when he made his debut here two years ago. What I said then still goes—this boy is phenomenal. The mark of greatness is on him and his 10 wonder-working fingers.

This was Mr. Gulda's first appearance with orchestra in the city. I imagine that all who heard him last night join me in the wish that it was the beginning of a long and seasonal association not only with the Philharmonic but with every other major orchestra in America.

Mr. Gulda had already demonstrated his prodigious gifts for the music of Prokofieff. So it was doubly exciting to find him billed for the Third Piano Concerto last night. The two—Mr. Gulda and the concerto—seemed destined for each other.

Mr. Gulda's playing was just like the concerto—dazzling in the fireworks and bewitched in the moments of poetry. There is a startling insight of style and subsurface meaning about his playing—almost as if he had come into the world with it.

Just as spell-binding—though in another way—was the local premiere of the late Alban Berg's "Three Orchestral Pieces." Berg's genius bulks larger with every passing season—so much so that though he began as Arnold Schoenberg's pupil, he has now completely overshadowed his teacher.

Like "Wozzeck," this is terrifying music, stabbing and probing like a surgeon's scalpel, yet bristling with a savage pity. It pictures a world in chaos and a new music in the pangs of birth. I found it distrubing, but fascinating. It is the H-bomb in music.

Mr. Mitropoulos confronted genius with genius in the magnificent performance accorded the score. That went for Berlioz's "Benevenuto Cellini" overture and Saint-Saens' "Algerian Suite" too. But the Berg performance was something special. It was like the discovery of a new world.

Delicious Evening

IT was one of those delicious concerts that Dimitri Mitropoulos conducts from time to time in a relaxed mood. Not carelessly, mind you. Ever so alert he was, but not tense, and using to the full at all moments his enormous intellectual and auditory awareness. As a result, the Philharmonic sounded better than I've heard it in many years, though very little of the music played was familiar to the players.

The novelty of the evening was Three Orchestral Pieces by Alban Berg, composed in 1914 but not previously heard here. These prefigure the score of "Wozzeck" in their fluent, even lurid emotionalism and also in their orchestral sound. They are intense music, sensitive and deeply sentimental. They are eloquent too and touching. Their orchestra is large (woodwinds by fours) and their volume at climactic moments massive. They have a lacy lightness too. Above all they have a spontaneous quality in their expression of feeling, in spite of their atonal (or proto-atonal) syntax, which is ever so complex. As read with love and tenderness, I found them irresistible. And I noticed no one leave the hall.

No less delicious in execution was the Suite Algerienne of Saint-Saens, which closed the program. This period piece from 1880 is no priceless bit of impressionism. Saint-Saens was not a landscape painter anyway. He was a symphonist, a formal spirit. But he did orchestrate with such a fine ear that his music is ever a pleasure to hear for the first time, because it sounds. It makes one love the orchestral palette. And Mr. Mitropoulos read the piece as if he loved it too, or at least as if he enjoyed bringing out its best.

Refreshing, too, was the performance by Friedrich Gulda and the orchestra of Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto. This piece is one of our century's finest works in that form, but curiously it is rare on programs. I don't know when I have heard it played with such beauty of sound, such perfection of balance. And Mr. Gulda executed its difficulties with such constant care for good scund and for accuracy of touch that I did not hear throughout its length one ugly tone or a single false note.

Friedrich Gulda

Piano soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony

Clearly this young man from Austria who looks and plays like forty but is only twenty-two is both a technical master and a musical artist of the very first water. He has power, perfection and command. Last night he had the added grace to offer with his orchestral début a noble work that is not hackneyed. And Mr. Mitropoulos' accompaniment was a dream of co-operation, of understanding.

Philharmonic At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

CONTEMPORARY music brought distinction to the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Of the two modern works presented, Berg's "Three Orchestral Pieces" received a first New York hearing. Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto would now be designated as a familiar and welcome item in the repertory. The soloist, Friedrich Gulda, however, made his orchestral debut on this occasion.

Two of the Berg pieces are atmospheric. They belong to the "Wozzeck" idiom in content and style, and they have those emotional undercurrents which suffuse the opera.

The final "march" is an extraordinary creation, much more understandable now almost 40 years after its initial composition and 20 years after its revision. With it Berg crossed the threshold into masterful writing. With it he gives meaning to the 12-tone system. And perhaps to the modern world. It sounded like incandescent music in Mitropoulos' interpretation last night.

Wonderfully Clear

Gulda gave a wonderfully clear, musically literate, vital performance of the Prokofieff. Aware of the concerto's many facets, he differentiated among them with that degree of tonal color that marks artistic conception and rendition. No display of technical fleetness (he played incredibly fast at times) nor of virtuosic brilliance (there was no brittle percussiveness) detracted from his making music where there was music.

The work sounded remarkably fresh and alive as set forth by Gulda, Mitropoulos, and the orchestra. And Gulda at 22 has made an exciting entry into the list of top-ranking orchestral soloists.

WORDS and MUSIC

Gulda Plays Prokofieff Concerto

The breadth of a talent only shows its full measure when big demands are made of it. I couldn't help reflecting on this fact as I listened to Friedrich Gulda, 22-year-old Viennese pianist, make his orchestral debut last night in New York playing the Third Prokofieff Piano Concerto in C Major with the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall. This work makes technical demands which the remarkable artist met with ease, and musical demands of a kind, which he also met full force.

But Gulda for his age is an amazing Beethoven player and, with all due respect to the Russian giant, is content in this concerto is on quite a different plane from that of the master from Bonn. Gulda has plenty of time and places to play Prokofieff. For this debut, it would have been more challenging for him and more revealing to his listeners of his immense gifts, to have heard Gulda play either a Beethoven or a Brahms Concerto. True, he is playing the Third Beethoven on Sunday afternon; but this is just one performance and his important initial hearing is past.

For the record, let it be clear that the pianist performed with extradordinary rhythmic buoyancy and yet maintained steadiness. This prokofieff concerto moves from bottom to top of the keyboard at every opportunity and the artist attained a bursting sense of climax in these passages through his dramatic sense of dynamics. His coloring of tone was done with beauty and always with full-nodied quality. From some standpoints it was interesting to hear him in this work because he decorated such piquant ideas as the second theme in the first movement, and the main theme of the second, with their proper pugency. When he played his last recital in 1951, one of my colleagues accused him of lacking a sense of humor. If he lacked it then, he has since acquired, judging from this playing, at least a measure of the precious stuff.

Berg Pieces Powerful

Alban Berg was a genius and a genius always has something to say. In his three orchestral pieces, Op. 6, given their first local performance last night by Dimitri Mitropoulos and orchestra, one finds peculiarly fascinating substance compounded of deeply emotional, often brooding music dramatized through an imaginative instrumentation that suffuses more mystery with already mysterious content. One could expound at length on this prelude. Round, march, if it weren't for that devil ever haunting the newspaper critic—space. Suffice it to say that this music adds emotional power to intellectual vigor and is, therefore, simultaneously, vital, challenging and satisfying.

Belated Milhaud Première

By Miles Kastendieck

New York

Darius Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb" has been heard here at long last. Its American première was given by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in concert form 22 years after its first performance in Berlin.

As an opera, in two acts and 27 scenes, it calls for the most modern kind of imaginative production. As an oratorio, the work probably projects equally well as far as appraisal is concerned. Milhaud's score is a highly individual creation. With the passage of time it may be looked upon more as a tour de force than as a genuinely moving work. The music has beauty and strength in parts; but as a whole, it is stunning to the point of numbness.

Overemphasis

Several restrictions appear to curtail its ultimate effectiveness. One of these is over-emphasis of the percussive element arising from the European concept of persistent drum-beats to create American local color. Too much bombast dulls the senses, tending to dispel the finer moments. Finally, the vocal treatment appears more dispassionate than the nature of the subject would warrant. The score is an extraordinary technical feat, but it needs a continuity to fuse the ideas of the librettist, Paul Claudel, into a significant entity.

Claudel's text is too literary, we may say, for musical projection, imposing more than Milhaud could cope with to achieve the combination of the real and the unreal. Even a second hearing fails to change this impression, or to dissipate the monotony which persists in the supertension encountered in the performance.

Mr. Mitropoulos achieved a remarkable feat of presentation. As was his custom, he conducted without score, showing amazing ingenuity in fashioning the performance.

His soloists were most cooperative. John Brownlee as narrator proved ideal. Mack Harrell as Christopher Columbus, Dorothy Dow, Adolph Anderson, Norman Scott, and David Lloyd performed admirably, along with a special chorus directed by Hugh Ross.

Though given in English the words did not come through too clearly. That fact may have explained in part why the audience lost its way and withdrew in almost startling proportions at the first performance.

Among the other first performances at the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts were two concertos — Martin's Violin Concerto and Martinů's 'Cello Concerto No. 1.

Two Concertos

Joseph Szigeti introduced the Martin Violin Concerto, but all his fine playing could not overcome the dullness which crept into each movement of the Swiss composer's writing. The piece has some ingratiating pages, especially at the beginning, when Martin was still influenced by just having composed five Songs of Ariel from Shakespeare's "The Tempest." Otherwise he appears to rhapsodize in an outmoded manner.

Pierre Fournier introduced the 'Cello Concerto of Martinů, which dates from 1934, undergoing revision five years later. A listener coming upon it for the first time would place it after Martinů's arrival in the United States; for the score reveals the influences of the American jazz idiom of the '30's. Under the circumstances, the syncopation is fascinating. The music is attractively vital and melodic, knowingly devised for the 'cellist, and cleverly orchestrated. It was well received.

Kapell Is Soloist, Mitropoulos Director at Carnegie Hall

By Francis D. Perkins

William Kapell, playing Mozart's piano concerto in G major (K. 453), was the soloist in the conservative program played by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos last night in Carnegie Hall. This work and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture, which opened the evening, and is also not played particularly often, gave a certain touch of unfamiliarity to the first half of the concert, which closed with the first symphony of Brahms.

Mr. Kapell's playing in the Mozart concerto was notable for clarity of medium, technical deftness and a consistently musical quality of tone. It was admirable in its realization of fine dynamic shadings and also of fine points of musical and interpretative color. These, however, lay within certain limits, so that variety of mood was not particularly in evidence, although the prevailing delicacy of its treatment was generally appropriate to the work. But a higher spirited interpretation of the finale would not have been amiss. There were indeed, poetically and persuasively played episodes, thorough technical neatness and well chosen tempi. The accompaniment was usually well co-ordinated, while slightly weighty in a few concerted measures.

Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture which, according to the latest research, seems really to be the first, is not first class Beethoven, although it merits occasional hearings; its musical ideas, apart from Florestan's aria, are not particularly memorable. The performance realized all the expressive possibilities of the music. Apart from a few unusually emphasized changes of tempo and a rather deliberate pace for the third movement, the Brahms symphony pursued an orthodox and sonorous course.

GULDA IS SOLOIST FOR PHILHARMONIC

Mitropoulos Conducts Berlioz Overture, Berg Pieces in Concert at Carnegie Hall

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Friedrich Gulda, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.
Overture to Benvenuto Cellini.....Berlioz
Three Orchestral Pieces, Op. 6 (first New York performance).....Berg
Piano Concerto No. 3 in C, Op 28...Prokofieff
Suite Algerienne.....Saint-Saens

By OLIN DOWNES

The Philharmonic-Symphony program offered by Mr. Mitropoulos last night in Carnegie Hall was something of a melange, something suggestive of an excursion trip, fare prepaid, from Mosquito Heights to Kingdom Come. Its principal symphonic feature was the first New York performance of the "Three Orchestral Pieces" of Alban Berg, preceded by the Weberish overture by Berlioz, followed by Prokofieff's glittering Piano Concerto No. 3, played by Friedrich Gulda and lapsing finally into the banalities of the Old Teakettle—excuse us, the Algerienne Suite of Camille Saint-Saens.

It is due to Mr. Mitropoulos to say that he conducted all of these works with the same degree of seriousness and attention to their best interests. His crowning performance, if only because of the exceptional complexity and subtlety of the score, was that of Berg. This is super-sensitive and introspective music. It dates from the period of the opera "Wozzeck" and much of it is similar in mood and technic to that score.

But it is not really concert music. It is operatic music from crown to toe—music-drama without scenery, a drama enacted by unseen protaganists; a mortal struggle, one would say, of defianee if not victory.

Whether it is to hold as music for the future need not, and cannot, be argued here. Because of its lack, for this writer, of genuine symphonic identity, because of the sensation of soul drama and a composer talking to himself, this does not seem stuff that can be measured by the yardstick of symphonic values.

One wishes scenery, a stage picture of some sort, however psychological in its import, to be provided with the score, and is not at all sure whether, lacking such visual representation, these allegedly symphonic pieces will be heard in future years as music qua music, or be utilized, some day, for a ballet or moving picture of the order of "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari."

Berlioz' Weberish overture, with the "Euryanthe" flourishes at the beginning, and places in the development distinctly emanating from Frieschutz, was done up to the handle. Prokofieff's concerto was played by Mr. Gulda with the most ample technic, thoroughness, variety of touch, and wire-smoking speed. It was an extremely capable performance, loudly applauded. Nor did Mr. Mitropoulos deny the globe-trotting tourist, Saint-Saëns, his desserts. He played the "Algerian Suite" for exactly what it is.

KAPELL PRESENTS MOZART CONCERTO

Young Pianist Is Soloist for Philharmonic—Mitropoulos Leads Brahms Symphony

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulous. Piano soloist, William Kapell. At Carnegie Hall.
Leonore Overture No. 1.....Beethoven
Piano Concerto in G (K.453).....Mozart
Symphony No. 1.....Brahms

Mozart's G major Concerto (K. 453) stands in a special position of its own. It is not as emotionally moving as the C and D minor Concertos, nor does it have the brilliance and bravura of the last C major. But for form, balance and proportion it is not surpassed by any of his twenty-seven piano concertos, while its bubbling melodic material and its occasional melancholy texture—the dark little E minor tonal shift in the first movement is ravishing—make it a unique work even for Mozart.

William Kapell is not normally associated with Mozart, though a few summers ago the brilliant young pianist played one of his concertos at Lewisohn Stadium, and played it very well. His work last night was not on an equal level of accomplishment. It did not flow naturally — one might even call the playing affected — and it lacked the bounce and resilience one looks forward to hearing in music such as this.

Part of the lack of effectiveness came from the inferior balance between piano and orchestra, especially in the first movement, where the end of many of the piano's phrases were blanketed by the accompaniment. There also were some rhythmic blank spots, especially in running piano passages, where Mr. Kapell failed to accent the basic pulse.

Technically, the performance had some excellent things, including a well-planned slow movement and some sharp outlines in the finale. Mr. Kapell used Mozart's own cadenzas, romanticizing them a little. He also varied his tempos once or twice in the interests of variety.

These effects did not always come off. Mozart himself took liberties with his music, but they always were controlled. He even occasionally adopted a tempo rubato, explaining his procedures in a letter to his father (1777):

"What these people cannot grasp is that in tempo rubato in an adagio the left hand should go on playing in strict time. With them the left hand always follows suit * * *"

In the Brahms First, which is virtually an official orchestral piece these days, Mr. Mitropoulos handled the score admirably. Possibly no conductor alive could find anything particularly novel to reveal in the music, but that is not Brahms' fault; and the very fact that the symphony has survived its multitudinous workouts of the last two decades is enough testimony to its basic strength. Mr. Mitropoulos also led a strong, incisive performance of the First "Leonore."

Gulda's Beethoven

The pianist Friedrich Gulda was heard yesterday afternoon over a nation-wide broadcast from Carnegie Hall playing Beethoven's Concerto No. 3, in C minor, with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos. The remainder of the program, heard and reviewed earlier this season, included Mendelsohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture and Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

Mr. Guida's Beethoven, to state it briefly, was superb. Phrases soared, were perfect in shape and moving in content. Color flowed, glistened and gleamed, and made of the familiar concerto a bright experience and a novel one. Fingerwise, also, the pianist was fully in charge of the music he had chosen to display. His scale passages and figurations were ever neat and firm, and his trill—as distinct from others of the gifted young—was lyric and limpid and nowhere founded on the model of the pneumatic drill. It was, in sum, piano playing authentic and genuine. If yesterday's performance may be taken as an augury, Mr. Gulda's rapidly rising fame will not cease to grow for some time.

The Minneapolis Symphony -- for Better or Worse

By Bert Cunnington

The Minneapolis Symphony is now in midseason.

After playing for 12 straight weeks, the organization and its conductor should be considered in their best shape since the concert season's beginning last November first.

So far, the orchestra has given a total of 21 local concerts, has appeared with some dozen big-name soloists, and has played under three very capable conductors.

THEY HAVE most certainly reached their zenith for this, their golden anniversary season.

Well, how does the orchestra stack up in their twelfth week?

Somewhat paradoxically, it must be admitted. Potentially, the group constitutes one of the truly great symphonic ensembles in the Western hemisphere: it possesses a trumpet and trombone section that is equal to all but a very few in this country today, it boasts of a woodwind section that has absolutely no peers anywhere, and it owns a string section that can be made to sound like that of the great Philadelphia Orchestra, perhaps the world's finest.

The Minneapolis Symphony is, in the words of Indianapolis symphony conductor Fabian Sevitzsky, "The most flexible in the U.S." It is also, in the opinion of Leopold Stokowski (who conducted here last year), "absolutely one of the great orchestras in the world."

And from tight-lipped Stokowski, that's great praise indeed.

The Minneapolis Symphony has also grown considerably in the last several years. Back in 1931 Eugene Ormandy, the present Philadephia maestro who then headed the Minneapolis group, referred to our orchestra as "nothing more than 84 pieces of wood." Sixteen years later, in 1947, Ormandy returned here for one week as guest conductor and declared that he "could have the orchestra sounding like the Philadelphia in five weeks." When he made his recent appearance here several weeks ago the Quaker City director was ecstatic: "Your progress has been simply incredible," he told the orchestra members. "You have matured unbelievably since I left you (back in 1936). At this moment, I can find no other words than these to express my feelings: You sound every bit as fine as the Philadelphia Orchestra, which is the greatest compliment I could ever pay you."

UNDER Ormandy the orchestra plays like it does for no one else. For five glorious years under his tutelage it sang with more soulful eloquence than it has in all the 16 years since he left it in 1936.

But from 1937 to 1949, the symphony with Dimitri Mitropoulos at its helm underwent a complete metamorphosis. Slowly but inexorably true orchestral balance and accepted orchestral tone vanished into bowed strings that scratched, woodwinds that wailed, brass that blasted, and percussion that resembled the bombing of Berlin during a thunderstorm. Mixed in equal parts with this cacophony was a dismally regular absence of correct intonation, attack, and discipline.

For the Mitropoulos philosophy was simply this: "It is for the orchestra to furnish the correct notes; it is for myself only to interpret those notes."

The Mitropoulos tonal "technique" was particularly hard on the wind players. When they gave him all the lungpower they had, he would ask for more, always more.

It didn't work of course.

Wind players can't be forced to the point of exertion; in fact, it's better not to force them at all, for forced winds mean faulty intonation and the most wretched sounds imaginable.

UNQUESTIONABLY, Mitropoulos knew a great deal about inspiring an orchestra to play music with magnificent thought and philosophy behind it. But he knew very little indeed of the capabilities of the instruments which played that music.

Mitropoulos' interpretations were sensational, it is true—senationally good or sensationally bad. There was no middle ground with genius Mitropoulos. What he did with such things as Rachmaninoff's Second symphony or Mahler's First was miraculous and reveltatory. What he did to pieces like Tschaikovsky's "Hamlet" overture and Mozart's G minor symphony was consummately outrageous.

When he left in 1949, his orchestra was in decidedly bad shape as major orchestras go.

It was a better orchestra that conductor Antal Dorati began to fashion in the fall of 1949. Within the first week of Dorati's leadership several factors were patently obvious to any observant listener. The Minneapolis Symphony was once again sounding like a symphony orchestra instead of a vulgarly overloud brass band, and the hypertensive, volcanic intensity with which it had been playing for the past 12 years under the glabrous Greek was cooling rapidly into a less erratic, albeit less exciting and emotional form of music making.

For Dorati's personality is not of the same ilk as Mitropoulous' or Ormandy's. He is more quiet, less compelling, allowing the music to flow past him rather than through him from his orchestra to the audience. Like all conductors there are a number of things he does better than other things. And there are some things he does better than most living directors. By way of example, there are no better interpretations than Dorati's of the Stravinsky "Rite of Spring," Resphigi's "Pines of Rome" or Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe."

Perhaps Dorati's greatest attribute is his overwhelming sincerity; in everything he does, whether in rehearsal or in concert, one cannot help but be strongly aware of it. And his almost fanatical devotion to the cause of disseminating culture is quite wonderful indeed.

Unquestionably, Dorati's major contribution to the Minneapolis Symphony has been a return to the Ormandy pattern of fluid and easy tone, technical perfection, and true symphonic balance. At best, the orchestra's character is one of shimmering, transulcent virtuosity. At worst, it sounds dull mechanical and careless.

This season the Dorati ensemble is sounding both ways.

In a sense, this is something of a paradox, because in all its fifty years it has never had a finer personnel. Since its conductor's arrival here three years ago, the Minneapolis Symphony has witnessed several significant changes in many of its key positions.

Rafael Druian, its brilliant concertmaster, jointed the orchestra in 1949. Rolf Persinger, whose teacher-father also tutored Yehudi Menuhin, assumed the first-chair viola chair a year later, as did trumpeters Sheldon Rockler and Bernard Adlestein. Adelstein as first trumpet is considered among his colleagues to be one of the finest brass men in the nation today.

In 1951, two principal vacancies were filled. Robert Jamieson, an excellent cellist, assumed the first-chair spot deserted by Lorne Munroe, who left the Twin Cities for the same position in Philadelphia under Eugene Ormandy. Along with Jamieson that year came Paul Walton, a tuba player from Chicago, who in the opinion of this writer is virtually peerless.

THIS SEASON the brass section got another shot in the arm when it secured as bass trombonist, a Chicago-trained musician by the name of Eugene Izaeff, who when combined in passages with tubist Walton, gives the brasses a solidity and depth that they have not had for years.

Well, then, what's wrong? Why, with an excellent personnel, an exhumed philosophy of orchestral balance, and a conductor who worships this balance and knows how to get it, is there such inconsistency in the quality of the concerts we've heard from the symphony this season?

How do you explain the fact, for instance, that the eighth subscription concert on Jan. 9 brought us one of the best Dorati performances we've had all year, while the very next Friday presented orchestral playing that was apathetic and lifeless? It is possible that after having reached midseason the orchestra is tiring, that for some reason it is faced with the doldrums.

WHATEVER the case may be, it is a mysterious and disappointing one indeed, for the orchestra was for many weeks after the season's beginning, playing with wonderful verve, spirit, and industry. It is a real pity too that things should be going as they are; the Minneapolis Symphony has terrific potential and can play quite wonderfully under Dorati. Many times, both here and elsewhere, the orchestra has given concerts with this conductor that, for balance, technique and tonal beauty would be hard to beat. There is a transparent, "floating" quality about the sound that Dorati achieves during those moments when things go well. It is a sound that, while not having the lushness and immensity of the Stokowski and Ormandy tone, is quite justifiable and worthy in its own way.

Well then, how does the Minneapolis Symphony stack up with the other U.S. orchestras?

AMONG THE 10 or 12 major symphonic ensembles in the country today, this city's orchestra ranks perhaps in about the fifth or sixth place, if one can be objective about something so intrinsically subjective. Our orchestra shares this position with at least two other excellent ensembles, those in Cleveland and San Francsico. Those units which take precedence in this regard are the Philadelphia, Boston, New York, Chicago and N.B.C. Symphonies.

It was Eugene Ormandy who was responsible for elevating the Minneapolis Symphony into this enviable position among the nation's great orchestras.

It was the curiously uneven talents of Dimitri Mitropoulos, which after a dozen years of decidedly paradoxical contributions, led the orchestra into a gradual technical decline. The results of this decline eventually found the organization trading almost solely on the understandable fame and popularity of its exciting conductor and on the past laurels it had received in other years.

IT IS Antal Dorati who, while not yet having matured as deeply in matters of personality and interpretative sense as have his older predecessors, has not only restored the Minneapolis Symphony's former orchestral briliance but has gone quite a bit further by giving this city the finest orchestra it has ever owned.

That's where the Minneapolis Symphony today finds itself when it plays well—at the height of its collective technical powers.

And it is to Antal Dorati who we must give the lion's share of the credit for putting it there.

Ἐν τῇ ἐκτιμήσει τοῦ θέματος, ὁ ἀρχηγὸς τῆς Κυβερνήσεως Στρατάρχης Παπάγος ἔκρινεν ὅτι ἐπεβάλλετο νὰ προτείνῃ τὴν ἀνάθεσιν τῆς Διευθύνσεως τῆς Λυρικῆς μας Σκηνῆς εἰς ἕναν ἐκλεκτὸν Ἕλληνα καὶ διάσημον μουσικόν, τὸν Δημήτριον Μητρόπουλον. Τὴν πρότασιν αὐτήν, τὴν ἰδιαιτέρως τιμητικὴν ἐκ τοῦ τρόπου τῆς προσφορᾶς καὶ τοῦ προσώπου ποὺ τὴν ἀπηύθυνε, δὲν κατέστη δυνατὸν νὰ ἀποδεχθῇ ὁ πρὸς ὃν ἀπηυθύνθη, λόγῳ τῶν συμβατικῶν του δεσμεύσεων εἰς τὴν ξένην. Ἤρκεσεν ὅμως αὐτὸ διὰ νὰ ἐπακολουθήσουν ἀνωμολόγητοι κατσφοραὶ καὶ τελικῶς ἐχρειάσθη νὰ ὑποβιβασθῇ καὶ ἴσως ἐπιεικῶς ὁ διακεκριμένος αὐτὸς Ἕλλην εἰς τὴν ἄγνωστην μέχρι τώρα τάξιν τοῦ... ὑποέλληνος!! Οἱ ἐκστομίζοντες παρομοίας χυδαιότητας, θὰ ἔπρεπε νὰ ὑπολογίσουν ὅτι ἡ συμπεριφορὰ των ἀφορᾷ ἐμμέσως καὶ τὸν ἐπὶ κεφαλῆς τῆς Κυβερνήσεως, ὁ ὁποῖος ὑποτίθεται τουλάχιστον ὅτι ἀπευθυνόμενος πρὸς τὸν μεγάλον καλλιτέχνην, ἐγνώριζε τὰς λεπτομερείας τῆς Ἐθνικῆς του ἐντάξεως. Ἀλλὰ καὶ ἂν δὲν εὐκαιροῦν τυχὸν νὰ ἀσχοληθοῦν μὲ παρόμοιον ἐνδοιασμόν, θὰ ἔπρεπεν ἐν πάσῃ περιπτώσει νὰ ὑπολογίσουν τὴν θλιβερωτάτην ἀπήχησιν τῶν ὕβρεων αὐτῶν εἰς τὴν ξένην, ὅπου ὁ ὑβριζόμενος ΤΙΜΑ ΚΑΤ' ΕΞΟΧΗΝ τὸ Ἑλληνικὸν ὄνομα, μὲ τὸ ἀνεπίληπτον ἦθος του καὶ τὴν ΟΙΚΟΥΜΕΝΙΚΩΣ ΑΝΕΓΝΩΡΙΣΜΕΝΗΝ καὶ μοναδικὴν ἀξίαν του.

Η ΚΥΒΕΡΝΗΣΙΣ
ΕΚΑΛΕΣΕ ΤΟΝ κ. ΜΗΤΡΟΠΟΥΛΟΝ ΔΙΑ ΤΗΝ ΛΥΡΙΚΗΝ ΣΚΗΝΗΝ

Ὁ στρατάρχης Παπάγος ἀπηύθυνε πρὸς τὸν ἐν Νέᾳ Ὑόρκῃ Ἕλληνα μουσουργὸν καὶ διευθυντὴν τῆς Φιλαρμονικῆς ὀρχήστρας κ. Δημ. Μητρόπουλον τὸ κάτωθι τηλεγράφημα:

«Ἀποβλέπων εἰς τὴν ἐξύψωσιν τῆς Λυρικῆς Σκηνῆς καὶ στηριζόμενος εἰς τὴν ἀγάπην σας πρὸς τὴν πατρίδα, σᾶς ἀπευθύνω τὴν θερμὴν παράκλησιν νὰ δεχθῆτε τὴν διεύθυνσιν καὶ ἀναδιοργάνωσιν τῆς Λυρικῆς Σκηνῆς. Παραλλήλως θὰ ἐπωφελοῦμαι τῆς πολυτίμου γνώμης σας ἐπὶ τῶν μουσικῶν ζητημάτων».

Μεταξὺ τῶν ἐνταῦθα μουσικῶν κύκλων παρετηρεῖτο σχετικῶς, ὅτι, κατὰ πᾶσαν πιθανότητα, ὁ κ. Μητρόπουλος, ἀκόμη καὶ διὰ λόγους ὑγείας, δὲν πρόκειται νὰ δεχθῇ τὴν πρόσκλησιν τῆς Κυβερνήσεως. Ἐξ ἄλλου δὲ εἶναι ἀμφίβολον κατὰ πόσον, ἔξω τῆς καθαρῶς μουσικῆς ἰδιοφυΐας του, ἔχει τὰ διοικητικὰ καὶ ἄλλα προσόντα διὰ νὰ διευθύνῃ καὶ τὸν ὅλον ὀργανισμὸν τῆς Λυρικῆς Σκηνῆς.

ΤΕΛΕΙΩΣ ΑΝΙΔΕΟΙ!

Δὲν γνωρίζομεν, ποῖος ἐκ τῶν ἁρμοδίων συνέταξε καὶ εἰσηγήθη εἰς τὸν κ. Πρωθυπουργόν, τὴν ἀποστολὴν τοῦ τηλεγραφήματος πρὸς τὸν κ. Μητρόπουλον διὰ ν' ἀναλάβῃ τὴν διεύθυνσιν τῆς... Λυρικῆς Σκηνῆς· ἀσφαλῶς, ὅμως, θὰ εἶναι ὄχι μόνον πολὺ ἀφελής, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀνίδεος προσώπων καὶ πραγμάτων.

Ναὶ μὲν ὁ κ. Μητρόπουλος εἶναι ὁ διεθνῶς γνωστότερος καὶ ἀνώτερος τῶν Ἑλλήνων μουσικῶν, μετέχων τῆς χορείας τῶν 6 πρώτων ἀρχιμουσικῶν τοῦ κόσμου. Πέραν, ὅμως, τῆς μπαγκέττας του, εἶναι, ἐκ χαρακτῆρος, ἀνίκανος νὰ διευθύνῃ ὅ,τι δήποτε—ἐξ οὗ καὶ τὰ ἀξιοθρήνητα λάθη, εἰς τὰ ὁποῖα κατὰ καιροὺς ὑπέπεσεν, ἀδικῶν καὶ τὸν ἑαυτόν του ἀκόμη. Τί νὰ διορθώσῃ, λοιπόν, εἰς ἕνα χρεωκοπημένον ὀργανισμόν, ὡς ἡ Λυρικὴ Σκηνή, καὶ πῶς θὰ παραβῇ, ἄλλως τε, καὶ τὸ συμβόλαιον, ποὺ ἔχει μὲ τὴν Ὄπεραν καὶ τὴν ὀρχήστραν τῆς Ν. Ὑόρκης;

Ὅλα αὐτὰ ὤφειλαν νὰ τὰ γνωρίζουν οἱ κ.κ. ἁρμόδιοι τοῦ Ὑπουργείου καὶ νὰ μὴ εἰσηγοῦνται εἰς τὸν κ. Πρωθυπουργὸν τηλεγραφήματα, ὡς τὸ προχθεσινόν.

Μακρὰ τηλεγραφικὴ ἀνταπόκρισις τοῦ ἐν Ν. Ὑόρκῃ συνεργάτου μας κ. Α. ΑΡΓΥΡΟΠΟΥΛΟΥ

ΝΕΑ ΥΟΡΚΗ, 19 Ἰανουαρίου. (Τοῦ ἀνταποκριτοῦ μας). — Ὁ Δημήτρης Μητρόπουλος, μὲ τὸν ὁποῖον συνηντήθην εὐθὺς μόλις ἤλθεν ἡ εἴδησις ὅτι τοῦ ἐτηλεγράφησεν ὁ στρατάρχης Παπάγος, μοῦ ἀνεκοίνωσεν ὅτι μόλις γύρω Κυριακὴν τὸ πρωῒ ἔλαβε τὸ τηλεγράφημα τοῦ Ἕλληνος Πρωθυπουργοῦ. Ὁ διάσημος Ἕλλην ἀρχιμουσικὸς μοῦ ἐξήγησεν ὅτι τὸ τηλεγράφημα ἐβράδυνε νὰ ἔλθῃ εἰς χεῖράς του, διότι ἐστάλη εἰς ἐσφαλμένην διεύθυνσιν.

Παρὰ τὸ γεγονὸς ὅτι ὁ κ. Μητρόπουλος μέχρι τῆς ὑψηλῆς ἑσπέρας δὲν εἶχε διατυπώσει τὸ κείμενον τῆς ἀπαντήσεώς του, ἀπεκόμισα τὴν ἐντύπωσιν ἀπὸ τὴν συνομιλίαν μας ὅτι θὰ ἐκφράσῃ τὴν συγκίνησιν καὶ τὰς εὐχαριστίας του διὰ τὴν πρόσκλησιν τῆς ἑλληνικῆς Κυβερνήσεως παρὰ τὸ γεγονὸς ὅτι ἔχει γίνει ἀπὸ μακροῦ Ἀμερικανὸς πολίτης. Ἐν συνεχείᾳ—παρ' ὅ,τι ὁ ἴδιος, ἐπαναλαμβάνω, ἀπέφυγε οἱανδήποτε ἀνακοίνωσιν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ τὴν ἐντύπωσιν τοῦ ἀμέσου περιβάλλοντός του — ὁ διακεκριμένος ἀρχιμουσικὸς θ' ἀρνηθῇ εὐσήμως τὴν μόνιμον ἐγκατάστασίν του εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα καὶ τὴν ἀπὸ μέρους του ἀνάληψιν τῆς διευθύνσεως τῆς Λυρικῆς Σκηνῆς. Ὅσον ἀφορᾷ τὸν ρόλον τοῦ μουσικοῦ συμβούλου, ποὺ τοῦ προετάθη παραλλήλως, ἡ γνώμη τῶν περὶ αὐτὸν εἶνε ὅτι θὰ ἐπικαλεσθῇ πρὸς τὸ παρὸν λόγους ὑγείας καὶ τὰς ἀνειλημμένας ὑποχρεώσεις του. Ἄλλωστε, ἡ ἀνάγκη συστηματικῆς ἰατρικῆς παρακολουθήσεως καθιστᾷ προβληματικὴν ἄμεσον ταξίδι του εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα.

Ὅπως εἶνε γνωστόν, ὁ Μητρόπουλος τελευταίως ἠσθένησε βαρέως καὶ ὑπεχρεώθη νὰ παραμείνῃ ἐπὶ τρεῖς ἑβδομάδας εἰς νοσοκομεῖον. Ἡ φύσις τῆς ἀσθενείας του δὲν ἀνεκοινώθη καὶ ἀπεδόθη εἰς ὑπερκόπωσιν. Πάντως εἶνε γεγονὸς ὅτι εἶχε χάσει σημαντικὸν βάρος καὶ εἶχεν ἐξασθενήσει. Τώρα ὅμως ἔχει ἀναλάβει ἀρκετὰ καὶ, ὅπως διεπίστωσα ἀπὸ τὴν συνομιλίαν μας, ἡ φωνή του ἐπανῆλθεν εἰς τὴν προηγουμένην ζωηρότητά της. Ἐκέρδισεν ἐπίσης βάρος.

Πάντως, ὁ διάσημος μαέστρος μας ἔλαβε πολύμηνον ἄδειαν ἀπουσίας ἀπὸ τὴν ἐργασίαν του. Ἡ ἐντύπωσις τῶν ἐδῶ μουσικῶν κύκλων εἶνε ὅτι ἐνδεχομένως θὰ δυνηθῇ νὰ διευθύνῃ πρὸ τὸ τέλος τῆς σαιζόν, ἀλλ' ὁ ἴδιος ἐνεπιστεύθη πρὸ ἡμερῶν εἰς φίλον του ὅτι δὲν πιστεύει ὅτι θὰ δυνηθῇ νὰ διευθύνῃ πρὶν ἀπὸ τὸ ἐρχόμενον φθινόπωρον. Ἐπὶ τοῦ παρόντος τὸ σχέδιόν του εἶνε νὰ ταξιδεύσῃ εἰς τὴν Νότιον Ἀμερικήν, πιθανῶς εἰς τὴν Φλωρίδα, διὰ ν' ἀναπαυθῇ, κατὰ σύστασιν τῶν ἰατρῶν του.

Τώρα ὁ Μητρόπουλος διαμένει εἰς τὸ γνωστὸν ξενοδοχεῖον «Gread Northern», εἰς τὸ κέντρον τοῦ Μανχάτταν, πλησίον τοῦ Κάρνεζυ Χώλ, ὅπου εἶνε ἐγκατεστημένη ἡ Φιλαρμονικὴ τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης, τῆς ὁποίας προΐσταται. Μέχρι προσφάτως ἐζοῦσεν εἰς ἕνα ἁπλὸ δωμάτιον, ἀλλὰ τελευταίως ἐνοικίασε μεγάλο διαμέρισμα εἰς τὸ ρετιρὲ τοῦ ξενοδοχείου ὅπου καὶ ἐγκατεστάθη.

Εἰς τὴν μεγάλην κόπωσίν του συνετέλεσε καὶ τὸ γεγονὸς ὅτι ἐπὶ ἡμέρας μετέφερεν ὁ ἴδιος τὰ βιβλία καὶ τὰ ἄλλα χαρτιὰ τοῦ μουσικοῦ του ἀρχείου.

Εἰς τὴν ὑπηρεσίαν του ἔχει μίαν Ἀμερικανίδα πρώτην γραμματέα καὶ μουσικόν, τὴν κ. Στράους. Ὑπενθυμίζω ὅτι ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἀνενέωσε προσφάτως τὸ συμβόλαιόν του μὲ τὴν ἐδῶ Φιλαρμονικήν. Ἐκ τοῦ ἀμέσου περιβάλλοντός του μοῦ ἐλέχθη ὅτι ἄμεσος μετάβασίς του εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα θὰ προεκάλει ἐπικινδύνους δι' αὐτὸν συγκινήσεις. Διὰ τὸν λόγον αὐτὸν καὶ διότι παραλλήλως ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἐπιθυμεῖ νὰ συμβουλευθῇ καὶ τοὺς φιλικούς του κύκλους τῆς Φιλαρμονικῆς, εἶνε προφανὲς ὅτι θὰ καταναλώσῃ τὴν σημερινὴν πρωΐαν εἰς ἐπαφὰς μὲ τοὺς παράγοντας αὐτοὺς καὶ εἰς συμβουλευτικὴν ἐπικοινωνίαν μὲ τοὺς θεράποντας ἰατρούς του καὶ μόνον κατόπιν θὰ συντάξῃ τὴν ἀπάντησίν του.

Ὁ Μητρόπουλος εἰς δύο χαρακτηριστικὲς στάσεις, ἐνῶ διευθύνει τὴν Φιλαρμονικὴν Ὀρχήστραν τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης.

Παρὰ τῶν ἐν Νέᾳ Ὑόρκῃ Ἑλλήνων ἐπισήμων ἐκφράζονται, σημειωτέον, ἀμφιβολίαι ἐὰν «πρὸς τὸ παρόν» θὰ δυνηθῇ νὰ ἱκανοποιήσῃ τὴν πρόσκλησιν τοῦ Στρατάρχου καὶ θὰ ἀποδεχθῇ μόνιμον ἐργασίαν εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα, ἐγκαταλείπων τὸ ἐν Ἀμερικῇ ἔργον του.

Ἐν τούτοις, λαμβανομένης ὑπ' ὄψιν τῆς καλλιτεχνικῆς καὶ αἰσθηματικῆς του ἰδιοσυγκρασίας, οὐδεμία θετικὴ πρόβλεψις δύναται νὰ γίνῃ προτοῦ ὁ ἴδιος ἀπαντήσῃ εἰς τὴν τηλεγραφικὴν ἔκκλησιν τοῦ κ. Παπάγου, ἡ ὁποία ζωηρῶς τὸν ἔχει ἐπηρεάσει.

Α. ΑΡΓΥΡΟΠΟΥΛΟΣ

Εἰς τὰς Ἀθήνας οἱ ἐνδιαφερόμενοι καλλιτέχναι διὰ τοῦ συλλόγου των «Καλλιτεχνῶν ἄσματος καὶ χοροῦ τῆς Ἐθνικῆς Λυρικῆς Σκηνῆς», ἀπηύθυναν πρὸς τὸν κ. Πρωθυπουργὸν τὸ ἀκόλουθον τηλεγράφημα:

The Philharmonic Ensemble has no composers on its board, but Mr. Temerson has sought their advice unofficially in planning programs. Also, Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the Philharmonic-Symphony, is adviser and final arbiter of the programs, and he provides the composer's point of view not only because he has composed but because of his well known keen perceptions of contemporary music and his vast and intimate knowledge of the field. But the collaboration and interest of Mr. Mitropoulos do not take away from the men the sense that the Chamber Ensemble concerts are their own and the pride that makes them play as if they enjoy doing so instead of giving the impression of doing a job or favor for some one else.

Right Expression Is Music To Dr. Schmidt, Picture Maker

Believe it or not, this is Dmitri Mitropoulos in an intense moment while rehearsing some members of the Philharmonic for a benefit performance. Made by Dr. I. W. Schmidt, with Rollei and speed lights.

By MABEL SCACHERI.

Music and photography are the two great enthusiasms of Dr. I. W. Schmidt. Now he has found a way to combine the two. Several hundred negatives have piled up since last spring when he talked himself into the rehearsals of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. He's cooking up a big, all-inclusive picture story of the orchestra.

"No, no, I'm not off of pictorial photography," Doc. protests. "But I find this orchestra material fascinating. Musicians are the kindest people imaginable, and their faces are the most expressive. Wonderful to photograph."

The most expressive face of all, according to Doc, is that of Dmitri Mitropoulos, the celebrated conductor.

100 Expressions.

"In one minute, a hundred different expressions will flit across his face, as he tries to bring out the mood of the music," Doc. declared.

"What mood was he trying to put across in this one?" I asked, picking up a real honey, with Mr. Mitropoulos twisting his features in a manner to bring envy to Danny Kaye.

"Aaah, you aren't going to use THAT one, are you?" Doc yelled. "I said musicians are kind, but maybe not kind enough to like gag shots."

"I'll bet Dmitri Mitropoulos thinks this one is funny," I said firmly hanging onto the expressive shot. "He thinks you're a swell fotog. Didn't he use one of your orchestra-and-chorus pix to make up 300 Christmas cards for himself in December?"

'Mad Scientist.'

Now I leave it to you. Isn't that some picture? Couldn't Mr. Mitropoulos star in one of those "mad scientist" movies?

Anyway, Doc Schmidt is doing all of his candids-with-music by means of a Rolleiflex synched to speed lights, the Mighty Midget, in fact. He threatened to make a real-life picture of me at my desk. I said: "Stick to Mitropoulos; he really knows how to pose."

Incidentally, the Midget ran for about eight months on the original batteries, with Doc shooting every day, before new batteries were necessary.

Dimitri Mitropoulos Pays Off Debt

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

BILLED on the Philharmonic program of April 2, Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony will mark both the passing of the Soviet composer and the recovery and return to work of Dimitri Mitropoulos.

For the Philharmonic conductor the performance will also be in the nature of squaring a personal debt. It was Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto that launched the Greek musician on an international career.

Mr. Mitropoulos was invited to Berlin in 1930 to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic. Egon Petri, the scheduled soloist for the Prokofieff's Concerto, could not appear, and no other pianist was available to replace him. To save the situation, Mr. Mitropoulos volunteered to play it himself.

The result was a spectacular double debut in Berlin as conductor and pianist for the young musician. The news flashed across the continent and Mr. Mitropoulos became one of the most talked of figures in European music.

Engaged to conduct in Paris soon after, Mr. Mitropoulos again billed the Third Piano Concerto. This time he was heard by Prokofieff, who stated publicly that the Greek played it better than he himself could ever hope to.

Word of this reached Serge Koussevitzky, who promptly invited Mr. Mitropoulos to come to America as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. All of which explains why the concerto is down in Mr. Mitropoulos' book as "the lucky Prokofieff Third."

Of the Fifth Symphony, he quotes Prokofieff himself: "It is a symphony about the spirit of man."

Of more interest to more Americans, however, will be Mr. Lindsay's observations on concerts that had been given by the New York Philharmonic. These, he says, "provided an unexpected interest in the contrast between the two conductors—Bruno Walter, the last representative of the old order of things, and Dimitri Mitropoulos, the dynamic representative of the new. They conducted on alternate nights, and one might have been listening to different orchestras. In one sense, it was clever of the management to arrange to provide us with, in effect, two orchestras."

Mr. Lindsay goes on to say why Mr. Walter's music was so much more satisfying than Mr. Mitropoulos', and I dare say the criticism would match pretty well some that you have read on this side of the ocean.

«TOSCA» und «WOZZEK»

Eines der erstaunlichsten und erschrekkendsten Werke der Moderne, der «Wozzek» (nach dem Text von Georg Büchner) von Alban Berg ist — unter Dimitri Mitropoulos — in New York aufgenommen worden, und zwar in deutscher Sprache, die überraschend gut gehandhabt wird, unbeschadet der leicht amerikanischen Färbung. Die technisch glanzvolle Aufnahme lässt an Eindrücklichkeit nichts zu wünschen übrig, vorausgesetzt freilich, dass man sich ihr, mit dem Textbuch in der Hand, mit voller Konzentration widmet (Col. The Maestro Learns to Slow Down

California-tanned Mitropoulos even considers recent illness a blessing in disguise.

Hollywood, Calif.

★ Dimitri Mitropoulos is learning—reluctantly—to slow down out here in the land of palm trees and sunshine, following a heart attack in December that forced him to take leave of absence from the directorship of the New York Philharmonic symphony.

I called on the former Minneapolis symphony conductor at the hillside home in north Hollywood he is occupying for four weeks. I was greeted by a healthy-looking convalescent with the bronze-brown complexion of a Hopi Indian—a husky, smiling patient whose normally hollow cheeks are now filled out, whose eyes no longer have under them the black coloring of strain and overwork.

In fact he looks marvelously fit, his weight is up, his morale is high and even bubbling. But he is not underestimating the seriousness of a coronary thrombosis. "I know ways," he said, "of economizing my energy, and I'm going to use them. But as for being relaxed in my work—I can't quite manage that. Nothing worth while ever came out of a relaxed approach."

"You'll have to quit those platform jumps," I suggested.

"That's unconscious," he said. "I don't realize I'm doing it. The doctor said something about my slowing down my tempos." He smiled and shrugged. "If I have to change my tempos, I'll go into another line of work."

"What else does the doctor say?" I asked.

"No cigarets, and a little wine each day. I have always liked to smoke and I've never cared to drink"—a rueful grimace—"so now I must do something with my hands instead of smoking." He reached into his coat pocket, pulled out a long strand of rosary beads.

"These are hand-carved cherry wood. I pass them through my fingers, and shuffle them, and once in a while I twirl them, like this"—and he swung the beads in a rather unpious loop-the-loop.

"Oh yes, and no mountain climbing," added the conqueror of Mts. Shasta and Whitney. "I have a little mountain here," he said, pointing downward toward Sunset boulevard eight blocks away, "and I get up it every day . . . mostly by cab."

Mitropoulos has a kind of mystical optimism about his attack of last December, which made him sick for two hours and prompted him to walk—not ride—to the hospital for a cardiogram.

"Every setback I've had in my life so far has pushed me forward, a blessing in disguise. This thing I feel is the same kind of fortunate accident. It is better to have it now than 15 or 20 years later."

The conductor is beguiled by the sunny California climate but impatient to get back in the harness again. Already he is preparing for the last four weeks of the Philharmonic season which he will conduct, arising every morning at 6 o'clock to study scores.

"But it is almost too nice to work here," he said. "I came out here in preference to Florida because they do things here and Florida is only for idlers. But all the same it is hard to work in this warm and sunny country. You know," he added, "a great deal has been accomplished in cellars."

Mitropoulos' temporary domicile, owned by a musician friend, is picturesquely perched on a steep hill overlooking lower Hollywood, the under part of the house extending horizontally above the slope and held in position by a curved steel beam that runs through the house. It has an outdoor terrace.

Next-door neighbor to the conductor is Hopalong Cassidy—William Boyd—who was seen reading on his terrace as we talked. Long an avid viewer of western films, Mitropoulos rather enjoys the proximity of Hopalong, although he hasn't yet sought his autograph.

THE SHERMANS WITH MITROPOULOS
And next door—Hopalong Cassidy

Always an omniverous reader, the maestro lately has gained greatest enjoyment from Maurice Herzog's chronicle of mountain climbing, "Annapurna," and Karl Mannheim's "Ideology and Utopia."

He voiced amazement at the progressiveness of the Minneapolis symphony's program of this and recent seasons. "I would have had to fight hard for such programs," he said. "Maybe I helped prepare the way."

Mitropoulos has four summer offers, all held in abeyance, to conduct in Florence, Salzburg, Milan and his native Greece, the latter an invitation to become a kind of "musical dictator" of that country.

"I'll see how I come out after my four weeks with the Philharmonic," he said. "If I manage that, then maybe I'll take up one of the offers."

Meanwhile he has the deepest tan in Los Angeles. He was accosted by a passerby who asked, "Is that a California tan? You didn't get that here!" Mitropoulos assured him he did. Even in the land of deep tans, the conductor's dark-brown complexion stands out, making him look more like an intellectual lifeguard off duty than a conductor.

MUSIC

By MILDRED NORTON
Drama & Music Editor

Dimitri Mitropoulos, restored in health after a four-week exposure to our winter sunshine, left here yesterday to take up again the reins of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, of which he is the musical director.

Tanned to a cordovan brown and looking extremely fit, the maestro showed up for lunch nervously fingering an elaborately carved rosary.

"It is to give me something to do with my hands," he explained. "You see, I have had to give up smoking, and smoking, of course, is largely a matter of nervous habit."

Habit, with Mitropoulos, has been notoriously on the ascetic side throughout his dedicated life, and so it seemed not at all odd that the conversation should immediately plunge neck-deep into the subject of morality as it governs the artist.

"Morality," opined the maestro, "is on three planes: the artistic, the human, and the personal. As an artist, one is obligated to give one's best to music, to support what is fine, to work for the new and not merely rest on the established.

"ON THE HUMAN level, one is not permitted to injure his fellow man or to run counter to the best interests of humanity. But personal morality must always be a matter of the individual conscience. If a man is true to his finest instincts as a person, he will inevitably transfer this affection to his musical efforts. Morality, therefore, enters into the interpretation of music quite as intimately as into any other facet of life.

"The interpreter," he continued, "has special obligations. For the composer it is necessary only that he create. When he has done that he has fulfilled his own debt to the world. But the conductor, or the performer, owe a further one. They must see that the world gets to know this music, and that it gets to hear it properly performed.

"The first means that the conductor must never be content to play only music that the world has already accepted. This is too easy, too lazy. He must also play music that the world is not yet familiar with. Otherwise music would quickly become a dead, academic art.

"His second obligation is to recreate this music with every sincerity and fidelity. He must believe in it, or else how will the public believe in it?

"There are many fine conductors who refuse to perform modern music. They tell me they do not like it, or that they 'see nothing in it.' I say to them, 'All right, don't play it if you don't want to. But don't talk it down. Don't say it is no good, or that it isn't worth your effort.' That leaves me too entirely alone. Because I feel I owe as much to tomorrow's music as to yesterday's. And so, if it could once understand this, does the public.

"MUCH OF IT is experimental, true. Yet experiments are necessary. Not all of them will survive, they never do. But out of them some good things always come.

"My board of directors are very understanding. They realize it is not always easy to fill a hall with new works, but they respect my purpose in playing them and they support me in this."

A while back Mitropoulos solved an orchestral problem that plagues all conductors. "The rank and file of players," he said, "are always frustrated because they are not first chair men. So what did I do? I formed a chamber ensemble, with no first chairs allowed. We've given several concerts and they've become quite a popular success. Now the first chairs are getting jealous!"

Mitropoulos Cheered

By MILES KASTENDIECK

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS returned to the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. Revitalized in health and renewed in his passionate desire to let the music public feel the pulse of contemporary music, he gave one of the most stimulating concerts of his career.

An audience which greeted him most cordially remained to cheer at the end.

The program contrasted two great English composers—Purcell of the 17th Century and Vaughan Williams of the 20th—and paid tribute to the memory of the great Russian composer, Prokofieff. It rang true on musical quality.

Mitropoulos had himself arranged the "Prelude and Death of Dido" from Purcell's opera "Dido and Aeneas," wonderful music beautifully played. Williams' Fourth Symphony came as an anthesis, for it is the composer's boldest musical thinking. Its modernity may still outreach the average listener.

Score Still Fresh

A rehearing of the Fourth finds the score remarkably fresh after almost 20 years. On the basis of form alone, it is a forceful work, stunningly written. In Mitropoulos' keen presentation, the music developed more than just musical logic: it asserted conviction and even struck fire in doing so.

The audience responded enthusiastically. Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony received a searching and exciting performance. Whether or not personal friendship gave Mitropoulos special insight into the score, he approached it quite individually in choice of tempos and handling of detail.

Movement followed movement with increased inner tension, though the end of the first was stupendous enough to stop the performance right there. Rhythmically the second and fourth were incredibly powerful.

Prokofieff could have been no more reverently commemorated.

Conductors Announced

PORTLAND (AP)—The Portland Oregonian said Thursday that the Portland Symphony orchestra would play under Dmitri Mitropoulos, Igor Stravinsky and Arthur Fiedler next season. These were named as the first of several guest conductors under negotiation whose contracts have been signed. Tentative arrangements call for nine guest conductors for the ten-concert season.

Philharmonic:

Beethoven And Bach

By MILES KASTENDIECK

MITROPOULOS began the final concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony's 111th season in Carnegie Hall last night. He anchored his program securely by opening with Bach and closing with Beethoven. In between came the contemporaries Prokofieff and Rochberg.

The first performance of Rochberg's "Night Music" introduced him as winner of the 8th annual George Gershwin Memorial Contest. Though the piece has been extracted from a lengthy symphony, it fits its descriptive title neatly. From some of its musical references it might even yield a program.

It is possible to imagine Siegfried's dragon stalking through a forest filled with the night sounds of an insect orchestra. Berg's Wozzeck also roams the woods.

Lacks Drama

From these suggestions, however no drama emerges. The piece subsides without a salient theme but sustained by some interesting scoring. The audience applauded politely when the composer appeared.

Milstein was soloist in Prokofieff's Violin Concerto No. 1. After some tentative playing in the first movement, he gave a true virtuoso account of the second and an eloquent, elegant reading of the finale.

The work is neither one of the most endearing nor the most enduring of Prokofieff's scores. Milstein and Mitropoulos renewed interest in it as the performance unfolded. They played it in memory of the composer.

A luxurious performance of Bach-Respichi's Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor and an individualized interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony showed off the orchestra handsomely.

MITROPOULOS BACK AT PHILHARMONIC

Conductor Returns After a Four-Month Convalescence —Leads Dido Prelude

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Conducted by Dimitri Mitripoulos. At Carnegie Hall.
Prelude and Death of Dido, from Dido and Aeneas ..... Purcell-Mitropoulos
Symphony No. 4 ..... Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5 (played in memory of the composer) ..... Prokofieff

By OLIN DOWNES

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony's audience was waiting eagerly for Dimitri Mitropoulos when he returned from his rest of four months to direct that orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. The welcome extended the leader was such that it was minutes before Mr. Mitropoulos could begin his performance. As soon as he did so it was clear that he was musically and physically in superb form. The concert was one of the most brilliant that the orchestra has given in seasons.

It began very beautifully with the Prelude and Love-death, not of Tristan and Isolde" but of Dido saying farefell to life for love of Aeneas. Mr. Mitropoulos had arranged the brief Prelude and the music of Dido's lament for the instruments with admirable simplicity and feeling for its style. The introduction of the overture was unforgettable for its loveliness and poignancy. The strings sang the great lament with a noble sentiment and vocal inflection that the greatest singer might have envied. One was back again to the realization that the essence of all music, whatever its form or outward guise, is song, whatever its variations, developments, or sublimations may become in the hands of learned composers.

Mr. Mitropoulos had shown himself before last night to be the outstanding interpreter of Vaughan Williams' remarkable Fourth Symphony. Last night he surpassed any previous performance of the work that he had given in this city. It was one of the interpretations that are so eloquent and inspired, and ring so true, that one feels he is listening to the voice of the composer, transmitted as few composers may, by a master of the baton. One doubts if another performance could blazon forth more impressively the innermost contents of this score.

Uses Dissonant Chord

The symphony itself stands alone among Williams' compositions in the form. The composer of the "London" and the "Pastoral" symphonies is far away. Poetical, introspective, pastorale significations are not here. The Fourth Symphony, using the same wildly dissonant chord that Beethoven uses in the introduction to the chorale finale of the Ninth Symphony, opens with a cry of protest and rage. The work was produced in 1935. Had it come in wartime its connotations would be obvious.

For its essential word is one of tragedy, strife, pity and protest. Alternating moods sieze the listener by their pathos and beauty, such as the coda of the first movement. The slow movement is one of profound reflection and melancholy, wherein learned canonic devices are employed with the most intense feeling. The sardonic dances an evil gigue What delights the moderns is the jagged sharpness and cleanness of the climatic lines of the score, the absence of the sensuous or sentimental, and the powerfully concentrated form. The performance impressed there qualities upon the audience as they had not been impressed before.

The Prokofieff Fifth Symphony, which that late and lamented master had spoken of as a work dedicated to the liberty and the freedom of the soul of man, has Prokofieff's electricity and vital force throughout. It has also a lofty serenity and consciousness of strength. The opening theme, a peaceful one, undergoes transformations that are joyous or elegiac, resolute or gay, as the theme is chanted by brass instruments, especially in the latter part of the opening movement.

The finale reassembles much of the thematic material previously heard. But above all reigns the healthy and lofty spirit of the music, companioning the richness of Prokofieff's invention and the wealth of his fantasy.

And here again Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra triumphed in the virtuosity and eloquence of the playing, and the glory of the orchestral tone. The two symphonies were not new to us at all, yet they made for a fresh experience, and a remarkable evening of modern orchestral music.

Look 'Applauds' City Symphony

A brief historical sketch of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, now in its 50th year, is published in the "applauds" section of the current edition of Look magazine, on sale today.

Mitropoulos's Direction Missed at Philharmonic

MILES KASTENDIECK

THOSE who follow the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts will rejoice in the return of musical director Dimitri Mitropoulos this week. He has been missed, and to tell the truth the concerts have been a little dull. The two-week stands of guest conductors bridged the gap but this arrangement was hardly more than satisfactory. Cantelli's visit has brought stimulation and some new music, but not the challenging programs that Mitropoulos offers.

Some people might prefer the conservative fare that the Winter months have offered, but it has only served to increase respect for Mitropoulos's efforts to widen our musical horizons. His extended absence helped emphasize this fact. It seems most fitting also that the Music Critics Circle cited this aspect of his work with the Philharmonic-Symphony.

Characteristic of him, the first program on his return is provocative. He offers re-appraisal of Vaughan Williams' Fourth Symphony and a performance of Prokofieff's Fifth. The latter will be played in memory of the composer.

It will be interesting to speculate again on its lasting qualities in these moments of reviewing Prokofieff's output.

Sorely Needed

Following up this presentation of contemporary music, he will offer the first complete New York performances of Berlioz's song cycle, "Nuits d'Ete" during the weekend. This gesture commemorates the 150th anniversary of the French composer's birth. It again demonstrates Mitropoulos's contribution to the musical life of the city.

This activated programmaking is what we sorely need from so illustrious an organization as the Philharmonic-Symphony. There are times when we may regret the dry quality of tone that Mitropoulos draws from the orchestra. It does not always show off the orchestra to best advantage—a fact other conductors have underlined during the season. Nevertheless, we cannot overlook his singular success in setting forth music that should be heard. It will be good to have him back.

Philharmonic Hails Return Of Mitropoulos

'Papa' Back Rehearsing His Men After Illness, and It's 'Like Old Home Week'

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, returned for his first rehearsal in nearly four months yesterday and led the orchestra vigorously through Vaughan Williams' fourth symphony.

Mr. Mitropoulos, tanned by eight weeks in Hollywood whence he returned ten days ago, was greeted on the second-floor landing backstage, just outside his dressing room, by smiles, handshakes, and the comment, "Maestro, you look like a million bucks." When he had disappeared into his dressing room, Michael DeStefano, violinist, scurried downstairs toward the stage, saying, "It seems like old home week, papa here."

Taken Ill Dec. 7

A few days after his last appearance on the Philharmonic podium on Dec. 7, Mr. Mitropoulos was taken ill. He was to have been absent only during his usual midwinter two-week vacation period, but late in December his continued exhaustion resulted in an announcement he would cancel all engagements until his concert this Thursday night.

At 9:58 a. m. the 103 men of the orchestra had assembled on the Carnegie Hall stage. When Mr. Mitropoulos entered, wearing his customary tight, black sweater, one of the orchestra men whistled. Immediately, all arose and applauded.

Mr. Mitropoulos took the podium, bowed, and told them, "You behaved like angels. For the love and consideration and gifts you gave. I thank you all. I have had two month's rest. Now I feel well and we can go to the end of the season." There was the barest hesitation and then his right arm wheeled out and down and the first bar of Williams' symphony filled the hall.

More Rehearsals Today

A second rehearsal was held yesterday afternoon, and others will be held this afternoon and tomorrow and Saturday mornings. At today's rehearsal Eleanor Steber, soprano, will practice for her appearances with the Philharmonic Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, singing the Berlioz song cycle, "Nuits d'Ete."

The program Thursday night will also include the prelude and death scene of Dido from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" and the fifth symphony of Serge' Prokofieff. Mr. Mitropoulos chose the Prokofieff music in memory of the composer, who died March 4 in Russia.

Mr. Mitropoulous will conduct the first public performances of two American works during the remaining four weeks of the Philharmonic season. "Ideas of Order," by Arthur Berger, will be played April 11 and 12, and George Rochberg's "Night Music" will be performed on April 23 and 24. A new European work, Gottfried von Einen's "Orchestra Music," will get its first American performance on April 16 and 17.

Mitropoulos Returns Thursday

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's musical director, Dimitri Mitropoulos, returns to the podium of his orchestra Thursday in Carnegie Hall to remain until the end of the season which closes Sunday, April 26. In memory of Russia's eminent composer, Sergei Prokofieff, who died in Russia March 4th of this year, Mitroupolos will conduct the Prokofieff Symphony No. 5 for his initial Thursday night-Friday matinee pair of concerts. The rest of the program follows: Prelude and death of Dido from "Dido and Aeneas," by Henry Purcell, arranged by Mitropoulos; Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, by Vaughan Williams.

MITROPOULOS

Mitropoulos, who knew Prokofieff personally, feels that he owes much to the composer. His Third Piano Concerto was the vehicle which made him first widely known both as conductor and pianist. Prokofieff, himself, heard him play the work in 1930 and stated publicly that the young Greek performed it better than he did. The Philharmonic-Symphony first played the Prokofieff Fifth in March, 1946. Its premiere in Moscow having taken place in January, 1945, under the direction of the composer. Though the work is without a program, Prokofieff has been quoted as saying, "It is a symphony about the spirit of man."

Mitropoulos Back With Philharmonic

Dimitri Mitropoulos is back on the podium of the Philharmonic-Symphony, dynamic and vigorous, as uninhibited in approach as before his leave of absence. Last night was the maestro's initial appearance with his orchestra in Carnegie Hall following an enforced rest necessitated by overwork and attendant strain. At the beginning and end of the concert, he received ovations, accompanied at the conclusion by bravos, and four return personal appearances.

Mitropoulos achieved both a sensitive and brilliantly penetrating performance of Vaughan Williams' Fourth Symphony in F Minor, one of the more abstruce works of the English genius. The concluding work was Sergei Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, performed in memory of the composer who died March 4.

Tomorrow night at 8:45 and Sunday afternoon at 2:30, Mitropoulos features on his program the song cycle, "Nuits d'ete" by Hector Berlioz, to be sung by the Metropolitan opera soprano, Eleanor Steber. The Vaughan Williams symphony will be repeated at these concerts.

Mitropoulos Gets a Glowing Welcome on His Return

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The news at Carnegie Hall last night was that Dimitri Mitropoulos was back at his Philharmonic stand—a tanned and youthful maestro looking as fit as a Stradivarius.

There was a prolonged ovation when Mr. Mitropoulous entered, and he was obliged to turn and bow several times before it completely died down. He seemed distinctly glad to be among us again. Feeling, I might add, was mutual.

It wasn't long before the familiar hand of the maestro was on the music that followed. There was a renewed fervor and intensity about his readings, and even an added zip to the sharper rhythmic turns of the evening. The rest his doctor ordered has obviously done him a world of good.

If there were a few ragged spots among the strings and brasses that was only to be expected. An orchestra takes a little readjusting between conductors, and the Philharmonic goes through so many hands in one season that the wonder is it preserves any elasticity at all.

The feature of the evening was a tribute to the late Russian composer Serge Prokofieff, who died early last month. This took the form of the Fifth Symphony, perhaps Prokofieff's strongest bid for permanence in the symphonic repertory.

The performance was overwhelming in emotional and artistic impact. There was a three-dimensional scope to the reading that gave it an exciting new appeal for me. I have never liked the first movement, but even there I was persuaded by amazing propulsion of the reading that I could be abysmally wrong.

A Hypnotic Rhythm.

My favorite of the four movements is the second—a sort of scherzo driven over a marked and sustained beat in a tensely woven crescendo of color and volume. Mr. Mitropoulos made it sound like a fast-moving huddle of living figures caught in the ceaseless throb of a hypnotic rhythm.

Earlier in the evening the orchestra performed Vaughan William's Fourth Symphony. This startling upheaval of sound can be quite an emotional ordeal at a first hearing. It is both disturbed and disturbing music, a picture of spiritual and moral chaos that, written in 1935, now seems a prophecy of the gathering horror.

After several hearings, I still find it an uncomfortable experience, though an absorbing and fascinating one, too. There is wholesale revulsion in these pages, but it is the sincere outcry of a deeply shaken man, and a genius besides.

The concert began on the serene and moving note of Mr. Mitropoulos's own arrangement of excerpts from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas." After Kirsten Flagstad, the Philharmonic is my favorite singer of Dido's celebrated "Lament."

Mitropoulos Back

Recovered From Illness, He Returns to Podium

By Francis D. Perkins

Dimitri Mitropoulos, fully recovered from the illness which had kept him away from the podium for nearly four months, made his first 1953 appearance with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall before an audience which welcomed him back with unusual applausive warmth. The orchestra's musical director began the program with his own transcription of the Prelude and Dido's Death from Henry Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas"; the rest of the evening was devoted to two symphonies by contemporary masters, Ralph Vaughan Williams' fourth, in F minor, and Serge Prokofiev's fifth, in B flat major. Mr. Mitropoulos, who knew Prokofiev, presented the latter work as a memorial tribute to its composer, who died early last month.

The orchestra played responsively for its conductor, who showed equal imaginative sympathy and musical and expressive understanding both in the dignified eloquence of the seventeenth century Purcell music and the differing style of the two symphonies; quality and balance of tone were of a consistently high standard; there was vividness of instrumental hue combined with thorough lucidity of musical medium. When Vaughan Williams' fourth symphony was first played here in 1936, it suggested that the composer had turned from his more usual style toward contemporary idioms. This rehearing, however, told of a style that is definitely Vaughan Williams', and also definitely English; a style which may vary for a particular work but retains its basic identity. There is ample scholarship in the work as well as inventiveness, but its manifest scholarship does not conflict with its vitality.

Prokofiev's fifth symphony, which has had quite a few performances here since it was introduced in 1945, offers no problems to its hearers; it has a liberal supply of ingratiating musical ideas and a definite Russian savor. Its emotional portent is well defined and persuasive. At times, however, one listener was led to wonder whether it did not have its repetitious and discursive moments. This was in spite of the merits of the performance, including the deftly gradual intensification of volume in the long crescendo near the close.

Honoring Berlioz

By Arthur Berger

Dimitri Mitropoulos observed the 150th anniversary of the birth of Berlioz at his Philharmonic-Symphony concerts over the week end and by this token he reminded us that now is the time for further re-examination of a musical figure who gets surprisingly little attention in view of his gigantic achievement. Mr. Mitropoulos anticipated the celebration of Berlioz' birthday early in the season when he presented all the orchestral portions of "Romeo and Juliet," and they are now available on a Columbia LP in his admirable and perceptive reading. Saturday night and yesterday afternoon the tribute was somewhat more modest, namely, a performance of the song cycle, "Nuits d'Ete" ("Summer Nights), but the occasion was a highly significant one, since this was the first time all six songs were presented in their orchestral version in this city.

The ranges of the songs are such that it would seem as if Berlioz intended the second and third for mezzo-soprano, and the others for soprano. In fact, it was the contralto, Thorborg, who sang the second song, "Spectre de la Rose," with the Philharmonic in 1942. In the more familiar version of these songs with piano, the second and third are in a higher key, and it was by singing them Saturday night and yesterday afternoon in this version at Carnegie Hall that the soprano, Eleanor Steber, was able to encompass them all.

Miss Steber has rarely sung more beautifully than she did in these fragile, subtly poetic and delicately colored settings of the masterly poems by Theophile Gautier. She and Mr. Mitropoulos have often worked together as a team and the reading gaev a constant sense of an easy rapport between the two and a fine musical intelligence and appreciation that they share. Miss Steber's French vowels were excellently shaped, and if there were moments when she was understandably nervous Saturday night, because the vocal line is so tenuous and so relentlessly exposed above a reticent orchestral background, there was much that was very fine, indeed.

Mr. Mitropoulos, for his part, judiciously used a reduced orchestra and illuminated many details in the score. Berlioz orchestrated five of the songs in 1856, twenty-five years after his first version with piano accompaniment. "L'Absence," the most familiar of the set, was orchestrated in 1843. The sophistications that Berlioz' orchestral imagination brought to the work is extraordinary, indeed. I was struck particularly with the independent use of basses and cellos.

The music and the reading so captivated me that I could not resist listening to it again yesterday over the CBS network. Miss Steber's nervousness this time was confined to the first song, after which she maintained extraordinary accuracy of pitch and rhythm, and sang with style, taste and a remarkable floating quality. The Vaughan Williams Symphony No. 4, which was heard Thursday and Friday, was repeated on the week-end programs which also included the Bach - Ormandy "Wachet auf" and the Bach-Respighi Passacaglia in C minor.

Collaborators Add to Berlioz Stature

By ROBERT BAGAR.

A fine pair of musical collaborators—Eleanor Steber and Dimitri Mitropoulos—assisted considerably by the Philharmonic-Symphony, did much honor to Hector Berlioz in Carnegie Hall at Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon. The common aim was not, necessarily, the deification of Berloiz, but the rendering—skillful, artistic and imaginative— of his six-gong cycle "Les Nuits d'Ete."

However, no composer can avoid being deified at least somewhat with a beautiful performance of his work, and that can be said of this one.

Miss Steber and Mr. Mitropolous have collaborated before and impressively. I refer to their discerning and sympathetic achievements with Puccini in "Madama Butterfly," and "Tosca" at the Lewisohn Stadium several years ago, when these works were given in concert from a season apart.

The Berloiz songs are all well known. They often appear in recital programs hereabouts, separately or in groups. Yet these concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony were the first at which a local audience heard them with orchestra.

Miss Steber's voice, her singing manner, were everywhere at the service of Berloiz. No less so the myriad accompanists under the piercing musical intelligence and humane sympathy of their leader.

N. Y. Chamber Orchestra.

Under various sponsorship, the New York Chamber Orchestra, under the direction of Franz Allers, made its official debut yesterday afternoon in the Town Hall. The groups sponsoring the orchestra were:

The Music Performance Trust Fund of the Recording Industry, in cooperation with Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians; the Composers of the United States and Canada; the Composers - Authors Guild; the Fellowship of American Composers, and the National Association for American Composers and Conductors.

The orchestra, composed of theater pit musicians who like to keep their finger in the classical pudding, played agreeably. Its program had variety and a certain ingenuity in its departure from the tried and true. Among the works were Purcell's "Abelazer" Suite, Honegger's "Le Dit des jeu du monde," and Antheil's Serenade for String Orchestra.

MISS STEBER SINGS WORK BY BERLIOZ

Soprano Is Soloist in 'Nuits d' Ete' With Philharmonic—Mitropoulos Is Conductor

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. Eleanor Steber, soprano. At Carnegie Hall.
Chorale-Prelude: Wachet auf....Bach-Ormandy
Nuits d'Ete .....Berlioz
Symphony No. 4.....Vaughan-Williams
Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor
Bach-Respighi

A variety of "firsts" dotted the Saturday evening program that Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted with the Philharmonic-Symphony.

He led with the first performance by the orchestra of the Bach-Ormandy "Wachet auf." He then continued with the first complete performance in New York of Berlioz' "Nuits d'Ete." Eleanor Steber was the soprano soloist, and it was the first time that she had appeared with Mr. Mitropoulos in a Carnegie Hall concert.

It seems strange that so great a work as the Berlioz should have had to wait so long for a Philharmonic performance. Perhaps singers have avoided it because of its length and difficulty. There also is the musical problem of sustaining the songs. Of the six in the cycle, Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5 are slow, with not too much variety; and No. 6, in addition to being relatively subdued, contains a quiet conclusion and is a long way from being an audience-getter.

But it is a score of genius. It has intensity and imagination, a sympathetic (in relation to the Gautier text) lyricism and superb workmanship. Despite the superficial lack of variety, there are any number of subtle touches that differentiate the songs. The opening "Villanelle," bubbling and graceful, is sheer enchantment. The brooding "Le Spectre de la Rose," or the haunting "L'Absence," or the simplicity of "L'Ile Inconnue"—all these are Berlioz at his best. And Berlioz at his best is one of the giants of the romantic age.

Miss Steber presented the music in a straightforward manner, fortunately abstaining from interpretive excess. None at this date need be reminded of the natural beauty of her voice. One could wish that her technique were a shade more secure and her diction clearer. Some of the upper notes sounded somewhat shrill, though Miss Steber's middle range was full and voluptuous. We are in her debt for having had a chance to hear the music.

The Ormandy transcription that opened the concert was scored in 1939. It has lots of brass, considerable massiveness, and ends with a big crescendo. Few will take it seriously. Also on the program was the Vaughan Williams Symphony No. 4 and that monstrosity of a transcription, the Bach-Respighi Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor.

VARGA IS SOLOIST FOR PHILHARMONIC

'Cellist Is Heard in Schubert's Concerto in A, Arranged by Cassado, Under Mitropoulos

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Laszlo Varga, 'cellist, and Leonid Hambro, pianist. Conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. At Carnegie Hall.
Symphony in G, No. 100 (Military).....Haydn
'Cello Concerto in A .....Schubert-Cassado
Prometheus—The Poem of Fire.....Scriabin
Die Meistersinger—Introduction to Act III, Dance of the Apprentices, Entrance of the Mastersingers .....Wagner

About the end of 1824, Schubert received a commission to compose a work for a new instrument called the arpeggione. Commissions were never too numerous in Schubert's career, and he polished it off quickly. The arpeggione, an offshoot of the viola da gamba, has long since disappeared, but its name has been immortalized, simply because Schubert composed a sonata for it.

Sometime around a hundred years later, the Spanish 'cellist, Gasper Cassado, brooding gloomily on the paucity of the 'cello repertoire, decided to transform the "Arpeggione" Sonata into a work for 'cello and orchestra. This he did, with rather agreeabe results.

In the process he transcribed very, very freely, adding cadenzas and fancy passage work and rather cheapening Schubert's lovely little work here and there by some obvious display effects. But the "Arpeggione" remains Schubert at his most lyrical, whether for solo 'cello and piano (in which form it is often heard) or for 'cello and orchestra in the Cassado transcription.

Loszlo Varga, the first 'cellist of the Philharmonic, was last night's soloist with his orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos. Mr. Varga, an experienced instrumentalist, played Schubert with entire musical competence and a thorough command of the mechanics involved. Mr. Mitropoulos worked fondly with him, like a proud father exhibiting his talented child.

The Scriabin work was another novelty. It has its underpinnings of theosophy and extra-musical messages; Scriabin was a decided mystic toward the end. It is also scored for a very large orchestra, with a prominent piano part (played last night by Leonid Hambro), an organ, varieties of bells and other impedimenta.

Musically it is rather close to the French impressionistic school; and while its content seems diffuse, its melodic ideas decidedly second-rate, there is no denying the brilliance of the orchestration. On this re-hearing, after a few years, "Prometheus" appears to be not as bad a work as its neglect would suggest, and not nearly as good as its composer thought it was.

This is the kind of music that Mr. Mitropoulos does better than anybody else. His conducting here was exciting, colorful, rhythmically flexible, and it is hard to conceive of the score being presented under more favorable auspices.

If Mr. Mitropoulos had equal emotional rapport with the classic school he would be unsurpassed among conductors. His Haydn, though, was fussy, overcalculated and not too firm in outline or orchestral balance. Somehow Mr. Mitropoulous fails to convey any great communication in music written before 1850 or thereabouts. H. C. S.

Philharmonic

Alexander Scriabin's "Prometheus, The Poem of Fire" had its first New York performance in ten years in last night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos in Carnegie Hall. Laszlo Varga, the orchestra's first cellist, was the soloist in a concerto in A major arranged by Gaspar Cassado from Franz Schubert's sonata for the arpeggione, a stringed instrument which had a short career early in the nineteenth century. Mr. Metropoulos opened the program with Haydn's pleasant, unmartial "Military" Symphony (No. 100), in G major, and closed it with music from the third act of Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

Scriabin has had his champions, but his orchestral works have never captured a lasting public favor here. "Prometheus," in yesterday's imposing performance, told of lofty aims and musical aridity for nineteen minutes. Its ideas seem repeated rather than developed in its effective scoring; it climbs to a succession of climaxes, but yet does not suggest progress. The main point of interest was whether the climaxes, and especially the final one, would come off. They did, magnificently, and the close was a resplendent blaze of sound, but here due and great admiration was of an external type for the orchestral accomplishment, rather than for the music.

Mr. Cassado, probably one of many musicians who wished that Schubert had written a concerto, first played his Schubertian adaptation here with the Philharmonic in 1938. It is pleasing, tuneful, easy-going music; the solo part lies well for the cello, and Mr. Varga played it with impeccable technique, suavity and ingratiating tone color. The orchestral scoring is generally well balanced, except for a few measures near the beginning. The Haydn "Military" Symphony, which takes its label from a short episode in the second movement, gave a sense of freshness in a performance marked both by dynamic discretion and vitality.

Rubinstein at Carnegie

Arthur Rubinstein was yesterday afternoon's soloist with the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos in Carnegie Hall, playing Saint-Saens' second piano concerto, in G minor, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations. In both works, the noted pianist was in fine technical form; he did not play the Saint-Saens concerto as a vehicle primarily for the display of virtuosity, but, while not overlooking this element, gave it an interpretation which called attention to its frequent romanticism and realized its expressive resources. The Franck work was presented with emotional breadth, and the orchestra and conductor gave Mr. Rubinstein well proportioned and sympathetic co-operation. The other items in the program, which had also been played Saturday night, were Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia," Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Pierne's orchestral transcription of Franck's Prelude, Chorale and Fugue. Von Einem Work Full Of Frenzy

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Dimitri Mitropoulos extended a warm handclasp to a fellow conductor and a young European composer on last night's Philharmonic program in Carnegie Hall.

The conductor so honored was Erich Leinsdorf, whose arrangement of Brahms' choral prelude, "O Gott, Du Frommer Gott," opened the bill. The young composer was that exciting new talent of Swiss origin, Gottfried von Einem. The title of his composition was "Orchestermusik."

Mr. Leinsdorf's sensitively scored arrangement was both a tribute to Brahms and a token of his own marked powers as a transcriber. Since it is now the fashion for conductors to transcribe, Mr. Leinsdorf should do more of it.

Takes Deserved Bow.

Mr. von Einem was on hand to take a well-deserved bow for his fresh and dramatic score. This is the music of a man of the theater, nurtured on drama and suspense and the conflict of man and the world around him.

The title says only that it is music for the orchestra. But the music says a great deal more. There is some sort of story here, a terrific emotional upheaval that resolves itself in the gradual breakdown of the whole fabric.

It is not surprising to learn that Mr. von Einem has written operas based on Buechner's "Danton's Death" and Kafka's "The Trial." They are the kind of thing his temperament would seem to be suited to, if the "Orchestermusik" is any clue.

Gnawing Frenzy.

There is a feverish restlessness about the music, a gnawing frenzy that bursts into pounding crashes of the drums. Obviously, Mr. von Einem isn't happy about what he sees around him. And he can't disguise his feelings under the simple title of "Orchestra Music."

Mr. Mitropoulos conducted the novelty with the fervor and conviction of a man wholly in tune with its idiom. He conducted Schumann's Second Symphony in the same spirit, with warmth and the right degree of nervous tension.

Last on the program were the "Caucasian Sketches" of Ippolitoff-Ivanoff. These pieces are drenched in the Oriental color that only the Russians seem to know how to apply to their symphonic canvases. Mr. Mitropoulos made that color come alive last night.

Philharmonic-Symphony

Anna Xydis was soloist in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor, Saturday night at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted, and the remainder of his program included the Franck-Pierné Prelude, Chorale and Fugue, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," Op. 54, and Borodin's "On the Steppes of Central Asia."

Technically, the Rachmaninoff third is the devil's own concerto, and it must be confessed that Miss Xydis could not everywhere cope with the overwhelming demands of the piece. None the less her reading was generally commendable and high-spirited. Lyric, meditative sections found her at her best, for in the playing of them she kept her phrases arched and her colors transparent. Elsewhere, when ringing chords were meant to be heard against a flaring orchestral tutti or in whirlwind scale figurations, Miss Xydis was not able to drive the concerto with the propulsive sleekness it requires. Thus her rendition, in sum, was uneven. It was warm, genuinely fanciful and thoroughly worked out. But there were moments in which difficulties of finger opposed an ultimate perfection.

Gabriel Pierne's orchestration of the Prelude, Chorale and Fugue is a feverish, impassioned, in-the-style-of-Franck transcription. By no means does it better the original, but it does maintain the ripe, lush and fragrant chordal sonorities that have made Franck's piano piece a perennial favorite. It was played—as was the "Poem of Ecstasy"—grandly, gloriously, with all the stops withdrawn. And for the climaxes of the Scriabin, Mr. Mitropoulos produced a burst of sound that could, in all cases, provide a perfect accompaniment for a major atomic blast.

Philharmonic:

Novel Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS devised an unusual program for the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night. It had an air of novelty, though it listed nothing new. The unfamiliar music prompted interesting reflection.

The Schubert-Cassado Cello Concerto made pleasant listening. Schubert would probably have been astonished on hearing Cassado's free transcription of the "Arpeggione" Sonata. That it favors the cello more than the orchestra matters little, however, since Laszlo Varga gave an excellent account of the solo part.

First cellist of the orchestra, Varga proved himself a soloist of musicianly bearing and artistic comprehension. He let the Schubert melodies sing out persuasively and imparted the right mood for the spirited finale. The performance had its touch of distinction, and delighted the audience.

Quite astonishing to this listener was the lack of fire in Scriabin's once daring "Prometheus: the Poem of Fire." Have forty years dulled its effects; the music sounded tame for a work that caused so much disturbance in the beginning.

Mitropoulos' brilliant performance gave it character but could not reshape the daring flames. For all his ecstasy on interpretation, Scriabin's composition emerged as wonderfully skillful but hardly alive with the creative energy of its subject-matter.

The program opened with the relatively unfamiliar but wholly delightful "Military" Symphony of Haydn in the performance of which the precision of Mitropoulos and of Haydn were remarkably fused. It closed comfortably with the very familiar excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

Tone Poem of Fire Epic Declaimed in Decibels

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Not for a long time has the Scriabin "Prometheus, the Poem of Fire" been heard in a local concert hall. But Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony saw to that at Carnegie last night.

This work was companioned by the Haydn Symphony in G major, otherwise known as the "Military" Symphony; Schubert's Concerto in A, for Cello and Orchestra (freely transcribed by Gaspar Cassado from the composer's "Arpeggione" Sonata), and three excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

Scriabin's score, a vast panorama of exotic coloration, doesn't sound new any more. I doubt whether it ever did, considering its debt to Debussy, Moussorgsky, perhaps, and others. It is certainly one of the loudest of all pieces when it really gets going in the last movement. There the entire orchestra, plus the organ for additional decibels, converges on what I suppose was expected to be a thundering apotheosis.

Applause Is Plentiful.

Of more fathomable interest last evening was the sensitive performance by Laszlo Varga of the concerted Schubert concerto. Mr. Varga, first 'cellist of the orchestra, had the support of players who believed in him and were all too eager to bring out their best for him.

I do think that the orchestra version of Cassado rather lengthens the work, or at least seems to do so. In any case, what is usually a concise, well-integrated 'cello and piano work becomes, in the larger form, something less unified, less compelling.

Nothing can be taken away from the rendering given the Schubert-Cassado material. And the audience applauded this effort far more noisily than any other.

But No 'Color Keyboard.'

The Prometheus of mythology has fascinated more than one composer. Likewise more than one man of letters. In this particular musical version his gift of fire to man gets the benefit of more esoteric interpretations than ordinarily. For in Scriabin's view religion definitely belonged in the picture, as did the "color keyboard." Ths projected onto a screen colors allegedly en rapport with the instrumental sounds. (I once experienced a color keyboard performance, sans music, that is. I thought it pretty dull stuff.)

There was no coloring employed last night in Carnegie Hall other than that manufactured out of whole instrumental cloth by Mr. Mitropoulos' musicians. It did all it was asked to do at that. Yet, from this vantage point, little of importance took place, except in the sterling performance by the orchestra.

Seven Mitropouli at Carnegie

There was only one Mitropoulos conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall but there were seven of him immortalized on the wall of the Carnegie Hall gallery; and only a hall separating. The high imagination, dynamic momentum and sensuousness of Scriabin's "poem of fire" were among the exciting fare poured out under the inspired aegis of the Philharmonic's director—and with only one head. But his chamaleon-like intensity turned up so many facts that he was quite the incarnation of "Mitropouli" the seven-head oil painting of him now on exhibition in the gallery as part of the Philharmonic-Symphony painters club fourth annual exhibition.

David Katz, violist, responsible for "Mitropouli," confesses that the seven bald pates surrounding a few score pages are intended to convey a slight idea of the tremendous absorption power and versatility of the Philharmonic's musical director. "He's really got seven heads, not one," says Katz.

Last night the maestro did not let Katz down. He led off with a brilliant rendition of Haydn's too-little-played "Military" Symphony and after the intermission performed the once iconoclastic but now merely exotic Scriabin Prometheus: "The Poem of Fire" with the utmost in nuance and color, gradually building an immense climax which abandoned itself to the exultation of its muse.

Philharmonic Painters Versatile

Before the intermission he also officiated in a sympathetic and sensitive collaboration with Laszlo Varga, first cellist, who was the evening's soloist in the so-called Schubert "Concerto" in A, freely transcribed by Gaspar Cassado for cello and orchestra from the composer's "Arpeggione Sonata." The evening concluded with excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

But let us not harbor the illusion for a moment that only the maestro in this orchestra is versatile. The men whose art work will be hanging in the gallery for all patrons to observe through April 26th, are one with him in this respect though their talents run to imbibing paint and brushes instead of scores.

Among the most provocative and personalized expression are two portraits by Michael de Stefano, first violinist. "Einstein" is painted with economy of means but with penetration. "Stravinsky" is tremendous—red eyes, chartreuse nose, orange skin, blue background. Harold Gomberg, solo oboist, has three interesting canvases, among them, a small but fascinating oil, "Storm at Sea." Frederick Zimmerman, double bass, tends toward abstraction in "Self Portrait" and "Breakfast." (It could be lunch or dinner, all good too.)

Frank Gullino, first violin, has a frothy "Seascape" vibrant with motion. Chester Burden, architect, and Philharmonic board member, also has two oils included.

The Philharmonic during its final month gains allure because of this free exhibition. I like art and among these works are several worthy of the name.

IDEAS' BY BERGER PLAYED FIRST TIME

1-Movement Work Performed by Philharmonic — Kapell Soloist at Carnegie Hall

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. William Kapell, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.
Overture to The Marriage of Figaro ...Mozart
Symphony in G (Military) .....Haydn
Ideas of Order (first performance) .....Arthur Berger
Piano Concerto in D minor .....Brahms

By NOEL STRAUS

Two young Americans were featured on the program given by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under Dimitri Mitropoulos, Saturday night at Carnegie Hall. Arthur Berger was represented by his "Ideas of Order," commissioned by Mr. Mitropoulos, which received its première, and William Kapell appeared as soloist in the Brahms Piano Concerto in D minor. Their respective contributions were warmly approved by the audience.

Mr. Berger, a member of the music staff of The New York Herald Tribune, derived the title of his one-movement composition from that of a volume of poems by Wallace Stevens. The music, sectional in form and based on a three-note figure, seemingly exhausts the possible permutations of the two intervals of this figure, from which the themes and motives of the highly sophisticated and intricate work were devised.

The opus, though the first written by Mr. Berger for full orchestra, proved knowingly scored. The music is purely esthetic, absolutely logical and quite out of touch with human emotions. It can be admired for its success in doing what it set out to accomplish, its ingenuity and its extremely careful, polished treatment of detail.

The acerbities of the melodic ideas in this novelty were softened by the mellow, suave performance it received under Mr. Mitropoulos' keenly sympathetic leadership.

The conductor also provided finely adjusted and impressive support throughout the Brahms Concerto in D minor, in which Mr. Kapell played the solo part with compelling virtuosity, pronounced dynamic variety and a further step forward in subtlety and poetry.

There were some places, as in the start of the development of the first movement, where the pianist indulged in a wildness and edgy overemphasis not fully in the Brahmsian spirit. But these lapses were few, and if the second theme of the initial division, or the impassioned episode in D minor in the finale, were not projected with full comprehension of their inner life, most of the lyric parts of the concerto were molded with a new sensitivity and beauty of tone.

There was grandeur as well as power in the restatement of the first theme of the opening Allegro, and marked dramatic fervor in the brilliantly played coda of that movement. The Adagio was expressively sung forth, and the finale filled with vivid contrasts.

The concert began with the Overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," which received an effective reading, but one more vetry tone than for sparkle. the finale were not projected with Haydn's "Military" symphony, carried over from the brace of concerts given the two previous days, completed the offerings.

Philharmonic-Symphony Gives Delightful Concert

By PAUL AFFELDER

The enforced rest that Dimitri Mitropoulos took this season seems to have done him a great deal of good, musically as well as physically. Though he returned to the Philharmonic-Symphony podium last week, we did not have the opportunity of hearing him until last evening at Carnegie Hall, and we were delighted at the fine quality of playing he elicited from his orchestra and the perceptiveness of his interpretations.

Best of all was the Haydn Symphony No. 100 in G major—the so-called "Military" symphony—which opened the program. There was freshness and elegance in Mr. Mitropoulos' reading, delicacy, precision and beautifully careful phrasing in the orchestral performance.

Next came Schubert's Sonata in A minor for arpeggione and piano, arranged as a concerto for 'cello and orchestra by the contemporary Spanish 'cellist, Gaspar Cassado, with Laszlo Varga, the young leader of the Philharmonic's 'cello section, as soloist. This essentially melodic work lacks sufficient bravura for treatment as a concerto; even the lightly scored orchestral background is too strong for a solo performer to buck without forcing Schubert's delicate music out of proportion. Therefore, it sounds best as a sonata for 'cello and piano.

Eloquent Musicianship

But the 'cello concerto literature is pitifully slim, and soloists cannot always depend on the single works in this form by Haydn, Schumann, Dvorak and Lalo. Mr. Varga made the most of his difficult lot. His tone is not large, but it has refinement; his technique is sure, and last night he played with eloquent musicianship. If there were moments when he was subdued by the orchestra blame that on Cassado rather than on Mr. Mitropoulos, who was most careful with his handling of the accompaniment.

There was once a time when Alexander Scriabin could arouse quite a musical furore. He claimed that his odd-sounding music, with its peculiar chord combinations, was inspired by his mystical beliefs, that it grew from some spiritual ecstasy. Listening to his "Prometheus: The Poem of Fire" last evening, we found it to be "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Wagner Excerpts Inspiring

Employing an oversized orchestra, Scriabin raves and rants for 15 minutes, pushing the same thematic fragments and augmented chords at the listener without relief or variation. Mr. Mitropoulos tried valiently to make something out of nothing, and Leonid Hambro, who played the piano solos excellently, did what he could. But the net result was emptiness and boredom. The Philharmonic has only played this work once before; we shall not regret it if it never plays it again.

With what pleasant and inspiring relief the music from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" fell on our ears! Conductor and orchestra brought us the prelude to Act III, Dance of the Apprentices and Entrance of the Mastersingers, with great tonal richness, intensity and warmth. The performance sent everyone home in a glowing mood.

The Philharmonic

Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order" received its first performances Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon at the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall. Dimitri Mitropoulos, to whom the work is dedicated, conducted, and the remainder of the program listed Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor, with William Kappell as soloist, Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and three excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

Mr. Berger's "Ideas of Order" is far and away his best work to date. It is a sunny, one-movement piece, agile, skipping, full of the grace and gestures of dance. According to a program note, the composition is named after a volume of poetry by Wallace Stevens, and the music itself is concerned with "three notes, which by changing their succession or register in terms of two fixed intervals (whole step and minor third), engender other intervals for use in shaping the total work."

So much for that. It is a detail which the ear finds unnecessary, for "Ideas of Order," despite the complexity with which it is made, is as simple and charming as a Haydn symphony. Its cardinal elements are two: a flexible rhythmic scheme that nourishes, measure by measure, every phrase of the work, and an intervallic outline whose expansions and contractions keep the music in a constant state of motion. This motion, one suspects, is derived from dance procedures. "Ideas of Order," through its leaps and melodic pirouettes, refuses to settle down and grow inactive. Thematically it is ever alert, harmonically it contains just those dissonant frictions required to sustain tautness of line, and orchestrally it hums with an inner energy.

"Ideas of Order," then, is exactly what it purports to be—a fastidious ordering of fastidious ideas. It is an elegant and supple work, immaculately turned out. In the final analysis, it projects and communicates an intense joy in the building of a sturdy structure out of the isolated and meaningless single elements of music. And that is an achievement of no minor significance.

4 Composers Star In All-U.S. Weekend

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A quartet of composers—either born in America or now living here—made it something of a composers' weekend with a made-in-America label.

Newcomer to symphonic music was my admired colleague of the Herald Tribune, Arthur Berger, whose "Ideas of Order" was given a world premiere by Dimitri Mitropoulos on the weekend Philharmonic bill.

Mr. Berger is a highly gifted musician, and an artist equally articulate in words. As a composer he had previously shown marked facility and freshness in all forms short of the operatic and symphonic. This was his debut in full orchestral dress, and a thoroughly persuasive one.

Taking a three-note motto as guidepost, Mr. Berger has built a strong and self-evolving set of patterns that dance and swirl through the orchestra with a keen sense of direction. The idiom owes little to others in its tidy logic and crisp imagery. I hope its success will prove an incentive to Mr. Berger to move on to larger forms.

The Philharmonic also featured William Kapell in a stirring and truly poetic reading of Brahms' First Piano Concerto.

Philharmonic

Mitropoulos gave the world premier of Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order," which he had commissioned for the Philharmonic-Symphony, in Carnegie Hall on Saturday night. The piece is well-named, for its composition conforms strictly to this principle. In fact, Berger again proves himself a composer with principles.

The music starts out jauntily in dance mood. As its identity appears to merge with the Stavinsky school in general, its personable beginning loses character. About half way its promise fades, as though in conforming to orderly evolution the composer lets the ideas take complete command.

William Kapell played the Brahms First Piano Concerto on this program. The performance was more Kapell than Brahms and quite a virtuoso Kapellmeister at that.

William Kapell With Philharmonic

William Kapell, pupil of Samaroff, and burning with a dynamic electricity which has been compared to that of Horowitz, played two performances of the Brahms D Minor Piano Concerto over last weekend as soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall, Mitropoulos conducting. It was interesting to compare the two, both of which I heard, and to note how much more relaxed and consequently how much more eloquent the second hearing was. Kapell's playing of the adagio was remarkable for its penetrating intensity, its glowing vitality and its beauty of phrasing. This extraordinary artist's danger, however, is that at times he becomes consumed by his own intensity. The result is tension, too much emphasis on virtuosity, overplaying of his instrument and a steely tone.

Eine Lanze für die klassische Musik?

Muß man überhaupt für die klassische Musik eine Lanze brechen, wie es in dem neuen Film „Meister der Musik" angekündigt wird? Steht sie nicht vielmehr unerschütterlich auf festen Füßen? Betrachtet man die heutige Musiksituation, dann kommt man zu dem Schluß, daß es zumindest nicht schaden kann, wenn für die klassische Musik eine Lanze gebrochen wird.

Das Thema der klassischen Musik soll wieder einmal durch den Film einem großen Kreis nahe gebracht werden und gerade das Publikum ansprechen, das sich bisher uninteressiert oder ablehnend verhielt.

Ein wesentlicher Abschnitt des Films ist dem bekannten griechischen Dirigenten Dimitri Mitropoulos vorbehalten. Er wird bei der Probearbeit mit den New Yorker Philharmonikern belauscht und man erlebt, mit welcher ungeheuren Sorgfalt und Gewissenhaftigkeit ausgefeilte Interpretationen klassischer Musikwerke vorbereitet werden. Der Film wird einen aufschlußreichen Einblick in seine Dirigierweise geben und zeigen, daß er weder eine Partitur noch einen Taktstock benötigt, sondern alles durch die zwingende Gestik seiner Hände erreicht.

Intensives Studium, lange Praxis und ein bewundernswürdiges Gedächtnis befähigen ihn, mit souveräner Sicherheit selbst diffizilste Werke der Orchesterliteratur auswendig zu dirigieren. Mitropoulos behauptet, daß er weitaus besser mit seinen Händen als mit dem Taktstock subtile Feinheiten einer Partitur ausschöpfen und seine Eingebungen viel exakter und deutlicher auf das Orchester übertragen kann. Der Film veranschaulicht die vitale und von innerer Dynamik beherrschte Dirigiertechnik dieses Künstlers, aber auch die gespannte Aufmerksamkeit und letzte Konzentration eines jeden Orchestermitgliedes.

Außerdem wird in „Meister der Musik" das Geheimnis der Geigenkunst von Jascha Heifetz gelüftet. Einmalige Kameraeinstellungen zeigen Heifetz während seiner Übungsstunden in seiner Wohnung und vergegenwärtigen den physischen Kräfteverschleiß, der hinter jeder reifen künstlerischen Leistung steht. Erst wenn Heifetz technisch und musikalisch über dem Werk steht, greift er zu seinen zwei berühmten Geigen, einer kostbaren „David" Guarnerius aus dem Jahre 1742 und einer Stradivari aus dem Jahre 1731, um auf diesen edlen Instrumenten seinem Vortrag den letzten Schliff zu geben.

Der Film gewährt auch den ersten genauen Einblick in die Klaviertechnik und in das Privatleben von Artur Rubinstein. Die Kinobesucher, die Rubinstein in diesem Film Mendelssohn, Liszt und Chopin spielen hören und sehen, erhalten nicht nur durch Großaufnahmen einen Begriff von der unglaublichen Fingerfertigkeit Rubinsteins, sondern sind auch eingefangen in die Atmosphäre seiner Häuslichkeit, die ebenso echt und ungezwungen ist wie sein Klavierspiel.

Rubinsteins Klavierspiel verbindet eine vornehme Anschlagkunst mit musikalischem Stilgefühl und unfehlbarer technischer Sicherheit und Präzision, für die es keine Probleme mehr zu geben scheint. Ob es glasklare Läufe in Chopinschen Stücken sind, in denen sich die Töne so gleichmäßig aneinanderreihen wie Perlen an eine Kette, ob es funkelnde Lichter sind, die er Strawinsky aufsetzt oder kraftvolle Akzente, dramatische Steigerungen und dynamische Entladungen von geballter Kraft in Beethovenschen Klaviersonaten, immer verdichtet sich das Spiel dieses großen Pianisten zu einer musikalischen Aussage von letzter Gültigkeit.

Um sich über die Publikumsresonanz des Films ein ungefähres Bild zu machen, starteten die Produzenten ihren Streifen an vier verschiedenen Plätzen an der Westküste Amerikas. Ohne Vorankündigung setzten sie den Film an dem geschäftlich schwächsten Abend jeder Woche auf das Programm. Das Ergebnis übertraf alle Erwartungen. Die Besucherzahlen lagen höher als gewöhnlich. Außerordentlich war auch die Zahl der eingegangenen Vorbestellungen. Einige Besucher hatten oft mehr als fünfzig Kilometer zurückgelegt, um den Film zu sehen.

Einen gleichen Erfolg möchten wir diesem Film auch bei uns wünschen.

ANNA XYDIS PLAYS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Soloist in Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto as Mitropoulos Conducts Philharmonic

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. Anna Xydis, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.
Prelude, Chorale and Fugue ....Franck-Pierne
Poeme de l'extase .....Scriabin
On the Steppes of Central Asia .....Borodin
Piano Concerto, No. 3 .....Rachmaninoff

By NOEL STRAUS

Late romantic music formed the program presented by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under Dimitri Mitropoulos, Saturday night at Carnegie Hall. With one exception, the offerings were Russian, including the most recent of the compositions, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto, No. 3, in which Anna Zydis was the soloist.

The exception mentioned was César Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue," given in the orchestral arrangement of that celebrated piano composition made by his pupil, Gabriel Pierné. It is almost seventy years since Franck wrote this work, which was considered very daring in its day, and nearly forty years since Pierné's transcription received its New York première. But time has not staled its impressiveness, in either version.

Naturally, most of us probably prefer the sound of the Franck masterpiece on the piano, for which it was conceived. But somehow, the unified structure of the music becomes more obvious in the Pierné version, even though some parts like the opening measures of the Prelude and the climax of the fugue lose their inherent character in the process.

Mr. Mitropoulos gave an illuminating and finely integrated reading of this Gallic opus, and followed it up by a superb interpretation of the Scriabin "Poème de l'extase." The adventurous conductor has done a laudable service in reviving two of Scriabin's most important orchestral works within the week. For the younger generation should have occasional opportunity to become acquainted with the scores of a composer who made so great a stir in his own lifetime and was so richly gifted.

The "Poème de l'Extase," a sort of glorification of the joy that comes to an artist in creating his works, was considered revolutionary, especially in its harmonic structure, when it was first heard.

The tone poem no longer seems as sensuous and voluptuous as it did formerly, except perhaps in the "moderato avec délice" section, but it still possesses many an impressive page and gives a general sense of power, authority and skill, not to be denied. And how imaginatively it is scored for the vast orchestra demanded! Mr. Mitropoulos knew how to make the greatest climaxes, as in the triumphant close, mellow to the ear, and the beautifully detailed performance was warmly applauded.

Miss Xydis, who has been favorably known hereabouts for more than a decade, played the extremely difficult Rachmaninoff Third Concerto in thoroughly virtuosic fashion, with energy, fire and precision. More color, however, a less percussive tone and greater strength in the left-hand passagework would have bettered an otherwise praiseworthy achievement.

Milstein Earns Plaudits In Prokofiev Concerto

By PAUL AFFELDER

Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra began the final week of their season in Carnegie Hall last evening.

The highlight of the varied program was the beautifully revealing interpretation of the late Sergei Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1 in D Major, played in memory of the composer.

It is no news that Nathan Milstein, who was the soloist, is one of the top violinists of our day; what is news is that he managed to bring more warmth and intimacy to the first and last movements of this concerto that we remember ever having heard before.

A certain harshness seems always to pervade the tone of the average soloist performing this concerto but last night all was silky smooth, except in the intentionally biting, satirical scherzo

Throughout the concerto, Mr. Mitroupoulos blended his orchestra into a sensitive, shimmering companion to Mr. Milstein's exquisite solo playing.

It was a rather strange experience listening to this 30-year-old work, in many respects far more modern in conception than Prokofiev's Seventh Symphony, wrtten only last year and performed here for the first time on Tuesday evening.

Gershwin Award Selection

It was also strange, and occasionally interesting, to hear what young George Rochberg had to say in his "Night Piece," which received its first performance as the result of having won, the Eighth Annual George Gershwin Memorial Contest, sponsored by Victory Lodge of B'nai B'rith.

Originally intended as part of a symphony, the music does manage to create a certain atmosphere, though the sound and ideas are often spotty. In the first and third sections, the scoring is mostly for winds, but the middle part—by far the best—is an attractive solo for cello, quite beautiful in spots, with an oriental or Hebraic cast.

The work was cordially received, and there were bows by the composer and the Philharmonic's first 'cellist, Laszlo Barga, who played the solo admirably.

Mr. Mitropoulos opened the concert with a heavy and almost sentimental reading of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor, in the equally heavy and unwieldy orchestration by Ottorino Respighi. He closed the program with a vigorous and often heroic performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

There were moments in the latter work when we would have liked less weight—particularly in the brasses—and more forward motion, but it was essentially a most gratifying interpretation which served as an appropriate seasonal finale for the Thursday night subscribers.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos began its final week of the season at Carnegie Hall last night, and no doubt to make sure that contentment would reign among the subscribers the program began with Bach and ended with Beethoven. Between these two fixed planets of the musical universe there was music by Prokofieff written when he was a young man and a new piece by George Rochberg, an American composer, who is a fairly young man now.

Mr. Rochberg's piece, called "Night Music," won this year's George Gershwin Memorial Contest under the auspices of Victory Lodge of B'nai B'rith in cooperation with B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation. The composer, who was born in Paterson, N. J., and who now lives in Philadelphia where he teaches at the Curtis Institute and serves as an editor for a music publishing house, completed a five-movement symphony in 1948. Finding it too long, he extracted one of the two slow movements, entitled it "Night Music" and won the $1,000 Gershwin Prize with it.

Mr. Rochberg today proclaims himself a twelve-tone man, but "Night Music" is relatively conservative, harking back in spirit to the impressionist school. Mr. Rochberg can score for orchestra with skill. Every page of this ten-minute score makes its effect, and a dark, almost grim, mood is sustained.

The evening's soloist was Nathan Milstein, who appeared in Prokofieff's Violin Concerto No. 1. He gave it a performance of silken smoothness, particularly in the delicate, poetic last movement, and of dancing lightness in other places. This concerto was composed more than thirty-five years ago, but it still has freshness (in both senses of the word). Other violinists may stress energy and bite, but one found that Mr. Milstein's controlled suavity gave a delightful aura to the youthful score of a composer well on his way.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra gave Mr. Milstein refined and balanced support in an evening of soundly realized performances. The Bach-Respighi Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor was properly broad and spacious. "Night Music" was played in a way to please its composer, and Mr. Rochberg, taking bows after it, seemed to reflect his satisfaction. With Beethoven's Fifth Symphony the orchestra and its conductor bade farewell to the Thursday evening subscribers on a note of mighty affirmation.

The Philharmonic

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and its musical director, Dimitri Mitropoulos, entered upon the last week end of their season at the top of their form last night in Carnegie Hall. There was also, to grave the occasion, a soloist of first rank in the violinist, Nathan Milstein, and to invest the program with more than routine musical interest there was the premiere of a work by a young American composer, "Night Music" by George Rochberg.

Mr. Rochberg, who is in his early thirties, was the 1952 winner of the Gershwin Memorial Contest which is open to young American composers. One of the substantial rewards for winners of this eight-year-old contest nowadays is performance of the prize work by the Philharmonic-Symphony, and it was thus that we came to hear "Night Music." It turned out to be a meagre ten minutes of music by a young composer who knows how to reproduce the tenuous orchestral colors of Impressionism with a fair degree of expertness.

According to the program notes provided by the composer, "Night Music" was from a symphony that had one movement too many, and the name was given to the piece after it was extracted from the symphony. We are told that "night" is to be interpreted in a broad way as "a symbol of whatever is dark, unknown, awesome, mysterious or demonic." Both this program and the grotesque opening solo by contra-bassoon immediately put me in mind of the modern dance events on Fifty-second St. Valiantly as the player tried to redeem this solo in the deep dark pitch regions that seem almost below the margin of hearing, the result was a highly unprepossessing opening. It sorely cried out for some stark, expressionistic, tortured stage counterpart.

There followed a promising section that verged, in a mild way, on a valid episodic, spasmodic contemporary chromaticism. But in less than two minutes this gave way to a far too easy solution for the piece as a whole, namely, a prolonged sonority consisting largely of muted harmonics on the strings, against which the cello plays a long improvisatory solo after the fashion of Bloch's "Schelomo." Laszlo Varga's cello tone was very pretty, but the music was empty and banal.

"Night Music" dates from four years ago. The composer tells us it preceded his "first efforts in the technique of twelve-tone composition," and we may assume from this intelligence that he means to say he has gone on to higher things since. The Gershwin committee must have had very slim pickings, indeed, to have been obliged to come up with this work as the prize-winner.

Mr. Mitropoulos made the best of whatever opportunity the piece gave to make an orchestra sound lovely, lucid and sonorous. He also provided an excellent accompaniment for Mr. Milstein in Prokofieff's first concerto. The violinist for his part played with his usual suavity and superb control, and if the reading was wanting in some of its customary excitement, it had a certain ease that was nice for a change.

Beethoven And Bach

By MILES KASTENDIECK

MITROPOULOS began the final concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony's 111th season in Carnegie Hall last night. He anchored his program securely by opening with Bach and closing with Beethoven. In between came the contemporaries Prokofieff and Rochberg.

The first performance of Rochberg's "Night Music" introduced him as winner of the 8th annual George Gershwin Memorial Contest. Though the piece has been extracted from a lengthy symphony, it fits its descriptive title neatly. From some of its musical references it might even yield a program.

It is possible to imagine Siegfried's dragon stalking through a forest filled with the night sounds of an insect orchestra. Berg's Wozzeck also roams the woods.

Lacks Drama

From these suggestions, however no drama emerges. The piece subsides without a salient theme but sustained by some interesting scoring. The audience applauded politely when the composer appeared.

Milstein was soloist in Prokofieff's Violin Concerto No. 1. After some tentative playing in the first movement, he gave a true virtuoso account of the second and an eloquent, elegant reading of the finale.

The work is neither one of the most endearing nor the most enduring of Prokofieff's scores, Milstein and Mitropoulos renewed interest in it as the performance unfolded. They played it in memory of the composer.

A luxurious performance of Bach-Respichi's Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor and an individualized interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony showed off the orchestra handsomely.

Milstein Fills Demands of Prokofieff

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

This has been Prokofieff Week at Carnegie Hall. Tuesday night the Philadelphia Orchestra gave the first New York hearing of the Seventh Symphony, and last night Dimitri Mitropoulos featured the First Violin Concerto on the Philharmonic bill.

It was stated on the program that the D Major Concerto was being played "in memory of the composer." Prokofieff died early last month at the age of 62, having long outgrown his country's boundaries and become the property of the world.

I doubt if a better violinist than Nathan Milstein could have been chosen for the occasion. This is a concerto that requires supreme control, a tone of silken purity, and a technic defiant of any demands placed upon it. Mr. Milstein was obviously the man for it.

The work bristles with high-register leaps, soaring trills, and glissandi that seem to move over very thin ice indeed. But it is not display music; all of it is part of a highly expresive scheme. And it took the best of Mr. Milstein's artistry to carry it out.

Mr. Mitropoulos, who had a special affection for Prokofieff, showed it in the masterly accompaniment—but, then hes howed pretty much the same affection for Beethoven's "Eroica" and Bach's "Passacaglia," also listed on the program.

Mr. Mitropoulos has a way of identifying himself completely with the idiom of the moment—to the point where one becomes convinced that it would have been his own had he chosen to develop as a composer instead of a conductor.

This was true of Bach, of Beethoven and of Prokofieff last night. Each benefited from a remarkable mind and a rare poetic intuition. It was true, too, of George Rochberg's "Night Music," which the orchestra performed as the prize-winning piece of the latest George Gershwin Memorial Contest Award.

Mr. Rochberg, a native of New Jersey and holder of the Purple Heart and Oak Leaf Cluster for wounds sustained in action while a second lieutenant, shows marked creative daring in this composition. It is in a style suggesting Berg and Schoenberg, yet distinctly his own in the shrewd play of novel idea and color. It made one want to hear more.

PhilharmonicEndsSeason

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concluded its season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with its musical director, Dimitri Mitropoulos, on the podium, and the distinguished violinist, Nathan Milstein, appearing once again as soloist. Enthusiasm ran high in the audience, and the general spirit of the occasion was to wish our resident symphony orchestra a fond "au revoir" until next October, when it returns to Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Milstein was soloist in the Mendelssohn concerto, and his customary suave tone, elegant style, careful intonation and general amiability were in evidence. Chausson's Symphony in B-flat major, Op. 20, was the other major work on the program, and while it has long been a part of standard repertory, it has been absent from our programs for the last four or five years. Mr. Mitropoulos, keenly sensitive as he is to the need for varying programs, did well to revive it if only as a relief from the perennial Franck symphony to which it bears a close relation.

Yesterday's program also included the Berlioz Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and Ravel's "La Valse." The performances of the orchestra under the direction of Mr. Mitropoulos matched and showed themselves altogether worthy of the warm audience reception. Those who tuned in to the Philharmonic program on the CBS network heard Mr. Mitropoulos during the intermission period acknowledge the receipt of a citation from the New York Music Critics Circle. Howard Taubman, chairman of the circle, who was introduced by James Fassett, presented the citation and explained that it was in recognition of the enterprise on the part of Mr. Mitropoulos and his orchestra in presenting a concert performance of Darius Milhaud's opera "Christophe Colomb" in November.

PHILHARMONIC END IS A GALA AFFAIR

Close of 1952-53 Season Is Marked by Critics, Peabody Awards for Achievement

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony concluded its 1952-53 season yesterday afternoon with a concert at Carnegie Hall that brought its total to 125 this season and a grand total of 5,180 concerts in 111 seasons.

The closing had a gala note, for there was a large audience that bestowed hearty applause on Dimitri Mitropoulos, the musical director, and Nathan Milstein, the soloist. During the intermission broadcast, radio listeners heard the presentation of two awards for the orchestra's achievements.

One was a special citation from the New York Music Critics Circle to Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra for presenting Darius Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb" in concert form. It was presented by Howard Taubman, chairman of the circle, and received by Mr. Mitropoulos, who said he was "very, very touched."

The other honor was one of the George Foster Peabody Awards for radio music, which the Philharmonic received jointly with the National Broadcasting Company's Standard Symphony. It was received on behalf of the orchestra by James Fassett of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Mr. Milstein's vehicle yesterday was the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. The orchestra selections were repititions from programs given earlier in the week: Berlioz' Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Chausson's Symphony in B flat and Ravel's "La Valse."

Chausson Work Given

Chausson's Symphony in B flat, Op. 20, was the feature of Saturday evening's concert at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Mr. Mitropoulos.

The Chausson work is not a hardy perennial of the repertoire; its sugary sentiment and lush orchestration are delightful for a few minutes, but wearisome when spread out to the dimensions of a work in sonata form.

Nevertheless it is pleasant listening once in a while, especially when done with such intense conviction as was displayed by Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic players on Saturday evening.

A test of the musicianship, to say nothing of the endurance, of orchestra and conductor is so familiar a piece as the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, especially when played for the third time in as many days.

The performers, however, showed no sign of being weary of Beethoven in C minor, and gave the work a rousing, muscular performance that greatly delighted the audience.

The program began with Berlioz' Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and closed with Ravel's "La Valse."

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

By VIRGIL THOMSON

Post-Seasonal Thoughts

EVERY year, as the music season is about to end, I try to think back and remember what it was like. But the more seasons I review the more seasons, in immediate retrospect, seem very much alike. The recitalists play and sing the same programs; the opera companies give the same operas; the conductors direct the same pieces, which are the same famous Fifty Pieces. And if programs do not change much from year to year, neither do the styles and standards of execution nor does the personnel of the successful executant group. The music world changes very slowly. Indeed, from a reviewer's eye each season is like a repeating dream from which one awakes in terror or despair, rarely with the joy of an enlightenment.

Programs and Artists

THERE are a few standard exceptions to the standard patterns. The City Center Opera continues to grow in artistic stature, the Philadelphia Orchestra in technical expertness. Dimitri Mitropoulos, among the program makers, gives more works than the others do that are rare, difficult and distinguished. The recording companies, large and small, are now deeply involved with out-of-line repertory. Radio, on the other hand, is in an epoch of musical doldrums; and television, save for a few efforts at short opera, has not even scratched the surface of its musico-dramatic possibilities. Neither ballet nor the light musical theater is making any musical advance at all. It is possible, however, just possible that the art of singing is again on the rise.

Musical execution in general has never been so expert, so efficient. The American-trained artist of today fears no competitor. In fact, he has few competitors, since post-war Europe is not producing well-trained executants in any quantity. We have lately experienced an invasion by French women pianists, all excellent, all charming and obviously intelligent but all just a shade overweaning, perhaps, in their determination to please. Actually the balance of trade has turned, and we now export more musicians than we import. Dozens of American artists are having successful careers in Europe.

Modern Music

IF THIS season has proved anything at all, it has shown that modern music, as a cause, is as dead as woman suffrage. And it is dead for the same reason. It has been won. The last of the modern techniques to achieve admission to the standard programs, the twelve-tone style, or atonality in general, has firmly arrived. Indeed, the atonal writers, who represent our only twentieth-century chromatic style, and the neoclassic composers, who have hitherto held to diatonic tunes and harmonies have declared an armistice. The terms of peace are not yet definitive, but it seems clear that a sort of co-dominion has been arrived at. This came about through no surrender by the twelve-tone forces but rather through their success in penetrating the seemingly impregnable defenses of the orchestral concerts and the teaching jobs.

This penetration has been going on slowly for a decade or more, and lately it has been clear that it could not be stopped. So the still strong neo-classical center has met the invasion by simply surrounding and absorbing the attacking wing. They have taken over chromaticism and the atonal techniques, used them to invigorate their own fading expressive powers and by doing so have invigorated the equally fading expressivity of the strictly chromatic group. The result has been exactly as prophesied in this column several years back. There is no modern music, as opposed to some other kind of music, because there is no other kind being written. There is simply a twentieth-century style, and everybody writes in it.

The 20th-Century Style

TO BE exact, there are two twentieth-century styles, the chromatic and the diatonic, with infinite gradations of chromaticism between them; and all successful composers from now on are going to have to be masters of both. This situation, which reproduces that of all the great periods in music's history, makes possible for our century's second half a very great expansion of music. We have laid the ghost of the powerful nineteenth century, and we are ready to be ourselves. This is not unlike what took place toward the middle of the sixteenth century and the seventeenth and the eighteenth and even of the nineteenth itself. The musical idiom at each of these times had reached a kind of stability. The differences of manner from one composer to another were small. The differences that counted were those of technical mastery and of expressive power, the differences between great men and small men.

With the last flare-up of the fifty years' war about modern music now extinguished, it seems likely that the societies founded to prosecute that war will also expire. Their concerts have for some years now drawn smaller and smaller audiences, offered less and less of esthetic novelty and intellectual stimulation. They have fought the good fight and won it; their mission is accomplished. Peace to their bones and all honor to their memory. There will be another war on soon, but it will not be their war.

Genius, Beware!

THE next war, if one can predict it from history, will be about individuals, not about styles. Our style can now absorb any influence, digest anything, without danger to itself. But a powerfully organized music world administering and exploiting so powerful an instrument invariably chokes a little on the larger, individual talents. As it becomes easier to produce a Mozart, it becomes also harder to use him. Already, among the young, one is encountering colossal talents and early-acquired masteries. And these very talents are the hardest right now to fit into teaching jobs and into the other neat niches of musical breadwinning. Before the century is out we may well have a martyr or two.

So far, modern music has had no martyrs, no unspeakable tragedies like the lives of Mozart and Schubert, not even torments like those suffered by Beethoven, Berlioz and Bizet. The century has been too busy destroying and rebuilding its musical language to find in persecution anything but a waste of manpower. With the language now rebuilt and available to everybody, a new conservatism is likely to set in. This will operate toward both technique and expression. But my prediction is merely an eventual one. For the moment all is under control, and general prosperity among composers is to be expected during the next few years.

Philharmonic Ends Season:

Last Concert a Gem

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ANOTHER Philharmonic Symphony season ended in Carnegie Hall yesterday. For the final program, Mitropoulos had selected time-honored works which made good listening. He expended considerable vitality in conducting them. The results reflected the wonderful response the orchestra gives him.

With Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini" to open and Ravel's "La Valse" to close the the concert, the hall resounded with maximum fortisimos.

Since Mitropoulos asked for them, the musicians obliged; but the din created was not quite that necessary. Mitropoulos conducting Ravel became a choreographic study himself.

Happy Choice

The choice of Chauson's symphony in B Flat turned out to be a happy one. Infrequent performance make hearing it a refreshing experience. Evidently the music awakens the spirit of romanticism in Mitropoulos because he conducted with a surge of emotional feeling. The performance accentuated the lush quality of the orchestration as well as the inherent beauty of the score.

Nathan Milstein was again the soloist. The Mendelssohn Violin Concerto was substituted for the Prokofieff First of last Thursday. After a somewhat indifferent start, Milstein warmed to his performance. Aside from some passing problems of pure intonation, he happily combined his virtuosity and artistry to give another elegant account of the work.

The somewhat checkered season thus ended with a splendid concert. In summary it will be the first in years when modern composers have been so well represented in the total figures on performances. Prokofieff, Ravel, Strauss and Stravinsky are credited with a total of five works each.

Beethoven Led

Those inclined to think too much emphasis may have been placed in this direction may be comforted by the fact that Beethoven was represented by 16 works, led all 72 composers, as usual.

Mozart, Brahms and Wagner received due recognition before the contemporaries qualified. A brief glance at the repertory printed in the final program book suggests a comprehensive and well-rounded season.

Mitropoulos contributed the most interesting highlights, the first American performance of Milhaud's "Christophe Colomb," for which the Music Critics Circle presented the conductor a citation during yesterday's intermission, the excerpts from Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" in English; and the first New York hearing of Berlioz's song cycle "Nuits D' Ete."

Bruno Walter's Mahler and Bruckner concerts and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony were other high points.

American Première of Prokofiev Seventh

By Miles Kastendieck
New York

Prokofiev's Seventh Symphony has been given its first performances in this country by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra. Composed last year, it received its first hearing in Moscow last October. There it met official acceptance. In spite of a sumptuous performance in Carnegie Hall, the work has encountered certain misgivings on the part of discriminating music lovers here.

The element of popular appeal cannot be overlooked. It arises from an obvious attention to melodies which tunesmiths will recognize as readily available for their purposes. Though this commonplace quality is not foreign to Prokofiev's music, it has never been quite so prominent. On the other hand, in giving himself wholeheartedly to melody, he has spun several in the tradition of Russian romanticism.

Serenity Expressed

What has prompted the relaxation in this symphony may never be known. The music expresses a kind of serenity which could anticipate the end of his creative activity. It also suggests looking backward to an earlier period in which he might have taken refuge from the circumstances surrounding him. Some element of philosophical reflection could indicate amusement at the turn of events in his life. The music is and is not the composer, in a most curious way.

Only two of the four movements have any substance. Both the Allegretto and the Andante are weak even in craftsmanship. The opening Moderato is perhaps the best, not only for the quality of its themes but also for the assertion of Prokofiev's peculiar individuality. The Finale is attractively gay, expressive of nonchalance.

Those characteristics of defiance, independence, and sardonic thrust so familiar in Prokofiev's finest work are not to be found in this symphony. Its simplicity and straightforwardness appealed to the audience, though the applause indicated some reserve in enthusiasm. If the audience looked forward to a notable successor to the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, it was disappointed. The Seventh can hardly be classed with these.

The Philadelphians' final concert overflowed with richness. It opened with Ormandy's transcription of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor and closed with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto. The organ effects in the former reflected Ormandy's command of his wonderful orchestra. The symphonic massiveness of the latter testified to its power. Rudolf Serkin played the piano part with characteristically dynamic brilliance. The sheer drama of his playing electrified the audience. If the performance appeared super-charged, the work had the capacity of absorption to allow Brahms still to triumph.

Mitropoulos Returns

Dimitri Mitropoulos returned to the Philharmonic-Symphony early in April, renewed in health and revitalized in purpose. His first program paid tribute to the memory of Prokofiev in an exciting performance of the Fifth Symphony. It also recreated interest in Vaughan Williams' Fourth Symphony, the modernity of which may still be ahead of the listening public. A week later Mitropoulos revived Scriabine's "Prometheus," the Poem of Fire. This interest he furthered in a later revival of the "Poem of Ecstacy." While the music sustained interest, it sounded tame in both cases. Indeed, it was hard to believe that these works had created so much disturbance years ago.

Two premières of note occurred during the past month—Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order" and Von Einem's "Orchestermusik." The former, commissioned by Mitropoulos, lived up to its name, through Berger's strict development of his musical formula. The work is definitely a product of the Stravinsky school, losing its own identity after an excellent beginning. It is as fastidiously scored as it is written, Von Einem's music is admirably made, dramatically effective, but strangely lacking in salient material. Mitropoulos gave it a theatrical performance which won justified appreciation.

Final Concert

The final concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony's 111th season featured an infrequently heard performance of Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, for which Mitropoulos has a special affinity. Nathan Milstein, soloist earlier in Prokofiev's First Violin Concerto, played the Mendelssohn on this occasion with characteristic elegance. The program, which opened with Berlioz's Overture "Benvenuto Cellini," closed with a rousing performance of Ravel's "La Valse."

The fact that Prokofiev, Ravel, Strauss, and Stravinsky tied for fifth place in the total number of works of single composers played during the season, substantiates to some extent Mitropoulos's efforts to give representation to modern music. Nevertheless, Beethoven, Mozart, Brahms, and Wagner led the repertory of 72 composers presented during the year.

Philharmonic's Closing

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The Philharmonic Symphony wound up its 111th season in brilliant style in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

Nathan Milstein played the Mendelssohn Concerto with superlative technic and finesse, and Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted in much the same spirit. The result was one of the most satisfying readings of this enduring masterpiece in years.

Mr. Mitropoulos also directed vivid renderings of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Chausson's B-flat major symphony and Ravel's "La Valse." As if to end the season with an unforgettable flourish, the orchestra played with marked warmth and sonority.

The concert was the 5180th since the Philharmonic gave its first program in 1842 in the Apollo Room, a small auditorium located on the east side of Broadway between Walker and Canal Sts. It is interesting to note that the composer most frequently played during that first season and the one just closing was the same—Beethoven.

The record of the last eight years shows that Beethoven led seven times, with Wagner coming out first in 1949-50. This season Beethoven was followed by Mozart, Brahms and Wagner in number of works performed. Prokofieff, Ravel, Strauss and Stravinsky tied for fifth place.

The novelty counter exhibited three world premieres, seven American premieres and six New York premieres.

Mr. Mitropoulos was rousingly greeted a few weeks ago after a period of rest imposed by his doctor. Yesterday the seasonal farewell was equally warm and inspiring to a man and a musician wholly dedicated to the highest ideals of art and service.

ORCHESTRA'S 111TH YEAR

Philharmonic Gives Wide Service in Long Season

By OLIN DOWNES

THE conclusion of the New York Philharmonic - Symphony Society's 111th season, and the number of programs, the number of conductors, the number of compositions new and old which it gave in that period, are emphatic of several things. One is the enormous productivity of the Society, and the immensity of the service it does its public. Another is the fact that it is practically impossible for any one or two conductors to prepare and direct its concerts through an entire season. A third is that New York's one great resident orchestra has the field in this city too much to itself.

The inadequacy of a single orchestra satisfying the symphonic needs of a city of New York's population is partly balanced by the annual visits of two of the other greatest orchestras of the nation, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra, which give a total of thirty concerts a season here, ten by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and ten pairs of concerts by the Boston Symphony. But it is unfortunate that New York has not at least two symphony orchestras of its own, which could share the burden of local symphonic production and healthily compete with each other for public favor.

Wealth of Music

Before budgetary conditions compelled the two New York orchestras to amalgamate in 1927, they provided a wealth of symphonic music which the public cheerfully absorbed. But there were immense deficits to be faced each season. Ideally, a city of New York's population should be able to support enough orchestras to afford us concerts of greater variety of attraction than is the case today. Only the Little Orchestra Society now offers programs that differ interestingly from the more or less standard repertoire of the Big Three that we hear season in and season out. Steadily increasing costs of symphonic performance contract this field as they do those of most other arts, and the public is the loser thereby.

Meanwhile, the Philharmonic-Symphony Society gallantly shoulders its burden, and the season just concluded is no exception to that rule. In this season Dmitri Mitropoulos conducted forty-three of the subscription concerts and two of the out-of-town concerts. LA FORZA DEL DIMITRI

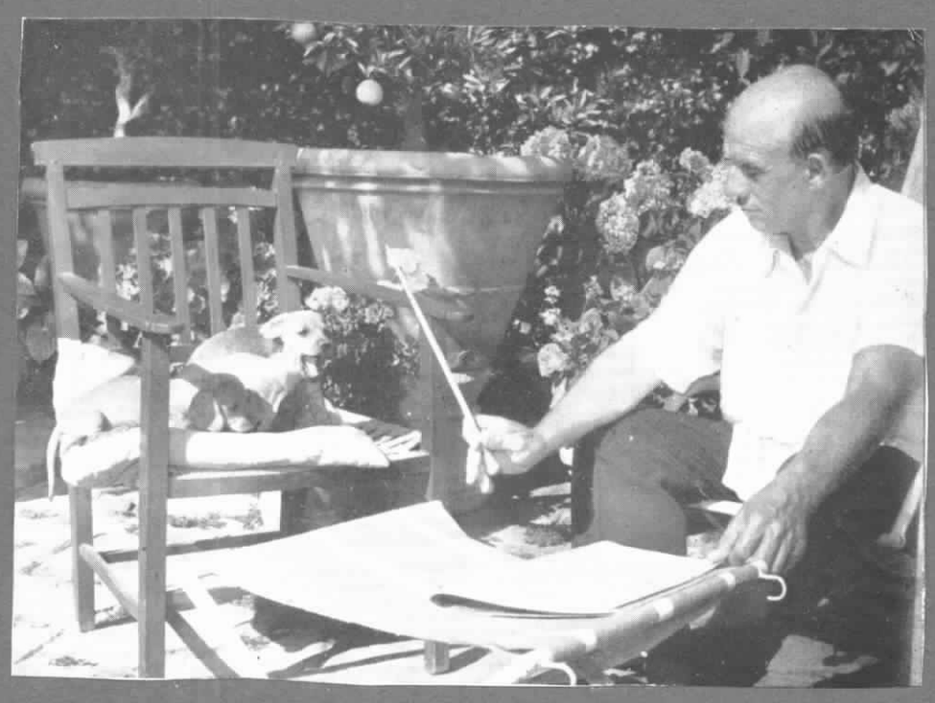
We went part way up the viale Michelangelo the other afternoon to call on Dimitri Mitropoulos who is staying there with friends while preparing to conduct La forza del destino here next month. The famous conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra is supposedly resting these days. He suffered a heart attack last winter and had to relinquish his podium for some of the season. Having passed part of the last three springs in Florence (he conducted concerts here last year as well as the famous production of Strauss' Electra during the Maggio Musicale of 1950), Mr. Mitropoulos came back to spend a few quiet weeks in this fond city.

Then the powers at Teatro Comunale persuaded him to take on the job of conducting one of the programmed operas and he chose La forza del destino. The Verdi opera will be given five times and Mitropoulos is going to conduct two concerts here which will be sandwiched in between the opera performances. Then in July he takes off for La Scala and two more concerts. Resting, he says.



When we saw the 57-years old musician the other day, he was one of the healthiest looking men we have yet come across in the music world. He has been studying the score out-of-doors and his face had taken on a mahogany finish. He told us that this was the first time he had conducted this particular opera, although he had conducted at the Staatsoper in Berlin before going to America in 1936. « For some reason, perhaps the libretto, this opera was never popular outside of Italy; which is a pity because it contains some of Verdi's best music. We've got a first-rate cast here, and I'm looking forward to this work. I suppose you realize that I must be the first non-Italian conductor in history to be asked to conduct Verdi in Italy », Mr. Mitropoulos said.

While he was talking, the conductor, who looks more like a football coach than a music master, was nervously tapping his fingers on the arm of the chair. A frisky dachshund leaped into his lap and began commanding affection. He said the dog was not his. « My hostess here raises them. They're terribly affectionate, you know, particularly toward the male sex ». At this point, the villa's owner and dograiser came in and said that it was time for the maestro to be taken into town, where he was dining with the composer Luigi Dallapiccola. «But did you take your medicine? » she asked. « Oh, yes, yes, yes! » he replied in a slightly angry tone. And we fully expected to see him bid us goodbye by turning defiant cart-wheels until he was out of sight.

LA «VETRINA» DEL MAGGIO MUSICALE

La "Forza del destino" di Verdi tradotta da Mitropulos e da Pabst

(DAL NOSTRO INVIATO)

FIRENZE, giugno

Verdi domina più che mai il mondo del melodramma con la forza d'un torrente che straripa di là dagli argini del tempo. Con la schiacciante potenza della sua opera ha ricondotto il pubblico a riesaminare quel problema dell'opera che si discute da tre secoli e che si riteneva risolto fuori del melodramma. Ma oggi Verdi torna ad imporre la realtà del suo melodramma: turba le teorie intellettualistiche e sgomina le fila di coloro che nell'aristocrazia d'una formula ideologica si erano illusi di aver trovato la soluzione pacificatrice del problema dibattuto. Il cinquantenario della morte di Verdi ha segnato una nuova risurrezione: accanto alle opere pilastro, alle opere di tutti i tempi sempre grandi e vive, vengono riportate in luce quei melodrammi meno noti o meno accetti un secolo fa e ognuno di essi offre una rivelazione stupefacente e appare d'un interesse attuale perchè pone e risolve problemi ancor oggi presenti. Meno di una settimana fa il Maggio fiorentino ha riportato in luce quell'Aroldo che ha stupito per la sua unità stilistica e la potenza di talune pagine in cui la musica, di là da ogni esteriore assurdità drammatica, tutto risolve in lirica potenza creativa. Ora è la volta della Forza del destino (cioè d'uno dei melodrammi verdiani più significativi, anche se più dibattuti quale opera di transizione) che il maestro Francesco Siciliani ha voluto porre in vetrina in una edizione spettacolosa, realmente eccezionale, quasi a voler riaprire la discussione estetica su quest'opera che è insieme fra le più ammirate e le più vituperate del grande tragedia.

L'edizione alla quale, com'era logico attendersi, ha arriso un così intenso successo di pubblico, è da far tanto di cappello: direttore Dimitri Mitropulos — che della Messa ha dato negli anni scorsi una versione stupenda per forza penetrativa — regista Georg Wilhelm Pabst, vale a dire uno dei pilastri del cinema; e cantanti principali Renata Tebaldi — una meraviglia! — Fedora Barbieri, Mario del Monaco, Cesare Siepi, per dir soltanto di maggiori. Cosa si può fare di più e di meglio, oggi, sulla scena lirica? Si chiamano forze nuove, e già grandi, per una spirituale collaborazione intesa a mettere in rilievo i puri valori estetici di un opera d'arte, fuori dal peso d'una cosiddetta tradizione che, in fondo, non è che il trionfo di manierismi e di sciatterie accumulatesi attraverso il tempo. Orbene Mitropulos e Pabst ci hanno dato un'opera d'arte viva, rivissuta attraverso una sensibilità vergine, direttamente sgorgata a contatto col testo, e pertanto fedele non solo alla lettera, ma allo spirito dell'opera d'arte.

Su questo punto bisogna intendersi e non equivocare. Verdi non amava le « ricreazioni », è ben noto. Proprio a proposito della Forza del destino — dopo cioè l'edizione rifatta per la Scala — nel '71 egli scriveva a Ricordi: « No, io voglio un solo creatore e m'accontento che si eseguisca semplicemente ed esattamente quello che è scritto: il male sta che non si eseguisce mai ciò che è scritto. Leggo sovente di effetti non immaginati dall'autore. Capisco tutto quello che voi dite all'indirizzo di Mariani. Tutti siamo d'accordo sul suo merito, ma qui si tratta non di un individuo, per quanto grande sia, ma di arte. Io non ammetto nè nei cantanti, nè nei direttori la facoltà di creare »

E, criticando, appunto il Mariani che, nella sinfonia della Forza del destino strozzava i tempi, realizzava effetti di pianissimo improvviso e faceva suonare fortissimo gli ottoni, nel tema del frate, scritti a « mezza voce », scriveva: «il fortissimo di Mariani altera completamente il carattere della sinfonia e quello squarcio diventa una fanfara guerriera: cosa che non ha nulla a che fare col soggetto del dramma in cui la parte guerriera è tutt'affatto episodica. Ed eccoci sulla strada del barocco e del falso ».

Ebbene, Mitropulos non è incorso di certo nel delitto deprecato da Verdi: nessun arbitrio, nella sua interpretazione, e soprattutto nessuna infedeltà allo spirito dell'opera d'arte. Mitropulos ha, è vero, mosso i tempi tradizionali, ha creato una elasticità interiore di fraseggio che è, poi, il segreto della musica; ma non ha mai alterato nulla, nè tanto meno, si è mostrato irrispettoso. Anzi Mitropulos è stato tanto rispettoso da eseguire l'edizione integrale, senza nulla omettere, fedele alla partitura del 1869, cioè alla versione definitiva fatta per la Scala, sette anni dopo la prima di Pieroburgo, edizione nella quale Verdi scrisse la sinfonia, la ronda, nonchè il divino terzetto che chiude l'opera. Questo finale, anzi, fu lungamente pensato da Verdi cui non andava la catastrofica soluzione del romanzo che vedeva morti tutti i protagonisti, compreso Don Alvaro che si uccideva nonostante indossasse il saio da frate. Fu il Manzoni a parlarne col Maestro e la parola del grande scrittore che Verdi venerava e che chiamava il « santo », fu decisiva: colpito da paralisi il Piave, Verdi incaricò il Ghislanzoni, che già lavorava intorno ad Aida, di apportare i progettati ritocchi al libretto fra cui il terzetto finale, che conclude il dramma glorificando la volontà divina. E a questo finale si ricongiunge il significato drammatico dell'opera in cui la forza della fatalità inesorabile — un destino spagnolo, non greco, ed in piena esuberanza romantica — imprime quella intima tristezza e quell'anelito di poesia che, in un'atmosfera di religiosità, contraddistinguono il carattere musicale del dramma.

Dramma vario, complesso, ricco ed anche troppo, di personaggi e di avvenimenti a latere, ma forse per questo di largo interesse: qui nasce il nuovo personaggio verdiano, il personaggio sarcastico, grottesco, tristemente comico: Fra Melitone. Verdi, che intorno al '60 si preoccupava già dello stile e della tecnica, ritrova ancora la ispirazione travolgente e fiammeggiante del Trovatore e del Rigoletto, ma è già preoccupato dalle finezze stilistiche che in Traviata nacquero spontanee. Non rinunzia al dramma « impasticciato », ma in questa vastità di elementi drammatici vuole ritrarre dal vero il particolare, vuol tracciare il personaggio di scorcio, vuol dare un'anima al discorso strumentale. Fa, insomma capolino, la commedia nella tragedia, moderno modo di vedere la realtà della vita in cui accanto al dramma spunta il grottesco, l'umanità mediocre e meschina. Melitone, come Trabucco, sono espressioni di questa grettezza umana, anch'essa degna d'esser cantata come gli « eroi »: e la concione di Melitone nell'accampamento è non solo espressione d'arte moderna, ma presenta già gli elementi che avvieranno Verdi al superamento stilistico del Falstaff.

Ora Mitropulos ha compreso tutto questo da quel grande artista e musicista ed esteta che è: vale a dire superlativamente. Come superlativamente egli ha amalgamato l'orchestra, ne ha idealizzato i timbri, ha tradotto in linguaggio di pura musica gli accenti, eliminando ogni pausa artificiale ogni esteriore ed arbitraria frattura fra recitativo e canto, sottolineando i colori, ampliando i piani sonori, accendendo le tinte sino al rosso fuoco o smorzando i toni fino ai capillari, pianissimo, urlando di spasimo là dove il grido è disperatamente lanciato da Verdi o pregando sommesso e intenso là dove il sentimento sembra placarsi nella fede e tutto questo non per amore di originalità (ecco l'equivoco da evitare) ma perchè la partitura verdiana è musica, e delle più nobili, e va, quindi, tradotta in linguaggio musicale, con la unica, eterna, indistruttibile tecnica orchestrale e vocale concepibile nella musica. E', quindi, su questo piano di nobiltà e di espressività che Mitropulos ha fatto rivivere la complessa opera verdiana: del che gli siamo grati perchè è riuscito a portare sul piano della musicalità più vera — l'unica musicalità concepibile — orchestra, cori e cantanti. E ha dovuto vincere, ed in un tempo relativamente breve, grandi difficoltà e naturali reticenze: ma ha vinto e completamente, da quel veramente grande artista che egli è.

Accanto a lui Pabst ha spolverato con un gigantesco aspiratore elettrico, tutta le retorica melodrammatica legata ad una pseudotradizione che è soltanto pigrizia ed ignoranza. L'azione è stata resa umana, semplice, spontanea fin dove era possibile; ed i quadri d'assieme mossi radicalmente, vale a dire spezzando la massa corale in gruppi e gruppetti, facendo muovere tutti con senso individuale, colorendo il quadro in atteggiamenti che per essere naturali non erano meno estetici; curando gli effetti di luce con gusto da pittore e insieme con intenti da drammaturgo: in una parola portando nel teatro lirico quel senso della minuzia espressiva che è legge nel cinema.

Per ottenere questo egli ha molto provato, e soprattutto con piena, alta autorità: del che va nuovamente lode a Francesco Siciliani che ha offerto le possibilità necessarie a creare un così espressivo, nuovo e realmente bello spettacolo di arte.

Al quale non era possibile arrivare senza l'apporto prezioso di cantanti come Renata Tebaldi (ideale Leonora, un incanto vero e grande per stupefacente bellezza di voce, arte di canto, sensibilità d'artista) Fedora Barbieri (voce d'una potenza pari alla morbidezza, cantante d'una rara bravura) Mario del Monaco (voce stentorea nel buon senso della parola, e bella e voluminosa e squillante e facile) e Cesare Siepi (la più pastosa e armoniosa voce di basso che oggi si possa sentire, con in più una musicalità di canto assai poco frequente). Ma anche gli altri interpreti erano a posto: Aldo Protti, quale Carlo (Mascherini è stato all'ultimo momento sostituito per una indisposizione) quell'intelligentissimo artista che è Renato Capecchi quale Melitone d'una misura pari alla penetrazione drammatica, lo ottimo Piero di Palma che ha disegnato con grazia umoristica la figura di Trabucco, e Silvio Majonica e il Finessi. Un bravo di cuore meritano il maestro dei cori, Andrea Morosini (che l'incontentabile Mitropulos, soddisfatto, abbracciava chiamandolo « caro Morosini ») la coreografa Nives Poli, e il bravo Caliterna direttore dello allestimento, che ha realizzato le scene di Franco Lolli con grande equilibrio scenico. Scene originali, soprattutto funzionali, come quelle della taverna, della chiesa e del convento, e specie quella dell'accampamento.

Insomma, questa edizione costituisce un grande merito del Maggio e vorremmo che fosse vista da molti, soprattutto da quanti amano il teatro lirico e che meritano, una volta tanto, un segno di affetto e di attenzione: ed ai quali il Maggio ha dimostrato che si può creare del bello e del nuovo nel segno del più ortodosso rispetto verso le opere d'arte. Purchè a realizzare questo compito ci sia gente sensibile ed intelligente.

ORCHESTRA'S 111TH YEAR

Philharmonic Gives Wide Service in Long Season

By OLIN DOWNES

THE conclusion of the New York Philharmonic - Symphony Society's 111th season, and the number of programs, the number of conductors, the number of compositions new and old which it gave in that period, are emphatic of several things. One is the enormous productivity of the Society, and the immensity of the service it does its public. Another is the fact that it is practically impossible for any one or two conductors to prepare and direct its concerts through an entire season. A third is that New York's one great resident orchestra has the field in this city too much to itself.

The inadequacy of a single orchestra satisfying the symphonic needs of a city of New York's population is partly balanced by the annual visits of two of the other greatest orchestras of the nation, the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra, which give a total of thirty concerts a season here, ten by the Philadelphia Orchestra, and ten pairs of concerts by the Boston Symphony. But it is unfortunate that New York has not at least two symphony orchestras of its own, which could share the burden of local symphonic production and healthily compete with each other for public favor.

Wealth of Music

Before budgetary conditions compelled the two New York orchestras to amalgamate in 1927, they provided a wealth of symphonic music which the public cheerfully absorbed. But there were immense deficits to be faced each season. Ideally, a city of New York's population should be able to support enough orchestras to afford us concerts of greater variety of attraction than is the case today. Only the Little Orchestra Society now offers programs that differ interestingly from the more or less standard repertoire of the Big Three that we hear season in and season out. Steadily increasing costs of symphonic performance contract this field as they do those of most other arts, and the public is the loser thereby.

Meanwhile, the Philharmonic-Symphony Society gallantly shoulders its burden, and the season just concluded is no exception to that rule. In this season Dmitri Mitropoulos conducted forty-three of the subscription concerts and two of the out-of-town concerts. Illness, brought on by Mr. Mitropoulos' prodigious labors, compelled him to give up his work for some weeks. This resulted in a greater number of guest conductors appearing with the orchestra than has been customary.

Guest Conductors

The conductors originally engaged to alternate their services with those of Mr. Mitropoulos were Bruno Walter, George Szell and Guido Cantelli. Added to these were Vladimir Golschmann, Efrem Kurtz and Igor Stravinsky, who conducted a program of his own works. Mr. Walter conducted twelve subscription concerts and a Pension Fund concert, Mr. Szell fourteen and the Pension Fund benefit at which Vladimir Horowitz celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his American debut with the Philharmonic — then the Philharmonic and not the Philharmonic-Symphony. Mr. Cantelli conducted fourteen subscription concerts, Mr. Golschmann eight, Mr. Kurtz three, Mr. Stravinsky three, and associate conductor Franco Autori one.

Major works which called for the services of vocalists and chorus as well as orchestra were Darius Milhaud's "Christoph Colomb," after the poetic play of Paul Claudel, given its first performance in America by Mitropoulos; scenes from "Boris Godunoff," in the Rimsky-Korsakoff version, sung in English, under the same conductor; Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," the Bruckner Te Deum and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, by Mr. Walter; the second half of Strauss' "Salome," by Mr. Szell; the first American performance by Mr. Cantelli of Ghedini's "Concerto of the Albatross," a symphonic work with narrator based upon Melville's "Moby Dick."

World Premieres

There were three world premières: Arthur Berger's "Ideas of Order," Louis Gesenway's "A Double Portrait," and George Rochberg's "Night Music," which won the eighth annual Gershwin Memorial Prize. Seven works were done for the first time in America: Ferguson's Concerto for piano and string orchestra; Gabrieli-Ghedini's "La battaglia"; Martin's Violin Concerto; Milhaud"s Christoph Colomb"; a symphony by Mozart (as alleged by Mr. Cantelli himself, who produced it, but a symphony of which the authorship, in the light of its performance, remains very suspect, and a symphony believed not to be by Mozart at all by considerably more authoritative Mozart scholars than Mr. Cantelli); Pizzetti's "Preludio a un altro giorno," and Gottfried von Einem's "Orchestermusik."

First performances in New York were of Berg's "Three Orchestral Pieces"; Berlioz' song cycle, "Nuits d'été"; the Brahms-Leinsdorf choral-prelude, "O God, Thou Holiest"; Martinu's Concerto for 'Cello and Orchestra; Roussel's Piano Concerto, Schoenberg's Violin Concerto.

It cannot be said that any one of the novelties represented music of new and original tendency. In sheer bulk and also in modernity of accent Milhaud's vast and very difficult score, originally designed for performance with cinema, towered highest. The Schoenberg Violin Concerto is in that composer's advanced idiom, and offered no essentially new departure by the master of atonality. The Ghedini "Concerto of the Albatross" proved as empty as its pretensions were vast. The Ferguson Piano Concerto was weak to a degree. Gottfried von Einem's "Orchestermusik" was one of the best of the new works.

Quality of Novelties

Mr. Berger's piece was not heard by this writer, and other novelties that he did not hear were received with a varying measure of approval or the opposite by other reviewers. It is perfectly true, of course, that in any year or period the number of transitory pieces produced is enormously greater than the number of works which remain in the repertoire. But the list of novelties of the Philharmonic-Symphony's last season proved exceptionally poor in fresh material. Its items, in general, seem to point to the prevailing mood of restlessness, lack of direction or creative conviction that the works of so many contemporary composers show, on both sides of the water. In this situation it may be said the young American composers as a group show as much or more creative impulse than is displayed by the great majority of their European colleagues.

SOTTO LA BACCHETTA DI MITROPOULOS

Una «Forza del destino» nuova senza scandali e senza «polvere teatrale»

Uno spettacolo d'eccezione: per il direttore d'orchestra, per il complesso dei cantanti, per la regìa di Pabst - I personaggi si sono mossi in un clima ottocentesco, quasi garibaldino

Si è avuto la vaga impressione nei giorni che hanno preceduto la «prima» della «Forza del destino» allestita ieri sera dal «Maggio», che questo spettacolo avrebbe fatto parlare molto di sè malgrado il fatto che la grandiosa opera verdiana non sia davvero una «novità». I nomi famosi degli interpreti, chiamati a raccolta dal «Maggio», hanno indubbiamente incuriosito anche quelli che sono propensi a considerare le manifestazioni musicali fiorentine come una serie di spettacoli da iniziati: se a Firenze fanno la «Forza del destino», deve aver detto qualcuno di loro, ci deve essere qualcosa sotto; la manipoleranno, faranno delle scene «futuriste», cambieranno lo «stacco» di tutti i tempi, faranno nascondere i coristi dietro le scene... Invece, nulla di questo: uno spettacolo, sì, di grande linea, una rappresentazione che ha fatto entusiasmare il pubblico (accorso in folla al Comunale), ma che ha troncato in bocca le argomentazioni preventive di quelli che avevano scritto (anche su qualche giornale del nord) che la «Forza del destino» di Firenze sarebbe stata uno scandalo o qualcosa di simile.

Quando si ha la possibilità di ascoltare un'opera in una edizione come quella che ieri sera ha diretto Dimitri Mitropoulos si resta un po' sconcertati: perchè un capolavoro che si credeva tutti di conoscere ci appare in modo nuovo, come un meraviglioso mobile antico che ha subìto una spolveratura. Talvolta verrebbe la voglia di domandarsi, per eccesso di scrupolo, se qualcosa non sia cambiato davvero, se l'artista interprete non si sia lasciato prendere la mano da una volontà di «restauro» e addirittura di «ricostruzione». Ma poi, man mano che l'opera d'arte mostra la sua chiarezza interna (e rivela anche le sue debolezze, e le sue meravigliose profondità espressive) ci accorgiamo che non è cambiato nulla: che si è trattato soltanto di una rispettosa, amorevole rispolveratura. Di polvere ne è cascata, fin dal tempo di Verdi, sulle opere del grande musicista: non la polvere delle biblioteche, che spesso conserva intatti gli originali, ma la polvere dei teatri, con le loro consuetudini, i loro arbitri, la loro tendenza a venire incontro al gusto personale dei cantanti, magari con l'illusione di fare un piacere al pubblico. Verdi stesso, ai suoi tempi, con tutta la sua natura di uomo di teatro, aveva avvertito e sperimentato i pericoli di questa «polvere» teatrale; ed aveva reagito con violenza.

La «Forza del destino», che ha una costruzione che la rende quasi un'opera smontabile («absit iniuria verbis»!), che è musica viva ma anche «spettacolo», ha subìto spesso le conseguenze di una tendenza interpretativa esasperatamente romantica che, mettendo in luce le punte liriche del dramma, i suoi accenti più sconvolgenti, le sue «forme chiuse», ha contribuito a rendere quest'opera più disunita di quello che effettivamente è. La caratteristica forse più evidente dell'interpretazione musicale di Mitropoulos è proprio l'aver preso la «Forza del destino» in blocco; senza insistere dove sarebbe stato più facile gravare l'accento espressivo, senza dimenticare i momenti di minore temperatura drammatica. Di qui quell'inpressione di lindore, come di un'opera riscoperta a tanti anni di distanza da uno che non conosce le «arie celebri» e le «celebri melodie», e che guarda soltanto la musica.

Lo spirito dell'interpretazione di Mitropoulos ha richiamato certi atteggiamenti di Toscanini. E questo mostra la statura morale ed artistica del grande direttore che non è stato qui l'esaltato e terribile vivificatore di «Wozzek», non il sensuale animatore di «Elettra». Il Mitropoulos dionisiaco di Mahler e di Scriabin ha cercato qui, in umiltà, di non mettere in mostra uno dei lati più appariscenti della sua personalità; ed è riuscito, senza venir meno ad un fuoco interiore, a svelare tanti particolari che sembravano nascosti e sepolti: con la semplicità che è propria dei grandi artisti.

Potrà sembrare inutile sottolineare il fatto che Mitropoulos è forse oggi uno dei più prodigiosi tecnici della direzione d'orchestra, e che la sua natura e la sua musicalità hanno qualcosa che potrebbe essere detto anche «disumano». Ma è certo che ieri gli scatti dell'orchestra, l'elasticità di un ritmo poderoso (che non è mai dato dal metronomo), la morbidezza non sensuale dei «tremolati», l'espressività degli accompagnamenti più consueti, il cantare pulito ma sempre sicuro dei cantanti (sostenuti dalla mano vigile di Mitropoulos, ma lasciati liberi di esprimersi), hanno dato all'interpretazione della «Forza del destino» un marchio inconfondibile.

Eccezionale per la presenza di Mitropoulos, senza dubbio, questo spettacolo verdiano del «Maggio»; ma non meno eccezionale, per restare nella parte più strettamente musicale della rappresentazione, la presenza di una così efficiente compagnia di cantanti. Renata Tebaldi, che è la nostra più bella voce di soprano, ha cantato con quella purezza di linea che la distingue da ogni altra cantante del nostro tempo; la sua voce e la sua musicalità sono tali che quasi si potrebbe fare a meno di vederla nelle sue capacità di attrice accorta ed intelligente. Fedora Barbieri, nella non facile caratterizzazione di Preziosilla, è stata cantante ed attrice di doti non comuni: la sua sembrava essere una gioia quasi sensuale di canto, senza esitazioni, ma sempre con stile musicalissimo. Mario Del Monaco, il celebre tenore che era assente dalle nostre scene da diversi anni, non è stato inferiore alla sua fama: la sua voce robusta e ricca di armonici anche nel registro grave, il suo spigliato modo di muoversi sulla scena, hanno rievocato negli animi dei più anziani le emozioni dei celebri tenori di «altri tempi». Molto espressivo nella parte di Don Carlo di Vargas, il baritono Aldo Protti, che ha sostituito poche ore prima dello spettacolo il baritono Enzo Mascherini gravemente indisposto.

Una suggestiva figura di Padre guardiano è stata creata dal basso Cesare Siepi, con la sua splendida voce e la sua intelligenza di attore. Vivace e gustosa la figura di Fra Melitone, nell'interpretazione di Renato Capecchi. Di ottimo livello anche le figure minori, realizzate da Angela Vergelli (Curra), Giorgio Giorgetti (un Alcade), Piero di Palma (Mastro Trabuco) Walter Finessi (un chirurgo) e l'ottimo Silvio Majonica nella parte del Marchese di Calabraca.

Il coro, diretto da Andrea Morosini, ha dato ieri sera una buona prova delle sue possibilità, soprattutto nei momenti di minore impegno scenico. Ottimo, ad esempio, nell'applauditissimo brano della «Vergine degli Angeli».

L'alto livello della veste musicale ha avuto un complemento di grande rilievo anche nella regìa di tutta l'opera. Pabst, quando fu chiamato a Firenze, pare che abbia esposto la sua idea di riportare la «Forza del destino» ai nostri tempi: e non lo deve aver detto certamente per fare la solita cosa «originale», ma perché convinto che il libretto, in sè abbastanza povero malgrado il numero dei personaggi e la vivacità delle sue ambientazioni spagnolesche, si sarebbe prestato — senza danno della musica — ad uno spettacolo moderno. L'idea di Pabst poteva essere discutibile, soprattutto da un punto di vista musicale; ma i risultati sarebbero stati senza dubbio di un interesse veramente eccezionale. Ma questo non è stato possibile, anche perché la modernità ricercata da Pabst era stata fatta passare da alcuni come una cosa addirittura dell'era atomica, con tanto di turboreattori e di aerei radiocomandati. E allora si è ripiegato su un concetto più tradizionale.

Pabst non ha mostrato, del resto, di essere imbarazzato anche in questa visione più ortodossa dell'opera verdiana, e ha lasciato ugualmente la sua impronta in tutto lo spettacolo. Aboliti i costumi «alla moschettiera», che tanto piacciono ai nostri tenori, tutti i personaggi si son venuti a muovere in un clima ottocentesco, e potremmo dire quasi garibaldino, malgrado l'ambiente spagnolo: ma i movimenti scenici hanno acquistato tutti in chiarezza. Si è avuto l'illusione (finalmente) di vedere il coro che canta anche senza guardare la platea, di assistere ad una animata e realistica commedia in cui l'occhio dello spettatore coglieva subito i «primi piani» e i «fondi», ma in relazione allo svolgimento psicologico del dramma. Efficaci, in questo senso, anche i bozzetti di Franco Lolli che hanno dato utile materiale alle suggestioni sceniche volute dal regista.

Una nota vivace, nei limiti del buon gusto, è stata data a tutto lo spettacolo anche dalle coreografie di Nives Poli.

Non si può passare sotto silenzio, nella manifestazione di ieri sera, la prova veramente eccellente dell'archestra; organismo perfetto per fusione e per bravura di solisti.

La cronaca della serata è stata fra le più liete di questo «Maggio» musicale. L'impressionante, e veramente toscaniniana esecuzione della «sinfonia», ha elettrizzato il pubblico che gremiva ogni ordine di posti. Applausi interminabili, tolvolta a scena aperta, hanno salutato i principali interpreti dell'opera che sono stati chiamati molte volte alla ribalta.

Durante un intervallo dell'opera il Sindaco di Firenze prof. Giorgio La Pira si è recato ad esprimere le sue felicitazioni e i suoi ringraziamenti al M.o Mitropoulos, a Pabst e a tutti gli interpreti dell'opera.

LEONARDO PINZAUTI

Nel camerino del celebre direttore d'orchestra il fotografo ha colto Renata Tebaldi, in abito virile, mentre riceve i complimenti di Mitropoulos. «Ma maestro — diceva la soprano — specialmente con questo vestito dovrei essere io a baciare la mano a lei!»

CURIOSITA' DEL MONDO MUSICALE

Il rosario di Mitropoulos e un'avventura di Morosini

Mitropoulos è nato nel 1896 ad Atene; ma studiò con Busoni e Gilson a Berlino. E' un tipo interessantissimo di uomo, oltre che di artista. Fra i grandi è uno di quelli che ho trovato più cordiali: segno questo di salute fisica e spirituale veramente eccellente. A parlare con lui ci si accorge che ha letto molto, ha studiato con tenacia, ha assimilato profondamente la nostra cultura. Ma, in fondo, malgrado la sua dimestichezza col mondo germanico e poi con quello americano, Mitropoulos è restato un greco, un orientale. Anche la sua figura, soprattutto la sua faccia, ha qualcosa di classico, e talvolta anche di monacale. Il suo profilo richiama alla mente quello di Savonarola.

Da qualche tempo Mitropoulos porta in tasca un bellissimo e pesante rosario greco, con i nodi scolpiti a mano uno ad uno, di un bel colore rosso scuro. Ogni tanto, durante gli intervalli delle prove, o quando sta conversando, Mitropoulos prende il suo rosario e comincia a girarselo fra le mani, quasi con abilità. Molti debbono avergli domandato la storia di questa sua abitudine; ed egli la racconta senza enfasi, e senza l'aria di voler apparire originale. «In casa mia ci sono stati diversi monaci del monte Athos: più di recente un mio zio e mio padre stesso, quando rimase solo perchè io ero in Germania, si chiusero nel monastero del monte Athos. Lassù i monaci portano questi rosari bellissimi; e questo che ho io mi è stato regalato. Io fumavo molto, tanto che i medici mi hanno consigliato di smettere; e allora quando mi trovo nelle condizioni di desiderare di fumare, prendo il mio rosario, mi ricordo che non posso, e cerco di allontanare da me questa tentazione».

L'Italia è ancora greca

Mitropoulos sta volentieri in Italia, perchè l'Italia è l'unico paese — dice — che è ancora greco nel senso classico del termine. In Grecia ci sono stati per troppo tempo i turchi, e tutto o quasi è cambiato. L'Italia è ancora il «paese degli dei», la patria dell'arte mediterranea. Quanto al termine «dionisiaco», usato dai critici per delineare un aspetto saliente della sua personalità, egli lo considera un complimento: «Dionisio — dice ridendo — era un mio compatriota...».

Come è noto Mitropoulos ha una memoria prodigiosa, che gli permette di presentarsi davanti alle orchestre di tutto il mondo senza la partitura. Comunque non crede ai miracoli della memoria e studia molto con una metodicità quasi tedesca. A Firenze è ospite di amici americani, in una villa sul viale Michelangelo, e si alza prestissimo; se esce va direttamente al Comunale, e torna alla villa in automobile. Non è tipo da salotti mondani, anche se è un piacevolissimo conversatore; e forse è rimasta in lui, la tendenza atavica ad una vita equilibrata, da monaco. Anche lui, quando aveva sedici anni, aveva deciso di ritirarsi sul monte Athos. «Poi mi decisi per la musica — dice — e credo di aver fatto meglio, secondo la mia attitudine».

Non ho mai sentito Mitropoulos dir male di qualcuno. Questo è un vero miracolo nel mondo dell'arte. Di Toscanini parla con venerazione, anche quando possono essergli dispiaciuti certi recenti atteggiamenti del grande direttore di orchestra contro artisti del nostro tempo.

Le malefatte del cannone

Mi è stata raccontata ieri un'avventura del maestro Morosini. Non tutti sanno che il maestro del coro dirige, nascosto dietro le quinte, le masse a lui affidate; «riporta la battuta» quando il coro canta dietro le scene, e aiuta il direttore d'orchestra quando il coro è in scena e canta in condizioni sfavorevoli di visibilità. Per questo il maestro Morosini, in camicia e corpetto, sta appollaiato su una specie di seggiolone metallico alto da terra un paio di metri. Durante una rappresentazione di «Guerra e pace» anche il maestro Morosini rischiò di andare alla guerra contro Napoleone.

Sul palcoscenico del Comunale si moveva qualche centinaio di persone; ad un certo momento, quando un gruppo di comparse doveva entrare in scena trainando un grosso cannone di legno, e tutti si erano già messi in posa, con gli occhi a terra per far finta di durare più fatica, una ruota del cannone rimase impigliata nel seggiolone del M.o Morosini. Il maestro del coro si sentì tentennare per un po', poi si accorse addirittura di camminare anche lui insieme alle artiglierie: reggendosi più che poteva, cercava di chiamare con gli epiteti più gentili i baldi cannonieri che lo volevano portare in scena. Fu un mezzo minuto di preoccupazione, perchè Morosini non si poteva mettere a gridare, e c'era da vederlo catapultare — in camicia e corpetto — sulla scena, alla vista di tutti. Per buona fortuna ci fu qualcuno che si accorse del fatto, e il «fuori programma» fu evitato. Ed ora ogni tanto c'è qualcuno che ripete al M.o Morosini la frase del regista Bassi che vedendo il suo amico in quelle non felici condizioni gli aveva detto: «Reggiti, Andrea, sennò ti portano alla guerra anche te!».

Fedora Barbieri è stata una bravissima Preziosilla. Mitropoulos si è congratulato spesso con lei per la sua voce e la sua abilità scenica

UNO SPETTACOLO CHE RESTERÀ MEMORABILE

LA "FORZA DEL DESTINO„ STASERA AL MAGGIO MUSICALE

Il direttore d'orchestra è Dimitri Mitropoulos, il regista P. W. Pabst, i cantanti sono Del Monaco, Siepi, la Tebaldi, la Barbieri, Mascherini - La "tradizione„ di Verdi

Per dirigere la «Forza del destino» di Verdi il «Maggio» ha chiamato il celeberrimo Dimitri Mitropoulos; la regìa dello spettacolo è stata affidata ad un nome fra i più grandi nella storia della cinematografia, G. W. Pabst; e i cantanti (tutti italiani questi) sono stati chiamati anche molto da lontano, come il tenore Mario Del Monaco, giunto in aereo dall'America, pur di ottenere una «compagnia di canto» veramente di eccezione: oltre a Del Monaco, partecipano alla rappresentazione artisti di fama mondiale come il basso Cesare Siepi, la soprano Renata Tebaldi, la mezzosoprano Fedora Barbieri e il baritono Enzo Mascherini. Questa dovrebbe essere quindi un'edizione «da disco», almeno per quel che riguarda la parte musicale; e forse anche «da televisione», se Pabst continua ad essere in teatro quello che è nel cinematografo. (Ma la televisione non è ancora in atto, fra noi, e il «Maggio» potrà servirsene fra qualche anno soltanto.....).

Il M.o Francesco Siciliani, direttore artistico del «Maggio», è convinto che questo spettacolo sarà ricordato per molto tempo; e ha voluto, di accordo con Mitropoulos, che questa «Forza del destino» sia un'edizione completa, senza i soliti «tagli» che vengono fatti per «alleggerire» lo spettacolo, e che poi lo rendono più povero. D'altra parte Siciliani è convinto che un artista della statura di Mitropoulos darà un'edizione «vergine», attendibile soprattutto da un punto di vista musicale: perchè Siciliani non crede a certe fantomatiche «tradizioni», tanto care ai nazionalisti nostrani (e ce ne sono parecchi di questi anche fra i musicisti). La «tradizione» delle opere verdiane è come quella delle opere di tanti altri autori. Se i musicisti tedeschi si fossero rammaricati di Marinuzzi, di Guarnieri, di Toscanini — mirabili interpreti delle opere di Wagner, e musicisti fra i più italiani come indole — ed avessero evitato di affidar loro gli spettacoli di Bayreuth, non soltanto avrebbero mostrato un gretto spirito nazionalistico, ma si sarebbero privati proprio di alcune delle più attendibili edizioni delle opere di Wagner (per citare un autore senza dubbio fra i più germanici).

Proprio il M.o Tullio Serafin, considerato non a torto uno dei più illustri continuatori della tradizione lirica italiana, ad un ammiratore che era andato da lui a congratularsi perchè aveva concertato l'«Aroldo» come vuole la tradizione di Verdi» disse: «La tradizione? Mai conosciuta. La tradizione non esiste; esiste lo stile. Io credo di conoscerlo, e per questo si parla della tradizione verdiana. Ma esiste anche la «tradizione» di Mozart, di Gluck, di Weber: e per interpretarli basta essere musicisti, e conoscere appunto il loro «stile». Il resto son tutte illusioni».

Per fortuna il pubblico che stasera ascolterà la «Forza del destino» concertata e diretta da Mitropoulos non si porrà, in genere, il problema di questa «tradizione», e il celebre direttore non farà dimenticare a nessuno la grandezza di Verdi: anche perchè la sua «tradizione» non potrà essere mai quella delle licenze dei cantanti.

I pochi che hanno potuto assistere alle prove di Mitropoulos si sono convinti che per un direttore di questa forza non possono esistere limitazioni di «generi». Mitropoulos ha affrontato il problema di questa eccezionale realizzazione della «Forza del destino» con un ardore particolarissimo, e non lo nasconde a nessuno. Non ha voluto le prove «di lettura» con la sola orchestra, e ha preparato prima tutti i cantanti: poi ha cominciato la «concertazione» vera e propria, in teatro, con tutti i cantanti, con l'orchestra e col coro. Perchè per lui non esiste un palcoscenico signore a priori dell'orchestra: il suo teatro si muove come una grande partitura, come una sinfonia che ha voci e strumenti, che cantano compatti o in drammatica lotta.

Un gruppo di cantanti d'eccezione: sono gli interpreti della «Forza del destino» di Verdi che andrà in scena stasera al «Comunale» di Firenze. Da sinistra: Fedora Barbieri, Mario del Monaco, Cesare Siepi, Renato Tebaldi ed Enzo Mascherini

Eppure non bisogna credere che Mitropoulos si comporti con la «Forza del destino» con lo stesso spirito con cui dirigerebbe un'opera sinfonica moderna, o l'«Elettra» di Strauss. «Di Verdi mi ha colpito — disse l'altra sera durante un intervallo delle prove — soprattutto la verginità: e c'è tutto, c'è indicato tutto in questa partitura, quando il direttore deve soltanto «agire» e quando deve «reagire». Ed io mi sento di fronte a questa musica come uno che si innamora per la prima volta».

Con la regìa di Pabst, che ha ambientato l'opera di Verdi nel clima romantico che le è proprio (ma che avrebbe potuto fare una cosa degna della sua fantasia anche se avesse inteso, come era corso voce, spostare la vicenda ai tempi moderni, con carri armati, autoambulanze, aeroplani ecc.), lo spettacolo di stasera ha quindi più di un motivo di interesse. Mitropoulos, l'altra sera, finì la prova una ventina di minuti prima del tempo stabilito dai contratti: lo fece perchè non aveva più nulla da dire, e non voleva stancare nè i cantanti nè gli orchestrali. Quando si avviava verso l'uscita del teatro (senza partitura e senza bacchetta: perchè prova a memoria, e si fida solo delle sue lunghe braccia) disse, come se parlasse fra sè: «Che peccato smettere così presto: starei a sentir quest'opera per delle serate. Perchè, fra l'altro, questa volta non debbo arrabbiarmi con i cantanti: è tanto bello stare ad ascoltarli... son tutti così bravi...». Mitropoulos, il direttore «dionisiaco», sa essere anche un uomo semplice.

LEONARDO PINZAUTI

Una grande edizione della «Forza del destino»

Il capolavoro verdiano ha ottenuto il più lusinghiero successo nella cornice del "Maggio Musicale Fiorentino„

Chi ha scritto il secondo atto della Forza del destino non ha più bisogno di avvocati difensori. Non ne ha più bisogno in nessun caso: anche se incorre, subito dopo, nella enigmatica disavventura di far seguito con un terzo atto misterioso ed inesplicabile. Perchè, veramente, nessuna retorica verdiana — o, meglio, dei verdiani — può salvare questo atto dallo stupore e dalla irritazione che seguono invincibili al precipitare repentino dalla gigantesca poesia che è

Il soprano Renata Tebaldi

nella scena del convento e della vestizione — dove Verdi ha trovato, fra l'altro, una verità di accenti mistici a lui non soliti — alla riuscita complessiva da operetta che, malgrado qualche saporosa pennellata, è la cifra irreparabile di questo atto (quasi tutto, del resto, molto pleonastico e ancor più dispersivo e controproducente).

Peccato! La Forza del destino è un poliorama che sfaccetta il prisma della vita secondo la visione che ne ebbe Verdi, e poco male se questa visione si traduce ed esprime nell'arco serrato e conseguente di una sintesi univoca oppure nell'indugio e nelle pause di un gusto — per così dire — apolittico. La Forza del destino appartiene a tale seconda categoria di opere, e tutto andrebbe bene se la forza tellurica che Verdi scatena nell'esplorazione e nella denunzia degli affetti primigeni ed elementari dell'uomo, oppure il sarcasmo e l'umorismo musicale che tratteggiano bravamente alcune «macchie», o quadretti di genere, che sono nella Forza, si fossero distesi ed avessero investito l'opera intera. Questo non è avvenuto. Ed è cosa che non si scopre certamente qui per la prima volta, ma che si ripete per l'agevolezza di giudizio su alcuni aspetti della presente edizione.

La regia, per esempio. Posta la disuguaglianza artistica e di stile dell'opera, còmpito della regia doveva, ovviamente, esser quello, una volta riconosciuta la particolare costituzione dell'opera, di estendere alle zone neutre o grige, il soccorso di vitalità e di colore delle altre; di quelle, cioè, privilegiate. Ci è sembrato, invece, che al regista Pabst, l'idea di una coerenza interiore ed unificante dello spettacolo non s'è accompagnata alla felicità di alcuni momenti. Momenti, e non «trovate», chè il guaio sta appunto qui: nelle «trovate» cui — secondo quel che si è sentito dire — parrebbe che i registi di provenienza «cine» siano particolarmente sensibili e commovibili.

Di valore ed approprietezza disuguali anche le scene di Franco Lolli. Calda e vivace l'ambientazione cervantina dell'osteria spagnola, al I atto, e gustosa anche quella del chiostro, nel 1.o quadro dell'ultimo atto.

Non altrettanto l'irta e manierata scena finale. Ma dove l'eccellenza altissima di questa edizione del Maggio non può temere paragoni è nel complesso degl'interpreti. Una schiera di assi della vocalità e della scena, cui, più delle solite e banali lodi, è sufficiente un semplice elenco: Renata Tebaldi, Mario Del Monaco, Cesare Siepi, Aldo Protti (che all'ultimo momento ha sostituito Enzo Mascherini indisposto), Fedora Barbieri, Renato Capecchi, Silvio Maionica. Tutti in forma stupenda, e su tutti la voce regale e impareggiabile di Renata Tebaldi.

Al vasto successo dello spettacolo hanno gagliardamente contribuito il solerte ed energico Morosini col suo coro, la coreografia di Nives Poli, l'allestimento scenico dell'impetuoso ed estroso Caliterna, l'invisibile Margarito, con le sue sensibili musiche di scena; gli altri tutti. A Dimitri Mitropoulos, infaticabile e magnifico animatore di scena ed orchestra, all'orchestra, superiore ad ogni elogio, ai cantanti e agl'interpreti tutti, il pubblico ha manifestato con prorompenti e ripetute ovazioni il proprio, incontenibile entusiasmo.

VIVO SUCCESSO DE «LA FORZA DEL DESTINO»

Niente più d'un'opera di repertorio eccita la fantasia registica e scenografica, intendiamo un'opera che per un complesso di convenzioni, via via liberamente accettate, abbia assunto una tradizionale cifra rappresentativa. Di tale stimolo della fantasia fa parte pure l'opinione quasi generale che il melodramma dell'Ottocento, e in particolare quello verdiano, sia il melodramma per eccellenza, quello che contiene in sè tutti i requisiti avvincenti l'attenzione dello spettatore, quali possono indicarsi nelle passioni violente, nell'accentuato colore ambientale, nel forte contrasto degli avvenimenti.

Non fa dunque meraviglia che l'opera di repertorio sia posta quasi come un problema, un terrfine di prova su cui si misura la capacità di chi lo affronta. Oggi, poi, che il teatro lirico si trova impegnato in una più o meno confessata gara con il cinematografo, indirizzando le sue mire a compiti e resultati anzitutto visivi, ancor più si comprende tale impegno di «aggiornare» il termine «rappresentazione», magari a scapito o in modo contraddittorio con gli altri due, «parola-musica», che insieme costituiscono appunto la essenza formale del melodramma. Finchè fantasia e senso dello spettacolo nel regista e nel bozzettista concordano per approfondire caratteri specifici dell'opera, per mettere in luce quanto la tradizionale messa in scena aveva lasciato in ombra, trascurato o svisato, la nuova visione che ne deriva di necessità si giustifica da se stessa. Ma se tale intento si determina tutto nella risoluzione di problemi di pura regia interpretando gli avvenimenti dell'azione a mero pretesto spettacolare, la nuova visione anzichè chiarire confonde, giacchè fra i tre termini in cui il melodramma consiste, un organico accordo viene a mancare. Ed è ciò che almeno in parte si può rimproverare a quest'opera verdiana nella regia di Georg Wilhelm Pabst e nei bozzetti di Franco Lolli, dove, pur nella singolare efficacia di alcuni momenti presi per se stessi — come ad esempio la prima scena della Stanza o quella del Forte — la rappresentazione non riesce persuasiva.

«La forza del destino» non è la «Carmen»; con i costumi, come altresì con certe ambientazioni scenografiche, non si fondono, in questa edizione, gli aspetti vitali dell'opera stessa, quello ad esempio dell'episodio mistico notturno nel Convento, troppo arbitrariamente interpretato con una «trovata» che, in odio alla convenzione, riesce d'una improprietà a tutto danno della presenza di quella stupenda musica. Nè una maggiore veridicità storica nè una più profonda universalità di significato artistico-umano possono resultarne. Inevitabile, da ciò, che l'intera impostazione registica abbia ad oscillare incerta fra una staticità di «quadro» ed una cercata ma non attuata animazione di movimento.

Necessario in primo luogo rilevare che «La forza del destino» ha avuto nel concertatore e direttore Dimitri Mitropulos, nel complesso dei cantanti solisti, nell'orchestra e nel coro istruito da Andrea Morosini, interpreti in tutto degni dell'opera e del Maggio Musicale. Cura precipua di Mitropulos quella d'accentuare i particolari caratteri delle singole scene: caratteri nervosamente incisivi quelli per le scene di ambiente, volta a volta fluidi e veementi quelli per le scene passionali — così da imporre nella omogenea varietà dell'esecuzione ciò che costituisce il vitale fondamento dell'arte di Verdi. In Renata Tebaldi un'esauriente potenza di espressione ha avuto «donna Leonora», nel suo canto così ricco di patos, di accenti disperati e di supplice speranza ultraterrena; i personaggi di «don Carlo» e di «don Alvaro», rispettivamente nell'esperta arte di Aldo Protti (che ha sostituito Enzo Mascherini, indisposto) e di Mario Del Monaco hanno palesato tutta la propria drammatica musicale verità, come ancora quelli di «Preziosilla» in Fedora Barbieri, del «Padre guardiano» in Cesare Siepi, di «Fra Melitone» nel Capecchi si sono imposti con evidente efficacia.

Pure le parti minori hanno contribuito alla solidità dell'insieme, dove i momenti coreografici di Nives Poli e l'allestimento scenico di Piero Caliterna hanno suscitato giusta ammirazione.

La moltitudine degli spettatori si è ancora una volta sentita accesa d'entusiasmo per questo che è uno fra i più popolari spartiti nostri, ed ha applaudito con fervore il maestro Mitropulos, acclamato dopo la esecuzione della sinfonia, i principali cantanti, anche a scena aperta, chiamandoli assieme a lui ad ogni fine d'atto.

VIRGILIO DOPLICHER

Giuseppe Verdi rinnovato da Mitropulos e da Palzt

Trionfo al Comunale della "Forza del Destino„

Dopo opere nuove o rare è giunta sulla ribalta del Comunale un'opera di repertorio: di Verdi, naturalmente, e tra le sue più note: quella «Forza del Destino», che, rappresentata per la prima volta a Pietroburgo il 10 novembre 1862, ebbe il suo battesimo definitivo, nella sua forma attuale, alla Scala nel 1869.

Con i suoi indiscutibili pregi e certi difetti, imputabili quasi tutti alla macchinosità del libretto, quest'opera è però una di quelle su cui «non ci piove piu'», come si dice in gergo teatrale, sul cui valore, insomma, sarebbe fuori luogo discutere ormai.

Tutta l'attenzione si sposta dunque sull'esecuzione. E per un Maggio musicale, si è voluto avere non una «Forza del Destino» qualunque, ma una che presentava veramente i caratteri della eccezionalità.

Così sono stati convocati alcuni dei nostri piu' celebri cantanti a sostenere le parti principali e secondarie, quali Renata Tebaldi (Leonora) Fedora Barbieri (Preziosilla). Mario Del Monaco (Don Alvaro) il Protti (Don Carlo), il Siepi (Padre Guardiano) il Capecchi (Fra Melitone) il Majonica (Marchese di Calatrava).

Era un complesso veramente imponente che da solo garantiva il successo della rappresentazione. Ma a coordinare tutte queste voci eccezionali, c'era anche un direttore eccezionale: Dimitri Mitropulos.

Questo maestro ammirato già dai fiorentini in concerti e in una splendida esecuzione dell'«Elettra» di Strauss, noto per la sua penetrazione profonda della musica moderna, si è impadronito con vero entusiasmo della partitura dell'opera — diretta naturalmente tutta a memoria — per farne cosa sua.

E nelle sue mani la strumentazione è apparsa quel che è in realtà, cioè un vero tesoro di coloriti, di sottolineature che spesso nelle consuete esecuzioni, vanno perdute.

Ma Mitropulos è troppo grande direttore per limitarsi a questo: egli ha saputo imprimere al recitativo e alle arie un ritmo insolitamente dinamico, in cui l'opera appare come rimodernata, quasi più vicina al nostro linguaggio di quel che si sospetti nel «vecchio» Verdi.

Forse qualcuno che ha negli orecchi ancora l'interpretazione «tradizionale» potrà esser rimasto qua e là un po' sorpreso. Ma dovrà pur sempre ammettere che un uomo come Mitropulos dà, proprio per la continuazione e il rinnovarsi della tradizione, un contributo piu' che positivo.

Anche il pubblico del resto è stato di questo parere: ha acclamato gli artisti e il coro, anche a scena aperta, ma piu' intensamente il direttore, specie dopo la «Sinfonia» iniziale.

E veniamo ora al «fatto nuovo» della presentazione odierna, alla regia cioè di Georg Wilhelm Pafst, famoso creatore di pellicole cinematografiche.

C'era inizialmente, a quanto pare, l'intenzione di trasportare l'azione nei tempi moderni — ma poi, per il linguaggio, per la maniera di agire dei personaggi — si è ripiegati verso l'epoca in cui i personaggi son realmente nati e vissuti: il primo Ottocento, che il Settecento in cui si suol collocare l'azione, — e ancor piu' il Seicento — sono qui eminentemente melodrammatici cioè di maniera.

La grazia dei costumi e dei colori, di cui va dato merito a Franco Lolli, è stata sfruttata magistralmente da Palzt, che non ha mai lasciato sopire l'azione — cosa difficilissima a ottenersi quando le masse corali, per ragioni musicali devono star ferme.

In conclusione, l'esperienza teatrale di Palzt, — e si tratta se non erriamo, della sua prima apparizione sulla scena lirica — è stata positiva e gli applausi che gli sono stati decretati ad apertura di scena, son apparsi meritati.

In questo campo il Maggio musicale procede veramente con grande coraggio; chiama pittori — come Alberto Savinio — e registi cinematografici — come appunto Palzt — a rimuovere un po' le acque a volte un po' troppo chete della scenografia e della regia nel teatro lirico.

E' sempre un salto nel buio, quando si tenta una via nuova; ma a volte — questa per esempio — si hanno dei risultati veramente sorprendenti e incoraggianti.

Si deve aggiungere per verità, che le masse corali, ottimamente preparate da Morosini, son parse animate da nuova disinvoltura, mentre efficace è stata anche la coreografia di Nives Poli.

Il pubblico che gremiva il teatro in ogni ordine di posti ha dimostrato con applausi prolungati, insistenti, la sua piena soddisfazione per questo spettacolo che fa veramente onore al Maggio.

RODOLFO PAOLI

LA GRANDE SERATA DEL "MAGGIO MUSICALE„

"La forza del destino„ con Mitropulos e Wilhelm Pabst

Un' italianissima compagnia di canto, impegnata con direttore e regista stranieri in un' edizione di eccezionale interesse

(DAL NOSTRO INVIATO SPECIALE)

Firenze, 15 giugno

Il Teatro Lirico Italiano — intendiamo il repertorio melodrammatico - è in crisi, crisi di interpretazione, derivante da difetti, tecnici ed organizzativi, oramai cronici, e dagli errori che, via via si vengono accumulando. Ciò che ieri era semplice, facile, normale, oggi è complesso, difficile, eccezionale.

Chi scrive ha assistito a edizioni memorabili di opere italiane, ascoltate con profonda soddisfazione ma con la tranquillità dell'evento naturale; le opere più difficili del nostro repertorio trovavano sempre i loro omogenei complessi, le parti più faticose, i loro interpreti. Oggi molte di quelle opere non appaiono più nei programmi dei nostri teatri, oppure vengono presentate in edizioni mediocri, per i motivi a tutti noti: sbagliata l'organizzazione dei teatri, pochi i cantanti di valore, pochissimi i grandi direttori capaci e disposti per il melodramma, in crisi di crescenza la regia.

In tali condizioni, proporsi di presentare un'opera italiana in una edizione degna del recente passato, è impresa ardua che può risolversi in una brutta avventura. Ad onta di ciò, il «Maggio musicale» ha voluto egualmente assumersi il grosso impegno e l'ha fatto con un'opera fra le più difficili del repertorio.

Qualche concerto, un'opera di Strauss e una di Berg, ci avevano dato la misura della straordinaria personalità di Mitropulos, questo greco, finito in America e rimasto, musicalmente, così europeo, ad onta delle complesse, molteplici esperienze d'oltre oceano. Musicista formidabile, dalla sensibilità acutissima, persino inquieta, tormentata, padrone assoluto della materia sonora, in ogni suo aspetto tecnico, Mitropulos c'era apparso dalla prima volta che lo ascoltammo.

«Mitropulos tutto musica», ci sembrò la frase meglio indicata a definire la natura di questo direttore, così assoluto è il suo modo di immergersi nella partitura, di farsi egli stesso musica. Un modo, dionisiaco, ditirambico, e che altra volta definimmo demoniaco, per taluni attributi poetici, sentimentali, essenzialmente drammatici che caratterizzano la sua personalità. Ma questo suo acceso, persino parossistico romanticismo, Mitropulos libera, domina e trasfigura nella bellezza formale, espressiva. E' la sua umanità che si riconcilia con se stessa, è il suo modo, pur necessario, di essere classico, quasi per ancestrale richiamo. Il sentimento romantico, l'istinto dionisiaco, sembrano aver ragione, talvolta, di altre esigenze. A tali pericoli estremi egli costringe e tende il suo arco espressivo. Ma il rigore storico, l'acutezza dialettica, il geniale intuito, ristabiliscono il necessario equilibrio.

Rimane, risultato logico e provvidenziale di questa interiore duplicità di esigenze, una spontanea tensione espressiva. La partitura, sotto le plastiche, magiche dita di Mitropulos, non conosce cedimenti, abbandoni, stanchezze. La intensità, nelle sue diversissime esigenze dinamiche, agogiche, è costante. La continuità del discorso fluisce con uguale, stupenda naturalezza.

Con queste caratteristiche musicali, Mitropulos ha concertato e diretto «La forza del destino». Come si fosse preparato alla grande prova, con quale amore e scrupolo, s'è visto dalla sbalorditiva sicurezza con cui, senza testo, ha dominato l'intera partitura.

I primi squillanti accordi della famosa sinfonia, secchi, rapidi, decisi, hanno detto subito in qual modo, per molti aspetti prevedibile, Mitropulos sentiva lo strumentale verdiano. Il seguito chiarì, in maniera definitiva, gli intendimenti dell'eccezionale interprete. Rigoroso, rapido, toscaninianamente rapido. Fatte saltare per incanto, tutte le incrostazioni, le sovrastrutture il discorso appariva di una chiarezza radiografica, ma non spietata, d'una lucentezza splendida ma non preziosa, l'espressione attenta a seguire ogni esigenza più riposta — lirica, drammatica, mistica che fosse — colma di umanità, decisa a porre l'accento su ogni sfumatura.

Così ha proseguito fino alla fine nella parte strumentale: tratta da un tecnico di questa capacità, da un musicista sensibilissimo, da un direttore che la consuetudine sinfonica porta a mettere in giusta luce ogni battuta, è emersa nei suoi valori, con una coerenza, con una unità assolute, con una diversa concezione dei rapporti timbrici e ritmici. L'intera partitura ha vissuto così una vita nuova per l'intensità e la bellezza dell'espressione, ha rivelato tutta la sua complessa fisionomia, nella ricchezza dei particolari, nella saldissima concezione architettonica, soprattutto nello spirito autenticamente verdiano, che ha animato, dall'inizio alla fine, in una fantasmagorica accentuazione di valori musicali, con generosa umiltà, l'interpretazione di Mitropulos.

Nei rapporti con il palcoscenico, Mitropulos, per un verso, ha agito con rare intuizioni e bellissimo equilibrio. Il canto ha avuto modo di emergere senza alcuno sforzo, perchè l'orchestra è stata docile, discreta, chiarissima; sempre l'ha sostenuto, adeguandosi con insuperabile varietà di accenti, alle sue esigenze. Per i cantanti, Mitropulos è stato, nei presupposti, altrettanto rigoroso, essenziale, avverso ad ogni retorico arbitrio, che per l'orchestra. Ma non sempre con gli stessi risultati. Qualcuno ha fatto talvolta resistenza al suo rigore. Nelle cadenze, nelle parti corali d'assieme, Mitropulos è riuscito ad imporsi, nelle romanze ha subito, qua e là, oppure accettato, certe consuetudini e vizi di un bel canto inteso come esibizionismo canoro. Tale contrasto ha alterato in alcuni punti la sua bellissima concezione unitaria, senza tuttavia comprometterla.

La regia dell'opera in musica oggi è in fase di sviluppo, cerca l'«ubi consistam» e non lo trova, nonostante gli straordinari progressi, per delle condizioni obbiettive immodificabili allo stato attuale delle cose. Per questo la opera di un regista, per grande che sia, resta limitata all'allestimento, cioè scenografia e ambientazione generale dell'opera. Qualche cosa può ottenere sui movimenti d'assieme, comparse e coro. Ma i singoli interpreti, i protagonisti, tranne insignificanti sfumature, restano fuori da possibilità di concrete modifiche.

Queste le premesse che la regia di Pabst ha confermato. Venuto meno il gesto rivoluzionario, Pabst ha dovuto ripiegare all'Ottocento: un Ottocento quarantottesco, si addice benissimo, alla musica di Verdi, al carattere dell'opera. Tolta un poco dal clima favoloso, mitico che le è proprio, accentuati, ma con discrezione, i lati realistici, l'opera è apparsa, nella sua fisionomia scenica, ringiovanita, resa più agile e spontanea.

Diversi i mutamenti apportati, oltre quello di principio, ma quasi tutti ragionevoli e accettabili. Il secondo quadro del primo atto, l'osteria spagnola, così vario, animato, pittoresco, ricco di succosi, nuovi particolari, è apparso quanto mai fresco e spontaneo. Al secondo atto la popolare preghiera «La vergine degli angeli» viene cantata dai frati all'interno della chiesa resa trasparente, da un lato, con effetto molto suggestivo. Il terzo atto è diviso, scenicamente, in due parti: Alvaro canta nel bosco la romanza «O tu che in seno agli angeli», e sempre qui si incontra con don Carlo. Poi appare un vero campo di guerra, con a lato alcune tende. Qui proseguirà tutto il resto dell'atto, dal duetto «solenne in quest'ora» al «Rataplan» che Pabst ha ironizzato forse più di quanto Verdi non abbia inteso. E tralasciamo tutti i particolari minori con i quali ha voluto ravvivare, di continuo, lo spettacolo, validamente aiutato dalle scene e dai costumi di Franco Lelli, il quale ha saputo bene adeguarsi, di volta in volta, alla realtà e al mito.

Circa i protagonisti s'era già detto. Qui neppure Pabst ha portato la rivoluzione, nè crediamo che intendesse farlo. Ha accettato anche lui una situazione preesistente che riteneva immodificabile. Così ciascun cantante s'è presentato con le sue solite caratteristiche, buone o cattive che fossero.

Renata Tebaldi è stata «Leonora». Il suo canto ha ritrovato purezza ed espressione; l'equilibrio, a un certo punto smarrito, con una consistenza vocale senza dubbio maggiore e una sicurezza di emissione quasi assoluta. E' il canto di una voce italianissima, che sa raggiungere mirabili altezze di intimità e nobiltà espressiva. Perciò ci spiace che cada, talvolta, in taluni eccessi veristici e indulga a qualche effetto retorico, magari pericoloso. Nell'insieme è riuscita una ottima Leonora, capace di terse dolcezze e umanissimi impeti.

Mario del Monaco resta sempre, per il volume, una grande voce, una voce di eccezione. Se il canto fosse solo e soprattutto, sfogo canoro, volume e potenza, oggi sarebbe il primo tenore italiano. Anche se la errata emissione di presunte mezze voci, l'uso del falsetto, l'assurda tendenza a certi innaturali suoni gravi, talvolta la incrinano. Ma il canto è anche interiorità espressiva, fatto spirituale, immedesimazione morale e psicologica. Del Monaco (Don Alvaro) ha cantato con entusiasmo, con generosità, con impeto, sia pure effettistici, ma senza riuscire a tradurli in profonda espressa musicale. Il suo canto resta l'esteriore decorazione di un evento sonoro.

Un elogio particolare meritano quegli artisti che, una volta tanto, hanno accettato di cantare in ruoli importanti ma non di primissimo piano, ed hanno così contribuito, in modo prezioso, al risultato dell'esecuzione. Ecco Fedora Barbieri una «Preziosilla» di lusso, per l'intelligenza della espressione, la straordinaria vivacità, la naturalezza del canto. Cesare Siepi, che, con la sua stupenda voce, l'accento semplice e comunicativo, ha dato nobilissimo rilievo alla figura di «Padre guardiano». E bisogna ricordare ancora Renato Capecchi, un «Fra Melitone» dalla impagabile vis comica, ma sempre signorile nella sua intelligente musicalità. Silvio Maionica severo «marchese di Calatrava».

A sostituire Enzo Mascherini nella parte di «Don Carlo» è stato chiamato all'ultimo momento, Aldo Protti il quale, nonostante l'evidente nervosismo iniziale, si è poi disimpegnato lodevolmente, ma che non ha voce e maturità artistica sufficienti per questa parte.

Scelti con molta cura i minori, Angela Vercelli (Oura), Giorgio Giorgetti (un Alcade), Piero Di Palma (maestro Trabucco), Walter Finessi (un chirurgo). Ottimamente istruito dal maestro Morosini il coro. Coreografia di Nives Poli.

L'esecuzione dell'opera si è svolta in un'atmosfera di costante e caloroso consenso. Una vera ovazione ha salutato la fine della sinfonia dell'opera.

ECCEZIONALE RIPRESA de «La Forza del Destino»

Grande successo tributato dal pubblico

DAL NOSTRO INVIATO

FIRENZE, 15 sera

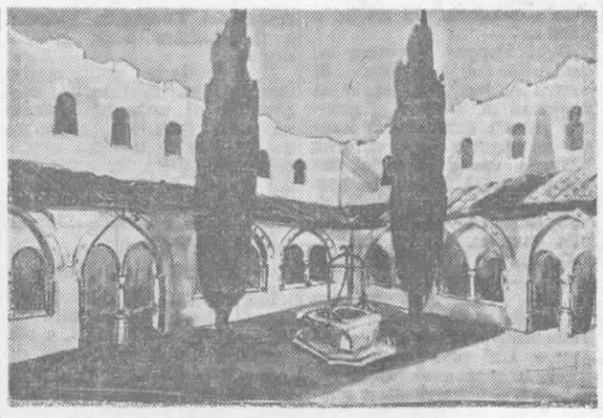
Questo prodigioso capolavoro, questo drammone nel quale i personaggi, agitati da complicate smanie di vendetta, di odii e di feste, si muovono in neite zone di sole e di ombre, d'amore e di morte, con un crescendo di emozione, è di quelle opere benedette che il pubblico, durante l'esecuzione, canta dentro di sè, silenziosamente, nota per nota, e nelle quali gli appuntamenti melodici si controllano dalla sensibilità che è il brivido della schiena.

La scelta del soggetto e il libretto del dramma di «Don Alvaro» o «La Forza del Destino» di Don Angelo de Saavedra, duca di Rivas, inducono a pensare che Verdi non poco fosse attratto dal gusto del «Grand Opéra» parigino. Quel correre di palo in frasca del soggetto, il suo continuo cambiare di luogo, il grande numero di figure e di tipi non necessari al dramma, i ricercati pretesti per creare scene d'ambiente, quadri di carattere o ampiamente affrescati, presentano un Verdi troppo diverso da quello asciutto ed essenziale di Rigoletto e di Traviata. Eppure, al Maestro, il dramma di Don Angelo de Saavedra parve «potente e singolare e vastissimo»; e in proposito aggiungeva: «Non so se il pubblico lo troverà come io lo trovo, ma è certo che è cosa fuori del comune». E prese un grosso abbaglio.

Spagna — Verdi non l'aveva mai vista„ e non c'era ancora andato Gustavo Dorè —; e gli episodi svolgentisi fra le terre di Siviglia, di Velletri e di Hornachuelos; campi di battaglia, conventi, osterie fragorose ed eremi, tradotti e riprodotti dal fedele Piave; sacre immagini dei crocevia e la preghiera dei passanti, tutto precipitava in una carneficina di personaggi tale da anticipare l'evidenza del grand guignol. Il grosso abbaglio apparve a Verdi dopo la prima rappresentazione di Pietroburgo, che pur ebbe vivo successo, e lo indusse verso un costante rifiuto dell'opera a qualunque richiesta. Ma l'esuberanza sentimentale, le violente emozioni dello spirito musicale verdiano e l'ambiente fastoso di Spagna, manifesti nella sola vulcanica fantasia inventiva e nei floridi frutti del suo magnifico istinto teatrale e poetico, lo decisero alla revisione dello spartito originale. Così ritoccata, l'opera affronta il giudizio della Scala il 20 febbraio 1868, ottiene il più vivo successo e da allora naviga sicura sulle acque perigliose dei palcoscenici del mondo.

Una esecuzione di quest'opera è per gli Italiani, finchè il nome d'Italia avrà il suo significato, una specie di festa nazionale. Mettiamo pure quest'opera tra le concezioni di una mentalità artistica superata, la chiamino pure tronfia, enfatica, paradossale, ma non le avranno tolto neppure un capello di quel suo calore espressivo che infiamma anche oggi la mente fantastica e il cuore sensibile che è pur sempre in noi. Scartiamo pure i vari episodi illogici e musicalmente mediocri e i pezzi superflui, e fermiamoci al dramma vero e proprio, al dramma di Leonora angosciata. Il suo dolore non è solo affilizione di sentimento, è di una amarezza cosmica. La sua figura si alterna di speranza e di dolore, di pace e di rassegnazione. La sua voce ha il timbro del patimento, ha un sapore di lagrime. Non è una bambola cantante in chiave di soprano, ma una donna capace di profonda sofferenza umana, di elevazione profondamente religiosa. La sua grande aria al secondo atto è una pagina lirica di intensa introspezione e l'inventiva musicale si accende per lei fra le più belle di Verdi alle parole «deh! non m'abbandonare», che fin dalla sinfonia accenna a stringere in un anello melodico tutta l'opera.

Da quest'aria fino alla melodia finale del «Pace, pace, mio Dio», il personaggio vive e palpita con una coerenza umana assoluta. E mai potremo dimenticare il grandioso affresco corale de «La Vergine degli Angeli» il più bel coro del mondo, punto di maggiore compattezza drammatica, di serena religiosa calda e costante invenzione musicale. Qui l'abilità del costruttore e dell'esperto contrappuntista vocale riesce a fissarsi in pagine mirabilmente concentrate. Verdi si abbandonò al canto, si lasciò cantare e basta, convinto che quello era per lui il solo modo di comunicare col pubblico cui intendeva nuovamente rivolgersi e lasciandosi andare, e non preoccupandosi oltre dei problemi dello stile, della misura, della scelta, gli venne fuori questo drammone aggrovigliato, fantasioso ed enfatico fin che si vuole. «La Forza del Destino» è opera, nella maggior parte, sanguigna e vitale sotto i fremiti della canora passione e sotto i segni francamente modellati dei suoi personaggi.



Domenica sera per l'ennesimo trionfale passaggio della «Forza del Destino» al Comunale, i quadri degli esecutori, al comando del maestro Dimitri Mitropulos, erano tutti pronti per una battaglia decisiva, trionfalmente vinta. Il fiore delle ugole d'oro era stato raccolto al convegno. C'era Renata Tebaldi, Leonora, doviziosa e vibrante, calda appassionata, d'una luminosità canora, potentemente drammatica, profondamente umana. C'era Fedora Barbieri Preziosilla, dalla voce di morbido timbro, ampia e fluida. C'era Mario Del Monaco, Don Alvaro, pieno di senso musicale, coraggioso e baldanzoso, dolce e potente, incisivo e squillante. C'era Cesare Siepi, Padre Guardiano dai mirabili mezzi vocali, tipico basso verdiano, dignitoso d'una nobiltà austera e paterna. C'era Aldo Protti Don Carlos, di cui ogni accento dello splendido timbro di voce è un battito di vita, d'una intensità ricca di significati. Gustosissima figura era il fra Melitone di Renato Capecchi, particolarmente nella predica del quarto atto. Eccellenti la Vercelli, il Giorgetti, il Di Palma e il Finessi.

Per conto nostro abbiamo assistito a una direzione e concertazione spiccatamente personale. Il maestro Dimitri Mitropulos ha trovato la voce grossa nell'orchestra, ha smussato, anche troppo talvolta, ha accentuato le violente emozioni, i ritmi frementi, ha guidato e animato con gesti imperiosi, nervosi, efficaci. Direttore d'orchestra gagliardo, è stato d'uno splendore sottile, d'una generosità a volte infiammata, e tutto è proceduto con armonia e sincronia, dominate da un'alta visione dell'opera d'arte. Mirabile la prestazione del coro del Morosini.

Quanto alla regia dell'opera si è voluto battere vie nuove e il regista Pabst, che viene dalla cinematografia, ci ha assai convinti per il suo lavoro non privo di ragionevole ardire. Il romanticismo verdiano è stato ricondotto alla sua epoca; modellati i blocchi delle loro figure e aggruppamenti; variopinto e brulicante di vita il palcoscenico nella scenografia plastica. Bella la scena della vestizione che ha subito un radicale cambiamento; la vestizione di Leonora si è compiuta infatti nell'interno della Chiesa. Ma è stata meno suggestiva della tradizionale. Pabst ci è sembrato più narrativo che poeta. Le scene, su i bozzetti di Franco Lolli, coincidono con la concezione dello spettacolo, e tutto va bene.

Pubblico straripante, il grande pubblico delle «prime», ed è stato accontentato in pieno, come si è potuto rilevare dagli applausi nutriti e insistenti, tributati a scena aperta e dopo ogni atto agli interpreti, al regista e al maestro Mitropulos.

Dimitri Mitropoulos e G. W. Pabst ne "La forza del destino,, di Verdi

Grandi firme del podio, del cinema e del teatro lirico per uno spettacolo che rimarrà memorabile

DAL NOSTRO INVIATO

Firenze, 15 giugno

Che il « Maggio » continui ad essere la più indovinata e ricca manifestazione musicale è cosa certa, e si comporta giudiziosamente chi, libero dalle congiure campanilistiche, opportunistiche e settarie, riesce a informare se stesso e gli altri di ogni sua mossa. Dopo le felici rivendicazioni di « Medea » e di « Aroldo », dopo le novità imparziali di « Amhal » e di « Guerra e pace » eccoci all'opera di repertorio: a questa « Forza del destino » che figura come un richiamo all'ordine naturale delle cose, che vale come soddisfazione e premio al gran pubblico, e che al tempo stesso è una dichiarazione di fedeltà e di amore scandita con intelligenza nei confronti del genio numero uno del melodramma. Di quel Verdi miniera vulcano e pascolo di fantasmi e di musiche, di colui che avendo pianto ed amato per tutti ogni giorno si dona più prodigo, universale ed attuale.

Tanto si parla di tradizione verdiana ma poco si fa per vedere quanto di giusto o di ingiusto essa sottintenda e consacri. La semplicità e la spontaneità del linguaggio musicale e dell'articolazione teatrale hanno spesso tratto in inganno, favorendo il determinarsi di luoghi comuni e di confidenze eccessive, di mediocri e superficiali letture se non addirittura di pessime ed errate traduzioni. Troppo isolato e distante è l'esempio di un Toscanini interprete fedele — ma non definitivo — di partiture più che di teatro romantico, e su quel prezioso e formidabile apparato che è il melodramma verdiano, sulla più alta espressione artistica dell'ottocento cioè, si è venuta formando una incrostazione di equivoci, una rete di insidie che parte dal disprezzo per il testo poetico e arriva al culto della romanza e del do di petto.

La dichiarazione di fedeltà e d'amore del « Maggio » voleva essere scritta a caratteri d'oro. Voleva indagare e rivelare, per quanto possibile, l'intera bellezza e potenza dell'opera. Non ha lesinato nei mezzi, nella scelta degli interpreti, nell'allestimento dello spettacolo. Ma soprattutto ha avuto il coraggio, che non è soltanto smania del sensazionale come qualcuno pretende, di sperimentare nuove e pericolose energie: e qui si allude alla direzione di Dimitri Mitropoulos e alla regia di Georg Wilhelm Pabst. Per la prima volta quel formidabile greco teneva il timone di uno spettacolo verdiano, per la prima volta Pabst si è presentato alla ribalta insieme ai cantanti e a un maestro di musica.

Dimitri Mitropoulos aveva già entusiasmato gli italiani specie in due memorabili occasioni: l'« Elettra » di Strauss al Maggio Musicale Fiorentino, il « Wozzek » di Berg alla Scala. Ma ci fu pure una terza occasione, di cui poco o niente si parlò e che vale invece al caso presente come un'introduzione, una garanzia e una presa di posizione nei confronti del discorso verdiano: la « Messa da Requiem » concertata e diretta da Mitropoulos in un concerto celebrativo del « Maggio ». Già fin da allora fu possibile capire come la dinamica di una sua tecnica dionisiaca e fremente sapesse piegarsi ed adeguarsi ai termini del più equilibrato romanticismo. Al misticismo, al lirismo, agli slanci, agli scatti ed al canto contenuti in un ottocentesco ma biblico buon senso padano.

FIRENZE. — Il maestro Mitropoulos e il regista Pabst in un intervallo della recita della « Forza del destino » di Verdi.

Fedeltà all'autore

Oggi, alle prese con un'opera che la « tradizione » ci tramanda quale geniale ma anche banale enciclopedia di motivi verdiani, Mitropoulos ha mostrato cosa significhi una comunione fra l'animatore e il creatore, quanto sia semplice, dopo tutto, nobilitare, ingentilire e dare unità a un discorso capito e definito con identica mente e con identico cuore. Tutta musica è Verdi, e tutta musica è Mitropoulos. L'enorme carica di fantasia concentrata nel melodramma verdiano è esplosa sapientemente, compiutamente e stupendamente ai gesti prodigiosi ed umili di questo interprete d'eccezione. Dimitri Mitropoulos è oggi il direttore d'orchestra più riccamente dotato di personalità. Sotto le sue mani la musica vive e respira con singolare intensità di palpiti e di accenti drammatici. Nessun particolare è trascurato, ed ogni segno della partitura acquista il valore di una sua presenza razionale, funzionale, espressiva.

Mai esiste un momento di stanchezza, ed anche nel semplice ma naturale svolgimento dello strumentale verdiano i suoni si fondono ed amalgamano in una dialettica coerente, in un gioco sinfonico d'estrema felicità e purezza. Tutta l'opera ha così goduto di un processo di chiarificazione, di una rivelazione e riabilitazione di ogni suo aspetto lirico e drammatico. Ma al tempo stesso che Mitropoulos operava questa sorta di radiografia, scaricava la propria personalità nella precisa volontà dell'autore. I mezzi espressivi si illuminavano, si lucidavano di vivacità e di nitore, ma il dramma, anzi il melodramma, manteneva segreta la sua linfa vitale. La sua intima e trasfigurata umanità, il suo mistero, la sua finzione, la sua necessità essenziale di amore e di morte, la sua cosmica e popolaresca cornice così ricca di psicologia, di episodi, di figure, così portentosamente e sottilmente oscillante fra l'ironia e la tragedia, fra i palpiti e la violenza, fra il piglio militaresco e l'anelito di mistiche suggestioni. Già nella celebre Sinfonia, dagli squilli degli ottoni alle sospese dolcezze degli archi, dalla calda innocenza dei legni agli impeti della batteria, Dimitri Mitropoulos aveva imposto ed esposto l'autorità del suo stile: rigoroso e morboso, castigato e romantico, estremamente vivo e qui inesorabilmente e inconfondibilmente verdiano. E per tutta l'opera ha mantenuto mirabile fede al suo impegno, lavorando di compasso, di ceselo e scalpello, ligio ed attento all'architettura degli atti ed alla prepotente e complessa personalità dell'autore. Con ritmo serrato, di preferenza, e tuttavia pronto ad alternare i momenti di appassionata tensione e di eccitazione drammatica al mordente di un piglio quarantottesco ed all'estasi di mistiche distensioni. L'orchestra del « Maggio », risuscitata al tocco delle sue mani, ha ubbidito in pieno conoscendo così la perfezione e l'autentica bellezza del suono. Il miracolo non si è ripetuto che parzialmente sul palcoscenico dove i concertati ed alcune scene soltanto hanno risposto alle esigenze del direttore. Sul palcoscenico l'aggiornato ed inguaribile bel canto di talune parti solistiche, e specie del tenore e del baritono, non ha sempre saputo sacrificare malanni e vizi all'evidente raccomandazione di una più scaltra ed umile partecipazione. Mirabile e commosso, salvo alcuni screzi stilistici e vocali, è risultato il personaggio di Eleonora nell'interpretazione di Renata Tebaldi. Un Alvaro truculento e tragicomicamente dedito allo squillo e al portento dell'acuto è stato il tenore Mario Del Monaco. Aldo Protti, che aveva l'attenuante di aver sostituito all'ultimissimo momento il baritono Enzo Mascherini, ha dato maschio ma monotono rilievo alla figura di Don Carlo di Vargas. Duttile ed armonioso Cesare Siepi nella parte del Padre Guardiano. Spigliato, addirittura virtuoso Renato Capecchi in quella di Fra Melitone. Una Preziosilla scenicamente vivace e espressiva è stata Fedora Barbieri.

Ottimi, quali Mastro Trabuco e l'Alcade, Piero Di Palma e Giorgio Giorgetti. Dignitoso padre nonchè Marchese di Calatrava Silvio Majonica. Il coro del « Maggio », istruito da Andrea Morosini, merita di essere citato specie per l'esecuzione del Rataplan, de La Vergine degli angeli e del difficile primo quadro del second'atto. E qui conviene parlare della regia poichè è in questo second'atto, specialmente, che la regia di Pabst ha cominciato ad imporsi.

Un'idea felice

Georg Wilhelm Pabst, nuovo alle scene del melodramma, aveva, sembra, bellicose intenzioni. Voleva trasferire tutta l'opera sul piano della vita moderna, e mettere i carri armati al posto dei cannoni di Velletri, infilare la tuta ai coristi e celare la Tebaldi in un impermeabile americano col cappuccio. Poi, data l'alzata di scudi di chi intendeva mantenersi coerente col linguaggio verdiano, ha ripiegato su posizioni più accessibili, limitandosi a spostare l'azione di cento anni in avanti e facendocela così trovare nel bel mezzo dell'ottocento. Idea felice, in verità, che ha accentuato il carattere quarantottesco di taluni quadri ed ha dato alle scene un sapore più gustoso. Lo spirito dell'opera è stato penetrato e capito da Pabst con intelligenza ed acume. Certi compiacimenti letterari, cui si intonavano peraltro le scene realizzate su bozzetti di Franco Lolli, hanno particolarmente giovato al primo atto — reso in vistosi termini di dramma a forti tinte — e soltanto caricato di troppa ironia (già ci aveva pensato Verdi coi suoi rataplan) la vita dell'accampamento militare. Fra le trovate ed innovazioni più valide sono da porsi i quadri dell'osteria, sciolto nell'articolazione e ricco d'episodi, il successivo dell'esterno del convento e della chiesa che ha incorniciato in una suggestione anche visiva l'altissimo momento verdiano, e quello del bosco adeguato al particolare clima misterioso e drammatico. Abilissima ed accorta regia che è valsa ad arrotondare la cifra di questo spettacolo d'eccezione.

CHIUSURA ALLA SCALA

Dimitri Mitropoulos in gloria conclude la lunghissima stagione

Tra i frequentatori della Scala, abbonati o meno, c'è chi sostiene di non poter giudicare dell'abilità di direttore di Dimitri Mitropoulos, perchè ha solo potuto ascoltarlo mentre pilotava composizioni nuove. Senza possibilità di confronti dunque con altri maestri. E torna nei discorsi il caso della partitura del Wozzeck, difficile e sconosciuta al pubblico, e si aggiunge adesso il programma di ieri sera tutto costruito su musiche di prima esecuzione, per lo meno a Milano.

Ma deve essere gente che non ha occhi o che non sa leggere. A chi non conosce le musiche che Mitropoulos ama diffondere e difendere, basta un po' di buona volontà. Basta guardare alle sue mani, mentre dirige, per avere non solo davanti a sè la partitura completa dell'opera che interpreta, ma soprattutto per sentirsi guidati da lui nella lettura. Con tutto ciò niente di spettacolare nel suo gestire. Anzi, se mai, ogni movimento è limitato all'indispensabile, all'essenziale. Proprio per questo risulta incisivo. Dimitri Mitropoulos non sta sul podio a battere il tempo. « I professori dell'orchestra non hanno bisogno di questo — sostiene lui. — Sono pure degli artisti, dei musicisti anche loro ». Dimitri Mitropoulos sta là per guidare gli esecutori attraverso le più difficili architetture musicali, per ricostruirle con loro, facendo lui da perno sul quale tutta la costruzione appoggia. Sta là per indicare a loro e al pubblico la strada per penetrare nel labirinto più complicato e per uscirne serenamente senza pericolo di deviazioni. Così su di lui e attraverso di lui, si costruisce l'opera che interpreta. Così le sue mani reggono tutta l'impalcatura, raccolgono in sè gli elementi singoli che gli strumenti e le famiglie gli porgono, li plasmano, li fondono, li restituiscono in onde dominate, mentre le sue dita ci fanno segno sulla partitura che si stende davanti a noi, ci indicano il sorgere di una voce, il suo svilupparsi, il suo fondersi in altre. Ci sciolgono l'intreccio difficile fino alla chiarezza estrema. Per questo una composizione interpretata da Mitropoulos non appare mai difficile, anche se intesa per la prima volta. Potrà piacere, potrà non piacere. Ma chiusa alla comprensione non rimane mai. E' un risultato combinato della sua intelligenza e sensibilità particolari e della preparazione minuziosa che a ogni interpretazione Mitropoulos dedica. Con lui non si improvvisa mai. Il maestro giunge al podio preparato da un lungo attento studio dell'opera, per cui il fatto che egli diriga sempre a memoria non è più un fenomeno spettacolare, ma una esigenza sua personale. Se non avesse già scritta nella mente tutta la partitura che l'orchestra legge con lui, non potrebbe guidarla come egli fa. E d'altra parte è pronto ad assumere la guida dell'orchestra solamente quando la partitura da interpretare è diventata talmente nota alle sue sensibilità, alla sua memoria e alle sue mani, che un leggio davanti a lui risulta solamente ingombrante. L'opera esce da dentro il maestro. Ed è per questa sua comprensione profonda, per questa sua macerazione, che l'intesa, il contatto con gli esecutori e con il pubblico si stabilisce immediata non appena Mitropoulos si prepara al segnale d'attacco.

Così è stato anche ieri sera. Malipiero, Chausson e Prokofiev, i tre autori spiegati al pubblico, hanno ricevuto ognuno la giusta luce. Per ognuno i riflettori erano puntati al punto giusto e nel pubblico non è rimasto il minimo dubbio di avere inteso le tre opere di così diversa ispirazione, proprio secondo le precise intenzioni degli autori. Il giudizio favorevolissimo per tutti e tre ne acquista più valore.

La Vivaldiana di Malipiero, ispirandosi a temi del grande nostro settecentista, ha dato modo al suo autore di diffondersi in un discorso più disteso, meno spezzettato e frammentario del solito, anche se la particolare vitalità dei fiati nella seconda parte della composizione ha aggiunto un moderno nervosismo al parlare arcaico. E alla felice ispirazione della composizione l'abilità della costruzione e della dosatura degli effetti hanno corrisposto conducendo a un risultato equilibrato e piacevole.

La Sinfonia in si bemolle di Chausson ci giunge in ritardo. Non è colpa sua. Ma non è una ragione per non apprezzarne la sincerità dell'ispirazione e la nobiltà della scrittura, specialmente nel primo tempo, che il miglior Franck potrebbe invidiare. Forse sotto altra guida, alcune parti avrebbero potuto lasciare un sospetto di volgarità. Ma con Mitropoulos a sorvegliarla, la Sinfonia di Chausson non ha sbandato mai, mantenendosi sempre e assolutamente in un clima di liricità pura.

La Sinfonia n. 5 di Prokofiev concludeva la serata e la lunga stagione scaligera. E' opera diseguale, come tutta la produzione di questo musicista. Ma il secondo tempo, lo Scherzo, la giustifica tutta. Con quello Prokofiev l'ha firmata e nel modo migliore, restituendocisi nella migliore forma: quella che sa fondere l'ispirazione della sua terra e della sua gente rivivendola in for-

Come il suo grande collega Herbert von Karajan ha una grande passione per la montagna, alla quale dedica tutto il tempo lasciatogli libero dalla musica. In queste settimane Mitropoulos ha diretto a Firenze "La Forza del Destino" e alla Scala due concerti, acclamato dal pubblico fiorentino e milanese. Egli tornerà in Italia l'anno prossimo.

La prima sera in cui fu dato alla Scala il Wozzeck di Alban Berg — nel giugno dello scorso anno — capitò un fatto fino ad allora mai verificatosi, nel massimo teatro d'opera italiano. Ne accennammo, a suo tempo, in una "cronaca" (vedi Oggi 1952, n. 25). Capitò che, finito il secondo atto — nel corso del quale una parte degli spettatori, poco persuasi dalle dissonanze stridentissime della musica berghiana, s'era data a manifestare il proprio malumore con fischi e zittii — capitò, dicevamo, che il direttore d'orchestra Dimitri Mitropoulos avanzasse alla ribalta e tenesse al pubblico un discorsetto. « La musica del Wozzeck è assai difficile », disse, press'a poco, Mitropoulos, « e il dirigerla a memoria richiede una concentrazione straordinaria: prego dunque il pubblico di non fischiare o zittire durante l'esecuzione, e di rimandare ogni manifestazione al calar del sipario ». Molti applaudirono, stupefatti dall' "audacia" senza precedenti d'un direttore d'orchestra che osava arringare il pubblico dal proscenio; i fautori della "dodecafonia" e ammiratori del cupo dramma di Berg esultarono, addirittura, ritenendo che, con quel discorsetto, risultasse provata l'ammirazione esclusiva e senza riserva d'un grande musicista e interprete come Mitropoulos per il Wozzeck; altri, invece, disapprovarono l'allocuzione, convinti che un direttore d'orchestra non debba, in teatro, esprimersi altro che con il gesto. Fummo con questi ultimi, anche perché ci sembrò che quel singolare modo di comportarsi rivelasse, in Mitropoulos, una certa dose d'esibizionismo e di "gigioneria".

Oggi, tuttavia, abbiamo cambiato opinione. Abbiamo avuto occasione di conoscere Mitropoulos e di conversare con lui per qualche ora; e abbiamo compreso che pochi artisti sono, come lui, alieni da qualsiasi forma di esibizionismo. Continuiamo a ritenere che il "discorsetto" del Wozzeck sia stato poco opportuno; ma abbiamo compreso che nessun "gigionismo" l'aveva ispirato. Esso era stato dettato all'artista dalla sua vocazione più intima e vera, quella di "missionario", di infaticabile propagandista di valori musicali: di tutti i valori, e non soltanto da quelli d'una data scuola o tendenza. Perché davvero Mitropoulos considera l'arte come una missione; anzi considera la vita come una missione; e manifesta

Σὲ ἡλικία εἴκοσι ἐνὸς χρονῶν εἶχε γράψει πολλὲς συμφωνίες καὶ μιὰν ὁλόκληρη ὄπερα. Ἡ κρίσι τῶν δασκάλων του ἦταν ἐνθουσιώδης. Εἶχαν ἀνακαλύψει μιὰ μεγαλοφυΐα καὶ γιὰ τοῦτο τὸν ἔστειλαν ἀμέσως μὲ ὑποτροφία στὶς Βρυξέλλες καὶ στὸ Βερολῖνο. Στὸ Βερολῖνο ἔμεινε τέσσερα χρόνια μὲ δασκάλους τὸν Μπουζόνι καὶ τὸν Γκέλσον. Ὁ Μπουζόνι τοῦ εἶπε πὼς θὰ ἔπρεπε νὰ γίνῃ μαέστρος, μὰ αὐτὸς προτιμοῦσε νὰ γίνῃ συνθέτης κι' ἡ φήμη του θὰ ἦταν διαφορετική, ἂν, ὅπως συμβαίνει μὲ τὶς ἀστάθμητες συμπτώσεις, δὲν τυχαίνε μιὰν ἡμέρα νὰ ἀντικατασταθῇ τὸν διευθυντὴ τῆς ὀρχήστρας τοῦ Βερολίνου. Ὁ Ἕλλην γίγας τῆς μουσικῆς ἦταν τότε εἴκοσι ἐννέα χρόνων. Ἡ ἐπιτυχία του ἦταν τέτοια, ὥστε μέσα σὲ λίγες ἑβδομάδες τὸν καλοῦσαν ν' ἀναλάβῃ τὴν διεύθυνσι τῶν καλυτέρων ὀρχηστρῶν τῆς Εὐρώπης. Ἀντιθέτως ὅμως μὲ τόσους ἄλλους, ἡ σταδιοδρομία του δὲν γνώρισε δυσχέρειες ἢ ἀπρογοήτευσεις. Ἀπὸ τὴν ἀρχὴ θριάμβευσε. Στὰ 1936 πῆγε γιὰ πρώτη φορὰ στὴν Ἀμερικὴ γιὰ νὰ διευθύνῃ τὴν ὀρχήστρα τῆς Βοστώνης καὶ ὕστερα τῆς Μιννεαπόλεως. Δὲν θὰ ἔφευγε πιὰ ἀπὸ τὴν Ἀμερική. Ἀπέκτησε καὶ τὴν ἀμερικανικὴ ὑπαγένεια καὶ τώρα θεωρεῖται ὡς ἕνας ἀπὸ τοὺς μεγαλειτέρους διευθυντὰς ὀρχήστρας τοῦ κόσμου. Εἶναι τὸ εἴδωλο τοῦ κοινοῦ καὶ ἡ Νέα Ὑόρκη τὸν ἔχει ὡς μόνιμον διευθυντὴ τῆς Φιλαρμονικῆς της.

Στὴ Φλωρεντία ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἦρθε τὴν πρώτη τοῦ Μαΐου, γιὰ νὰ ἀναπαυθῇ. Μὰ μολὶς ἔφθασε τὸν ζήτησαν νὰ συμμετάσχῃ στὸν Μουσικὸν Φλωρεντινὸ Μαΐο καὶ φυσικὰ δὲν μποροῦσε νὰ πῇ ὄχι. «Ἡ δύναμις τοῦ πεπρωμένου», ποὺ διηύθυνε, ἦταν ἕνα ἀπὸ τὰ μεγαλύτερα μουσικὰ γεγονότα τῆς χρονιᾶς. «Φαίνεται σὰν ἕνας Τοσκανίνι κατὰ τριάντα χρόνια μικρότερος», εἶπαν ὅλοι. «Εἶναι κυριευμένος ἀπ' τὴ μουσικὴ καὶ κατακλύζει ὅλους ὅσους τὸν ἀκοῦν μὲ μιὰ θαυμαστὴ μαγεία», ἔγραψαν γι' αὐτὸν οἱ κριτικοί, ποὺ περιέγραψαν μὲ τὰ πιὸ διαλεχτὰ ὑπερθετικὰ τὴν μεγάλη του τέχνη. Διευθύνει κι' αὐτὸς ἀπὸ μνήμης. Φτάνει νὰ διαβάσῃ μιὰ φορὰ ἕνα κομμάτι, γιὰ νὰ μὴν τὸ ξεχάσῃ πιά. Τὰ μέλη τῆς ὀρχήστρας ἔμειναν κατάπληκτα, ὅταν εἶδανε, ἀπὸ τὴν πρώτην ἡμέρα, πῶς ἤξερε τὰ ὀνόματα ὅλων.

Καὶ ὅμως εἶναι ὁ μοναδικὸς μεγάλος μουσικός, γιὰ τὸν ὁποῖον δὲν ὑπάρχει μιὰ πλήρης βιογραφία. Ἴσως αὐτὸ νὰ ὀφείλεται στὴ μεγάλη του μετριοφροσύνη, ποὺ ἀποφεύγει τὶς ματαίες ἐπιδείξεις. Ἡ κρυφὴ τοῦ θλῖψις εἶναι πὼς διευθύνει μόνο τὴ μουσικὴ τῶν ἄλλων καὶ γιὰ τοῦτο εἶναι ἀναγκασμένος νὰ ἀφήσῃ τὴ δική του. «Οἱ συνθέσεις μου εἶναι κλεισμένες σ' ἕνα ντουλάπι καὶ ποτὲ δὲν θὰ ξαναβγοῦν στὸ φῶς». Γιὰ τοῦτο σὰν κάθεται καμμιὰ φορὰ λέγει τὸ κάποιον ἐμπιστό του: «Κι' ὅμως τώρα μουσικὴ ζῇ μέσα μου: ἐδῶ, ἐδῶ...» καὶ ἀγγίζει τὴν καρδιὰ καὶ τὸ κεφάλι του. Μὰ μονομιᾶς συνέρχεται, χαμογελάει, πηγαίνει στὸ πιάνο καὶ αὐτοσχεδιάζει μιὰ συμφωνία

Στὴ Νέα Ὑόρκη μένει στὸν τελευταῖο ὄροφο τοῦ Γκρὴτ Νόρθερν. Στὸν οὐρανοξύστη αὐτόν, ποὺ κυριαρχεῖ σ' ὅλην τὴν Νέα Ὑόρκη, τοῦ ἀρέσει νὰ μένῃ, γιατὶ νοιώθει σὰν νὰ βρίσκεται πιὸ κοντὰ στὸν Παράδεισο. Τὰ δωμάτιά του εἶναι γεμάτα ἀπὸ ἔργα τοῦ Πλάτωνος, τοῦ Θωμᾶ, τοῦ Ἀκινάτη καὶ τοῦ Ἁγίου Αὐγουστίνου. Οἱ τοῖχοι τους εἶναι στολισμένοι μὲ πίνακες ποὺ ἔχουν ἀποκλειστικὰ δυὸ θέματα: τὸν Ἅγιο Φραγκίσκο τῆς Ἀσσίζης καὶ τὰ πιὸ ξακουστὰ βουνὰ τοῦ κάσμου. Ὁ ἀγγελικὸς ἅγιος καὶ ἡ ὀρειβασία εἶναι τὰ δυὸ μεγάλα του πάθη, ὕστερα ἀπὸ τὴ μουσική.

«ΤΟ ΒΗΜΑ»

Νέος θρίαμβος τοῦ Μητροπούλου

ΡΩΜΗ, 2 Ἰουλίου.— Αἱ Ἰταλικαὶ ἐφημερίδες ἀφιερώνουν μακρὰ καὶ ἐνθουσιώδη σχόλια εἰς τὸν Δημήτριν Μητρόπουλον, ποὺ διηύθυνε συμφωνικὰ καὶ μελοδραματικὰ ἔργα εἰς τὸ τελευταῖον μουσικὸν Φεστιβὰλ τῆς Φλωρεντίας. «Ὁ Δημήτρης Μητρόπουλος, γράφει ἡ μεγάλη ἐπαρχιακὴ «Ἐφημερὶς τῆς Ἐμιλίας», εἶναι σήμερον ὁ μαέστρος μὲ τὴν πλουσιώτερην προσωπικότητα. Ὑπὸ τὴν διεύθυνσίν του ἡ μουσικὴ ζῇ καὶ ἀναπνέει μὲ μοναδικὴν ἔντασιν παλμοῦ καὶ δραματικοῦ τόνου. Δὲν παραβλέπει καμμίαν λεπτομέρειαν: κάθε σημεῖον τῆς παρτιτούρας ἀξιολογεῖται καὶ λαμβάνει τὴν λογικὴν λειτουργικὴν θέσιν του εἰς ἕνα ἐκφραστικὸν σύνολον». Μία μεγάλη ἐφημερὶς τῆς Βενετίας γράφει: «Ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἀφομοιώνει ἀπολύτως τὸν ἑαυτόν του μὲ τὴν μουσικήν, κατὰ ἕνα τρόπον διονυσιακόν, διθυραμβικόν, δαιμονιακὸν θὰ ἔλεγε κανείς. Εἶναι ἕνας καταπληκτικὸς μουσικός, μὲ ὀξυτάτην εὐαισθησίαν, μὲ προσωπικότητα ἀνήσυχην καὶ ταλαιπωρημένην. Ἀπόλυτος κύριος τῶν ἤχων ὑπὸ ὅλας τὰς τεχνικάς των ἀπόψεις, ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἐπεβλήθη ἀπὸ τὴν πρώτην στιγμὴν ποὺ τὸν ἀκούσαμεν». Τὴν τελευταίαν του ἐμφάνισιν ἔκαμεν ὁ Μητρόπουλος διευθύνων τὴν «Δύναμιν τοῦ Πεπρωμένου» τοῦ Βέρντι. Ἡ παράστασις, κατὰ κοινὴν ὁμολογίαν ὅλων τῶν μουσικοκριτικῶν, θὰ μείνῃ ἀλησμονήτη. «Ὁ Μητρόπουλος, γράφει ὁ κ. Ροντόλφο Πάολι εἰς τὴν «Ἐφημερίδα τῆς Φλωρεντίας», ἐπέβαλεν εἰς τὰ ρετσιτατίβα καὶ εἰς τὶς ἄριες ἕνα ρυθμὸν δυναμικόν, ὑπὸ τὸν ὁποῖον ἡ ὄπερα ἐφαίνετο σὰν ἀνακαινισμένη, καὶ εὑρίσκετο πολὺ πλησιέστερα πρὸς τὴν σημερινὴν μουσικὴν γλῶσσαν».

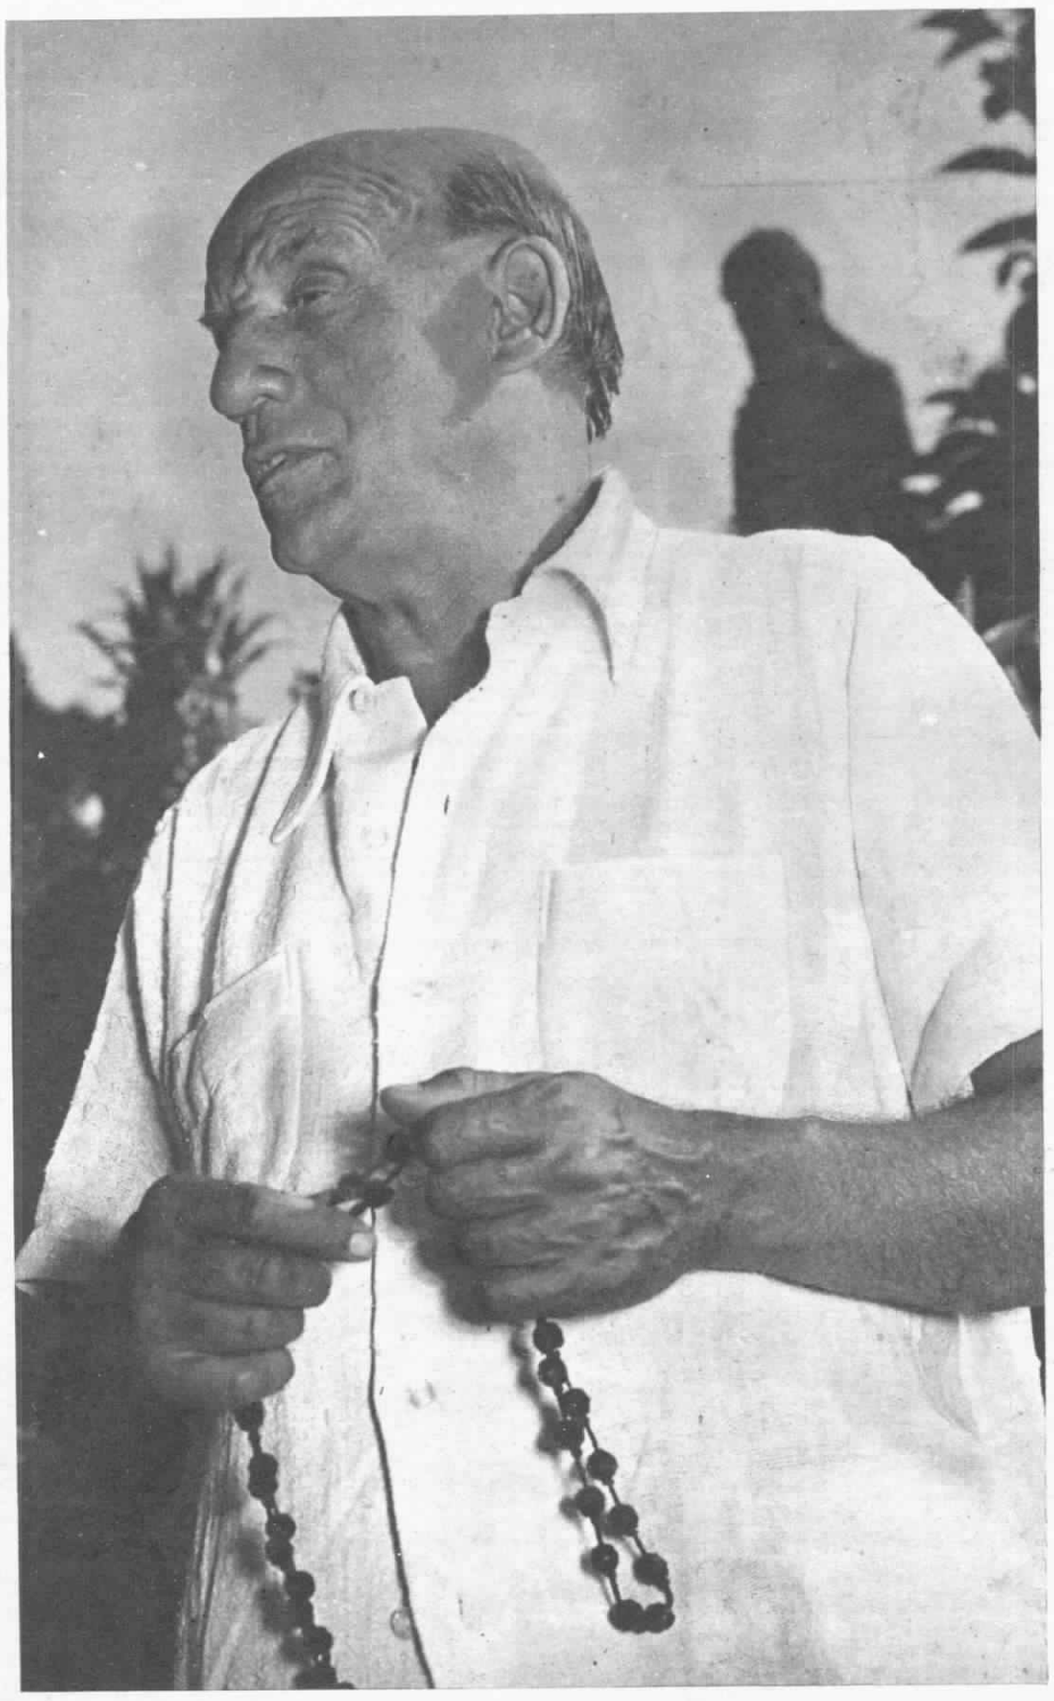
FRATE MITROPOULOS musicista per vocazione

Il famoso direttore d'orchestra ha lasciato il convento perché non poteva suonare il pianoforte, ma ha sempre condotto una vita monacale. Sgrana il rosario ogni volta che lo assale la tentazione di fumare.

Firenze, agosto



La prima cosa che colpisce nel grande Dimitri Mitropoulos è la sua straordinaria espressività. Il suo volto ricorda certe maschere tragiche del teatro greco. Ci sono momenti in cui quella faccia cotta dal sole sembra scolpita nel bronzo dalla fantasia di un artista geniale: sotto la fronte altissima il naso è lungo e massiccio, esageratamente grande, la bocca è larga, dalle labbra quasi invisibili e i candidi denti perfetti che così spesso si schiudono in un inquietante sorriso. Gli occhi sono piccoli e azzurri, così chiari che a momenti sembrano bianchi, come quelli delle statue, e così acuti che quando si posano su una persona sembra vadano dritto al cuore e al cervello. Gli orecchi sono anch'essi enormi, a sventola, e vibrano come antenne tese a captare sfumature di suono per noi inafferrabili quando egli dirige l'orchestra e i tratti del viso, ora abboniti fino alle lacrime, ora stravolti da una collera profonda, alternano l'espressione addolcita di un santo a quella infuriata di un demonio. Il cranio, stranamente appuntito e anch'esso abbronzato dal sole, non ha mai avuto che pochi capelli in fondo alla nuca: lisci, di un colore indefinito, che gli circondano la base del capo come un'aureola bizzarra.

Seduto dinanzi ad uno spartito di Brahms, nella villa fiorentina della sua vecchia amica Gisella Selden Goth che lo conosce da trent'anni, Dimitri Mitropoulos ascolta con aria maliziosa ma che forse è soltanto interessata gli aneddoti che gli amici stanno raccontando su di lui, e intanto sgrana il rosario, a grosse noci di corallo intagliate ed infilate in una corda di seta, secondo l'uso ortodosso. Quel rosario gli è stato mandato in regalo, qualche anno fa, dai monaci del monte Athos e serve a dargli la forza di non fare le cose che non deve fare, anche se vorrebbe. Nel caso suo la voglia repressa è molto innocente: quella di fumare. Un anno fa Mitropoulos che fumava un'ottantina di sigarette al giorno è stato molto male ed ora, ogni qualvolta gli viene in mente di accendere una sigaretta o vede gli altri che fumano, tira fuori il rosario e allontana la tentazione. Il sacrificio è grosso ma non c'è rinuncia che quest'uomo controllato come un frate o un atleta non compirebbe in nome della musica che è la sua sola ragione di vita. C'è in questa forza di imposizione morale un residuo della antica vocazione religiosa. Mitropoulos, che è nato ad Atene, proviene da una famiglia greco-ortodossa di grande fede religiosa e molti dei suoi familiari tra cui suo padre e due zii, hanno preferito a un certo punto della vita la pace del monastero che sorge sulla cima del monte Athos. Dimitri si decise a quel passo quando aveva sedici anni ed era un ragazzo meditativo e difficile, con la testa sempre persa dietro qualcosa che gli altri non riuscivano a capire. Però, quantunque la vocazione religiosa fosse sincera, c'era qualcosa che premeva al ragazzo non meno di quella.

Dopo due anni di ritiro sul monte Athos, Dimitri decise che fare il monaco senza poter suonare nemmeno un po' il pianoforte era veramente insopportabile e, lasciato il saio, rimise i pantaloni e tornò ad Atene per studiare in Conservatorio. Aveva fatto un voto: dare alla musica quello che altrimenti avrebbe dato alla religione; il che era un medesimo modo di manifestare la fede. Così, fin da principio, si impose lo studio con l'ardore con cui i monaci del monte Athos si impongono le veglie e i digiuni. Studiava come un invasato, pianoforte e composizione, e a vent'anni ne sapeva più dei propri maestri che lo trattavano con reverenza impaurita. A ventuno aveva scritto molte sinfonie, accompagnamenti musicali e un'opera intera. L'opera fu giudicata talmente geniale che gli dettero una borsa di studio e lo mandarono d'urgenza a studiare a Bruxelles e a Berlino. Rimase a Berlino quattro anni, allievo di Busoni e di Gilson. Busoni gli diceva che avrebbe dovuto dirigere l'orchestra, aveva una gran disposizione. Ma lui preferiva diventare un compositore e forse la fama di Mitropoulos sarebbe oggi diversa se, per uno di quei casi fortuiti che mutano inaspettatamente il destino di un uomo, non gli fosse capitato un giorno di sostituire un direttore dell'orchestra di Berlino. Il gigante greco aveva allora ventinove anni. Se la cavò con tanta disinvolta sicurezza che, in capo a poche settimane, senza nemmeno rendersene conto, era impegnato a dare concerti con le migliori orchestre d'Europa. Al contrario di tanti altri, la sua carriera non conobbe sconfitte o disillusioni. Fu un successo fin da principio e un trionfo continuo. Nel 1936 andò per la prima volta in America per dirigere un concerto a Boston e poi a Minneapolis per mettere in sesto un'orchestra sconquassata che in breve tempo trasformò in una delle migliori orchestre del mondo. Dall'America non doveva più partire. Prese la cittadinanza americana e dopo alcuni anni, ormai stimato come uno dei più grandi direttori del mondo, conosciuto attraverso il cinematografo, idolatrato dal pubblico, l'ex monaco del monte Athos venne chiamato ad assumere il posto di direttore stabile della Filarmonica di New York.

A New York Mitropoulos non ha nemmeno una casa: vive nella pent-house di un albergo vicino al Metropolitan, il Great Northern, in un appartamento di quattro stanze sopra l'ultimo piano del grattacielo. La pent-house domina tutta New York ed al Maestro piace perché si sente più vicino al Paradiso. Ha riempito le stanze con le opere di Platone, San Tommaso d'Aquino, Sant'Agostino, ha tappezzato le pareti di quadri che riproducono esclusivamente due temi: San Francesco e le montagne più famose del mondo, il santo e l'alpinismo essendo, dopo la musica, le sue passioni più grandi. La sua giornata incomincia alle cinque e mezzo del mattino quando si alza per studiare e finisce alle undici e mezzo di sera, quando torna dal teatro. Eccettuati pochi amici che ogni tanto lo vanno a trovare, come i Toscanini e i Rubinstein, e qualche ospite di passaggio per cui ha sempre una camera pronta, egli vive completamente solo. Per una ragione che nemmeno lui saprebbe spiegare e che molti vorrebbero ricercare nel suo tenore di vita monacale, Mitropoulos non si è mai sposato e nessuno è mai riuscito a scoprire una donna nella sua vita. È stato osservato che sa guardare le donne con occhi pieni di interesse e che sono molte quelle che gli fanno la corte. Ma se qualcuno gli chiede la ragione di tanta ostinata solitudine, Mitropoulos punta in faccia un inspiegabile sorriso e risponde con tono che non ammette repliche che la sua donna è la musica.

Dimitri Mitropoulos col rosario greco ortodosso regalatogli dai monaci del Monte Athos. In questi giorni egli è in vacanza a Firenze, ospite nella villa della signora Gisella Selden Goth.

A Firenze Mitropoulos è venuto i primi di maggio col proposito di prendersi la prima vacanza in quattordici anni trascorsi senza un giorno di riposo. Naturalmente la vacanza non c'è stata. Appena arrivato gli hanno chiesto di partecipare al Maggio Musicale Fiorentino e lui non ha saputo dire di no. Ha ripreso ad alzarsi alle cinque e mezzo, a passar le giornate tra il pianoforte e le prove d'orchestra, ad andare a letto alle due. La « Forza del destino », diretta da lui, è stata uno degli avvenimenti musicali più importanti dell'annata. « Sembra un Toscanini con trent'anni di meno » è stato detto di lui. « Scoppia di musica e inonda di meraviglia tutti quelli che lo stanno a sentire » hanno detto i critici, impegnati a descrivere con superlativi la sua arte e la sua abilità. Al vecchio maestro hanno paragonato anche la prodigiosa memoria che gli permette di dirigere un'opera intera senza spartito. A Mitropoulos basta infatti leggere un brano di musica una sola volta per non dimenticarlo mai più, fino nei particolari più insignificanti. Gli orchestrali sono rimasti incantati a vedere che, fino dal primo giorno, conosceva tutti i loro nomi a memoria. Infatti prima di affrontare un complesso nuovo si fa dare la lista dei componenti ed impara diligentemente nomi, cognomi e attributi. Alla prova, punta il grosso indice verso di loro e dice « Signori, guardiamo se ho l'onore di riconoscervi », riconoscendoli a uno a uno come se fossero antichissimi amici. Malgrado questo sa ancora meravigliarsi se qualcuno lo complimenta, gli riesce estremamente difficile parlare di sé (è l'unico musicista famoso di cui non esista una biografia completa) e quando accenna ai suoi successi lo fa con un tono di rimpianto nascosto: quello di dover sempre dirigere la musica degli altri e di aver dovuto, per questo, abbandonare la sua.

« Le mie composizioni sono ormai chiuse dentro un cassetto e non le tirerò fuori mai più » dice sgranando tra le mani il rosario. Ha mani immense e quadrate, dalle dita massicce come bastoncini, michelangiolesche. Eppure quando si posano sul pianoforte o toccano il rosario sanno diventare leggere come farfalle. « Non so nemmeno se mi piacciono ancora, non me lo chiedo. Ormai è un capitolo chiuso ». Si rimette in tasca il rosario e con gli occhi che mandano lampi inquietanti brontola piano: « E dire che ho tanta musica che mi pigia dentro: qui, qui... » e si tocca il cuore e la testa, in un gesto che par quasi infelice. Ma subito si scuote, sorride con tutti i denti candidi, va verso il pianoforte, abbozza un accordo: « Ma perché, cara amica, mi fa fare questi discorsi e continuiamo a parlare di me? » Interviene la signora Selden Goth che girando la testa bianca come una nuvola gli chiede, per piacere, di suonare qualcosa. Immediatamente le mani di Mitropoulos si impennano, restano immobili sulla tastiera, l'accordo rimane interrotto a metà, come una risata dispettosa. Fortunatamente la vecchia signora ha ripreso la conversazione e non se ne accorge. Sta parlando della Scala e Mitropoulos, con le orecchie ritte, capta subito l'argomento che gli sta a cuore. « La Scala, la Scala, vorrei che lei dicesse, cara amica, una cosa che ho detto soltanto a Toscanini: e cioè quanto mi sia dispiaciuto di non aver suonato con lui, nel primo concerto del dopoguerra, per ricostruire il teatro distrutto. Non mi lasciarono suonare, capito? Dissero che avrei tradito il mio paese suonando per un paese che era stato nemico della Grecia. Perfino Re Paolo intervenne. Pazzi, pazzi. Non sanno comprendere né perdonare, vedono le colpe degli altri e dimenticano le proprie. Dovetti mandare i soldi di nascosto e rinunciare al concerto per non provocare uno scandalo ». È tanto indignato da non accorgersi che sta arrivando qualcuno. Si tratta della solita gente che gli viene a chiedere di dare un concerto. Mitropoulos che non sa negare un favore a nessuno, dice immediatamente di sì. « Ma certo, caro amico, ma certo. Splendida idea, naturalmente ».

Lo scocciatore non crede ai suoi orecchi e incoraggiato avanza la richiesta più importante: « Si tratterebbe, naturalmente, di un concerto gratuito... » Mitropoulos che regala più di metà di quel che guadagna inviando denari in Grecia a vecchi amici e istituzioni, mantenendo allo studio musicisti poveri ma con qualche ingegno, lasciandosi commuovere da tutti, non mostra disappunto o sorpresa: « Ma certo, caro amico, splendida idea, la beneficienza... ». Ci vorrà poi tutta la dialettica di Trudy Goth, la sua giovane amica che lo protegge da tutti e gli fa da segretaria, per convincerlo che è assolutamente impossibile. Ma ecco che squilla il telefono, è un musicista dodecafonico che chiede al maestro il permesso di sottoporgli alcune sue composizioni: sa quale coraggioso diffusore egli sia della musica moderna, non vorrà quindi rifiutare un colloquio. Sulla faccia di Mitropoulos si dipinge un'espressione furibonda, poi costernata e infine paziente. Il maestro ha tirato fuori di tasca il rosario e girandolo tra le dita risponde con voce addolcita: « Ma certo, caro amico, ma certo. I giovani autori vanno sempre seguiti, venga quando vuole... ». Anche questa volta si è ricordato di San Francesco.

ΡΩΜΗ, 'Ιούλιος. ('Εκτάκτου συνεργάτου μας). — 'Ο Μητρόπουλος δέν εἶναι μόνον μιὰ ἑλληνικὴ δόξα. "Εχει καθιερωθῆ διεθνῶς. Εἶναι νωπὲς ἀκόμη οἱ δάφνες ποὺ ἔδρεψεν εἰς τὴν Φλωρεντίαν, ὅπου διηύθυνε τὴν ὀρχήστραν εἰς τὴν θριαμβευτικὴν παράστασιν τῆς «Φόρτσα ντὲλ Ντεστῖνο» καὶ εἰς τὸ Μιλάνον, μὲ τὰ δύο κοντσέρτα ποὺ διηύθυνε εἰς τὴν Σκάλα. Δὲν θὰ εἶχε λοιπὸν παρὰ σχετικὴν ἐντελῶς σημασίαν, ἂν διὰ λόγους ἁπλῆς ἐνημερότητος, μετεδίδαμεν ὅσα γράφει γιὰ τὸν μεγάλο μαέστρο ὁ 'Ιταλὸς μουσικοκριτικὸς Τεόντορο Τσέλλι εἰς τὸ μόλις κυκλοφορῆσαν τεῦχος τοῦ μεγάλου περιοδικοῦ «"Οτζι». Θὰ παρεθέταμεν ἕνα ἀκόμη ξένον ἐγκώμιον μέσα εἰς τὰ ἄλλα — ἕνα δενδρύλλιον μέσα εἰς τὸ μεγάλο δάσος! "Αν ἐκρίναμεν σκόπιμον νὰ φέρωμεν ἐνώπιον τοῦ ἑλληνικοῦ κοινοῦ ὅσα γράφει ὁ κριτικὸς τοῦ «"Οτζι», τὸ κάνομε μόνον καὶ μόνον γιατί ὁ Τσέλλι ἦταν ἕνας ἀπὸ ἐκείνους ποὺ, ὅπως ὁμολογεῖ, δὲν ἐπίστευαν εἰς τὸν Μητρόπουλον. 'Ιδοὺ ὅμως ὅτι καὶ αὐτὸς προβάλλει εἰς τὴν δημοσιότητα διὰ νὰ βροντοφωνήσῃ ὅτι «ἔσφαλε»: «Μέα κούλπα!». 'Αμφισβητῶν ἕως χθὲς τὴν μεγάλην μουσικὴν προσωπικότητα τοῦ "Ελληνος μαέστρου, προσχωρεῖ τώρα ἀνεπιφυλάκτως εἰς τὸ στρατόπεδον τῶν θαυμαστῶν του. Τὸ ἄρθρον του εἶναι ἡ μεγαλύτερη δικαίωσις γιὰ τὸν "Ελληνα μουσικὸν ἐδῶ εἰς τὴν 'Ιταλίαν, μίαν ἀπὸ τὶς μεγάλες πατρίδες τῆς μουσικῆς. Εἶναι μία ἀποθέωσις τοῦ Μητροπούλου καὶ ταυτοχρόνως μία μεγάλη ἑλληνικὴ νίκη.

Τί εἶχε ὅμως κάνει τὸν 'Ιταλὸν μουσικοκριτικὸν νὰ ἔχῃ τὶς ἐπιφυλάξεις του ἀπέναντι τοῦ Μητροπούλου καὶ τί τὸν ἔπεισεν ὄχι μόνον ν' ἀλλάξῃ γνώμην, ἀλλὰ νὰ πληρώσῃ μὲ τοὺς τόκους καὶ μὲ τὰ ἐπιτόκια τὸ χρέος ποὺ ἤρνεῖτο ν' ἀναγνωρίσῃ ἕως χθές; Μᾶς τὸ λέγει ὁ ἴδιος:

'Η ἀφορμὴ ποὺ τὸν ἔκανε νὰ ἔχῃ ἐπιφυλάξεις γιὰ τὸν Μητρόπουλον ἦταν τὸ πολύκροτον «ἐπεισόδιον», ποὺ ἐσημειώθη πέρυσι εἰς τὴν «Σκάλα» τοῦ Μιλάνου. Διευθυντὴς τῆς ὀρχήστρας ἦταν πάλιν ὁ Μητρόπουλος. Τὸ κοινὸν ἐσφύριζε τότε, ὄχι τὴν ὀρχήστραν καὶ τὸν διευθυντήν της, ἀλλὰ τὸ ἐκτελούμενον ἔργον: Τὴν ὄπερα «Βοτσὲκ» τοῦ μακαρίτου 'Αλμπὰν Μπέργκ. 'Επρόκειτο γιὰ ἕνα ἀπὸ τὰ πιὸ δύσκολα ἔργα τῆς μοντέρνας μουσικῆς. Μπροστὰ εἰς τὶς ἀποδοκιμασίες ὁ Μητρόπουλος δὲν ἐσυνθηκολόγησε. "Αφησε τὴν ὀρχήστραν, ἐστράφη πρὸς τὸ κοινὸν καὶ ἔκανε νόημα πὼς ἤθελε νὰ τοῦ ὁμιλῄσῃ. 'Η χειρονομία του εἶχε κάτι τὸ παθητικὸν καὶ ἀπονενοημένον, σὲ τέτοιο σημεῖον, ὥστε ἐπεβλήθη. Τὸ κοινὸν ἐσιώπησε. Κί τότε ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἄρχισε νὰ ἐξηγῇ εἰς τὸ κοινὸν ὅτι ἡ ὁμορφιὰ τῆς μουσικῆς τοῦ "Αλμπαν Μπέργκ εἶναι δυσπρόσιτη. "Οτι χρειάζεται κάποια προσπάθεια γιὰ νὰ εἰσδύσῃ κανεὶς μέχρις αὐτῆς καὶ νὰ τὴν συλλάβῃ. Διαμαρτυρία, ψόγος, μομφή; Τίποτε ἀπὸ αὐτά. 'Ο Μητρόπουλος ἀπηυθύνθη εἰς τὸ κοινὸν ὄχι γιὰ νὰ τὸ καταδικάσῃ, ἀλλὰ γιὰ νὰ τὸ μυήσῃ. Καὶ τὸ θαῦμα ἔγινε: Τὸ ἴδιον κοινὸν ποὺ πρὸ ὀλίγου εἶχε σφυρίξει, ἐξέσπασε εἰς χειροκροτήματα. 'Ο δαμαστὴς τῆς ὀρχήστρας εἶχε μεταβληθῆ εἰς ἀνθρωποδαμαστήν. 'Ο Μητρόπουλος εἶχε δαμάσει τὸ μυριοκέφαλον θηρίον ποὺ ὀνομάζεται «κοινόν». Αὐτὸ δὲν τοῦ συγχωροῦσεν ὁ μουσικοκριτικὸς Τσέλλι πεὺ ἀπὸ τῶν ἰδίων στηλῶν, ἀπὸ τῶν ὁποίων ἐξομολογεῖται ἐφέτος τὴν ἁμαρτίαν του καὶ δικαιώνει τὸν Μητρόπουλον, τὸν εἶχε καταγγείλει πέρυσι ὡς «ἐπιδειξεομανῆ». «"Ημουν ἕνας ἀπὸ ἐκείνους — γράφει σήμερα ὁ Τσέλλι — ποὺ πιστεύουν ὅτι εἰς τὸ θέατρον ἕνας μαέστρος δὲν δικαιοῦται νὰ ἐκφράζεται παρὰ μόνον μὲ τὰς χειρονομίας, μὲ τὰς ὁποίας διευθύνει τὴν ὀρχήστραν του. 'Η ἀπρόοπτη ἐκείνη ἐπέμβασις τοῦ Μητροπούλου μοῦ φαίνεται ὅτι περιέκλειε μίαν δόσιν «ἐξιμπισιονισμοῦ», ὁ ὁποῖος ἔπρεπε νὰ χτυπηθῇ. Σήμερα ὅμως ἤλλαξα γνώμην. Εἶχα τὴν εὐκαιρίαν νὰ γνωρίσω καλύτερα τὸν Μητρόπουλον καὶ νὰ συνομιλήσω μαζί του ἐπὶ μακρὰς ὥρας. Καὶ ἀπεκόμισα τὴν ἐντύπωσιν ὅτι ὀλίγοι, πολὺ ὀλίγοι καλλιτέχναι εἶναι ὅσον αὐτὸς ξένοι πρὸς κάθε ὑπόνοιαν ἐξιμπισιονισμοῦ. 'Εξακολουθῶ ν' ἀμφισβητῶ τὴν σκοπιμότητα τοῦ «λογυδρίου» ποὺ ἐξεφώνησε κατὰ τὴν παράστασιν τοῦ «Βότσεκ» ὁ Μητρόπουλος. Κατενόησα ὅμως καὶ ἀναγνωρίζω ὅτι τὴν ἐπέμβασιν ἐκείνην δὲν τοῦ τὴν εἶχεν ἐμπνεύσει τὸ πάθος τῆς ἐπιδείξεως. Τὴν ὑπηγόρευσεν εἰς τὸν καλλιτέχνην ἡ ἐσωτερική του φωνή, ἡ συναίσθησις τῆς διακονίας του εἰς τὸν Ναὸν τῆς Τέχνης. 'Ο Μητρόπουλος εἶναι ὁ ἀκατάπονητος «ἱεραπόστολος», ὁ προπαγανδιστὴς τῶν μουσικῶν ἀξιῶν, ὅλων ἐν γένει τῶν ἀξιῶν τῆς Μουσικῆς, καὶ ὄχι μόνον μιᾶς ὡρισμένης σχολῆς ἢ τεχνοτροπίας. Τὴν τέχνην καὶ ὄχι μόνον αὐτήν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὴν ζωὴν ὁ Μητρόπουλος τὰς θεωρεῖ ὡς μίαν ἱερὰν ἀποστολήν. Εἰς ὅλας του τὰς πράξεις, εἰς ὅλους του τοὺς λόγους, ὁ Μητρόπουλος εἶναι ὁ μεγάλος ἱεραπόστολος, τὸν ὁποῖον κινεῖ μιὰ βαθειὰ μυστικοπάθεια. "Αν δὲν εἶχε γίνει μουσικός, ἀσφαλῶς θὰ γινόταν ἱεραπόστολος». Καὶ ὁ ἐπικριτὴς τῆς χθὲς περνᾶ ἀμέσως εἰς τὸν ἀνεπιφύλακτον θαυμασμὸν καὶ τὸ ἐγκώμιον: «'Ο "Ελλην Δημήτρης Μητρόπουλος — γράφει — θεωρεῖται σήμερα ἕνας ἀπὸ τοὺς μεγαλυτέρους ζῶντας διευθυντὰς ὀρχήστρας, ἕνας ἀπὸ τοὺς πέντε ἢ ἕξη μεγίστους «στρατηγοὺς» τῆς παγκοσμίου ὀρχήστρας. Αὐτὴν τὴν γνώμην φαίνεται νὰ ἔχῃ καὶ ὁ 'Αρτοῦρο Τοσκανίνι. Καὶ ὅποιος γνωρίζει τὸν Τοσκανίνι, εἶναι εἰς θέσιν νὰ ξέρῃ πόσον φειδωλὸς εἶναι εἰς τὰ ἐγκώμια τῶν νεωτέρων του διευθυντῶν ὀρχήστρας. Εἰς τὸ ἔργον τοῦ διευθυντοῦ τῆς ὀρχήστρας ὁ Μητρόπουλος, ὅπως μοῦ λέγει ὁ ἴδιος, προσεχώρησε μὲ ζωηρὰς ἀνησυχίας καὶ ἀμφιβολίας. 'Ο διευθυντὴς τῆς ὀρχήστρας ἐθεωρεῖτο ὡς ἕνα εἶδος «δικτάτορος» καὶ «τυράννου» διὰ τοὺς ἐκτελεστὰς ποὺ διηύθυνε. «Δὲν μοῦ ἄρεσε — μοῦ εἶπεν ὁ Μητρόπουλος — νὰ ἐκβιάζω τοὺς μουσικοὺς τῆς ὀρχήστρας καὶ νὰ πνίγω τὴν εὐαισθησίαν καὶ τὴν προσωπικότητά των. Δὲν ἤθελα νὰ γίνω ἕνας δικτάτωρ». Καὶ δὲν ἔγινε. 'Ως διευθυντὴς τῆς ὀρχήστρας βρῆκε τὸν δρόμο του. 'Αντὶ νὰ «ἐξαναγκάζῃ» τοὺς μουσικοὺς ποὺ διηύθυνε, προσπάθησε νὰ τοὺς πείσῃ. Καὶ σήμερα ἀκόμη ποὺ ἐγνώρισε τὴν διεθνῆ καθιέρωσιν, ὁ Μητρόπουλος εἶναι μεταξὺ τῶν μεγάλων μαέστρων ὁ πιὸ ἥρεμος, ὁ πιὸ εὐφραδής, ὁ πιὸ πειστικός». Διευθύνει τὴν ὀρχήστρα ὄχι μὲ τὴν μπαγκέτα, ἀλλὰ μὲ τὰ ἐκφραστικὰ χέρια του. 'Η μέθοδος αὐτή, ὅπως τὸ ἀναγνωρίζει καὶ ὁ ἴδιος, εἶναι ἐπικίνδυνη. "Οταν ὅμως ὁ διευθυντὴς τῆς ὀρχήστρας ἔχῃ ἐξαιρετικὰ ἐκφραστικὰ χέρια, ἡ μέθοδος αὐτὴ εἶναι ἡ πιὸ ἀποτελεσματική. Καὶ ὅταν ἀκόμη ὁ Μητρόπουλος δὲν διευθύνῃ τὴν ὀρχήστραν, καὶ ὅταν ἀκόμη στὸ μικρόν του δωμάτιον συνομιλεῖ μὲ ἕνα ἐπισκέπτην του, τὰ μακρουλά, νευρώδη, εὐφραδῆ χέρια του διατηροῦν ὅλη τους τὴν πλούσια ἐκφραστικότητα. Τὴν διατηροῦν καὶ ὅταν ἀκόμη παίζουν μὲ τὸ κομπολόϊ. Τὰ ἴδια χέρια ποὺ παίζουν, ὅσον ὀλίγοι εἰς αὐτὸν τὸν κόσμο, πιάνο — διότι ὁ Μητρόπουλος, μαθητὴς τοῦ μεγάλου Φερούτσιο Μπουσσόνι εἰς τὸ Βερολῖνον, εἶχεν ἀναδειχθῆ εἰς μεγάλον πιανίστα πρὶν γίνῃ διευθυντὴς ὀρχήστρας — τὰ ἴδια χέρια ποὺ παίζουν μὲ ἄφθαστη ταχύτητα πιάνο, παίζουν σήμερα τό... κομπολόϊ! «Πρὸ ἐτῶν— μοῦ ἐξήγησεν ὁ Μητρόπουλος — ὑπέφερα ἀπὸ σοβαρὰς καρδιακὰς κρίσεις. Οἱ γιατροί μοῦ συνέστησαν νὰ κόψω τὸ τσιγάρο. Καὶ γιὰ νὰ μὴν ὑποκύψω εἰς τὸν πειρασμόν — μοῦ ἐξήγησε — ν' ἀνάψω ἕνα τσιγάρο, προσέφυγα εἰς τὸ κομπολόϊ. Εἶναι ἡ ἀλυσίδα ποὺ δένει τὰ χέρια μου καὶ μὲ κρατεῖ αἰχμάλωτον». 'Ο Μητρόπουλος ὅμως καὶ τὰ μοναδικὰ εἰς ἔκφρασιν χέρια του εἶναι πρὸ παντὸς αἰχμάλωτοι τῆς Μουσικῆς...».

Ein vielgesuchter Mann

(-ck) Unter den Festspielgästen, die der gestrigen Eröffnungsvorstellung beiwohnten, befand sich auch Dimitri Mitropoulos, ein Mann der bereits kurz nach seiner Ankunft so überlaufen war, daß er es vorzog, sich in die Fränkische Schweiz abzusetzen.

Es ist der erste Dirigent des Symphonieorchesters New York, dem

Theateragenten und andere Herren und Damen vom Fach ihre Aufwartung machen wollten. Trotzdem gelang es unserem -ck - Mitarbeiter, Mitropoulos zu einer kurzen Unterredung bereitzufinden. Es ist das erstemal, daß er nach Bayreuth kommt. Was ihn dazu bestimmt habe, zu kommen? fragen wir ihn. Er antwortet, in Amerika werde soviel Gutes und Interessantes von Bayreuth gesprochen, daß es eine Notwendigkeit sei, sich einmal selbst zu überzeugen. Mit dem New Yorker Symphonieorchester spiele er zwar nicht in der Oper, sondern nur im Konzertsaal. Trotzdem gehöre die Pflege der Wagnerschen Musik selbstverständlich auch zu seinem Programm.

„Ich glaubte, mit Wagner fertig zu sein"

Dimitri Mitropoulos auf Festspielreise zwischen Bayreuth, München und Salzburg

Dimitri Mitropoulos, der Leiter des Philharmonischen Orchesters New York, hat während seiner Informationsreise durch die europäischen Festspielstädte für einige Tage in München Station gemacht. Im Sommer 1954 wird Mitropoulos im Rahmen der Münchner „Musica viva" sein erstes Konzert im Nachkriegsdeutschand dirigieren. Der amerikanische Dirigent erzählte uns von seinen Eindrücken in Bayreuth und München.

Der Dirigent Dimitri Mitropoulos — vor 57 Jahren in Griechenland geboren — groß geworden im Berlin der zwanziger Jahre, seit 18 Jahren leidenschaftlicher Verfechter der neuen Musik in den USA —, zählt sich zu den „Ausdrucksmusikern", zu denen, für die Musik ein Instrument der Metaphysik und der Seele bedeutet. Sein Name ist mit der Welt Bergs, Schönbergs oder Mahlers verbunden wie die Interpretennamen Bülow und Richter mit dem Werk Richard Wagners. Mitropoulos ging als Europäer nach Amerika und kommt heute wieder als Europäer zurück. Nicht Amerika hat ihn beeinflußt, sondern er hat Amerika für die neue Musik Europas aufgeschlossen. Das Geheimnis seines Erfolgs: Für ihn, der nichts heftiger ablehnt als den Stardirigenten („Der Dirigentenkult ist beinahe etwas Kriminelles!"), war Amerika keine Melkkuh für Starerfolge, sondern ein Neuland, dem es Kulturwerte zu vermitteln galt. Das Publikum in den amerikanischen Großstädten fühlte sich von ihm ernst genommen und leistete allmählich Gefolgschaft bei den musikalischen Experimenten. Vor drei Jahren war das Eis gebrochen; der Avantgardist Mitropoulos wurde Leiter der New Yorker Philharmoniker.

„Meine Eindrücke von Europa, wo ich vor zwei Jahren zum ersten Male wieder gewesen bin? Die Leute dürsten nach Musik. Nie war ihnen die Musik so wichtig. Überall sind das ganze Jahr über Festspiele. Europa ist ein wahres Dorado der musikalischen Kunst." Mitropoulos faßt seinen Enthusiasmus in tadelloses Deutsch; er hat es, nebst der Kunst des Komponierens und dem Dirigentenhandwerk, in Berlin gelernt, wo er zuerst Schüler Busonis gewesen war, Korrepetitor an der Staatsoper wurde und schließlich mit einem sensationellen Auftreten als Solist und Dirigent des 3. Klavierkonzerts von Prokofieff das Interesse der musikalischen Welt auf sich zog. „Ich wollte gar nicht Dirigent, sondern Komponist werden. Das Schicksal hat anders entschieden."

Maestro Mitropoulos kommt aus Bayreuth. „Ich glaubte mit Wagner fertig zu sein. Jahrelang habe ich keines seiner Werke mehr dirigiert. Ich bin zu allen Festspielaufführungen in Bayreuth gewesen. Glauben Sie mir, ich habe meine Kindheit wiedererlebt. Ich bin zutiefst erschüttert gewesen. Wagner sollte von jetzt ab nur noch in Bayreuth gespielt werden, wo die Inszenierungen der Enkelsöhne sein Werk so vollendet darstellen, daß Wagner noch jahrhundertelang weiterleben kann. Die Bayreuther Festspiele müssen zu einem Mittelpunkt der geistigen Welt werden. Und die ganze Welt muß das neue Bayreuth unterstützen. Ich werde meinen ganzen Einfluß geltend machen. Allmählich sollte auch das neue Opernschaffen in Bayreuth seinen Einzug halten."

Pfitzner verehrt Mitropoulos ebenso überzeugt wie Reger und Mahler. Um den „Palestrina" zu hören, kam er nach München. „Palestrina ist eine der größten Leistungen des 20. Jahrhunderts. Ich freute mich, in Robert Heger einen hervorragenden Pfitzner-Experten am Pult sehen zu können. Allerdings müßte ein so heikles Werk wie der 'Palestrina' gründlicher probiert werden können, als das bei den Münchner Festspielen, wo sich die verschiedensten Aufführungen und Dirigenten innerhalb der kürzesten Frist gegenüberstehen, der Fall sein konnte." Mitropoulos will versuchen, den „Palestrina" an der Mailänder Scala und in England heimisch zu machen.

Mitropoulos will sich während seiner Münchner Tage über den Wert des Schaffens von Carl Orff klar werden. Die „Trionfi" hat er unter Jochums Leitung gehört, die „Antigonae" will er morgen im Prinzregententheater sehen. Dann reist der Europäer aus Amerika nach Salzburg, zur Uraufführung von Gottfried von Einems Oper „Der Prozeß".

Amerikas berühmter Dirigent von Einem begeistert

Für wenige Tage der Rast, auch um der Uraufführung von Einems „Prozeß" beizuwohnen, hat sich der große amerikanische Dirigent Dimitri Mitropoulos im Fondachhof in Parsch aufgehalten. Mitropoulos, der zum erstenmal nach dem Krieg kürzlich an der Mailänder Scala und in Florenz dirigierte, ist bekanntlich der Leiter der hervorragenden New Yorker Philharmoniker. Als solcher hat er heuer in der Carnegie Hall ein Orchesterstück Gottfried von Einems aufgeführt und plant, in der nächsten Saison die Wiedergabe einer weiteren Orchesterkomposition des Österreichers. Nach seinem italienischen Gastspiel reiste Mitropoulos, der griechischer Abkunft ist, nach Bayreuth. In einem Gespräch über seine europäischen Kunsterlebnisse in diesem Sommer meinte er: „Endlich haben die Enkel Richard Wagners den Aufführungsstil gefunden."

Von Bayreuth begab sich der Maestro nach München, wo er bei den dortigen Festspielen einige Theateraufführungen und Konzerte der Musica Viva besuchte. Die Begegnung mit dem Werk Carl Orffs, dessen „Antionae" und „Trionfi", die Mitropoulos konzertant aufgeführt erlebte, („Ich dirigiere in Amerika keine Opern", erzählte er, „wohl aber führe ich solche ab und zu konzertant auf"), war für ihn bedeutungsvoll. „Hier ist etwas ganz Neues, das völlig aus dem Persönlichen kommt", meinte er. „Orff schreibt alles immer für sich, was nicht heißen soll, daß seine Musik nicht alle anginge. Aber was er schafft, ist eben durchwegs persönlich und neu." Befragt, ob das amerikanische Publikum Orffs musikalisches Werk positiv aufnehmen würde, sagte er: „Und warum nicht? Gerade. Es richtet sich doch an alle Menschen und man brächte drüben ja die entsprechende Aufgeschlossenheit einem so großartig Neuen entgegen." Abgesehen von Orff, berichtete er dann noch in fließendem Deutsch, indes er die Perlen eines besonders reich geschnitzten orientalischen Rosenkranzes zwischen den immer beweglichen Fingern durchlaufen ließ, „habe ich die Musik Egks, Hartmanns, Blachers, Fortners, Wagner-Regenys mit größtem Interesse auf mich wirken lassen. Alles Große, wirkliche Begabungen, deren Musik ich in Amerika gebührenden Platz einräumen werde."

Gespräch mit Dimitri Mitropoulos

Der berühmte Dirigent über seine Eindrücke in Europa
Mitwirkung bei den Salzburger Festspielen 1954

Von unserem Mitarbeiter

Salzburg, 18. August

„Ja, ich habe mit der Festspieldirektion für die Saison 1954 einen Vertrag für ein Konzert mit den Wiener Philharmonikern abgeschlossen, sagte Dimitri Mitropoulos, der nun einige Tage inkognito am Stadtrande Salzburgs ausgeruht hat, ehe er nach der „Prozeß"-Premiere wieder an seine Wirkungsstätte nach New York zurückflog. Bekanntlich ist er der Leiter des hervorragenden New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Mitropoulos zählt heute einige fünfzig, ist in Athen geboren, aber schon lange in den Vereinigten Staaten heimisch geworden. Der elegante, sehnige Mann mit dem braungebrannten Gesicht, der kühn geschwungenen Nase, erzählt sehr lebendig das während seines europäischen Aufenthaltes in den letzten Wochen Erlebte. Zuerst dirigierte er, übrigens zum erstenmal seit dem Kriegsende in Europa, in Florenz und an der Mailänder Scala. Danach reiste Mitropoulos nach Bayreuth, wo er über den Regiestil der Wagner-Enkel hell entzückt war. Er findet, daß dieser Stil der heute einzig tragbare, direkt aus der Musik entspringende sei und Schule auf der ganzen Welt machen müsse. Von Bayreuth begab sich der Maestro nach München, wo ihn das Werk Karl Orffs, dem er dort zum erstenmal begegnete, faszinierte. Sowohl die „Antigone", wie auch die konzertante Wiedergabe von dessen neuestem Werk „Trionfi" fanden seine Zustimmung. Er meint, daß sich Orffs Musik in Amerika sehr rasch durchsetzen würde. Neben Orff nahm er zur musikalischen Welt der Egk, Hartmann, Fortner, Wagner-Regeny und Blacher Fühlung und will all diesen ihre Chance im amerikanischen Musikleben verschaffen.

Ein Orchesterwerk Gottfried Einems hat Dimitri Mitropoulos bereits in diesem Jahr mit den New-Yorker Philharmonikern in Anwesenheit des Komponisten in der Carnegie Hall erfolgreich aufgeführt und gleich ein weiteres zur Aufführung unter seiner Stabführung für die nächste Saison angenommen. Er ist solange in Salzburg geblieben, bis er die Uraufführung des „Prozeß" erleben konnte, dem er eine Aufführungssuite auf der ganzen Welt prophezeit. Er hält Einem heute für den bedeutendsten Repräsentanten der jüngeren Komponistengeneration. Dienstag früh kehrte Mitropoulos nach Amerika zurück.

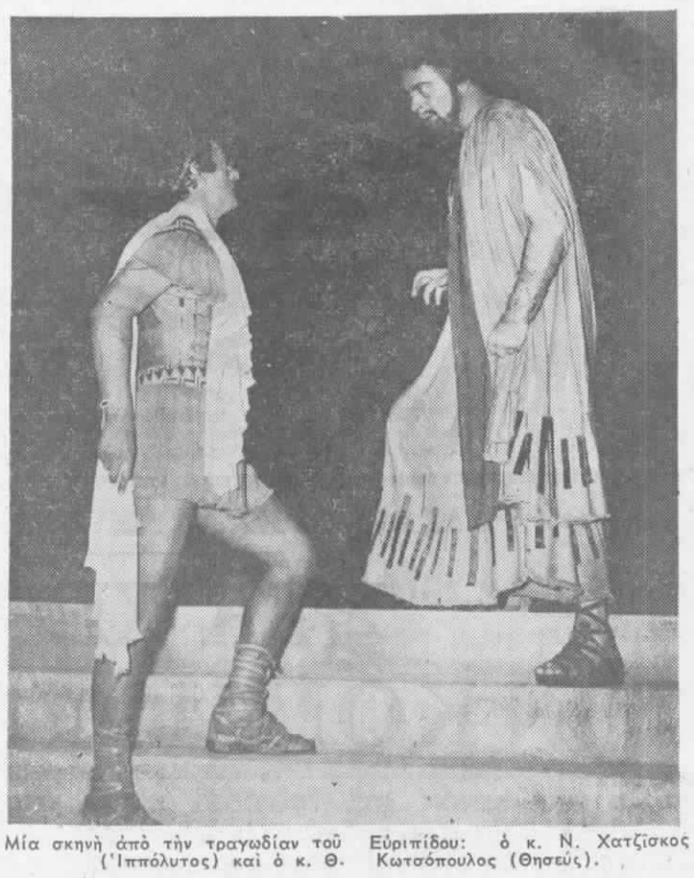
ΑΘΗΝΑΪΚΑ ΕΙΚΟΣΙΤΕΤΡΑΩΡΑ

ΩΔΕΙΟΝ ΗΡΩΔΟΥ ΑΤΤΙΚΟΥ

Θίασος Ἐθνικοῦ Θεάτρου

«ΙΠΠΟΛΥΤΟΣ»

ΤΟΥ ΕΥΡΙΠΙΔΟΥ



Ἀπὸ τὴν χθεσινοβραδυνὴ παράστασι τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου» ἔλειψε ἐκεῖνο ποὺ ἔκανε τὴν ἑρμηνεία τῆς «Ὀρεστείας», πρὶν ἀπὸ τρία χρόνια, τὸ καλύτερο ἀσφαλῶς σκηνοθετικὸ ἐπίτευγμα τοῦ Δημήτρη Ροντήρη. Ἔλειψε ἡ δημιουργικὴ ἀπόδοσις τοῦ ἔργου τοῦ Εὐριπίδου, ὁ μυσταγωγικὸς τόνος, τὸ ζωντάνεμα τοῦ ἀρχαίου κειμένου, ὅσο κι' ἂν οἱ συντριπτικοὶ ὀγκόλιθοι τοῦ ρωμαϊκοῦ οἰκοδομήματος, μὲ τοὺς μυστικοπαθεῖς φωτισμοὺς καὶ μὲ τὰ μυστηριακὰ σκοτάδια, δὲν παρέχουν τὸ πλαίσιο ποὺ ταιριάζει στὸ τέκνο τοῦ ἀπολλωνίου φωτός, ποὺ εἶνε ἡ ἑλληνικὴ τραγῳδία.

Δὲν εἶχε δυστυχῶς αὐτὴ τὴ φορὰ ὁ Δημήτρης Ροντήρης τὶς εὐτυχεῖς ἐμπνεύσεις ποὺ συνετέλεσαν ὥστε ἡ Τριλογία τοῦ Αἰσχύλου ν' ἀφήσῃ ἐποχὴ στὴν διδασκαλία τοῦ ἀρχαίου δράματος. Δὲν εἶχε τὴν βοήθεια τῆς Μαρίκας Κοτοπούλη καὶ τὶς χορογραφικὲς δημιουργίες τῆς Ραλλοῦς Μάνου, οὔτε καὶ μιὰ μετάφρασι σὰν ἐκείνη τοῦ Γιάννη Γρυπάρη. Τὸ μόνο ποὺ τὸν ἐξυπηρέτησεν ἦταν ἡ ὑποβλητικὴ μουσικὴ ὑπόκρουσις τοῦ Δημήτρη Μητροπούλου, ἴσως ἡ καλύτερη ποὺ ἔχει συντεθῇ ἀπὸ Ἕλληνα γιὰ ἀρχαία τραγῳδία.

Ἡ ἐξοικονόμησις τοῦ χοροῦ —ἡ προσπάθεια δηλαδὴ νὰ μὴ μένουν ἀκίνητοι, σὰν κούτσουρα, ἐκεῖνοι ἢ ἐκεῖνες ποὺ τὸν ἀποτελοῦν σ' ὅλη τὴν διάρκεια τῆς παραστάσεως— δὲν ἦταν ἀπὸ τὶς εὐστοχώτερες. Οἱ κοπέλλες ποὺ συγκροτοῦν τὸν χορὸ τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου» παίρνουν μερικὲς φορὲς ἐπιτυχημένες στάσεις, ἀλλὰ κινοῦνται μὲ τρόπο ποὺ δικαιολογεῖ ὅσους συνιστοῦν ἀποχὴν ἀπὸ ρυθμικοὺς ἐλιγμούς, ἀφοῦ δὲν εἶνε γνωστὸ πῶς χόρευε καὶ πῶς τραγουδοῦσε ὁ ἀρχαῖος χορός.

Ἡ μετάφρασις τοῦ καθηγητοῦ Δ. Σάρρου προσπαθεῖ νὰ κάνῃ ἀντιληπτὸ τὸ κείμενο. Δὲν ἔχει ὅμως φιλοτεχνηθῇ ἀπὸ ποιητὴ καὶ μένει δασκαλίστικη. Πολὺ καλὴ ἂν θὰ ἦταν δυνατὸν νὰ διδαχθῇ ὁ «Ἱππόλυτος» σὲ σχολικὴ παράστασι —πρᾶγμα κάπως δύσκολο...— ἄτονη καὶ σχεδὸν ἄψυχη στὸ Θέατρο. Ἐπὶ πλέον ὁ μεταφραστὴς παίρνει μιὰν ἀπαράδεκτη ἐλευθερία: ἀποδίδει σὲ ὁμοιοκαταλήκτους στίχους ὡρισμένα χορικά, αὐθαιρεσία ποὺ ἀποτελεῖ σχεδὸν ἀνευλάβεια πρὸς τὸν Εὐριπίδη.

Ὁ «Ἱππόλυτος» παίχθηκε γιὰ πρώτη φορὰ κατὰ σκηνοθεσία τοῦ Δημήτρη Ροντήρη τὸ φθινόπωρο τοῦ 1936 πάλι στὸ Ὠδεῖο τοῦ Ἡρώδου.

Μία σκηνὴ ἀπὸ τὴν τραγῳδίαν τοῦ Εὐριπίδου: ὁ κ. Ν. Χατζίσκος ('Ιππόλυτος) καὶ ὁ κ. Θ. Κωτσόπουλος (Θησεύς).

μὲ τὴν Κατίνα Παξινοῦ καὶ τὸν Ἀλέξη Μινωϊτῆ. Δὲν μᾶς εἶχε πολυαρέσει τότε ἡ ἑρμηνεία τοῦ ρόλου τῆς Φαίδρας, ἀλλὰ χθὲς τὸ βράδυ νοσταλγήσαμε καὶ τοὺς δύο πρωταγωνιστὰς τοῦ 1936. Δυστυχῶς ἡ νέα Ἔκδοσις τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου» ἀπέδειξε πόσο φτωχὸς ἔχει μείνει ὁ θίασος τοῦ Ἐθνικοῦ Θεάτρου, ἀφοῦ ἡ Φαίδρα καὶ ὁ Ἱππόλυτος ἀνετέθησαν σὲ ἠθοποιοὺς ἐντελῶς ἀκαταλλήλους νὰ τοὺς ἑρμηνεύσουν.

Ἡ Ἄλσα Βεργῆ ἔχει ἀναμφισβήτητα προσόντα τραγῳδοῦ. Εἶνε ἐπιβλητική, ἀγαλματώδης, αὐστηρὰ λιτὴ στὸ παίξιμό της. Μιὰ τέτοια ὅμως γυναίκα δωρικοῦ ρυθμοῦ πῶς μπορεῖ νὰ δώσῃ τὴν αἴσθησι τοῦ θηλυκοῦ πού, παρὰ τὶς τύψεις τῆς συνειδήσεως, φλέγεται ὁλόκληρο ἀπὸ τὸ ἔνοχο πάθος πρὸς τὸν προγονό: Ἡ σύζυγος τοῦ Θησέως, ποὺ σπαρταρᾷ στὸ κατώφλι τῆς φοβερώτερης μοιχείας, ἔχει τέτοια θηλυκότητα ποὺ νὰ δικαιολογῆται ὁ στίχος τοῦ Ρακίνα στὴν «Φαίδρα» του:

C' est Venus toute entière à sa proie attachée

Ἡ Ἄλσα Βεργῆ ὅμως, ἀντὶ γιὰ τὴν Ἀφροδίτη, θὰ ταίριαζε νὰ ἐνσαρκώσῃ τὴν Ἀρτέμιδα...

Τὸ ἀντίθετο συμβαίνει μὲ τὸν Νῖκο Χατζίσκο. Δὲν εἶνε βέβαια ὁ συμπαθὴς αὐτὸς καλλιτέχνης εἰδικευμένος «ἐραστὴς» στὴ σκηνή, ἀλλὰ ἀπὸ τὴν ἐποχὴ ποὺ ἔπαιζε πολὺ εὔγλωττα τοὺς ἐξαγγέλους, τοῦ ἔχει μείνει κάτι τὸ «σαντεκλερικό», ποὺ ἀσφαλῶς δὲν ἁρμόζει στὴν ἀρρενωπὴ παρθενικότητα τοῦ λάτρου τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος. Ὁ Ἱππόλυτος, ποὺ ἐκφωνεῖ τὸν περίφημο φιλιππικὸ κατὰ τῶν γυναικῶν καὶ καυχᾶται ὅτι εἶνε ἀναχωρητὴς τοῦ Ἔρωτος, δὲν μπορεῖ συγχρόνως καὶ νὰ κορδώνεται σὰν κόκορας ἐν ὄψει ἐνδεχομένου θήλεος, ἐντύπωσι ποὺ δίνει μὲ τὸ παίξιμά του ὁ Ν. Χατζίσκος.

Ἀπὸ ὅλους τοὺς ἠθοποιοὺς καλύτερα ἔπαιξε ἡ Ἀθανασία Μουστάκα. Ἦταν μιὰ παραμάνα ἴσως κάπως ρεαλιστική, ἔξω ἀπὸ τὸν ὀρθόδοξο τόνο τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγῳδίας, ἀλλὰ πολὺ ἐκφραστική, ἀντάξιο «παντάν» τῆς συγκινητικῆς ἐκείνης ποὺ δημιούργησε στὴν «Ὀρέστεια». Μὲ ἄνεσι κράτησε τὸν ρόλο τοῦ Θησέως ὁ Θάνος Κωτσόπουλος. Καλὸς ἀγγελιαφόρος ὁ Στέλιος Βόκοβιτς, μολονότι δὲν μᾶς ἱκανοποίησεν ἀπόλυτα ἡ ἀφήγησις τῆς τραγικῆς περιπετείας τοῦ Ἱππολύτου. Ἡ Κάκια Παναγιώτου (Ἀφροδίτη) καὶ ἡ Ἀλέκα Κατσέλη (Ἄρτεμις) ἀπήγγειλαν εὐσυνείδητα κ' ἐχρωμάτισαν ὑποβλητικὰ τὰ μέρη τους. Ἀξία ἰδιαιτέρας μνείας ἡ κορυφαία τοῦ χοροῦ Θάλεια Καλλιγᾶ.

Η ΜΟΥΣΙΚΗ ΣΤΗΝ ΑΡΧΑΙΑ ΤΡΑΓΩΔΙΑ

ΤΟΥ κ. ΜΑΝ. ΚΑΛΟΜΟΙΡΗ

Τὸ πρόβλημα τῆς μουσικῆς στὴν ἀρχαία τραγῳδία εἶνε ἄλυτο. Ὅσες γνώσεις κι' ἂν ἔχωμε γιὰ τὴ θεωρητικὴ τῆς ἀρχαίας ἑλληνικῆς μουσικῆς, δὲν ἔχομε καμμίαν ἀντίληψι γιὰ τὴν πρακτική της ἀπόδοσι καὶ στὴν πραγματικότητα εἴμαστε τελείως ἀνίδεοι γιὰ τὸ ἄκουσμα καὶ τὴν ἀπόδοσι τῆς μουσικῆς ποὺ ἕνας Αἰσχύλος ἢ ἕνας Σοφοκλῆς εἴχανε οἱ ἴδιοι —γιὰ τὸν Εὐριπίδη λέγεται πὼς ἀνέθετε σὲ ἄλλους τὸ μουσικὸ μέρος— ἐμπνευσθῇ ἐπάνω στοὺς ἀριστουργηματικοὺς στίχους των.

Γι' αὐτὸ καὶ κάθε ἀπόπειρα ἀναδημιουργίας τῆς μουσικῆς τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγῳδίας ἐπάνω σὲ καθωρισμένα καλούπια, βγαλμένα ἀπὸ τὴ μελέτη τῆς ἀρχαίας θεωρίας τῆς τέχνης τῶν ἤχων καὶ τῶν ρυθμῶν, στάθηκε πάντα ἀτυχὴς καὶ δὲν ἀπέδωκε παρὰ μουσικὴ ὠχρή, ἀναιμική, χωρὶς ἐμπνευσι καὶ χωρὶς πνοή. Τὸ ἴδιο καὶ διάφορες ἄλλες μουσικὲς προσπάθειες, βασισμένες σὲ σκηνοθετικὲς ὑποδείξεις καὶ γραμμένες ἔστω καὶ ἀπὸ καλοὺς μουσικούς, μὲ κάποια προχειρολογία γιὰ νὰ δημιουργήσουνε λίγο εὐχάριστο μουσικὸ θόρυβο σὲ κάθε εἴσοδο τοῦ χοροῦ ἢ κάτι σχετικό.

Ἔτσι τὸ πρόβλημα τῆς μουσικῆς τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγῳδίας παρουσιάζεται ἄλυτο.

Καὶ ὅμως ὑπάρχει μιὰ καὶ μόνη λύσι, ἀνάλογη μὲ τὴ λύσι τοῦ Γορδίου δεσμοῦ.

Μὲ ἄλλα λόγια, ἡ λύσι ποὺ θὰ δώσῃ ἕνας πραγματικὰ ἐμπνευσμένος μουσουργός, γράφοντας μιὰ μουσικὴ βγαλμένη ἀπὸ τὸ πνεῦμα καὶ τὴν ψυχὴ τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγῳδίας, ὄχι ὅμως κι' ἀπὸ τὸ γράμμα της, καὶ χωρὶς νὰ σκοτίζεται ἀπὸ ἀρχαιολογικὰ θεωρητικὰ ζητήματα. Τότε καὶ μόνο μᾶς δίνει μιὰ μουσικὴ γεμάτη ἀπὸ ἀληθινὴ συγκίνησι, ποὺ μπορεῖ νὰ δονήσῃ τὸν ἀκροατὴ καὶ νὰ τοῦ ξανοίξῃ τὸν ἐσώτερο κόσμο, τὸν ἀσύλληπτο, τῆς ψυχῆς τῆς ἀρχαίας ἑλληνικῆς τραγῳδίας.

Στὰ παλιότερα χρόνια ὁ Μέντελσον, μὲ τὸν τρόπο καὶ τὴν τεχνοτροπία του, ἔκοψεν ἔτσι τὸ Γόρδιο αὐτὸ δεσμὸ μὲ τὴν μουσική του στὴν «Ἀντιγόνη».

Στοὺς δικούς μας τοὺς καιροὺς καὶ στὸν τόπο μας, δυὸ μουσικὲς σὲ ἀρχαῖες τραγῳδίες ξέρω ποὺ κυρίως μπόρεσαν καὶ λύσανε κατ' ἀνάλογο τρόπο τὸ Γόρδιο αὐτὸ δεσμὸ τοῦ ἄλυτου μουσικοῦ προβλήματος:

Ἡ μιὰ εἶνε ἡ μουσικὴ στὴν «Ἑκάβη» ποὺ ἔγραψεν ὁ ἀξέχαστος Αἰμίλιος Ριάδης, ὅταν πρὶν χρόνια ἡ μεγάλη μας Μαρίκα Κοτοπούλη ἔδωσε τὴν «Ἑκάβη» στὸ Στάδιο.

Ἡ ἄλλη μουσικὴ εἶνε αὐτὴ ποὺ ἀκούσαμε προχθὲς στὸν «Ἱππόλυτο» τοῦ Εὐριπίδη γραμμένη ἀπὸ τὸ Μητρόπουλο.

Ἐντελῶς διαφορετικὲς οἱ δυὸ αὐτὲς μουσικὲς ἡ μιὰ ἀπὸ τὴν ἄλλη, τόσο στὴν τεχνοτροπία ὅσο καὶ στὴν ὅλη τους διάρθρωσι.

Ἔχουνε ὅμως ἕνα κοινὸ γνώρισμα ἀναμεταξύ τους πὼς εἶνε καὶ οἱ δύο πέρα ὡς πέρα γεμάτες ἀπὸ ἐμπνευσι, ἀπὸ ἀληθινὴ μουσικὴ συγκίνησι, ἀπὸ τὴ χαρὰ τῆς μεγάλης καὶ ἱερῆς τέχνης.

Γιὰ νὰ μείνω στὴ μουσικὴ τοῦ Μητρόπουλου ποὺ ἀκούσαμε προχθὲς θὰ ἤθελα νὰ τονίσω τὴ βαθειὰ ἐντύπωσι ποὺ μοῦ ἐπροξένησε ἀκούγοντάς την πάλι ὕστερα ἀπὸ δεκαπέντε τόσα χρόνια καὶ μπορῶ νὰ πῶ πὼς ἐφέτος μοῦ ἐπροξένησε μεγαλύτερη ἀκόμη συγκίνησι ἀπὸ τότε.

Λυποῦμαι πὼς δὲν εἶχα τὴν εὐκαιρία νὰ ξανακούσω πέρυσι καὶ τὴ μουσικὴ τῆς «Ἠλέκτρας» γιὰ νὰ δῶ ἂν θὰ ἔνοιωθα τὴν ἴδια πνοὴ ποὺ βρῆκα στὸν «Ἱππόλυτο».

Καὶ πιστεύω πὼς ἡ τόσον ὑποβλητικὴ αὐτὴ μουσικὴ δημιουργία θὰ μποροῦσε ἀκόμη περισσότερο νὰ συγκλονίσῃ τὸ ἀκροατήριο ἂν οἱ ἀκουστικὲς συνθῆκες ἦτανε καλύτερες ἀπὸ ὅ,τι μὲ τὸ κρυφτοῦλι ποὺ γίνεται στὸ Ὠδεῖον Ἡρώδου γιὰ τὴ μουσική.

Τὴ μουσική, ὅπως τὴν ἀντιλαμβάνονται στὸν τόπο μας, τοὐλάχιστον ὅλοι οἱ σκηνοθέτες, ἀκόμη καὶ ἕνας τόσο φωτισμένος καὶ ἐμπνευσμένος τεχνίτης ὅπως ὁ κ. Ροντήρης, μοῦ φαίνεται πὼς τὴ μεταχειρίζονται σὰν ἕναν ἀνεπιθύμητο συνοδοιπόρο τοῦ ὁποίου μπορεῖ νὰ χρησιμοποιοῦνε τὸ ταγαράκι του χρείας τυχούσης, ὅμως πρὸς Θεοῦ φυλάγονται νὰ μὴν ἐμφανισθοῦνε ποτὲ πουθενὰ μαζὶ σὰν φίλοι καὶ συνεργάτες.

Τὸ ἴδιο σκέπτομαι τί θὰ ἀπέδιδε τὸ θαυμάσιο τραγουδισμένο μέλος τῶν χορικῶν ἂν οἱ νεαρὲς χορῳδοὶ ἀντὶ νὰ τραγουδᾶνε μὲ μιὰν ἀνύπαρκτη φωνὴ μπορούσανε νὰ ἀποδώσουνε τὸ μέλος μὲ ὡραίαν ἐκφραστικὴ φωνὴ καὶ ἤτανε σὲ θέσι νὰ ἀρθρώσουνε τραγουδῶντας τὰ μέλη ὅπως κάνανε πράγματι ὅταν τὰ χορικὰ σὲ ἄλλα σημεῖα ἀπηγγέλλοντο κατὰ τὸ σύστημα τοῦ σπρὲχ κόρ.

Γράφοντας τὶς ἐντυπώσεις μου αὐτὲς θὰ ἤτανε ἄδικο νὰ μὴν ἐξάρω τὴν ἀληθινὰ πολύτιμη συμβολὴ τοῦ κ. Λυκούδη στὴν ὑλοποίησι καὶ ἀπόδοσι τῆς μουσικῆς σκέψεως τοῦ Μητροπούλου.

Τὸ νὰ στήσῃ κανεὶς τὴ μουσικὴν αὐτήν, ὑπὸ τὶς ἀκουστικὲς μάλιστα συνθῆκες ποὺ προσφέρει ὁ στενόχωρος χῶρος ὅπου περιορίζεται ἡ ὀρχήστρα στὸ Ὠδεῖον τοῦ Ἡρώδου ἦτανε ἕνας ἀληθινὸς καλλιτεχνικὸς ἄθλος τοῦ κ. Λυκούδη καὶ τὸν συγχαίρω καθὼς καὶ τοὺς μουσικοὺς τῆς ὀρχήστρας, ποὺ ἂν καὶ χωρὶς διολιὰ ποὺ θελητικὰ ἔχει παραλείψει ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἀπὸ τὴν ἐνορχήστρωσί του εἶχε τόσον συμπληρωμένη ἠχητικότητα — ὅσον βέβαια ἦτανε δυνατὸν νὰ ἀποδώσουν ἀπὸ ἐκεῖ ποὺ ἐκτελοῦνται.

ΑΠΟ ΤΗΝ ΖΩΗΝ

ΙΠΠΟΛΥΤΟΣ

Μέσα στὸ χάος τῶν ἀσημάντων θεαμάτων, ποὺ σερβίρονται στὰ θεατρά μας, ἡ Ἐθνικὴ Σκηνὴ ἑτοιμάζει τὸν «Ἱππόλυτο Στεφανηφόρο», τοῦ Εὐριπίδη. Ὅλες ἡ τραγῳδίες τοῦ τρίτου ἀπὸ τοὺς μεγάλους δραματικοὺς τοῦ 5ου αἰῶνος, παρουσιάζουν ἐξαιρετικὸ δραματουργικὸ καὶ ποιητικὸ ἐνδιαφέρον. Ὁ «Ἱππόλυτος», ὅμως, ἔχει τὴν χάρι μιᾶς σημαντικῆς ἀφετηρίας: Εἶναι μ' αὐτὴ τὴν τραγῳδία, ποὺ ἀνεβαίνει, γιὰ πρώτη φορά, ὁ ἔρως στὴ σκηνή. Ὁ Αἰσχύλος καὶ ὁ Σοφοκλῆς δὲν ἐτόλμησαν νὰ δώσουν τὴν εἰκόνα του στὸ θέατρο — ὁ Αἰσχύλος ἀποφασιστικὰ τὸν ἀγνοεῖ, ὁ Σοφοκλῆς τὸν ὑμνεῖ, ἀλλὰ δὲν τὸν παρουσιάζει — ἀπὸ φόβο μὴ βλάψουν τὴν ἀρετὴ τῶν ἡρωϊκῶν πολιτῶν, ποὺ δὲν εἶχαν μαραθῆ στοὺς κροτάφους των ἡ δάφνες τῶν Μηδικῶν πολέμων.

Ὁ ρεαλισμὸς τοῦ Εὐριπίδη παραμερίζει αὐτοὺς τοὺς ἀνωτέρους παιδαγωγικοὺς δισταγμούς. Καί, ἀπὸ τότε, σ' ὅλους τοὺς μετέπειτα αἰῶνες, ἕως σήμερα, ἡ διαβρωτικὲς φλόγες τοῦ μεγάλου αὐτοῦ τυράννου, ποὺ λυμαίνεται τὸ θέατρο (ὅπως καὶ τὴν ζωὴ) ὑψώνονται ἀπὸ τὴν τραγῳδία τοῦ Εὐριπίδη: Ἡ Φαίδρα του εἶναι ἡ μακρυνὴ κι' ἐπιβλητικὴ προμάμμη ὅλων τῶν ἐρωτευμένων ἡρωΐδων, ὅλων τῶν θεάτρων καὶ ὅλων τῶν ἐποχῶν...

Ὁ ἔρως ὅμως, τὸν ὁποῖον ζωγραφίζει μὲ δυνατές, φοβερὲς πινελιές, δὲν ἔχει καμμιὰ σχέσι μὲ τὸ λεγόμενο «αἴσθημα» τῶν νεωτέρων καιρῶν. Ἔκτοτε οἱ ποιηταὶ ἐμεγάλωσαν τὰ φτερά του γιὰ νὰ σκεπάσουν μ' αὐτὰ τὴν φυσική του γύμνια. Ὁ ἔρως τῆς Φαίδρας δὲν ἔχει τίποτε ἀπὸ τὶς γλυκύτητες καὶ τῆς τρυφερότητες μιᾶς τιθασσευμένης Ἀφροδίτης. Εἶναι ἡ ὀργή της: Εἰκὼν τρομερή, γυμνὴ τοῦ φυσικοῦ πάθους, τοῦ πρωτόγονου καὶ ἀφτιασίδωτου, στὸ ἀποκορύφωμά του. Ἡ Φαίδρα, ὅπως τὴν παρουσιάζει ὁ ποιητής, θυμίζει τὶς «δαιμονισμένες» τῶν χριστιανικῶν χρόνων.

Ἡ Ἀφροδίτη τὴν «κατέχει». Γιὰ νὰ ἐκδικηθῇ τὸν Ἱππόλυτο, τὸν ἁγνὸ κι' ἀσκητικὸ ἔφηβο, τὸν σύντροφο κι' ἀγαπημένο τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος, τὸν περιφρονητὴ τοῦ ἔρωτος, φυσᾷ στὴν ψυχὴ τῆς Φαίδρας, τὴν θεομηνία κολασμένου πάθους γι' αὐτόν. Εἶναι μανία, θεία μάστιξ, ποὺ τίποτε δὲν μπορεῖ νὰ δυσωπήσῃ. Ἀλλ' ἂν τυλίγῃ ὁ Εὐριπίδης μὲ τὸν διάφανο πέπλο τοῦ μύθου αὐτὸν τὸν τυραννικὸν ἔρωτα, τὸν ξεσκεπάζει ὅμως — γιὰ πρώτη φορὰ —σ' ὅλη τὴν ἄμεση καὶ ὡμή του πραγματικότητα.

Καμμιὰ «φιλολογία» καὶ καμμιὰ ἐξιδανίκευσις: Εἶναι τὸ σαρκικὸ πάθος, στὴ μορφὴ τῆς βαρειᾶς ἀρρώστειας — ἕνας ὑψηλὸς πυρετός, ποὺ προσβάλλει μιὰ βασίλισσα, σεμνὴ καὶ ντροπαλή, ποὺ παλαίει μὲ τὸν δαίμονα, τὸν θρεμμένον ἀπὸ γάλα πάνθηρος καὶ ποὺ ἀναδεύει τὰ σπλάχνα της μὲ τὰ φοβερά του νύχια.

Ἡ ἡρωΐς αὐτὴ τοῦ Εὐριπίδη— μαστοριὰ μεγάλη — δὲν ἔχει παρὰ μιὰ καὶ μόνην ἐμφάνισι. Μπαίνει στὴν σκηνή, τσακισμένη, φλεγόμενη, κρατημένη ἀπὸ τὶς σκλάβες της, γιὰ ν' ἀκούσωμε τοὺς στεναγμούς της, νὰ ἰδοῦμε τὸ μαρτύριό της, νὰ προδοθῇ ἀπὸ τὴν παραμάνα της, ποὺ νομίζει πὼς δουλεύει γιὰ τὸ καλό της, νὰ συναντηθῇ μιὰ φορὰ μὲ τὸν Ἱππόλυτο, νὰ καταφρονηθῇ ἀπ' αὐτόν καὶ βγαίνει ἀπὸ τὴ σκηνὴ γιὰ νὰ πεθάνῃ. Ὁ ρόλος της εἶναι παθητικός. Εἶναι τὸ ἐνεργούμενον τοῦ πάθους, ποὺ βρίσκει στὸν θάνατο τὴν ἀπολύτρωσι, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὴν ἐκδίκησι τοῦ περιφρονητοῦ της.

Αὐτὴ ἡ τραγῳδία εἶναι ἀπὸ τὶς λίγες τοῦ Εὐριπίδη, ὅπου τὰ θαυμάσια χορικὰ εἶναι ἄμεσα καὶ σφικτὰ δεμένα μὲ τὸν μῦθο καὶ τὴν δραματικὴ ἐξέλιξι. Ἡ δὲ μουσικὴ τοῦ Μητροπούλου, πρὸ πάντων στὰ τραγουδιστὰ μέρη, φαίνεται λαμπρὰ προσηρμοσμένη στὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ ἔργου. Τὰ μέρη τοῦ κομοῦ, ὁ θρῆνος, ὅπως καὶ τὸ φινάλε, τὰ χαρακτηρίζει μεγαλοπρέπεια. Ὅταν τὰ πρωτοπαρουσίασε, ξέρω πὼς οἱ «εἰδικοὶ» τοῦ ρίχθηκαν. Ἀλλὰ σήμερα, ποὺ ἐπέρασε ὁ σάλος, μποροῦμε ν' ἀναγνωρίσουμε, νομίζω, πὼς αὐτὴ ἡ μουσική, ποὺ κυματίζει ἀνάμεσα βυζαντινῆς μελῳδίας καὶ λαϊκοῦ τραγουδιοῦ, χωρὶς νὰ πέφτῃ σὲ μιμήσεις, ἔχει ἀναμφισβήτητη πρωτοτυπία...

ΕΘΝΙΚΟΝ ΘΕΑΤΡΟΝ

Ὁ κίνδυνος γιὰ μιὰ σημερινὴ παράστασι τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγῳδίας, εἶναι νὰ χάσῃ τὸ θεσμὸ τὸν πρῶτο καὶ κύριο χαρακτήρα του, τὸν θρησκευτικὸ καὶ μεταφυσικό, καὶ ἐπηρεασμένο ἀπὸ τὸ θεατρικὸ κλίμα τοῦ καιροῦ μας νὰ γίνῃ δρᾶμα ψυχολογικὸ ἢ κοινωνικό. Ἀπ' αὐτὸ τὸν κίνδυνο δὲν νομίζω ὅτι κατώρθωσε τελικὰ νὰ ξεφύγῃ ἡ προχθεσινὴ ἑρμηνεία τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου» ἀπὸ τὸ θίασο τοῦ Ἐθνικοῦ Θεάτρου, μὲ ὅλο ποὺ ἐπέτυχαν οἱ συντελεστὲς τοῦ ἔργου νὰ δώσουν στὸ ἀθηναϊκὸ κοινὸ μιὰ γραφική, μελετημένη καὶ εὐπρόσωπη παράστασι. Καὶ στὸν «Ἱππόλυτο», ὅπως σὲ ὅλα τὰ ἔργα τοῦ κλασσικοῦ ἑλληνικοῦ θεάτρου, τὸ τραγικὸ λάϊτ—μοτὶφ εἶναι ἡ «ὕβρις». Αὐτὸς ὁ ἁγνὸς καὶ θεοσεβὴς νέος παρασύρεται ἀπὸ τὸ φλογερό ζῆλο του ἔως τὴν ὑπερηφία νὰ καταφρονήσῃ μιὰ πανίσχυρη καὶ φιλέκδικη θεά, τὴν Ἀφροδίτη. Ὕστερ' ἀπὸ τὸ δεινὸ τοῦτο κρίμα ἡ μοῖρα του εἶναι πιὰ γραμμένη: θὰ πεθάνῃ φοικτά, κι' ἂς εἶναι ἄθῶος.— Ἔτσι ἐξηγεῖται τὸ πῶς ὁ θάνατος τοῦ ἀθῴου δὲν κάνει τὸ δρᾶμα τοῦτο «μιαρόν» κοπὰ τὸ χαρακτηρισμὸ τοῦ Ἀριστοτέλη. Καὶ πῶς ἀκόμη μιὰ γυναίκα σὰν τὴ Φαίδρα, φτάνει τὴν τελευταία στιγμὴ τοῦ μαρτυρίου ἕως τὴν ἀπρέπεια τῆς συκοφαντίας, Ἐδῶ ἕνας τρομερὸς θεὸς συνθέτει τὴν ἐκδίκησή του καὶ οἱ ἄνθρωποι γίνονται παιχνιδάκια στὰ χέρια του...

Ἔγινε ἄραγε φανερὸ τοῦτο τὸ βαθὺ θρησκευτικὸ καὶ μεταφυσικὸ νόημα τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου» μὲ τὴν ἑρμηνεία ποὺ εἴδαμε προχτὲς στὸ Ὠδεῖο τοῦ Ἡρώδη τοῦ Ἀττικοῦ; Ἀμφιβάλλω. Πρῶτα ὁ «ναturαλισμός» μὲ τὸν ὁποῖο παίζουν οἱ κύριοι ἠθοποιοὶ τοὺς ρόλους των, δὲν ἀφήνει νὰ ἀναπτυχθῇ καὶ νὰ ἐπιβληθῇ ὁ τόνος τοῦ «ὑψηλοῦ» ποὺ πρέπει νὰ ἀναδοθῇ ἀπὸ ὁλόκληρο τὸ δρᾶμα. Μόνο ὁ χορός—καὶ μὲ εὐχαρίστηση σημειώνομε ὅτι εἶναι ἕνας ἀπὸ τοὺς καλλίτερους ποὺ παρουσίασε ὡστώρα ὁ κ. Ροντήρης —βρίσκεται στὸ σωστὸ κλίμα (ἐκτὸς ἀπὸ τὴν Πάροδο ποὺ ἐκτελέσθηκε ἄψυχα). Ἀλλ' ἀκριβῶς αὐτὴ ἡ ἀντίθεση ὕφους ἀνάμεσα στὸ διαλογικὸ καὶ στὸ λυρικὸ μέρος τοῦ δράματος, ἀντίθεση ποὺ σημειώνεται καὶ σὲ ἄλλα ἐπίπεδα: στὸ χρόνο τῆς δράσης, στὴν ἔνταση τῆς φωνῆς, στὸν ψυχικὸ κραδασμὸ κ.ο.κ., ταλαιπωρεῖ τὸ θεατή, ἀφοῦ τὸν ἀνογκάζει ν' ἀλλάζῃ ἀλλεπάλληλα τὸν ἄξονα τῆς προσοπτικῆς του.

Ἔπειτα οἱ πρωταγωνιστὲς δὲν φαίνεται νὰ ξεκαθάρισαν μέσα τους ἐντελῶς τὸ ρόλο τους. Ἡ κυρία Ἔλσα Βεργῆ (καλλίτερη ἀσφαλῶς ἀπὸ ἄλλες ἐμφανίσεις της) γρήγορα παραμέρισε τὴ γυναίκα τὴ βαθιὰ πληγωμένη ἀπὸ τὸ πικρὸ πάθος, ποὺ χαροπαλεύει ἀνάμεσα στὸν πόθο καὶ στὴ ντροπή, καὶ μᾶς ἔδωσε μιὰ «Φαίδρα» παραπολὺ ἀρρενωπή, σκληρὴ καὶ στομφώδη, ποὺ ἐγγράφεται στὴν ἐντύπωσή μας πιὸ πολὺ μὲ τὴν κακεντρέχεια παρὰ μὲ τὸ μαρτύριό της. Ὁ κ. Ν. Χατζίσκος, παρὰ τὰ τόσα προσόντα του, παίζει τὸ μεγαλύτερο μέρος του μὲ ἀδικαιολόγητο λαχάνιασμα καὶ τόση ἔνταση ποὺ δὲν μᾶς ἀφήνει νὰ σκεφτοῦμε ὅτι ὁ Ἱππόλυτος δὲν εἶναι μόνο ρωμαλέος καὶ τιμητὴς τῆς ἀκολασίας, ἀλλὰ προπάντων σεμνὸς καὶ εὐαίσθητος νέος. Ἀκόμη κ' ἕνας ἠθοποιὸς τῆς ποιότητας τοῦ κ. Θ. Κωτσόπουλου παρασύρθηκε ἀπὸ τὸ γενικὸ κλίμα καὶ μᾶς ἔδωσε ἕνα Θησέα ποὺ γρήγορα λησμονεῖ τὴ βασιλική του ὑψηλοφροσύνη καὶ γίνεται πολὺ κακομοιριασμένος. Στὸ σωστὸ τόνο βρίσκονται ἡ κορυφαία τοῦ χοροῦ κυρία Θάλεια Καλλιγᾶ ἡ κυρία Ἀλέκα Κοτσέλη ὡς Ἄρτεμη καὶ ὁ κ. Σ. Βόκοβιτς, ἐξαίρετος ἄγγελος.

Ἡ μουσικὴ ποὺ ἔχει γράψει γιὰ τὸν «Ἱππόλυτο» ὁ Δ. Μητρόπουλος, περιέχει πολὺ ὑποβλητικές, ρυθμικὲς, ἀναπτύξεις. Τελειώνει ὅμως μὲ μιὰ μακρόσυρτη marche funèbre ποὺ παρώθησε τὸν σκηνοθέτη νὰ τερματίσει τὸ δρᾶμα μὲ κακόζηλο τρόπο: ὁ Ἱππόλυτος κηδεύεται πολὺ θεσματικά, οἱ φορεῖς μάλιστα τοῦ νεκροῦ περνοῦν κάτω ἀπὸ τὸ ἄγαλμα τῆς Ἀρτέμιδας καὶ ὑψώνουν θρισμευτικὰ τὸ φορεῖο, σὰ νὰ προσφέρουν τὸν νεκρὸ θυσία στὴ θεά. Στὸ μεταξὺ δὲν ἀκούγεται ὁ τελευταῖος λόγος τῆς Ἐξόδου καὶ ὁ Χορὸς ἀποσύρεται ἄφωνος καθὼς σκοτεινιάζει σιγὰ-σιγὰ ἡ σκηνή... Τέτοια ἀδόκιμα καὶ ἐξωτερικὰ effets νομίζω ὅτι μόνο ἀνευλάβεια ἀποτελοῦν μέσα στὸ ἀρχαῖο δρᾶμα.

ΑΠΟ ΤΟ ΘΕΑΤΡΟΝ

Η ΠΑΡΑΣΤΑΣΙΣ ΤΟΥ «ΙΠΠΟΛΥΤΟΥ»

(Εἰς τὸ Ὠδεῖον τοῦ Ἡρώδου, ἀπὸ τὸ «Ἐθνικόν»)

Εὐπρεπής, εὐπρεπεστάτη παράστασις —μέσα εἰς τὸ κλῖμα τῆς παραδόσεως ποὺ κατὰ κάποιον τρόπον ἐδημιούργησε καὶ ἀκολουθεῖ μὲ πεῖσμονα ἐμμονὴν ὁ κ. Ροντήρης— ἡ προχθεσινὴ τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου» εἰς τὸ Ὠδεῖον τοῦ Ἡρώδου. Ἐὰν εἰπῶ ὅτι αὐτὴ ἡ παράδοσις εἶναι ἐκείνη ποὺ πρέπει νὰ πολεμηθῇ, ἐὰν θέλωμεν νὰ δώσωμεν νέαν ζωὴν εἰς τὸ ἀρχαῖον δρᾶμα, ὁ σκηνοθετήσας τὸν «Ἱππόλυτον» θὰ ἔχῃ κάθε δικαίωμα νὰ ἀντιτείνῃ ὅτι αὐτὴ εἶναι γνώμη ἰδική μου καὶ ὅτι αὐτὸ ποὺ μᾶς παρουσίασε ἐκφράζει τὴν ἰδικήν του ἀντίληψιν περὶ τραγωδίας. Καὶ ἐπειδὴ ἐγὼ δὲν εἶμαι σκηνοθέτης καὶ ἐκεῖνος εἶναι, οὔτε καὶ θέατρον ἔχω, ἐνῷ ἐκεῖνος ἔχει, λογικὸν εἶναι νὰ ἀκολουθοῦν αἱ παραστάσεις τὰ γοῦστα τὰ ἰδικά του. Νὰ ἀρχίσωμεν, λοιπόν, πάλιν ἀπὸ τὴν ἀρχή; Νὰ ἐπαναλάβω, δηλαδή, ὅσα κατὰ καιροὺς ἔγραψα, πολλὲς φορὲς μὲ κουραστικὴν ἐπιμονήν, περὶ τοῦ πῶς εἶναι δυνατὴ μία μ ε τ ά θ ε σ ι ς τοῦ ἀρχαίου τραγικοῦ στοιχείου εἰς τὰ σύγχρονα, διὰ νὰ ἀφομοιοῦται ἀκοπώτερα ἀπὸ τὴν νεωτέραν δεκτικότητα; Καὶ ὅτι αὐτὰ ποὺ ἐπιχειρεῖ ὁ κ. Ροντήρης, ὁ δρόμος ποὺ ἀκολουθεῖ, δὲν ἠμποροῦν νὰ ὁδηγήσουν ποτὲ εἰς τὴν σφριγηλὴν αἰσθητικὴν ἀξιοποίησιν τῆς ἀττικῆς τραγωδίας; Τὸ πρᾶγμα εἶναι πλέον ἄχρηστον. Τὸ ἀρχαῖον δρᾶμα εἰς τὴν Ἑλλάδα θὰ ζῇ ὅπως ἔζησεν ἕως τώρα καὶ θὰ γνωρίζῃ μόνον ἀπὸ καιροῦ εἰς καιρὸν κάποιους πειραματισμοὺς ἀπὸ τολμητίας ποὺ δὲν θὰ ἔχουν οὔτε τὰ μέσα, ἔμψυχα καὶ ἄψυχα, διὰ νὰ δικαιώνουν αἰσθητικῶς τὰς ἀπόψεις των, ἀλλ' οὔτε —ὅπως τὸ ἔδειξαν ἄλλωστε— μεγαλυτέραν εὐτυχίαν εἰς τὴν μεταχείρισιν τῆς ἀρχαίας δραματικῆς ὕλης. Καί, πρέπει νὰ τὸ εἰπῶ μὲ κάθε εἰλικρίνειαν, προτιμῶ αὐτὴν τὴν πεπατημένην ποὺ πατεῖ μὲ βαρύτατα πέλματα ὁ κ. Ροντήρης ἀπὸ τοὺς αὐτοσχεδιασμοὺς ποὺ ἔγιναν, τοὺς προσφάτους καιρούς, μιὰ ἄλλη καὶ αὐτὴ πεπατημένη ταλαιπωρουμένη κάτω ἀπὸ ἀνυπόφορους κοθόρνους.

Ὁ κ. Ροντήρης, λοιπόν, ἔστησε τὴν παράστασίν του μὲ τετράγωνον ἐπιμέλειαν καὶ τὰ ἐλατήριά της εἰργάσθησαν μὲ ἀκρίβειαν καὶ εὐσυνειδησίαν ὡρολογιακήν. Εἶχε κανείς, ἀνά πᾶσαν στιγμήν, τὴν ἐντύπωσιν ὅτι ἡ ποίησις τοῦ ἀρχαίου κειμένου εἶχε μετρηθῇ μὲ τὴν μεζούρα γιὰ νὰ προσαρμοσθῇ εἰς τὴν ὑποκριτικήν, τὴν κίνησιν, τὴν ἔκφρασιν καὶ τὴν χειρονομίαν. Θὰ εἰπῆτε ὅτι ἔτσι ἡ ποίησις παύει πλέον νὰ ἔχῃ τὴν ὡραίαν αὐθορμησίαν τοῦ λόγου, ποὺ ἠμπορεῖ νὰ ἔχῃ «μέγεθος» χωρὶς νὰ ἔχῃ τὴν ἐκτατικὴν ἔκφρασιν τῶν ἐπικουρικῶν του μέσων. Καὶ ὅτι τὸ μέγεθος τῆς ποιήσεως εἶναι πάντοτε ὑπόθεσις βάθους καὶ ὑποβολῆς καὶ ὄχι στόμφου καὶ χορδῶν λάρυγγος. Ὁ κ. Ροντήρης καὶ οἱ μαθηταί του ἔχουν διάφορον γνώμην. Ἴσως γι' αὐτὸ λ.χ. ὁ ἀγγελιαφόρος, ὅταν ἐπρόκειτο νὰ περιγράψῃ τὸ κορυφαῖον σημεῖον τῆς τραγικῆς περιπετείας τοῦ Ἱππολύτου καὶ ἐπλησίαζε διαρκῶς πρὸς αὐτό, ἐχαμήλωσε τὴν φωνὴν μέχρι ψιθύρου, διὰ νὰ ἀφήσῃ κατόπιν τὸν ἀλαλαγμὸν ποὺ ἔσεισε τὰ ἐρείπια τοῦ ἀρχαίου Ὠδείου. Αὐτό, εἶμαι βέβαιος, θὰ ἀποτελεῖ εἰς τὴν σχολὴν τοῦ Ἐθνικοῦ Θεάτρου ἔκτακτον δεῖγμα ὑποκριτικῆς ἱκανότητος καὶ εὐγλώττου φωνητικῆς εἰκονογραφίας. Καὶ αὐτό, εἶμαι καὶ εἰς τοῦτο βέβαιος, θὰ ἐξετιμήθη ἀπὸ τὸ πολὺ πλῆθος ποὺ κατέκλυσε προχθὲς τὰς κερκίδας τοῦ ἀρχαίου θεάτρου, διότι ἔτσι ἐδιδάχθη ἐπὶ σειρὰν ἐτῶν ὅτι πρέπει νὰ ἑρμηνεύεται ἡ ἀττικὴ τραγωδία. Φοβοῦμαι μάλιστα ὅτι ἐὰν ἀχθῇ μέχρι τῶν λογικῶν της συνεπειῶν ἡ ὑποκριτικὴ ρομαλεότης τοῦ εἴδους αὐτοῦ, θὰ πρέπει μεθαύριον ἀντὶ ἠθοποιῶν νὰ στρατολογοῦνται οἱ περιοδεύοντες κήρυκες πλειστηριασμῶν, οἱ ὁποῖοι διαθέτουν λάρυγγας ἀντέχοντας εἰς ὅλας τὰς δοκιμασίας, τὰς ὁποίας ἐπιβάλλει ἡ σύγχρονος ἑρμηνεία τῆς κλασσικῆς δραματικῆς ποιήσεως...

Ἐν τούτοις εἰς τὸν φωνητικὸν αὐτὸν ἀνταγωνισμόν, ὁ ὁποῖος ἠρχιζεν ἀπὸ τὰς ἐμφανίσεις τῶν θεοτήτων διὰ νὰ φθάσῃ τὴν διαπασῶν εἰς τὸν Ἱππόλυτον —μὲ τὴν ἐπαινετὴν ἐξαίρεσιν τοῦ κ. Κωτσοπούλου, ποὺ ὑπεδύετο τὸν Θησέα— παρουσίαζε περίεργον ἀντίθεσιν ὁ χορός. Ὁ χορός, λοιπόν, καὶ εἰς τὰς ἀποκορυφώσεις ποὺ ὑψοῦντο εἰς τὸ προσκήνιον, ἀντέδρα μὲ νυσταλέαν σχεδὸν ἀπάθειαν. Εὐτύχημα, ἀποτελεῖ, βεβαίως, τὸ γεγονὸς ὅτι ὁ κ. Ροντήρης ἐγκατέλειψε μέχρις ἑνὸς σημείου τὰς τυποποιημένας ἐκείνας ἀνελίξεις ποὺ ἐπέβαλλεν ἄλλοτε εἰς τὸν χορὸν καὶ τὸν μετέβαλλε πότε εἰς ὁμάδα γυμναζομένων γεανίδων καὶ πότε εἰς συντεταγμένον ὅμιλον μεθυσμένων παρὰ ταῦτα δερβίσηδων. Ὁ χορός, αὐτὴν τὴν φοράν, εἶχε συχνὰ ἀνθρωπίνην φυσικότητα εἰς τὰς κινήσεις του καὶ ἐὰν δὲν ἔφθασε ποτὲ εἰς τὴν ὡραίαν ὑποβολὴν τοῦ μετέχοντος συναισθηματικῶς εἰς τὰ δρώμενα πλήθους, δὲν ἠνώχλει μὲ ἀχρήστους ἀκροβασίας. (Τοῦτο δὲν συνέβαινε, βεβαίως, πάντοτε. Ἡ μουσικὴ συνοδεία τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου», ὅταν ἐπρόκειτο νὰ ἐκφρασθῇ εἰς τὴν κίνησιν τοῦ χοροῦ, παρεκίνει εἰς μερικὰ βήματα ποὺ ἐνθυμίζαν κάπως τὸ παλαιότατον ἐκεῖνο Pas d'Espagne, ποὺ ἐχόρευαν οἱ γιαγιάδες μας. Ἀλλ' αὐτὰ δὲν ἦσαν ἐκτροπαὶ ποὺ θὰ ἔπρεπε νὰ μᾶς συνοφρυώσουν). Ὡς γενικὴ ὅμως ἐντύπωσις ἡ δραματικὴ ἔκφρασις τοῦ χοροῦ εὑρίσκετο εἰς πρόδηλον ἀνισομέρειαν μὲ τὸ ὅλον ἦθος ποὺ ὁ κ. Ροντήρης ἠθέλησε νὰ δώσῃ εἰς τὴν ἑρμηνείαν τῆς τραγωδίας. Ἐλπίζω εἰς τὰς παραστάσεις ποὺ θὰ ἐπακολουθήσουν νὰ ἐπέλθῃ κάποιος συμβιβασμός. Ἢ νὰ τονωθῇ μὲ ὀλίγες διταμῖνες ὁ ἀναιμικὸς χορὸς ἢ νὰ κουρασθοῦν κάπως οἱ κραυγαλέοι ἑρμηνευταί.

Ἕνα ἄλλο σημεῖον ποὺ μοῦ ἔκαμε κάποιαν ἐντύπωσιν εἰς τὴν διδασκαλίαν τοῦ χοροῦ εἶναι ἡ βαθμιαία προσχώρησις τοῦ κ. Ροντήρη εἰς τὴν ὑ δ έ α ν περὶ ἀδομένων χορικῶν. Θὰ διασθῶ νὰ εἰπῶ ὅτι εἶναι τακτικὴ καή. Πρῶτον, διότι τὸ ἄσμα τοῦ χοροῦ δὲν εἶναι ἄσμα, ἀλλὰ ἐνοχλητικώτατον μιαούρισμα —«οἰμωγὴν γαλῶν εἰς τοὺς δρόφους», θὰ τὸ ἔλεγεν ὁ Ἄγγελος Βλάχος...— καί, δεύτερον, διότι καταστρέφεται διὰ τοῦ τρόπου αὐτοῦ ἡ ἁβρὰ καὶ τόσον γοητεύουσα ποίησις τῶν χορικῶν. Ἤδη τὰ χορικὰ καὶ ἡ ὑποβολή των φθείρονται μὲ τὴν συνεκφώνησιν (τὴν ὁμαδικὴν ἀπαγγελίαν), ἀπὸ τὴν ὁποίαν ὁ κ. Ροντήρης δὲν θέλει νὰ ἀποστῇ. Τὸ μονόφωνον μέλος ὄχι μόνον δὲν τὰ ἐξαίρει, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ ἐξασθενίζει μέχρις ἀνυπαρξίας.

Ἀλλὰ βλέπω ὅτι κατολισθαίνω πάλιν εἰς τὰς κατὰ καιροὺς ἀντιρρήσεις μου καὶ εἰς τὰς ἄλλας ἐκείνας ἀπόψεις, ποὺ κατήντησαν ἐνοχλητικώτατος μονόλογος. Ἐνῷ εἶχα γράψει εἰς τὴν ἀρχὴν ὅτι τὸ ἀρχαῖον δρᾶμα θὰ μᾶς προσφέρεται ὅπως θέλει ὁ κ. Ροντήρης —καὶ εἶναι ἐπὶ τέλους αὐτὸ πτωχὴ παρηγορία, διότι δὲν θὰ μᾶς προσφέρεται ὅπως τὸ θέλουν ὁ κ. Καραντινὸς ἢ ὁ κ. Μινωτῆς, καὶ ὁ κ. Καρζῆς δὲν θὰ ἔχει ποτὲ λεπτὰ διὰ νὰ ἁρπάζει ἀνθρώπους ἀπὸ τὰ σοκάκια διὰ νὰ τοὺς φορεῖ μάσκες καὶ κοθόρνους— ἐξαντλῶ τὸν χῶρον διὰ νὰ εἰπῶ ὅτι αὐτὸ ἔπρεπε νὰ ἦταν ἔτσι καὶ τὸ ἄλλο ἀλλοιῶς. Καὶ ὅλαι αὐταὶ αἱ ἀντιρρήσεις —καὶ μόνον αὐταί; θὰ ἦσαν, ἐὰν ἐγράφοντο, πλῆθος...— θὰ ἠμποροῦσαν ἴσως νὰ ψυχράνουν τὸν ζῆλον μερικῶν ποὺ θὰ ἤθελαν νὰ ἰδοῦν τὸν «Ἱππόλυτον». Ἀλλὰ πρέπει νὰ πᾶνε καὶ νὰ τὸν ἰδοῦν. Πρῶτον, διότι ἡ παράστασις εἶναι κατὰ πολὺ καλυτέρα ἀπὸ ὅσας ἐνεφάνισεν ἕως σήμερα τὸ «Ἐθνικὸν» καί, δεύτερον, διότι εἶμαι ἀπολύτως βέβαιος ὅτι οἱ ἐνεννηταεννέα στοὺς ἑκατὸ θεαταὶ —ἀφοῦ δὲν ἐγνώρισαν ἄλλο τι νέον— θὰ συμφωνοῦν μὲ τὸν τρόπον ποὺ ἑρμηνεύει τὴν ἀρχαίαν τραγωδίαν ὁ κ. Ροντήρης καὶ θὰ εὕρουν τὶς δικές μου παρατηρήσεις ἀνάξιες λόγου καὶ προσοχῆς λεπτομέρειες. Ἔπειτα ὑπάρχουν ἀληθιναὶ ἐπιτυχημένες στιγμὲς εἰς τὴν παράστασιν. Ἡ εἴσοδος τοῦ Ἱππολύτου μὲ τὴ συνοδεία τῶν τοξοτῶν συντρόφων του ποὺ ἔρχονται νὰ ὑμνήσουν τὴν Ἄρτεμιν, ἡ κίνησίς των, ἡ στάσις των, ἡ ὁρμή των εἶναι ἕνα ὡραῖο σκηνοθετικὸν ἐπίτευγμα. Η ΜΟΥΣΙΚΗ ΤΟΥ "ΙΠΠΟΛΥΤΟΥ"

ΥΠΟ ΤΟΥ κ. Π. ΠΕΤΡΙΔΗ

Παραπέμπεται εἰς ἐμὲ ἀπὸ τὸν ἔγκριτον συνάδελφον κ. Αἰμ. Χουρμούζιον ἡ κριτικὴ ἀξιολόγησις τῆς μουσικῆς ὑποκρούσεως, ποὺ συνέθεσεν ὁ κ. Δ. Μητρόπουλος γιὰ τὸν «Ἱππόλυτον». Τὸ δῶρον εἶναι κατά τι ἄδωρον, διότι μοῦ φαίνεται δύσκολο μὲ τὴν ἀκμὴ ξυριστικῆς λεπίδος νὰ ξεχωρισθῇ ἡ μουσικὴ ὑπόκρουσις ἀπὸ τὰ ἄλλα κυριαρχοῦντα στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγωδίας, τὰ ποιητικά, τὰ χορογραφικά, ἀπὸ τὴν συνολικὴν αἰσθητικὴν τοῦ διδασκομένου ἔργου. Ἐπικαλοῦμαι, ἑπομένως ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν, ἂν τυχὸν στὴ ρύμη τοῦ λόγου διέπραττα ἄφρονά τινα παραβίασιν τῆς μεθοριακῆς γραμμῆς.

Ἀνάμεσα στὰ πολλὰ ἀκανθώδη προβλήματα, ποὺ θέτει τὸ ζήτημα τῆς μουσικῆς ὑποκρούσεως τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγωδίας, συγκαταλέγεται καὶ τὸ πάντοτε ταραχῶδες τῶν σχέσεων σκηνοθέτη καὶ μουσουργοῦ. Κατὰ γενικὸν σχεδὸν κανόνα, αἱ σχέσεις αὐταὶ κάθε ἄλλο εἶναι παρὰ ὁμαλαί. Ὁ σκηνοθέτης συνηθέστατα εἶναι ἐχθρὸς τῆς μουσικῆς καὶ ἐπιδιώκει νὰ τὴν ἐξουθενώσῃ μέχρις ἄκρας ἀφανείας. Ὁ συνθέτης, ἐξ ἄλλου, ἀγωνίζεται ἀπεγνωσμένως νὰ διασώσῃ μερικὲς συγχορδίες ἐδῶ, μελωδικά τινα ἀποσπάσματα παρέκει, γιὰ νὰ δώσῃ εἰκόνα ὅσο τὸ δυνατὸ πιὸ ὁλοκληρωμένη τῶν παλμῶν, ποὺ ἔνοιωσε κατὰ τὴν συγγραφὴν τῆς μουσικῆς. Τὸ ἀποτέλεσμα ἐμφανίζεται ὡς συνωφρυωμένος συμβιβασμός, θῦμα τοῦ ὁποίου πίπτει ἡ ἀρχαία τραγωδία.

Εἶναι προφανὲς ὅτι στὴν περίπτωσι τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου» ἐπεκράτησε μεταξὺ τῶν κ.κ. Ροντήρη — Μητροπούλου θαυμαστὴ ὁμόνοια καὶ αἰσθητικὴ συναδέλφωσις. Ὡς κύριο χαρακτηριστικὸ τῆς ὑποκρούσεως τοῦ κ. Μητροπούλου ἐμφανίζεται ὁ πλήρης ἐναγκαλισμὸς ὑπὸ τῆς μουσικῆς τῶν λυρικῶν καὶ χορογραφικῶν προθέσεων καὶ ἐξορμήσεων τοῦ σκηνοθέτη. Ἐὰν ἀποδέχεται κανεὶς τὰς αἰσθητικὰς ἀντιλήψεις τοῦ κ. Ροντήρη ὅσον ἀφορᾷ τὴν ἀρχαίαν τραγωδίαν, τότε πρέπει νὰ θαυμάσῃ ἀδιστάκτως τὴν ἐξαιρετικὴν μουσικὴν εὐστροφία, μὲ τὴν ὁποίαν ὁ κ. Μητρόπουλος ἐτόνισε μὲ στοιχεῖα μουσικὰ τὰ χορικὰ τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου». Ἀλλ' ἡ ἐργασία τοῦ κ. Ροντήρη δὲν ὑπόκειται στὴν ἐμὴν ἁρμοδιότητα. Δὲν θὰ προωθήσω ἑπομένως περαιτέρω τὴν ἀνάλυσι τοῦ σημείου αὐτοῦ.

Ἐπανερχόμενος στὰ δσα στοιχεῖα μποροῦν νὰ θεωρηθοῦν μᾶλλον μουσικὰ παρὰ γενικῶς αἰσθητικὰ ἢ χορογραφικά θὰ εἶχα, κατὰ πρώτιστον λόγο, νὰ ἀσχοληθῶ μὲ τὴν θρυλικὴ ὑπόθεσι τοῦ «ὁμιλοῦντος χοροῦ» («Σπρέχορ»). Σὲ διεξοδικὴ μελέτη περὶ τῆς μουσικῆς τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγωδίας προωρισμένης γιὰ εὐρωπαϊκὸ περιοδικὸ εἶχα ἀναλύσει τὸ ζήτημα καὶ φθάσει στὸ ἐκπληκτικὸ καὶ μ' ὅλα ταῦτα τόσο προφανὲς συμπέρασμα ὅτι δὲν ὑφίσταται, ὅτι δὲν ὑπάρχει εἰμὴ κατὰ φαντασίαν αὐτὸ ποὺ παταγωδῶς διαλαλεῖται ὡς «ὁμιλῶν χορὸς» ἐν ἀντιθέσει μὲ τὸν «ψάλλοντα χορὸν» (Γκεζάνγκκορ).

Ἰδού, ἐν ὀλίγοις, ἡ ἀλληλουχία τῶν συλλογισμῶν: εἴκοσι, τριάντα ἢ πενῆντα πρόσωπα ἐπὶ σκηνῆς ὁμιλοῦν, ἀπαγγέλλουν, προφέρουν μὲ ὁμαδικὸ ρυθμὸ τὸ κείμενο ἑνὸς χορικοῦ. Κάτω, δίπλα ἢ πάνω ἀπὸ τὶς φωνὲς τοῦ συγκροτήματος ξεδιπλώνεται κάποια μουσική, ποὺ ἔχει τὴν τονικότητά της, τὶς διαστηματικές της σχέσεις, τὴν τελεολογία τῆς μελωδικῆς καὶ ἁρμονικῆς της κατευθύνσεως. Πάνω στὰ σφικτὰ ὠργανωμένα, στερρὰ ἔναρθρα πλαίσια τῆς μουσικῆς ἔρχονται νὰ προσκρούσουν οἱ τόνοι τῶν ἄρθρώσεων τοῦ ὁμιλοῦντος χοροῦ. Καὶ προσκρούουν μὲν οἱ τόνοι, ἀλλὰ δὲν κατορθώνουν νὰ ἐνταχθοῦν, νὰ λάβουν νόμιμον θέσιν μέσα στὰ προκαθωρισμένα πλαίσια τῶν διαστηματικῶν συμπλεγμάτων τῆς μουσικῆς. Ἂς ληφθῇ ἐδῶ ὑπ' ὄψιν τὸ συνηθέστατα παραγνωριζόμενον φυσικὸν φαινόμενον ὅτι κάθε συλλαβὴ ποὺ προφέρουμε, κάθε φωνὴ ποὺ ἀκοῦμε, κάθε ἐπιφώνημα, κραυγή, οἰμωγὴ κλπ. ἀντιπροσωπεύουν μοιραίως ἕνα κάποιον ἦχο στὴν κλίμακα τῶν ἀκουστικῶν δονήσεων. Τί ἄλλο εἶναι, ἄλλωστε, ἡ τέχνη τῆς μουσικῆς εἰμὴ ἡ αἰσθητικὴ καὶ ὀρθολογιστικὴ ὀργάνωσις τῶν ἐν λόγῳ ἀκουστικῶν δονήσεων; Εἶναι προφανές, ἑπομένως, ὅτι οἱ ρυθμικοί, κοφτεροὶ τόνοι τοῦ ὁμιλοῦντος χοροῦ ἀντιστοιχοῦν μοιραίως μὲ κάποιες νότες τῆς μουσικῆς κλίμακος.

Καὶ στὸ σημεῖο αὐτὸ ἀρχίζει ἀκριβῶς ἡ μεγάλη συμφορὰ τοῦ ὁμιλοῦντος χοροῦ. Τριάντα τόσα μέλη ἐκτοξεύουν μιὰ συλλαβὴ πρὸς τὰ ψηλὰ καὶ πιάνουν κατ' ἀνάγκην κάποια νότα. Ἀλλ' ἡ νότα αὐτὴ δὲν ἔχει σημειωθῇ στὸ πεντάγραμμο καὶ τὸ καθένα ἀπὸ τὰ τριάντα μέλη τοῦ χοροῦ πιάνει μιὰ κατὰ προσέγγισι νότα. Τριάντα, δηλαδή, προσεγγίσεις συνωθοῦνται γύρω ἀπὸ τὴν πραγματικὴ νότα, ἐξ οὗ μιὰ πρώτη φρικτὴ παραφωνία. Ἀλλ' ἕπεται τὸ χειρότερο: κι' ἂν ἀκόμη, στὴν εὐτυχέστερη τῶν περιπτώσεων, τὰ τριάντα μέλη κατορθώσουν νὰ τονίσουν τὴν ἴδια νότα, μένει πάντοτε αὐτὴ ξένη, τυχάρπαστος πάνω στὰ σφικτοδεμένα πλαίσια τῆς μουσικῆς, ποὺ τὴν περιβάλλει. Ἐντεῦθεν, ἄλλη φρικτότερη τῆς πρώτης παραφωνία. Διότι, ὡς ἐγράψαμε παραπάνω, οἱ τόνοι, αἱ κραυγαὶ καὶ ἐπιφωνήσεις τοῦ ὁμιλοῦντος χοροῦ δὲν σημειοῦνται ἐπὶ τοῦ πενταγράμμου κι' ἀφίνονται ἀδέσποτοι στὴν τυφλὴ τύχη. Εἶναι ἡ αἰσθητικὴ τοῦ «Μπρὸς παιδιά, κι' ὁποιον πάρῃ ὁ Χάρος».

Θέλω νὰ ἐλπίζω ὅτι, εἰς χεῖρας μουσολήπτων σκηνοθετῶν καὶ χορογράφων, ὁ ὁμιλῶν χορὸς θὰ διοχετευθῇ πρὸς τὸ κλασικὸ ρεσιτατίβο, ποὺ ἀποτελεῖ ἕνα ἀπὸ τὰ ἐντονώτερα μέσα δραματικῆς ἐκφράσεως καὶ μπορεῖ νὰ συνδεθῇ, κατὰ τρόπο φυσικὸ καὶ ἄνευ διακοπῆς, μὲ τὰ λυρικὰ μέλη, τὰ θρησκευτικὰ χορικὰ ἢ ἄλλα τυχὸν στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχαίας τραγωδίας. Ἀνεκδοτικῶς ἀναφέρω ὅτι τὰ ὡς ἄνω συμπεράσματα (μαζὶ μὲ ἄλλα τῆς μνημονευθείσης μελέτης) ἐπέσυραν μύδρους καὶ κεραυνούς. Καὶ παραμένει αἰώνιο τὸ γεγονὸς ὅτι ὁ φανατισμὸς τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐμφανίζεται πάντοτε ἀντιστρόφως ἀνάλογος μὲ τὴν ἀλήθεια, ποὺ νομίζουν ὅτι κατέχουν. Παρὰ ταῦτα, σὰν ἄλλος πείσμων προφήτης, δὲν μπορῶ νὰ μὴ τονίσω ὅτι «ὁμιλῶν χορὸς» δὲν εἶναι ἄλλο τι εἰμὴ «ψάλλων χορός», ποὺ ψάλλει φάλτσα καὶ βάναυσα. Τὰ δυὸ χορικά, ὅπου μὲ πολλὴν ὕφεσι χρησιμοεῖται ἀπὸ τοὺς κ.κ. Ροντήρην — Μητρόπουλον, ἡ τεχνοτροπία τοῦ ὁμιλοῦντος χοροῦ, ἀποτελοῦν καὶ τὰ ἀσθενέστερα σημεῖα τῆς μουσικῆς ὑποκρούσεως τοῦ «Ἱππολύτου» κατ' ἀντίθεσιν μὲ τὰ δημοτικοφανῆ μέλη ἄλλων χορικῶν, τῶν ὁποίων ὁ μονόφωνος ψαλμὸς ἀπὸ τὸν χορὸ καὶ ὁ ἁρμονικὸς καὶ ἀντιστικτικὸς χειρισμὸς ἀπὸ τὴν ὀρχήστρα δέον νὰ καταλογισθοῦν ὡς περιφανεῖς ἐπιτυχίαι στὸ ἐνεργητικὸ τοῦ κ. Μητροπούλου. Δίκαιος ἔπαινος ἐπίσης ὀφείλεται στὸν μαέστρο κ. Γ. Λυκούδη, ποὺ διηύθυνε τὸ σύνολο μὲ τὴν ἐγνωσμένη του πεῖρα καὶ μουσικότητα.

ΜΟΥΣΙΚΗ ΚΑΙ ΧΟΡΟΣ ΓΙΑ ΤΟΝ «ΙΠΠΟΛΥΤΟ» ΤΟΥ ΕΥΡΙΠΙΔΗ = =

ΤΗΣ κ. ΑΛΕΞ. ΛΑΛΑΟΥΝΗ

Ἀκούοντας μιὰ μουσικὴ ποὺ συνοδεύει ἕνα θεατρικὸ ἔργο, φυσικὰ δὲν μπορεῖς νὰ τὴν κρίνῃς σὰν κάτι τὸ αὐτοτελές, τὸ ξεχωριστό, ἀλλὰ στὴ σχέσι της μὲ τὸ ἔργο, σὰν ἔκφρασι τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ ἔργου, σὰν ὑπογράμμισι τῶν βασικῶν του ἰδεῶν. Καὶ τὸ πρᾶγμα γίνεται πιὸ δύσκολο ὅταν πρόκειται γιὰ μιὰ ἀρχαία τραγωδία—ἢ κωμωδία.

Νομίζω πὼς γιὰ τὸ συνθέτη ποὺ ἀποπειράται νὰ γράψῃ μουσικὴ γιὰ ἕνα ἀρχαῖο δραματικὸ ἔργο, ἀνοίγονται δύο δρόμοι: Ἢ, μὲ βάσι τὰ Ἱστορικὰ δεδομένα, νὰ «μιμηθῇ» ἕνα ἀρχαϊκὸ ὕφος, χρησιμοποιώντας ἀρχαῖες κλίμακες, μονοφωνικὴ γραμμή, ἀρχαϊκὰ ὄργανα —αὐλοὺς π.χ. καὶ κρουστὰ —ἢ ν' ἀφεθῇ ἐλεύθερα στὴν ἔμπνευσί του —ποὺ θὰ πηγαζῃ βέβαια ἀπ' τὸ ἔργο —χρησιμοποιώντας μιὰ σύγχρονη μουσικὴ γλῶσσα. Στὴν πρώτη περίπτωσι, ἡ ἔμπνευσις, ἀναγκαστικὰ περιορίζεται καὶ σπάνια οἱ μουσικὲς σελίδες θὰ διαπνέωνται ἀπὸ εἰλικρίνεια. Θάναι μᾶλλον μιὰ «μουσικὴ γραφειοκρατία». Ὁ Δημήτρης Μητρόπουλος, καθαρόαιμος μουσικός, ἀκολουθεῖ τὸν δεύτερο δρόμο καὶ γράφει γιὰ τὸν «Ἱππόλυτο» τοῦ Εὐριπίδη, ἀξιοθαύμαστες μουσικὲς σελίδες, ποὺ ὄχι μόνο δείχνουν πὼς γράφηκαν ἀφοῦ ὁ συνθέτης τους θυθίστηκε στὴν ἔννοια τοῦ ἔργου καὶ τὸ αἰσθάνθηκε βαθειά, ἀλλὰ καὶ κάτι παραπάνω: Ἀφοῦ αἰσθάνθηκε καὶ τὸν ρυθμὸ καὶ τὸ πλάτος τοῦ λόγου κι' αὐτὸ τὸ βλέπεις ἰδιαίτερα στὴ χρησιμοποίησι τῶν κρουστῶν ποὺ ἀντὰ ποκρίνονται πλέρια στὸ μουσικὸ καὶ ρυθμικὸ ὕφος τοῦ ἀρχαίου λόγου — φαντάζομαι μιὰ ἀπαγγελία στρογγυλή, ρυθμική, σφυρηλατημένη, ποὺ κάθε συλλαβὴ ν' ἀντηχῇ σὰν ἦχος τυμπάνου.

Ὑπάρχουν ὡραιότατα λυρικὰ σημεῖα στὴ μουσικὴ αὐτὴ τοῦ Μητροπούλου, ὅπως στὴν Εἰσαγωγή, μὲ τὴν εἴσοδο τοῦ χοροῦ, ἔπειτα τοῦ Ἱππολύτου καὶ τῶν κυνηγῶν καθὼς κι' ἀργότερα τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος. Ἡ ὑπόκρουσις τῶν χορικῶν, ἁπλή, ρυθμική, γραμμική—μερικὰ χορικὰ τραγουδιστά, σὲ λιτή, ἀρχαιόπρεπη ἑλληνικὴ γραμμή —ἡ πένθιμη μουσικὴ γιὰ τὸ νεκρὸ Ἱππόλυτο, ὅπου ὁ θρῆνος τῶν ἐγχόρδων μαζὶ μὲ τὶς ρυθμικὲς ἐμπνεύσεις δίνει βαθειὰ συγκίνησι... Μὰ δὲν λείπουν καὶ τὰ ἐκφραστικὰ στοιχεῖα— δὲν τολμῶ νὰ πῶ «περιγραφικὰ» μ' ὅλο ποὺ μὲ τὴν πολυφωνικὴ τεχνικὴ τοῦ συνθέτη, τοὺς ἁρμονικοὺς καὶ ἀντιστικτικοὺς συνδυασμούς, ζωγραφίζονται τόσο ἔντονα τὰ πάθη ποὺ συγκλονίζουν τὶς ψυχὲς τῶν ἡρώων, τῶν ἡρώων ποὺ στὸν Εὐριπίδη εἶνε ἀληθινοὶ «ἄνθρωποι», πολὺ «ἄνθρωποι», πολὺ κοντά μας...

Γενικὰ ὁ Μητρόπουλος, μὲ τὴ μουσική του στὸν «Ἱππόλυτο» κατορθώνει κάτι τὸ πολὺ σπουδαῖο καὶ σημαντικό: νὰ

SEASON AHEAD

Philharmonic Conductors Are Balanced Group

By OLIN DOWNES

IN every way the New York Philharmonic-Symphony must build for the future. In every way: in the field of musical education for the rising generation; in widening the base of the great public which must be attracted in ever-increasing numbers to the fold, and whose final support as well as artistic patronage is essential to the orchestra's future; and in the programs and the quality of the conductors who present the music both to the public in the concert hall and the millions of people who listen to the concerts over the air waves.

In the matter of conductors there is much, in the coming season, of special interest. We know well that the ideal state of a great orchestra comes when it is rehearsing and performing under the direction of a single leader of musicianly power, thoroughness and imagination. As noted here last Sunday, circumstances due to the immense schedule that the Philharmonic-Symphony has to carry make such an arrangement out of the question.

Taxing Schedule

Since the Philharmonic Society amalgamated with the New York Symphony in 1928 it has found itself confronted with a schedule of concerts so long and taxing that no single director could take such a burden of rehearsals and performances on his shoulders alone. There is no doubt that an orchestra that grows and develops under the ministrations of a single leader can reach a higher level of sensitivity and technical finish than any orchestra led by a variety of conductors. We have always been the first to urge the single-conductor policy, and the principle is followed to as great an extent as is practicable by the engagement of a head conductor, or musical director, currently Dimitri Mitropoulos, to carry the greater part of the season and to have supervision, if not final authority, over the programs.

A group of other conductors of eminence gives the principal conductor periodic rests from his labors and also gives variety of style in interpretations, besides emphasizing certain kinds of music or schools of composition in which the individual conductor is a specialist. And this arrangement, whatever it may sacrifice in unbroken continuity of the training and control of the orchestra by one head, has its highly compensatory values.

It is a system which can degenerate, of course, into a kaleidoscopic series of so-called virtuoso conductors, each anxious to prove —and the devil with probity of interpretation and underscoring of sensationalism!—that he is superior to his fellows.

Virtuoso Conducting

But this is abuse of the practice involved. Anyway, a conductor cannot have too much virtuosity for his interpretive needs. He can have too little sincerity toward his art. Who is more of a virtuoso conductor than the great Toscanini? There are those who advance the other argument: that we do not need "personalities" of the baton, only honest, capable musicians who will give us the music "as it is written." But there is scarcely anything as unilluminating as the men who simply play, or think they play, the music "as it is written."

The Philharmonic-Symphony is fortunate in the conductors it has re-engaged for this season and, in the writer's opinion, is making a worth-while experiment with the engagement of another conductor whose activities have not been, for the greater part, in the serious symphonic field. We refer now to the engagement for three concerts of André Kostelanetz.

But let us take the conductors in their turn. Mr. Mitropoulos has put the Philharmonic-Symphony to the fore among all American orchestras by the daring and earnestness with which he has produced highly debatable and as yet unaccepted compositions by composers of our era. In this aspect alone, Mr. Mitropoulos' activities have done much to give the Philharmonic-Symphony pre-eminence, in a day and in a musical situation where the programs of his orchestra must equal, in variety and substance and modernity, the programs of any and all of the visiting orchestras which come to this city. This is not to imply that Mr. Mitropoulos is skilled only in contemporary music, but to point out that he is unique, to a great degree, among American orchestral conductors in this respect.

Repertory Balance

To balance the modern and ultra-modern elements of Mr. Mitropoulos' programs, there are Bruno Walter's devotion and exceptional sympathy with the music of the great classics and the post-romantics, such as Mahler and Bruckner. George Szell is the uncommonly eclectic and appreciative interpreter of music of the whole repertory, old and new. Young Guido Cantelli, who has risen so rapidly, has shown phenomenal gifts which promise the emergence of a conductor who may carry on the finest traditions of his art. We come then to the engagement of Mr. Kostelanetz.

The purpose here must be to find new audiences. There is still a gap, and a large one, between large portions of the public and the level of the programs offered by the Philharmonic-Symphony. There are millions of people, as it might be put, who love good music but as yet haven't found that out! They have still to learn—and so many people are learning today through phonograph records and the radio —that great music does not bite; that, in fact, it has minifold fascination for the person with an ordinary pair of ears who knows that he likes Gershwin and Sousa but is not aware, until he hears it, that he also immensely enjoys a Wagner overture, or Stravinsky's "Fire Bird," or Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," to say nothing of Mozart and Beethoven.

And it is these people in particular who are an immense potential new public for the Philharmonic-Symphony and its sisters over the nation. By gauging his programs to this potential it may be that Mr. Kostelanetz will make converts to the regular Philharmonic seasons.

Much also is expected of the Philharmonic-Symphony's concerts for young people, now in their thirtieth season. The concerts this year will be under the direction of Wilfred Pelletier, whose success with children's programs of symphonic music has been noted since he first undertook them in Canada.

Mr. Pelletier will give two groups of concerts this season. Five Saturday morning concerts will be played in Carnegie Hall, aimed at children from 9 to high school age, and three in Town Hall on Saturday afternoons. These will be for children from the 5 to 8 age brackets. The details of these programs are yet to be announced. Mr. Pelletier promises a "surprise," calculated to delight children, at each concert; and at certain of them young people, as they have done in years past, will appear as soloists.

Some of the first desk players of the Philharmonic, which opens its 1953-'54 season at Carnegie Hall on Oct. 8, are: Top, William Bell, tuba; Theodore Cella, harp; Saul Goodman, timpani, and James Chambers, French horn. Far left, William Polisi, bassoon. Above, John Wummer, flute, and conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos with the Philharmonic's concertmaster, John Corigliano.

Philharmonic Plans Many New Works

By JAY S. HARRISON

When Dimitri Mitropoulos talks music, he beams. He was beaming the other day.

"My friend," he said, "you shall have this year such a Philharmonic season as you have never seen. What programs! I love them. There is old and there is new. But you, I know, are interested mainly in the special features I have scheduled."

So saying, the musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony reached deep into his pocket for a sheaf of notes, smoothed them out on the table and regarded them fondly.

"Here it is," he said. "The whole list. It is best if I read them to you. That way I can tell you a little about some of the pieces."

Mr. Mitropoulos pushed aside his plate—it was lunchtime—beamed again and began. "On Oct. 8, our opening night, we do Stamitz' Sinfonia Concertante for seven instruments. It is a fine 18th century work. It has not been done before by my orchestra. Then, as the season continues, you will hear Gottfried von Einem's 'Capriccio,' a new piece by Malipiero called 'Vivaldiana,' and the first New York performance of Hindemith's 'Die Harmonie der Welt.'"

It's a Fact

Mr. Mitropoulos paused, took a bite of his spice-covered tartar steak, and observed parenthetically: "You know, concerning Hindemith I will tell you something. Only a few days ago I had lunch with Milhaud and he made an interesting remark. To me he said, 'It is a fact. With all the young composers springing up, my generation has become old-fashioned.' And it is a fact. I see what he means. These young men, they make our modern music. They have the endless ideas. Look at tape-recorder music. Is it not something frighteningly new?

"But about Hindemith. In Germany they say that he is an old-fashioned composer of today. They tell me he's gone soft, gone —here is a good word—gone legit. I don't know. But it's a point worth thinking over."

Mr. Mitropoulos returned to his list. "Where am I?" he asked. "Hindemith—yes. Then we have two premieres, works commissioned by the duo-pianists Whittemore and Lowe — Krenek's two-piano Concerto and Morton Gould's 'Dance Rhapsody.' Later there is my commission, a piano concerto by Paul Besancon, a young man from Iowa City. It will be played by John Sims, also of Iowa. Believe me, it is an interesting state."

He paused a second time. "You think that I am through? Not at all. I have not even mentioned Louis Aubert's 'Fantasie,' Beethoven's 'Missa Solemnis' and Boris Blacher's 'Ornaments.' Now there, my friends," he exclaimed, "is a peculiar work. It is based on a new rhythmical system in which every bar is different; and it grows. I have never conducted such a piece before in my life.

"Also we have the concert premiere of Copland's Short Symphony, and a new piano concerto by Leon Kirschner which the composer himself will play. I could mention, too, I suppose, an all-Mahler night combining the original parts of the Tenth Symphony with the entire Sixth. And Schoenberg's piano concerto, William Schuman's 'Judith,' Walter Piston's Fourth Symphony and Richard Mohaupt's violin concerto. And I will give a special all-Alban Berg night, with excerpts from 'Wozzeck,' and 'Lulu,' the 'Wein' cantata and the Three Pieces for Orchestra.

Swimming in Moderns

"You think that I am finished?" he asked. "I am," he answered.

This time it was the reporter who paused, for his pencil had turned to rubber and his hand had turned to stone. After a moment, a question. Your trip to Europe this summer—had it gone well?

"I tell you, you could swim in modern music if you wanted to. I could spend the entire year abroad conducting new works one after the other. But the Philharmonic and this country are my mission. The orchestra and I have stimulated and influenced people all over. That must not stop. We have not nearly finished our work. I will stay on.

"In Europe I went everywhere to festivals—Munich, Bayreuth; and in Bayreuth I discovered—this you will not believe—Wagner." Mr. Mitropoulos was quick to point out, however, that he had no intention of going on a Wagner-conducting binge. "No chance of that," he declared. "But I must say that in Bayreuth I finally discovered why Wagner has suffered. Everywhere in the world the operas are done with childish realism. In Bayreuth, the Wagner grandchildren present them as huge fairy tales. And that is what they are. Now, even the music sounds better."

Presumably, the Maestro had finished. He called the waiter, paid his check and stood up. As he walked to the door, he thought for an instant, then said, "Do you know of my troubles in Italy?" Only by hearsay, was the answer. "Well," he concluded, "we were going to give Verdi's 'Forza del Destino' in modern dress at the Teatro Communale in Florence. It was a version by Franz Werfel that had already played in Vienna. After all, the monastery scenes would still be the same in any age and I was delighted at the thought of getting rid of the usual ridiculous Velasquez type of attire.

"But neither I nor G. W. Pabst, the director, had contended with the singers. The whole thing was set to go when the singers decided that they sang better with plumes on their head and boots up to their hips on their feet. One of them, a tenor who was to appear as a modern military officer, said to me, 'What! You want me to make music in a trenchcoat? It cannot be done.' I must say, though, I convinced them to do it our way. I was very eloquent.

"And then it happened. Ricordi, the firm that publishes Verdi's music, decided three days before the performance that it was unwise to upset the Verdi tradition in Italy. If we did, they implied, they would withdraw the music. So we had three days to re-do the whole thing—boots, plumes and all. We did it. What a job. It was a success.

A final question was asked. For what reason, specifically, had the Maestro gone to Europe. He smiled. "For what reason? Why, my friend, it is simple—to relax, of course."

PHILHARMONIC REHEARSES

Mitropoulos Conducts — Session Pays Tribute to von Praag

With Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, the Philharmonic-Symphony began its first rehearsal of the season yesterday morning at 10 o'clock in Carnegie Hall.

Bruno Zirato, co-manager with Arthur Judson of the Philharmonic, welcomed the musicians and introduced new members of the orchestra and administrative staff. After Mr. Zirato's speech, the orchestra rose in silent tribute to the late Maurice van Praag, former personnel manager of the Philharmonic.

Work's rehearsed yesterday included Stamitz' Symphonie Konzertante in R, to be heard on the orchestra's opening program tomorrow night with seven first-desk men as soloists.

Symphonie Concertante in F, for seven solo instruments and orchestra.....Stamitz
Symphony No. 3.....Schumann
"Harold in Italy".....Berlioz

By OLIN DOWNES

It may be chronicled that the 112th season of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society opened last night under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos in Carnegie Hall, before an audience that packed the auditorium and hearkened attentively to every offering of the orchestra and its distinguished leader.

The first work on the program provided the novelty of the occasion, if a work that was composed approximately in the Seventeen Seventies can be given that name. As a matter of fact, this composition was played for the first time by the Philharmonic-Symphony: a "Symphonie Concertante" by the young K. Stamitz, of "Mannheimer" fame, and a delectable piece it proved to be.

It is "period" music by a composer who was not a single outstanding figure of his age, but it is not the less entertaining and felicitous for that. It is music of delightful invention and style; spontaneous, unaffected, engaging and in the best of the taste of its period. It is unhurried, lively and graceful in the fast movements, lyrical in the manner of the periods when composers could sing on the instruments and not merely develop ideas that in themselves are of secondary value. It is chamber music, conversation music, if you like, calculated, as the Greek philosopher put it, to communicate a gentleman-like joy and in so doing, to delight the ear and the understanding.

Example of Changing Form

This piece has also a particular stylistic interest. It is in the harmonic, homophonic, prevailingly single-voiced form of the later eighteenth century; yet it comes straight from the contrapuntal period and from the old form of the "concerto grosso." You see the "concerto grosso" becoming a classic symphony under your eyes. Yet the symphony retains the old division of the "concerto grosso" orchestra, with the major part of the orchestra of the "tutti," and the smaller orchestra, comprising solo players, of the "concertino."

But here are the two main themes of the symphony, and the general outlines, plus cadenzas, of the Mozart concerto. The first statement of the themes is by the big orchestra; their development is undertaken by the seven instruments—as they are in this score—of the "concertino." And there is ample play for soloistic prowess, shown with striking skill and musicianship by the players of the "concertino" group, all leading members of the Philharmonic-Symphony: John Corigliano, violin; John Wummer, flute; Lazlo Varga, 'cello; Harold Gomberg, oboe; Robert McGinnis, clarinet; James Chambers, first horn, and William Namen, second horn.

Other Symphonies Heard

We have spoken of the first movement principally. The slow movement gave the solo players greater opportunity for individual expression and eloquency in the singing of melodies—first-rank artists, blended in a fine fusion but clarity of tone by Mr. Mitropoulos. One could speak in more detail of their individual performances and of other aspects of this lovely old piece. But enough! We heard some unfamiliar and uncommonly rewarding music.

The two major symphonies of the evening were the Schumann E flat "Rhenish" Symphony and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy"—the latter work no doubt designed to celebrate the 150th anniversary of Berlioz' birth in 1803. The rich-toned William Lincer was the viola soloist in the "Harold" symphony's performance. In the reading of these two works we found it impossible to agree with the highly gifted and wholly unpredictable Mitropoulos.

Many were the interesting details of the Schumann symphony, but here the same conductor, who gave so admirable and inspired a performance of another work of Schumann's last season, was inclined to drive the audience to stridency of tone, and to give the work restlessness rather than rapturousness, and mannerisms of phrasing. Nor did we find Mr. Mitropoulos in much more felicitous a vein in the Berlioz score, which has been done with finer technical finish and a greater variety of tone-color on other occasions.

Philharmonic Begins 112th Season

The Philharmonic-Symphony, pedigreed by 111 past seasons, started out on a new one last night, in some ways worthy of its heritage, in some ways not. Dimitri Mitropoulos, the ensemble's musical director, was on the podium in Carnegie Hall for a program that looked better on paper than it sounded.

"Symphonie Konzertante in F," by Karl Stamitz, which opened the program, was historically fascinating as it brought to life a work from that family of 18th Century musicians responsible for an extraordinary orchestra in Mannheim. This music written for orchestra and seven solo instruments, was also made happier by the excellent playing of the soloists, first-desk men from the Philharmonic. Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony followed, in five movements.

Concluding the program was another 19th Century work, the Berlioz four-movement "Harold in Italy, Symphony with Viola Solo," with first violist, William Lincer as soloist. Lincer, who played with a warm able-bodied tone and unusual sensitivity, also contributed a great deal to the positive aspects of the evening.

While talking about beautiful sound, it must be noted that the various sections of the orchestra came across with delightful relaxation and freshness of tone. The string section, while not velvety, was sweet and persuasive, and Mitropoulos kept his urge to bombast well under control until the final movement of the Berlioz. Thus the balance, for the most part, was good. The wind section, as usual, was most impressive.

All of which is to say that Mitropoulos has a superlative instrument to work with and to this reviewer it was depressing to have the opening program without one work which was of first calibre, considering the orchestral repertory as a whole. Also, to program two long works of the romantic period, one after the other, (especially when both missed considerably in content and structure despite their lovely moments) did not seem making the most of opportunity.

Philharmonic in Season Opener

By DOUGLAS WATT

With Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, the Philharmonic-Symphony began its 112th season last night at Carnegie Hall. A good-sized audience heard a smartly-played program of warm, melodious music.

The most recent work of the three played was Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, composed in 1850. Mitropoulos gave it a fluent reading but gained his best effects during the second half of the concert, which was devoted to Berlioz' tuneful and imaginatively-scored "Harold in Italy." William Lincer was the solo violist in this work and he played his part skillfully and sensitively.

The concert opened with the society's first performance of an 18th Century work, Karl Stamitz' vigorous "Symphonie Konzertante." This music has much charm but not enough, in one listener's opinion, to sustain the piece for the half hour it takes to perform it.

Philharmonic to Begin Thursday

The iconoclastic Dimitri Mitropoulos has chosen to open the 112th season of the Philharmonic-Symphony Thursday in Carnegie Hall with a program which, if conservative, still is provocative. In commemoration of the 150th anniversary year of Berlioz' birth, Mitropoulos will perform for the first Thursday-Friday pair of concerts the composer's symphony, "Harold in Italy," with William Lincer, first violist, as soloist. This will be the first time the Philharmonic has performed the work since 1935.

Two Top Musical Events Inaugurate New Season

THIS Thursday the music season begins abruptly. A little late in starting, it opens with two major events. The Philharmonic Symphony launches its 112th season in Carnegie Hall with its musical director Dimitri Mitropoulos in charge for the first two months. The New York City Opera Company presents Rossini's "Cenerentola" as the first offering of its Fall season at the City Center.

That Mitropoulos seeks to blend the familiar with the unfamiliar in his programs may be noted in the announcements for the first two. The opening concert features a performance of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" in the observance of the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth. Incidentally, it will be the first performance of "Harold" by the Philharmonic Symphony in 18 years.

Also included is the first performance by the Society of Karl Stamitz's "Symphonie Concertante," an 18th century work for seven solo instruments with orchestra.

Premiere Due

The following week will bring the American premiere of Gottfried von Einem's "Capriccio." Other first performances will follow shortly: Morton Gould's "Dance Rhapsody" and Ernst Krenek's Concerto for Two Pianos, both commissioned by pianists Whittemore and Lowe; Aaron Copland's Short Symphony; and Hindemith's Symphony "Harmonie der Welt." Mitropoulos may be relied upon to be stimulating.

City Opera Co. Conflicts With Philharmonic Debut

By PAUL AFFELDER

Last evening was one time a music critic could wish he were two people. At Carnegie Hall, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra began its 112th season, while at the City Center, for some thoughtless and inconsiderate reason, the New York City Opera Company also elected to open its season.

The music calendar is not that cluttered at this time of year that the opera couldn't have begun Wednesday night, instead of conflicting with the Philharmonic's traditional opening date. It was all very confusing for critics and audiences alike, because whoever was at one event missed a fine performance at the other.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Philharmonic's musical director, made a wise and thoughtful gesture when he planned the opening program so that it would allow eight of the orchestra's excellent first-desk players to be heard in solo spots. Each of these section leaders is a superb artist in his own right, and it was a most rewarding experience hearing them perform.

Septet Performance a Joy

Seven of these men—John Corigliano, violin; Laszlo Varga, 'cello; John Wummer, flute; Harold Gomberg, oboe; Robert McGinnis, clarinet, and James Chambers and William Namen, horns—appeared in the program's opening work, the Symphonie Konzertante in F Major by the 18th Century composer, Karl Stamitz.

The music, undoubtedly written for the skilled players in the Mannheim Orchestra, turned out to be rather second-rate, save for some lovely passages in the second movement. But this talented septet performed this difficult score with such tonal beauty and musicianship, both in the solo passages and the ensembles, that it was a joy from beginning to end.

Everyone, including the conductor, seemed to be enjoying himself immensely, with the result that the music had a wonderfully relaxed feeling. The performance only whetted the appetite for more music of this type—for example, some of the Bach Brandenburg Concerti.

Mr. Lincer Plays Berlioz

The eighth soloist from the orchestra was William Lincer, principal violinist, who was heard in the extensive and important solo part of Beerlioz' Symphony, "Harold in Italy," played to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth. This highly romantic work was accorded an intensely romantic, colorful and often exciting reading last night.

We do not remember ever having heard the viola solo in this symphony set forth with such a glowingly warm tone or such penetrating understanding. His was a memorable account of the music, one that added immeasurably to its sometimes shaky stature. He was enthusiastically applauded for his artistry.

Another work from the romantic period, Schumann's Third — or "Rhenish" — Symphony, completed the program. What we heard of it sounded rather brash and fragmentary.

Philharmonic Opens Year With Berlioz

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The symphonic pride of New York—also the oldest orchestra in America—opened its 112th season in Carnegie Hall last night.

It was a bright and freshly decorated hall, with improved lighting, in which Dimitri Mitropoulos signalled the new Philharmonic season into being with a brisk reading of the National Anthem.

Alert, Inspiring.

The briskness continued all through the program. Mr. Mitropoulis was alert, energetic and inspiring as ever. The men responded with smart precision and balance. And there was a good deal of beautiful sound that augured well for the long months ahead.

There was also a new look about the program book, now being edited by Irving Kolodin, who will use his own scholarly notes as well as material culled from past writers.

Since this is the 150th anniversary of Berlioz's birth, Mr. Mitropoulos rightly featured the "Harold in Italy" symphony on last night's program. Also billed were an unfamiliar work by Karl Stamitz and Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony.

Composer of Year.

Berlioz is definitely the composer of the year—and not only because of the anniversary. A growing number of people have become aware of the limitless power and resource of this composer once relegated to second rank. Calling him the fourth "B" of music is merely stating a fact.

The symphony was excitingly performed last night, with William Lincer as the perfect viola soloist. It is music of vast strength and romantic imagination, of endless drama and adventure. While it is based on Byron, it is really more Byron than Byron himself. After all, Berlioz was Lord Byron masquerading as a composer.

Captures Quality.

It is the quality of the poem and the poet that Berlioz captures, not the narrative or descriptive detail. There is no point in searching for these in the music. As Jacques Barzun pointed out in the program, "We do not have to follow anything but the music. And what music."

Equally brilliant was the reading of the "Rhenish" Symphony. It is not my favorite symphony by any means, but Mr. Mitropoulos made it sound like his. It was the best way to recommend it to the audience.

And Stamitz, Too.

Stamitz's "Symphonie Konzertante," salvaged from the teeming hoards of the 18th century, made a pleasant but innocuous novelty to open the program.

It made several of the wind players solo-happy. But I am quite prepared to live out the rest of my life without Karl Stamitz.

34 Pianists in Concert at Carnegie Hall To Mark 100th Year of Steinway & Sons

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

STEINWAY & SONS have been making fine pianos for fine pianists for 100 years. It is proposed that the centenary be celebrated a week from Monday, Oct. 19, in Carnegie Hall, New York, with a most unusual musical event. This concert will enlist the services of 34 pianists, all of whom play the product of Steinway & Sons and some of them with distinguished art.

To accommodate this army of instrumentalists, 10 Steinway concert grands will be placed high on a platform at the rear of the stage overlooking the orchestra and the conductor, who will have the arduous task of establishing an ensemble with the numerous pianists and the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of New York.

The public may be disappointed in that all 34 pianists will not address the listeners simultaneously. The performers will be drawn sequentially and by lot and their assignments will not be too serious.

Many will remember from the concert hall and the radio the organization known as the First Piano Quartet. For many seasons past these competent technichians have been playing on four keyboards important music originally designed for one keyboard and two hands.

They have had great success with the public and on this occasion they will be asked to present a new composition by Morton Gould.

This gifted composer hovers on the narrow line that divides serious music and the music of entertainment. It is not known into which category the new concerted piece for four pianos and symphony orchestra will be listed. It is entitled "Inventions" and doubtless will be a stimulating item.

The other concerted numbers seem to be not too demanding. They will comprise Josef Hofmann's arrangement of "The Star-Spangled Banner," Gould's arrangement of Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever," which inevitably will pay some tribute to the celebrated treatment of the same number by Horowitz, and Chopin's so-called military Polonaise in A Major. Meanwhile the orchestra will satisfy popular taste with works by Wagner, MacDowell and Falla.

It is entertaining to note that the serious piano playing of the concert will be done not by any one of the 30 luminaries remaining in the list about to be published, but by the conductor of the Philharmonic Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos.

CHOICE of the conductor as piano soloist must be regarded as a stroke of diplomacy. How else could the conflicting ambitions of 30 pianistic stars be resolved? Mitropoulos has never posed as a pianist, tho he was at one time a student of the late Ferruccio Busoni.

Upon this study period Mitropoulos has not expatiated. In truth, he confesses that Busoni advised him not to prepare himself for a career as a pianist but to concentrate upon his other promising gifts for composition and conducting.

The contact of the conductor with the greatest of the century's pianists impressed him so profoundly that he has piously performed many of the major works of his great teacher and these have added an accent of erudition to New York's customary calendar which has proved salutary.

For this assignment Mitropoulos has set himself no easy task. He will play the final movement from the Third Concerto by the great Soviet composer, Serge Prokofieff. This imposes upon the performer certain keyboard evolutions which are completely outside and beyond the conventional finger vocabulary.

A PERUSAL of the names of the 34 pianists who have been chosen for the honor attaching to this appearance will surprise the informed concertgoer by reason of the omissions.

Thus, one does not find Vladimir Horowitz among the elect. Neither is the great Egon Petri included, nor is Artur Rubenstein, nor Rudolf Serkin. To the informed lover of piano music one or another of these four names will seem to deserve the epithet "greatest."

It is of course idle to speculate upon the reasons for their absence from the roll of honor, tho it is known that Horowitz is said to be ill, and Petri reserves his concert activities for the happy State of California where he now resides.

The reader, it is hoped, is now impatient to learn the names of the 34 elect, so here they are in impartial alphabetical order.

Jacques Abram, Ellen Ballon, Erno Balogh, Ethel Bartlett, Alexander Brailowsky, Gaby Casadesus, Robert Casadesus, Abram Chasins, Ania Dorfman, Sidney Foster, Carl Friedberg, Rudolph Ganz, Sascha Gorodnitzki, Gary Graffman, Leonid Hambro, Skitch Henderson, Constance Keene, Muriel Kerr, Eugene List, Moura Lympany, William Masselos, Guiomar Novaes, Menahem Pressler, Nadia Reisenberg, Rae Robertson, Franz Rupp, Gyorgy Sandor, Jan Smeterlin, Alexander Uninsky and Beveridge Webster.

If the reader finds some names in this list which are unknown to him, it must be confessed that the writer also fails to recognize some of them. This can only mean that they have not appeared in the concert halls of Washington in the last 17 years.

Comment on the choice of these artists for these special honors is therefore omitted. There are still some other pianists of equal renown who are known to the Washington public and to America generally who do not appear in this group.

IT IS understood that this mass exhibit of pianists is to be repeated in more than 200 American cities and 57 foreign countries, so it is entirely probable that the Steinway artists, seemingly overlooked, will be included in some of these events.

Steinway & Sons pay all the expenses of this first concert. Artists and orchestra players donate their services.

The total box office receipts will be given to the Musician's Foundation, Inc., and the Philharmonic-Symphony Society.

34 Pianists on Steinway Show Sunday

NEW YORK—The Steinway Centennial Concert, Monday at Carnegie Hall, opening ceremony of the Steinway 100th Anniversary Celebration, will feature 34 famous pianists and the New York Philharmonic Symphony. That so many great keyboard stars will appear on the same program is absolutely unprecedented in music annals.

Music lovers from all over America will attend the performance, but for the millions unable to get into Carnegie Hall a preview of this event will be the highlight of Ed Sullivan's CBS-TV show, "Toast of the Town," Sunday night. It will be carried on both WOI-TV and WCCO-TV from 7 to 8 p. m.

A remote pick-up of the dress rehearsal from Carnegie will be followed by an interview with the president, Theodore E. Steinway and the 34 participating artists.

Carpenters will move into Carnegie Hall prior to the concert to construct a high platform at the back of the stage to support 10 grand pianos on which the pianists will perform in groups of 10 at a time. This platform will tower above the 100 members of the orchestra conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, who will also appear as a pianist.

The concert grand from which the conductor will direct the orchestra will have a special plexiglass lid, designed by Steinway & Sons, to enable Mr. Mitropoulos to see the entire massed ensemble. His piano will be flanked by four other grands on which the First Piano Quartet will play, thus bringing the total of grand pianos on stage to 15.

To determine the make-up of the three groups of 30 pianists who will perform in teams of 10 at a time, a drawing was conducted. The results of this choice by lot are as follows:

The opening number, Josef Hofmann's multiple arrangement of the "Star-Spangled Banner" will be played by Gregory Sandor, Skitch Henderson, Nadia Reisenberg, William Masselos, Gary Graffman, Sascha Gorodnitzki, Menahem Pressler, Constance Keene, Ania Dorfmann and Franz Rupp.

Chopin's "Polonaise in A Major" will have at the 10 pianos, Alexander Brailowsky, Guiomar Novaes, Moura Lympany, Eugene List, Ethel Bartlett, Rae Robertson, Gaby Casadesus, Rudolph Ganz, Beveridge Webster and Sidney Foster.

The third team performing in the grand finale, Morton Gould's arrangement of "Stars and Stripes Forever," for 10 pianos with full orchestra consists of Robert Casadesus, Alexander Uninsky, Leonid Hambro, Abram Chasins, Carl Friedberg, Jan Smeterlin, Muriel Kerr, Ellen Ballon, Jacques Abram and Erno Balogh.

The First Piano Quartet and orchestra will premiere Morton Gould's "Inventions," composed for this occasion and Dimitri Mitropoulos will conduct and play the finale from Prokofieve's Third Piano Concerto. The orchestra will be heard in works by Wagner, MacDowell and de Falla. All the artists, orchestra members and conductor are donating their services as a salute to Steinway's 100th birthday, and the proceeds will go to the Musicians Foundation and the Philharmonic-Symphony Soci-

Philharmonic:

Yehudi Soloist

By MILES KASTENDIECK

MITROPOULOS OPENED the Philharmonic Symphony's subscription series with an astutely devised program in Carnegie Hall last night.

Balancing old and new music on both sides of the intermission, he presented a list of works entirely fresh that made good listening.

The presence of the Swiss composer Gottfried von Einem to hear the American premiere of his "Capriccio," and of Yehudi Menuhin as violin soloist somewhat glamorized the occasion.

Einem's music attracted the audience. Its rhythmic pulse and its lyric appeal in the adagio section commanded attention. Though brief, the score expressed definite character.

Menuhin played Viotti's charming violin concerto, No. 22 and Bartok's second rhapsody. They presented a dramatic contrast in style and contest as well as in performance.

Menuhin's notably expert fiddling paid off in the Bartok to greater effect. His playing of the Viotti palled in the final movement. Past master at tossing off intricacies, he still remains an aloof interpreter.

Quite a different Mitropoulos from the one who opened the season last week mounted the podium last night. He was in the vein especially for the Mendelssohn "Reformation" symphony which began the concert.

Attuned to the classic as well as the religious character of this score, he capitalized on his orchestral discipline to fashion a finely integrated performance.

His handling of the Einem and Bartok scores was characteristic of his success in the contemporary field.

By OLIN DOWNES

The program of the Philharmonic-Symphony's concert last night in Carnegie Hall was one of many sorts, curiously compounded. The program did not amalgamate; neither did the qualities of the performance. It is, however, a pleasure to relate that the orchestra was in first-class form and intonation, and that the orchestral performance made by far the best and most interesting part of the concert.

Mr. Mitropoulos was in complete control, both authoritative and persuasive when he conducted the blithe, naïve and sometimes amusingly complacent little "Reformation" symphony of Mendelssohn. He made the music as dramatic as he legitimately could, and neither distorted nor exaggerated the qualities of those passages when suddenly Mendelssohn forgets his religious pronouncements and the heralding forth of the German chorales and church chants upon which the symphony is based, and proceeds to sing his pretty instrumental song.

Forgets Modern Criteria

There is only one conductor, perhaps, who can render music as innocently as it deserves and forget all modern criteria and sophistications when he does so. But the reading of the symphony last night was a potent one, and it comprised some superb playing of the orchestra.

Von Einem's piece pleased the audience greatly. It is a cocktail of biting harmonies and rhythms with a kick in them, and for its middle part of tongue-in-the-cheek melodiousness that wouldn't let butter melt in its mouth and glories in the obvious. It is eclectic, derivative, waggish and expertly made. It provided at least momentary entertainment.

It would be pleasant to praise Mr. Menuhin's performances, but it must be said that neither in point of style, finish nor intonation either, did his rendition of the Viotti classic correspond to the nature of the music and the aristocratic treatment that it asks of its interpreter.

Then Mr. Menuhin sacrificed himself on the altar of the reputation of the late Bela Bartok. It is the fashion now, after his death in 1945, to acclaim anything and everything that Bartok wrote as the achievement of a great and previously misunderstood master. The Second Rhapsody for violin and orchestra does not impress us as coming within that category.

Its exoticism becomes forced. Effects that at first are exciting or disturbing, begin to have the flavor of triteness and mannerisms rather deliberately pursued. Nor is the work easy or advantageous to the solo violinist. Mr. Menuhin devoted himself to the cause, and his deed was acclaimed by the audience.

Menuhin Shines at Carnegie

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Dimitri Mitropouldo, who can be the best program-builder in the business, surpassed himself with last night's Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall.

It was a program perfectly divided between the moderns and the classics, with the four composers listed alternately in the order of classic-modern -classic-modern.

Sustained Interest.

The composers were Mendelssohn, Von Einem, Viotti, and Bartok. They balanced and contrasted with each other in perfect variety, and the sequence of moods and idioms was of a kind to sustain interest and suspense.

It is a pleasure to report that the orchestra again rose to the occasion and gave its inspiring conductor performances that were worthy of him and the composers.

Soloist on last night's program was Yehudi Menuhin, who proved something of a divided program himself. His playing in Viotti's A Minor Concerto was scarcely up to the standard he has set for himself.

Bold, Confident.

He was another violinist, however, in Bartok's second rhapsody, almost another person. Where the playing had been unsteady, it was now firm and solid; where it had been self-conscious, it was now bold and confident.

The program opened with a performance of Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony that was unforgettable for beauty of phrasing and depth of feeling and thought. Mr. Mitropoulos obviously both feels and thinks out the music he conducts.

Vital Piece.

Novelty of the evening was a startlingly vital Capriccio by the young German composer Gottfried Von Einem, who was on hand to taek a bow. This is one modern composer whose music goes places and does things—all sorts of things.

It is music almost feverish in its tension, constantly on the go, dodging in and out as if it were playing tag with every instrument in the orchestra. There is a fresh surprise at every turn. burst of sizzling energy in every phrase.

Von Einem writes as if music were an atom and he alone had found the way to split it.

Mitropoulos Conducts

Dimitri Mitropoulos, conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony in a concert last night in Carnegie Hall, introduced to America Gottfried von Einew's one-movement "Capriccio." And a lucky thing, too. For it literally saved an evening that was nowhere overgenerous in the richer musical values.

The short Einem piece, however, is a dashing orchestral work, full of instrumental zest and rousing high spirits. Though chronologically an early work, the "Capriccio" none the less foreshadows the composer's present preoccupation with the significance of rhythm. And rhythm, indeed, is its fibre and core. It is what holds the piece together and makes it move. Essentially, each tune, each idea—and there are many of them—pivots about a flexible and syncopated rhythmic center, somewhat in the nature of latter-day Stravinsky. But here the relationship ends. Einew's "Capricoio" is in the idiom of our time, but never agressively so. And though its three tightly compact sections wander between elements both chromatic and diatonic, they do it with so sure a step that the transitions are neither obvious nor abrupt.

The "Capriccio" is further adorned with an orchestral dress of the brightest colors and smoothest textures. It is Einem's habit to pit against one another the various choirs of the band, in each case highlighting its especial features through the contrast with its neighbor. A dangerous device this, when incautiously used, for it is apt to—and often does—lead to a mottled and disunified total sonority. But Einem is openly a craftsman and no blemish scars his work.

The remainder of the concert did not climb to the level set by Einem's Opus 2. Throughout the Viotti concerto, Mr. Menuhin was beset by difficulties. The mild and innocuous work seemed to cramp his gifts, prevent him from doing those big, sweeping things that are his distinctive way. And his discomfort, moreover, transmitted itself to his technical facility and over-all musical capabilities. His tone, especially in the first movement, was wiry and pinched, his pitch indistinct, and his color store not nearly the equal of its reputation. What Mr. Menuhin obviously needed was a headier composition to set his imagination steaming. When it came, in the person of Bartok's rhapsody, the violinist was fully prepared to hurl it headlong, with all its folk tunes flying. The rhapsody really sang; and lovely song it was.

The evening began with Mr. Mitropoulos' rendition of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, a nervous, stormy interpretation that was all the same flashingly vivid and expressive. And we may all be grateful to the conductor that what syrup is implicit in the work's quite saccharine themes was not dripped endlessly onto the audience.

MAJOR & MINOR

Modern Acoustic Methods Still Ignored By Some of Our Major Symphonic Groups

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN

WASHINGTON'S symphonic music again will be provided by three visiting orchestras and two resident groups.

One of the resident groups, the National Gallery orchestra, conducted by Richard Bales, already has begun its activities. The other resident group is, of course, the National Symphony, conducted by Dr. Howard Mitchell. Its concerts begin this week.

The visitors are the three top orchestras of the Atlantic coast—the Philadelphia orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor; the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch, conductor, and the New York Philharmonic Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor.

The Philadelphia will play eight concerts here, the Boston four, and the New York one. This is more than half the number announced by the National Symphony.

THESE symphonic groups fall into two categories—the classic and the modern. With the classicists, the New York Philharmonic Symphony and the National Symphony take their firm stand. The modern orchestras are those of Boston, Philadelphia and the National Gallery. It has been noted that on occasion both the Philadelphia and Boston groups revert to the classic tradition; this is when guest conductors take over the podium.

The difference between the ancients and the moderns will seem simple to the layman. The modern ideal places the tone of the violin choir as the most important and the most sensitive in the ensemble. To secure the values, the modern conductor seats all his violin players together on the conductor's left, and places the lower strings—violas, 'cellos and basses—on his right.

This was the arrangement devised by Stokowski and immediately adopted by Koussevitzky and Stock in this country and by the major orchestras of Paris, London and Denmark in Europe.

IT WILL surprise many to learn that little Denmark has one of the finest symphony orchestras in Europe. Like the French and English orchestras, which are equally fine, it is supported by radio, and not by radio advertising, of which there is none. In this country, symphony passes the hat.

Returning to the problem of acoustics as it develops in connection with violin tone, it must be stressed that the so-called classicists merely took the orchestra as they found it when it crawled up out of Monteverdi's theater pit onto the stage early in the 17th century. They added some new wind instruments but remained faithful to the Monteverdi string tradition.

That they have not been happy with it seems obvious and those conductors who retain it must be described as ultra conservative. One of the most determined champions of the ancient order is Mitropoulos. He has magnificent string talent at his disposal in the New York Philharmonic Symphony but is not always successful in making his violins achieve tonal or even rhythmical unanimity.

Another determined practitioner of the ancient order is young Dr. Howard Mitchell of the National Symphony.

MITCHELL'S situation is aggravated by the fact that his strings are not as numerous as those of the older orchestras and by no means of equal competence. His directors should be more generous with him, and give him a larger string body.

So he gives himself a handicap assumed at the time he took over Hans Kindler's post and determined to prove himself different. He has paid a high price in orchestra sound for his devotion to the ideals of the past.

As to the miracles which can be wrought with violin tone, when the players are unified after the modern fashion, it is necessary to remind this musical public of the first concert conducted here by Munch with the French National orchestra, which made spectacular display of this kind of virtuosity. Or the listener may be asked to recall the wide and varied beauty of the Nielsen Symphony as played last season by the Danish National orchestra. Or again, the astonishing delicacy achieved by Ormandy and his Philadelphia group in certain trite Wagnerian excerpts which were made to sound new and fresh and inspired as they once may have been.

MITCHELL and the National Symphony open their series of 20 Wednesday evening concerts in Constitution hall on Wednesday. Details of this first program will be found in another column.

The Philadelphians play the first of their monthly concerts on Oct. 27.

The Bostonians will arrive in November, probably with a new Concerto Grosso by Ernest Bloch.

The New Yorkers will not arrive until January.

This is the symphonic road ahead.

New York

The music season, having lagged in getting started, finally burst forth with two major events on the same evening.

The Philharmonic-Symphony launched its 112th season in Carnegie Hall under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos. The New York City Opera Company opened its fall season at the City Center of Music and Drama by presenting Rossini's "Cenerentola." With four concerts by the Philharmonic-Symphony and six operas at City Center in one week end, musical activity is under way.

Mr. Mitropoulos, for his first programs, offered Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," in recognition of the 150th anniversary of the composer's birth. By way of novelty, he gave the first Philharmonic performance of Karl Stamitz's Symphonie Konzertante in F. The Philharmonic had not played the Berlioz work in 18 years. A more familiar item was Schumann's Third Symphony, "Rhenish."

Stamitz Piece

A Stamitz piece conformed to 18th century conventionalism, chiefly offering several first-desk men the opportunity to appear as soloists. It was the playing of this concertante—John Corigliano, violin, John Wummer, flute, Laszlo Varga, cello, Harold Gomberg, oboe, Robert McGinnis, clarinet, James Chambers and William Namen, horns—that made hearing the piece at all worth while.

Though the other works would be classified as romantic music, the style in which Mr. Mitropoulos presented them divested them of much of the warmth and expressiveness attributed to this type. The kind of abandon with which he conducted proved somewhat out-of-character, and it resulted in highly individualistic interpretations. The truly romantic element was supplied by William Lincer, whose viola solo in the Berlioz work had the richness of tone and the traditional quality appropriate to it.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The first hundred years of Steinway & Sons, as manufacturer of pianos and servant of music in the United States, were fittingly memorialized last night with a gala concert at Carnegie Hall. Naturally, the piano and pianists played a large part in this centenary concert, but the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which antedates Steinway by eleven years, also was on hand.

There were thirty-four pianists taking part in last night's concert, and if you count Dimitri Mitropoulos, as indeed he should be counted, since he doubled as conductor and piano soloist, there were thirty-five. Not all of these pianists, who included some of the world's finest today, played at once. However, at three different times units of ten took the stage, deploying clear across its generous width, each in front of a grand piano, a Steinway, of course.

There were plenty of other pianists, professional and amateur in the house, but they were in the audience that filled the hall. It was a brilliant gathering. It included leaders in music, the other arts, industry, society and Government and it seemed to take the attitude that it was at a gay birthday party. In fact, one noticed people in the audience stopping frequently to congratulate members of the Steinway family just as if it were a personal birthday.

New Piece Commissioned

A new piece, commissioned for the occasion, was one of the principal ornaments. It was Morton Gould's "Inventions" for four pianos and orchestra. The First Piano Quartet—Adam Garner, Edward Edson, Glauco D'Attili and Frank Mittler—provided the solo contingent, and Mr. Mitropoulos led the reduced orchestra. All shared in a lively performance.

Whatever one may think of the idea of an ensemble of four pianos, Mr. Gould made a virtue of his solo combination. He did not overload it with doublings or request it to pound out great gobs of sound. His writing was idiomatic, crisp and sprightly, and by dispensing with the string choirs of the orchestra, he complemented the four pianos with an instrumental background that was cool and tangy.

As the concert opened, the orchestra was in the background, and ten pianos were ranged along the front of the stage. Then Ania Dorfman, Sascha Gorodnitski, Gary Graffman, Skitch Henderson, Constance Keene, William Masselos, Menahem Pressler, Franz Rupp, Gyorgy Sandor and Nadia Reisenberg marched out and played Josef Hofmann's piano version of "The Star-Spangled Banner." They did all right, save for a few places where some were not with their fellows. But they really were not given enough to do, maybe they should ask for a recount.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the full orchestra then played Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude, a proper festival piece for a celebration. Three movements from Edward MacDowell's immensely atmospheric Orchestral Suite No. 2 (the "Indian") came next and served as a reminder that this American composer of an older generation had something to say and knew how to say it.

And Mitropoulos Plays

Then an eleventh piano was rolled out—this one with a transparent cover of lucite, which, when raised, enabled Mr. Mitropoulos as piano soloist to see, and be seen by, his orchestra. Mr. Mitropoulos proceeded to give a sparkling performance of the finale from Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 3, which is impudent, propulsive and thoroughly likable music.

After the performance of the Gould work, the ten pianos were moved into place again in front of the stage. While this chore was being attended to, Alexander Greiner, who is in charge of the Steinway company's artist relations, walked out to pick up manuscript sheets of the Gould piece. Persons in the audience recognized him and began to applaud. Whereupon Mr. Mitropoulos rushed out and embraced him, making the spontaneous accolade official.

Now another set of ten pianists was put to work. They were: Ethel Bartlett, Alexander Brailowsky, Sidney Foster, Gaby Casadesus, Moura Lympany, Rudolph Ganz, Eugene List, Rae Robertson, Beveridge Webster and Guiomar Novaes. They played, all at the same time and with rousing sonorities. Chopin's A major Polonaise, Op. 40.

Actually, nine pianists did most of the playing. Mr. Ganz' faced his colleagues and gave them the beat. Most of the time, he stood and conducted. Occasionally he sat down for some chords. But there was enough sound from the nine to justify Mr. Ganz in his role as leader.

Enjoyed by Audience

It was a stunt that the audience enjoyed. It proved that nine virtuosos could harness their artistic impulses to play as one. You wouldn't choose to take your Chopin in this inflated form as a regular thing, but if Steinway wants to celebrate its next centenary in this fashion, there will be people to relish it.

After a performance of De Falla's Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat" by the orchestra, the next batch of ten pianists came upon the stage to join Mr. Mitropoulos and his ensemble in Mr. Gould's arrangement of Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" for multiple pianos and orchestra. This time the pianists were Ellen Ballon, Jacques Abram, Erna Balogh, Robert Casadesus, Abram Chasins, Carl Friedberg, Leonid Hambro, Jan Smeterlin, Alexander Uninsky and Murial Kerr, and they helped to bring the concert to a tumultuous close.

The entire proceeds from this affair will be donated to the Musicians Foundation, Inc., and to the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, a characteristic Steinway gesture.

The centenary observances will go on across the country for the next few months. Last night's concert was just the beginning. It was followed immediately by a reception for hundreds of guests at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. A centenary piano will be unveiled today at another event. It looks as if the Steinway is here to stay.

Carnival of the Pianists

Many a young piano student must hav looked with awe upon the gathering in Ca negie Hall the other night. The stage was fille with pianists—no fewer than thirty-four them—representing many of the greate names in the music world, and performing relays of ten. Even when Dimitri Mitropoulo the conductor of the Philharmonic, sat dow at the piano, nobody laughed. And the capac ity audience, too, was made up in large pa of pianists, amateur and professional, wh wanted to be part of the keyboard carnival.

The occasion, of course, was the observanc of the Steinway Centennial, celebrating th first 100 years of one of the world's great pian manufacturers. Short of having Mozart an Clementi stage a repeat of their famous con test for the Emperor Joseph II, it is hard t see what might have been added to the occa sion. Purists undoubtedly would suggest tha something might have been taken away, sinc Chopin's A-major Polonaise sounds no bette when played by ten pianists than by one. Bu birthday parties invariably are a little on the noisy side; it's the spirit that counts, and there was plenty of it at Carnegie Hall. The pianoforte has been in existence for more than 200 years now; it remains the most versatile and satisfying of all instruments. The latest demonstration of these qualities at Carnegie Hall should encourage many people to go home and do some piano playing of their own, though using only one keyboard at a time.

35 Pianists Play at Carnegie To Hail Steinway Centenary

Carnegie Hall resounded last night to a celebration of the 100th anniversary of Steinway & Sons, the piano manufacturers, in which thirty-five pianists, playing in groups as large as ten simultaneously, joined the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in a musical bow to the Steinway pianos.

Four of the pianists played as a quartet. Thirty played in ten-man tandems, the first group Josef Hofmann's piano version of the National Anthem; the second, Chopin's "Polonaise in A Major," and the third, Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever" in a Morton Gould arrangement for multiple pianos and orchestra.

Mitropoulos at Piano, too

The thirty-fifth pianist was, of course, Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the Philharmonic, who played the finale from Prokofieff's third concerto on a piano with a specially attached plexi-glass lid, built for the concert, which John Steinway explained yesterday could act as a reverberator, deflecting sufficient sound outward to the audience, while its transparency permitted the orchestra to follow Mr. Mitropoulos's conducting.

It was a very pianistic occasion, and for the massed piano effect the instruments were lined up across the stage from wing to wing, the players' backs to the audience. Ania Dorfmann, Sascha Gordnitzki, Gary Graffman, Skitch Henderson, Constance Keene, William Masselos, Menahem Pressler, Franz Rupp, Gyorgy Sandor and Nadia Rosenberg played the first massed number.

Artists in Second Number

The second piano number was played by Ethel Bartlett, Alexander Brailowsky, Sidney Foster, Gaby Casadesus, Moura Lympany, Rudolph Ganz, Eugene List, Rae Robertson, Beveridge Webster and Guiomar Novaes. For the last number the pianists were Ellen Ballon, Jacques Abram, Erno Balogh, Robert Casadesus, Abram Chasins, Carl Friedberg, Leonard Hambro, Jan Smeterlin, Alexander Uninsky and Muriel Kerr.

The First Piano Quartet, which played Mr. Gould's "Inventions," a piece composed for the concert, comprised Adam Garner, Edward Edson, Glauco D'Attili and Frank Mittler.

Philharmonic Opens 'Even' Series

The Philharmonic-Symphony, running, as formerly several series this season in Carnegie Hall, performed the usual double take on Thursday opening last night with the beginning of its "even" set of concerts. This event turned out the better half of the first round for this reviewer as the concert proved more enjoyable than the opening of the "odd" series last week.

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, with which the program opened, is a glowing work. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted it with a sensitive feeling for its qualities of affirmation and joyousness. One could have wished for more integration and beauty in the string section as against the illumination of the brass. But Mendelssohn's structural sense, amazing in a young man of 20, was dramatized brilliantly by the conductor. When the composer finished the symphony, he had reached his 21st birthday only a few months before.

Menuhin Soloist in Two Works

Yehudi Menuhin was featured on the second half of the program in two works: the Viotti Concerto for Violin in A Minor, No. 22, and the Bartok Rhapsody No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra. Neither of Menuhin's performances could be termed of unusual penetration or remarkable artistry but in each case his vehicle of expression was not too inspiring. The Viotti work was not left by the composer in finished form and the version Menuhin played was one arranged by Kreisler and played by him ten years ago with the Philharmonic. One suspects that this somewhat dated work needs the magic of a Kreisler to compensate for its lack of substance.

Gottfried von Einem's "Capriccio," the novelty of the evening, was given its American premiere on this occasion. A work of high rhythmic interest and humor, it is skillfully contrived. Bizarre driving figures follow fast upon one another and then topple together just for the fun of it. A whirling pattern that might easily have come from South America turns up toward the finish and helps the general excitement. Along the way a Wagnerian climax stirs up a few memories too.

The large audience, which included Artur Rodzinski, former conductor of the Philharmonic, and recently returned from Europe, vigorously applauded the proceedings.

Steinway Piano Centenary Marked in Rousing Style

By PAUL AFFELDER

A festive mood prevailed last evening at Carnegie Hall, where the centenary of the Steinway Piano was observed with an appropriately gala concert. It was so crowded with famous musicians, in fact, that there wasn't room enough backstage for the vast array of keyboard soloists.

All of them, as well as Dimitri Mitropoulos and the members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, donated their services for the concert, the proceeds being divided between the musicians foundation and the Philharmonic's pension fund.

Stretching across the stage in front of the orchestra were ten grand pianos, and in three of the numbers, all ten were in use. The program began with Mr. Mitropoulos conducting ten pianists in Josef Hofmann's version of the National Anthem. Participants included Ania Dorfmann, Sascha Gorodnitzski, Gary Fraffman, Skitch Henderson, Constance Keene, William Masselos, Menahem Pressler Franz Rupp, Gyorgy Sandor and Nadia Reisenberg.

Mr. Mitropoulos in Dual Role

After brisk performances by the orchestra of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner and three movements from Edward MacDowell's "Indian" suite, Mr. Mitropoulos seated himself at the keyboard of an eleventh piano—this one specially fitted with a lucite lid, through which he could see and be seen by the orchestra—and both played and conducted the brilliant, brittle third movement of Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Major, for which he won an ovation.

After intermission came the one really new work on the program—Morton Gould's "Inventions" for four pianos and orchestra—with the members of the First Piano Quartet (Adam Garner, Edward Edson, Giauco D'Attili and Frank Mittler) as soloists.

It is difficult to tell whether it was where we were sitting or whether it was the combined tone of the four instruments, but to us, this music conveyed a certain smoothness of texture not customarily associated with the piano.

This four-movement work, scored for the pianos with an orchestra minus strings, made delightful listening. It has a classically-inspired first movement, called "Warm-up"; a lyrical, guitar-strumming effect in the second movement, "Ballad"; a jovial dance quality in the "Schottische"; and lively reminiscences of the last movement of Mr. Gould's "Interplay" in the final "Toccata." The music, its performers and the composer, who wrote it especially for this concert, were all warmly received.

Next came ten more pianists to play the Chopin Polonaise in A Major Opus 40. Perhaps we ought to say nine pianists, for one of them, Rudolph Ganz, had his hands full beating time in order to keep his colleagues together for their spirited performance. Joining him at the keyboards were Ethel Bartlett, Alexander Brailowsky, Sidney Foster, Gaby Casadesus, Moura Lympany, Eugene List, Rae Robertson, Beveridge Webster and Guiomar Novaes.

Finale Fills the Bill

After an intense reading by the orchestra of the three dances from Manuel De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" the concert came to a fittingly rousing, jovial conclusion with a special arrangement by Mr. Gould of Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." And what an arrangement it was!

Obviously writing a piece d'occasion with his tongue in his cheek, he really pulled out all the stops and used all the tricks he knew. A more fun-filled, rousing finale to a festive concert cannot be imagined.

The ten pianists—Ellen Ballon, Jacques Abram, Erno Balogh, Robert Casadesus, Abram Chasins, Carl Friedberg, Leonid Hambro, Jan Smeterlin, Alexander Uninsky and Muriel Kerr—had their hands full, as did the orchestra. Mr. Mitropoulos got so excited at one point that he actually took two or three leaps in the air.

Needless to say, everyone present, including scores of musical luminaries, had a wonderful time, and a world-wide celebration of an important musical anniversary was properly launched.

34 Artists Yield Spotlight to a Piano

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

For a change, a piano gave a concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

The piano was the Steinway, monarch of all keyboard instruments. Last night was its 100th birthday, and everybody who is anybody—in and out of music—was on hand for the celebration.

It was a thrilling and timely tribute to a great family and a great tradition. Pianists come and go, virtuosos replace virtuosos, much of the music dies—but the Steinway goes on forever.

Much of last night's celebration came in 10s—10 pianos for the National Anthem, 10 more for Chopin's A major Polonaise, and another 10 for the bang-up finale of the evening—Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Four for Gould.

One felt cheated when only four pianos appeared for Morton Gould's "Inventions." The real back number of the program was the Finale of Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto. It was played on only one piano.

Even though I came away feeling more than a little crowded, I should like to make it clear that this report is being written on only one typewriter.

There were 34 different pianists on the program, plus Dimitri Mitropoulos, who turned in both the neatest and most artistic stunt of the evening as conductor-pianist of the Prokofieff concerto.

Piano's the News.

With so many pianos around, one might be forgiven for overlooking the Philharmonic, that filled in beautifully last night. After all, a hundred men and their instruments are no match for 10 Steinway concert grands.

Since, the Steinway was the news, I see no point in enumerating the other 34 artists whose 340 fingers went galloping up and down the ivories last night.

They were all good, and so was the music—and best of all was that noble medium of a noble heritage—the Steinway piano. May its next hundred years be equally glorious!

Little Orchestra, Steinway Concerts

The festive spirit dominating our two major concert halls last night was worthy of the opening of the opera. Steinway and Sons, celebrating the 100th anniversary of its founding, had ten of its unequalled pianos playing to a packed house in Carnegie Hall. The house was not only jammed but dressy and distinguished, with a long list of the famous attending, including Eleanor Roosevelt.

Thomas Scherman, opening his series with little orchestra society in Town Hall, also drew a large enthusiastic house for what promises to be one of the most interesting seasons, musically, he has thus far presented. Following his usual policy of intermingling the provocative of the present with the accepted of the past, Scherman opened the series with the Pergolesi "Stabat Mater," the Paul Creston second symphony and a concert performance of Stravinsky's little comic opera, "Mavra."

In making "Mavra" palatable to the audience, who chuckled gleefully on several occasions, Scherman more than earned his applause. His formula follows. Preceding the opera, David Randolph gave the audience some idea of the ludicrous situation which forms the basis of the plot. The performance followed in English, in a pungent translation by Scherman. All four singers possessed voices, acting ability and a sense of humor. The brilliant orchestration was excellently dramatized by the ensemble.

Result? The audience appeared to enjoy itself despite the consistent unsingable vocal line, Stravinsky appears to have used about the same approach to the voice in "Marva," completed in 1922, as he did 30 years later in "The Rake's Prograss."

Philharmonic Honors Steinway

Carnegie Hall has never seemed so gala as last night with 34 pianists playing in groups of ten and four; with the Philharmonic-Symphony on the stage performing as well, with Dimitri Mitropoulos appearing as soloist as well as maestro, using a special plexi-glass lid for his piano. Mitropoulos performed the finale from the Third Prokofieff Concerto in C Major introducing the lid which was especially built for him. Its transparency enabled him to see the orchestra better and vice-versa. Who knows? Maybe, the serious Demitri, certainly no fashion mentor, has set a new style.

Morton Gould's "Inventions," a set of four short pieces, especially composed this summer for the occasion, were pungently expressive. The work for various reasons, should prove a welcome addition to the orchestral repertoire. Written for four pianos and orchestra, and played by the four-piano quartet, the "Warm-up," "Ballad," "Schottische," and "Toccata" each in its way employed the piano with originality and combined its color with an imaginative orchestration.

As a rouser on this historical program, stupendous for a stupendous occasion, the high point was Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever," arranged for multiple pianos and orchestra by Gould. But the Polonaise in A Major by Chopin and "The Star Spangled Banner," also both played on ten pianos cannot be discounted. There was more music too but space is, alas, not endless.

Altogether it was a unique concert, worthy of a unique firm that makes a great piano. Among those who bore this testimony professionally were Alexander Brailowsky, Guiomar Novaes, Rudolph Ganz, Robert Casadesus and Carl Friedberg. Don't forget, 30 other pianists, too, including Mitropoulos.

HINDEMITH'S WORK IN LOCAL PREMIERE

'Die Harmonie der Welt' and Malipiero's 'Vivaldiana' Played by Philharmonic

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. At Carnegie Hall.
Vivaldiana (first American performance) ..... Malipiero
Symphony, Die Harmonie der Welt (first New York performance) ..... Hindemith
Symphony No. 2 ..... Borodin

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Paul Hindemith's symphony, "Die Harmonie der Welt," which had its first New York performance at Carnegie Hall last night, is an impressive work, both in aim and in reach. It is not music designed for charm or easy appeal, and it may not win friends readily. But it has spaciousness of design and a high austerity of purpose, and it belongs, if one may hazard an estimate after one hearing, among the composer's major works.

Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra evidently had prepared themselves meticulously for this performance, which matched the largeness of the composer's concept. Hindemith's polyphonic writing needs clarity and the large forces he employs must be martialed with power and a sense of reserve. Last night's reading had these qualities. Mr. Mitropoulos is at home with the heavily accented sonorities and severe colors this composition seems to require, and he brought to it a sense of deep conviction.

Hindemith calls the piece a symphony, and if tightness of organization and loftiness of approach are the measure, a symphony it is, indeed. And yet this work is, in many ways, a parallel to his "Mathias der Mahler" Symphony. The latter is an orchestral work drawn from the opera of the same name, and as a symphony it has had many more performances than the opera. The "Harmonie der Welt" Symphony also is drawn from an opera, which, as far as the records in this office show, has not yet been performed.

This particular opera has Johann Kepler, the astronomer, as its principal subject. The three movements of the symphony may be said roughly to concern themselves with the external difficulties of Kepler's life, his spiritual evolution and "the harmony of the universe." It may be helpful to know what the subject matter is, but in this purely orchestral setting there is nothing to do but to listen to the work as absolute music. And as absolute music it has a granitic quality and, in the slow movement, an austere lyricism that may take on depth and dimension with further acquaintance.

NEW WORK GIVEN: Paul Hindemith, whose "Die Harmonie der Welt" was given its initial New York performance by Philharmonic last night.

The symphony had its first performance in Basle in January, 1952, and its American première in Minneapolis last March, where the composer was the conductor. One would guess that Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic would have made the grade with Mr. Hindemith. There were a few bravos from the audience and some murmurs of discontent.

The evening began with Malipiero's "Vivaldiana" in its American première. The Italian composer has spent many months editing more than 100 works of Vivaldi and he has done this job faithfully and well. Now he has dared to take some of this Vivaldi material—sections from six different scores—and put them together into a three-movement suite.

He has added the color of wind instruments, but otherwise he has been steadfast in following the spirit of Vivaldi. It is a pleasant work, and Malipiero may be indulged in his diversion. But there is a lot of original Vivaldi we never get to hear.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra played this score with grace, and they closed out the program with a lively performance of Borodin's Second symphony, which seemed, after the Hindemith, gay and sensuous and full of color.

Hindemith Symphony Featured by Philharmonic

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A stirring performance of a new symphony by Paul Hindemith highlighted last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall.

That doesn't mean everybody present liked the often strident and explosive score by a musician whom many regard as the foremost of living composers. Far from it.

Irate Subscribers.

There were several obviously irate subscribers who worked off their indignation by refraining from applauding either the symphony or the performance. One or two gave off a sound that with less self-consciousness might have been a hiss.

The others gave Mr. Mitropoulos a rousing ovation for both bringing the symphony to their attention and according it a reading worthy of its lofty ideals and the means chosen to carry them out.

Ironic Title.

The symphony bears a slightly ironic title, considering the state of the planet—"The Harmony of the World." It is music drawn from an opera about Johann Kepler, who worked out the mechanics of the cosmos.

It is perhaps the harmony that Kepler, astronomer and musical theorist, sensed beyond the apparent disharmony of things. In his music Mr. Hindemith almost miraculously achieves this pattern of unity amid disunity.

Harsh forces of disintegration seem to be at work all through the music, clashing fiercely, only to arrive at a synthesis in which harmony finally prevails.

Another Novelty.

Mr. Mitropoulos had still another novelty on the bill—a "Vivaldiana" by Malipiero. While the body of the music was Antonio Vivaldi—the Italian Bach—the clothes were by his living countrymen.

It was hard to tell where one ended and the other began, so perfect was the tailoring.

Mr. Mitropoulos gave the "Vivaldiana" the warm and poetic reading it deserved. After the intermission he saw the orchestra through one of the most stimulating performances of Borodin's B Minor Symphony I have heard in years. Only Arturo Toscanini could have equaled him last night.

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

BEARING THE FAME of its noted conductors, the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra early next year will invade the territory of the big eastern orchestras in New York and Boston.

The occasion will be the 50th anniversary of the orchestra, which looks back on a succession of distinguished conductors, including Dimitri Mitropoulos, now directing the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The orchestra is one of the city's most famous children. Mention Minneapolis, and the orchestra is likely to be one of the first recollections to come to thought.

Many circumstances have led to this identification of a midwestern city with great music.

Minnesota was settled by Scandinavians and Germans—two groups notable for their enthusiasm for singing. Singers like instrumental accompaniment. What better reason for forming the Minneapolis Symphony in 1903, as it was, mainly because the Philharmonic Club, a mixed singing society, wanted an orchestra it could count on.

Another ingredient of the orchestra's beginning was that there happened to be in Minneapolis several persons who spent their time performing music with small financial reward and to discouragingly small audiences at first. They were zealots, the ground breakers who gradually built up a music-conscious community. By the turn of the century they were responsible for two music schools in the city, two opera houses, and regular concerts by a local group.

For many years the Minneapolis Symphony toured more than any other orchestra in the land, spreading its fame. The touring began in 1907, only four years after its founding, and soon proved so remunerative that the tours were extended to six-week safaris into "darkest America."

There was very little competition. No radio, no television — phonograph records sounded tinny then. In many instances people never had heard any orchestral music until the Minneapolis Symphony came to town.

Played Anywhere

The Minneapolis Symphony would go anywhere it was invited, regardless of floods, train wrecks, or snowstorms. It played in any structure, no matter how ramshackle. Once, according to John K. Sherman, music critic of the Minneapolis Star, in his book "Music and Maestros: The Story of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra," the men even played a concert in a state penitentiary.

During its 50 years of being an orchestra on wheels the Minneapolis Symphony has traveled 200,000 miles, played in all but five states, and also in Canada and Cuba.

Then, of course, there was that necessity—money. Minneapolis was fortunate here. Among its businessmen were many who had enough hunger for music to subscribe large sums to the orchestra's guaranty fund. Chief among these was Elbert L. Carpenter, a lumberman who had as a young man dreamed of becoming a musician. From 1907 until his passing in 1945 Mr. Carpenter was president of the Orchestral Association, and to his efforts goes much of the credit for keeping the orchestra going.

Phonograph records added to the orchestra's fame. Back in 1934 RCA-Victor found out that the Minneapolis Symphony could be employed for recording without being paid extra. At that time the Minneapolis men were hired for a certain number of hours a week, which could be spent whatever way the management wished. So RCA-Victor acquired a large number of Minneapolis Symphony recordings practically for nothing. It was like picking up gold.

The Minneapolis Symphony members, by the intercession of the musicians' union, have a better contract today, which stipulates extra pay for every hour spent recording.

Bountiful Harvest

But those hectic hours back in the 1930's were seeds which brought forth a bountiful harvest. The records sold well, and recording companies ever since have been coming back for more. Through the years, the orchestra has reaped more than $400,000 in royalties, and the records themselves act as good-will ambassadors all over the world.

Then there were the conductors, who with the musicians made for the widest fame of the orchestra.

During its 50 years, the Minneapolis Symphony has had five conductors. The first of these, and longest in point of tenure, was Emil Oberhoffer.

A native of Munich, Germany, Mr. Oberhoffer stumbled into Minneapolis by accident, being stranded there by an opera company which folded up in the hinterlands. For a while he played viola in hotels and restaurants. Presently he became a church organist, and in 1900 conductor of the Philharmonic Club, the local singing society.

Here he began to present such ambitious works as Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Haydn's "Creation," and Handel's "Messiah." Each time, he had to struggle alone with a pick-up orchestra—some professionals paid on a piecework basis, and diluted by amateurs.

Mr. Oberhoffer longed for a full-fledged symphony orchestra. Philharmonic members concurred. Finally, in the spring of 1903, the Philharmonic Club announced that an orchestra would be formed the following fall, and would have the dignified title: The Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

First Concert

The first concert was held Nov. 3, 1903, in the Exposition Building in Minneapolis. The opera singer, Marcella Sembrich, was imported at the tremendous cost then of $1,800 to be guest soloist. Everybody who was anybody in town was there. The press of carriages at the door caused an acute traffic problem.

Fifty years later, almost to the day, on Nov. 7, 1953, the Minneapolis Symphony will give the first concert of its 51st season. It will present a special commemorative program. Recollective emotions are likely to run high, since there will be some persons in the audience who attended that opening night in 1903.

Mr. Oberhoffer's term as a conductor lasted for 19 years. He was a picturesque man, a devotee of the flowing cape, the pince-nez, and the gold-headed cane. It was Mr. Oberhoffer who started the orchestra on its tours, financing the first three himself.

But in 1922 he resigned.

Second conductor was a Belgian—Henri Verbruggen. Unlike Mr. Oberhoffer, Mr. Verbruggen came to Minneapolis with an impressive record of European triumphs behind him. He was, therefore, more expensive—$25,000 a year—but he was already a highly skilled man with a wide reputation. In addition, he was handsome, charming, and energetic.

During the eight-year Verbruggen reign there took place an important boost for the orchestra. It had been holding rehearsals and concerts at a downtown theater, and the rent had grown steep. So the Orchestral Association petitioned the University of Minnesota for the use of its magnificent Northrop Auditorium, which was midway between the twin cities of Saint Paul and Minneapolis, and in the ideal setting of a university campus.

New Campus Home

Although there were legal difficulties, an agreement was finally reached, and in 1930 the University of Minnesota became the only university in the country with a major professional symphony orchestra on campus—an arrangement which benefits both institutions.

Late in 1931, Mr. Verbruggen retired.

Within hours after the announcement of his retirement, the long-distance wires were humming with urgent calls. Within a week the flamboyant young Hungarian, Eugene Ormandy, was en route to Minneapolis, which was to be his home for the next five years.

Only 32 when he arrived, he caused an overnight sensation. A former conductor of the orchestra at the Capitol Theater in New York, he was ambitious, intense, and a perfectionist—yet he was also gregarious. He arrived at a time when the orchestra needed such an individualist, for these were depression years. Mr. Ormandy bubbled over at parties, he cheerfully attended public functions, and he pulled in the crowds.

So while other orchestras were either folding or halving their numbers, the Minneapolis Symphony scraped by. Thus, when Mr. Ormandy was tapped by the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1936, his departure was felt keenly.

There followed a year of guest conductors, among whom was a dynamic Greek, well-known on the Continent but little-known in this country—Dimitri Mitropoulos. He became the new permanent conductor.

'Mitropoulos, Minnesota'

During the next 12 years, the Minneapolis Symphony shot up higher than ever. One woman, an easterner who moved to Minneapolis, remarked that she knew nothing about Midwest geography. "In my mind," she said, "I always thought of it as Mitropoulos, Minnesota."

Mr. Mitropoulos, shy and gentle, feels that music is a gift which must be used to benefit mankind. He lived for years in a small, plain room on the university campus. He made a large salary, but gave most of it away. He did not drink, and he suffered acutely when people surrounded him and gushed over him.

But on the podium, he forgot himself, and made every concert exciting, even when he played something unpopular. He believed that contemporary music should be played, and often. So Minneapolis audiences got Schönberg, Hindemith, Křenek, Alban Berg, and Roger Sessions—whether they liked it or not. Often they didn't, and there was much grumbling.

He spent many hours each day memorizing scores. Recently Leonard Lyons asked Mr. Mitropoulos why he took all this trouble, and he answered: "The lion tamer does not enter the cage full of wild beasts reading a book on How to Tame Lions."

This remark is indicative of Mitropoulos's attitude toward his musicians—he has enormous respect for them.

Touching Farewell

During the last week in 1948, the symphony's usual Friday-night crowd streamed out after the concert to find newsboys peddling extras, with giant banner headlines: "MITROPOULOS TO QUIT SYMPHONY." Although it had long been rumored that the New York Philharmonic had been dickering with Mr. Mitropoulos, still, the news fell like a thunderbolt.

When Mr. Mitropoulos made his farewell speech in the spring of 1949, audience and orchestra gave him a standing ovation which lasted for many minutes.

The present conductor, Antal Dorati, came to Minneapolis after a successful four years with the Dallas Symphony.

As a conductor Mr. Dorati places great emphasis on program-building. He also is adept at handling children's programs. He gives short lectures in his Hungarian-flavored English to the young audiences, which greet him joyously. In getting more young people interested in music, Mr. Dorati is truly building for the future.

When John K. Sherman was writing his book, "Music and Maestros," one title suggested was "Bach on Barren Ground."

But then, one really couldn't say the ground was so barren any more. Gradually the public has become more sophisticated, and nowadays it is hard, as one sees a Minneapolis audience listening to a Mozart symphony, to realize that in the Sioux uprising in 1862, relatively only a few musical years ago, the town of New Ulm, eighty miles southwest of Minneapolis was almost wiped out.

The growth of the twin cities has been prodigious, and no small part of their cultural blooming is due to the role played by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

2 Works Premiered

The world premieres of Ernest Krenek's Concerto for Two Pianos and Morton Gould's Dance Variations for Two Pianos were the feature of Saturday night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos at Carnegie Hall. The duo-pianists Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe, who commissioned the works, were the soloists of the occasion, and the remainder of the program listed Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Seas and Prosperous Voyage," and Borodin's Second Symphony.

Commissioning and playing two contemporary works for two pianos is a highly commendable pursuit. The repertory for the combination being scraggly, there is every reason to hope that the Messrs. Whittemore and Lowe will continue in the direction they have charted and build for themselves a backlog of scores suited to their needs. These things said, it would be a great pleasure to report that the pieces contrived by Messrs. Krenek and Gould are notable additions to the present-day musical scene. But, unfortunately, they are not.

Mr. Krenek's concerto is an aggressive and impulsive work built in the atonal manner and withal quite tolerable to the ear. Here, however, its significance ends. Its one movement relies feverishly on all the tensions implied in contrasted tempos, sonorities and rhythms, and the concerto flags when it is not busy pitting idea against idea and passage against passage. Its tunes, moreover, are quite vapid; at any rate, the score's melodic outlines are neither distinct nor distinctive. As such, the concerto, even when moving apace, seems to travel with no goal in sight.

Mr. Gould's "Dance Variations" is one of his politer jokes, and moments of it are good fun. But once it is remarked that the piece is full of zipping orchestral effects and exhilarating piano sounds, there is little further comment to make. As in many of Mr. Gould's compositions, its substance is its color and its color is skillfully applied. There is no more to it; there is no less. The music bounces gayly and it gleams the while it runs.

The performances of both numbers were accomplished in the best of spirit. A field day it was for lusty playing, and Messrs. Whittemore and Lowe outdid themselves to make it all go right. Despite their compositions' lack of audience appeal, the two scored a personal success.

DUO-PIANISTS OFFER 2 WORLD PREMIERES

Two world premières were played by the two-piano team of Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe at Saturday evening's Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. With Dimitri Mitropoulos on the podium, the Concerto for Two Pianos by Ernst Krenek and the Dance Variations by Morton Gould were unveiled.

Krenek's work is vigorous and dissonant, composed with a sure hand, completely objective and dispassionate. Its melodic content is rather grim and the four short movements, played without halt, give the impression of a high-powered computer clicking logically away without heart or soul.

Gould's piece is altogether different. Like most of this composer's work, it contains no surprises, being a slick, professional, jazzy pastiche, full of orchestral and pianistic effects. It takes its name from the dance-derived content of the four movements—Chaconne, Arabesques, Pas de Deux and Tarantella.

Messrs. Whittemore and Lowe played in a clear, straight-forward manner well adjusted to each other and to the orchestra. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Journey" Overture and concluded with Borodin's B minor Symphony. In the latter, Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra were in superb form, uniting to present a colorful, brilliant performance of this magnificent work. H. C. S.

Philharmonic Premieres Two Piano Works

Morton Gould's latest score, "Dance Variations for Two Pianos," was the more captivating of two world premieres on the Philharmonic program Saturday night in Carnegie Hall.

The other was a rather involved and abstract "Concerto for Two Pianos" by Ernst Krenek. While both showed masterly craftsmanship, Mr. Gould's was the more readily appealing in melodic warmth and rhythmic drive.

The finale, a "Tarantella," was especially gripping in its carnival-like momentum. In both works Whittemore and Lowe, again proved they are rapidly becoming America's No. 1 piano team.

Carnegie Hall Rings With 4 Old-Timers

By ROBERT BAGAR.

None of the four numbers in Dimitri Mitropoulos' program for the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night could be called youthful.

From top to bottom the program consisted of Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture; Saint-Saens' Piano Concerto No. 4 in C minor; Schoenberg's symphonic poem, "Pelleas and Melisande," and two excerpts, Interlude and Dance, from Falla's "La Vida Breve."

Aura of Novelty.

That two of the four were not terribly familiar—the Saint-Saens and the Schoenberg—gave to the program an aura, though perhaps not too genuine, of novelty. But it did suggest, at any rate, that symphonic programs don't have to go far afield for material in order to sound fresh to loyal ears.

To these reportorial ears the aforementioned pair proved the cream of the entertainment. The Fourth Piano Concerto may have had many a soaring interpretation in its time, but I doubt whether for appreciation of its style and many charms they could have topped the joint rendering afforded us by soloist Robert Casadesus and the orchestra.

Thistle-Blown Touch.

Mr. Casadesus is a pianist who rises to the occasion. When the script calls for the light, thistle-blown touch he is equal to it. When the dictum is the big and expansive, likewise. The opportunities to do both were many last evening and, as you might expect, the soloist made every one count.

Not only that, but he was convincing and communicative, extremely congenial toward the particular brand of Saint-Saens melody, and always concerned with the bigger purpose, that of turning in this music as something continuous, balanced and entire.

Given all that, the only thing to complement it could have been an astutely conceived orchestral contribution. Mr. Mitropoulos and his musicians were right there to help make the performance an entente cordiale; a triple entente, in fact, remembering that Saint-Saens was the party of the first part.

Mood for Mood.

The "Pelleas and Melisande" of Schoenberg is a tone poem, based dramatically as well as spiritually on the Maeterlinck play. The composer never lost sight of that concept.

He pursued his course piece for piece, mood for mood, sequence for sequence, until he felt that he had done what he started out to do, and all planned on the scale of a symphony consisting of only one movement.

It has endearing qualities, this work. An early one in the composer's career, it may show some leanings toward Debussy and Wagner and Richard Strauss, who were all known to be particular idols of his. But in the long view the score is Schoenberg's, a score not entirely unrelated—regarding sounds and directions—to a still earlier piece of his, "Verklaerte Nacht."

Beautifully, indeed, did Mr. Mitropoulos render this music. It had presence every inch of the way. And the musicians gave it their all—con amore.

There was a sentimental side to the conductor's delivery of the Mendelssohn Overture. Thank heavens it didn't turn mawkish. The Falla fragments could, with reason, boast of a whip-like flash, a flamenco tang.

CASADESUS PLAYS FOR PHILHARMONIC

Pianist Heard in Saint-Saens' C Minor Concerto — Tone Poem by Schoenberg Given

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Robert Casadesus, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.
Fingal's Cave Overture ..... Mendelssohn
Piano Concerto No. 4 in C minor, Op. 44 ..... Saint-Saens
Symphonic Poem, Pelleas and Melisande. Schoenberg
La Vida Breve ..... De Falla

By OLIN DOWNES

Schoenberg's once controversial symphonic poem after the same drama that inspired Debussy's opera, "Pelleas and Melisande," was played last night for only the second time in this city by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society eighteen years after its New York première by the same body in 1935.

This is Schoenberg's first full-length orchestral composition, and it was completed only three years after the sextet, later scored for chamber orchestra, "Verklaerte Nacht," which has had an immense popularity. Not so with the symphonic poem, which has passed so much time since its creation on the shelves of orchestral libraries. It is rather hard to see why.

The audience last night approved the forty-minute bill wildly, and there is no doubt that Mr. Mitropoulos' wonderful performance probably did more to clarify and communicate the music than any previous one known to our public. What is there to dismay us in this music? We can think of only one thing: Its inordinate length. The tone-poem is much too long, but it is obviously melodic, conventionally harmonic, effective in sound, though over-orchestrated and tinctured with Straussianisms and Mahlerisms for audience consumption.

There is no doubt that the première of Debussy's opera suggested the symphonic poem to Schoenberg. It is no mere coincidence that he used the whole-tone scale, which was one of Debussy's patents, or rather specializations—although Schoenberg uses these intervals in a manner far more superficial than Debussy, and as one incidental feature of his scheme. The fundamental point of divergence is that one man turned to the theatre with the subject, while Schoenberg, in spite of Strauss' recommendation that he make an opera of it, preferred the purely instrumental form.

And there are departures from Schoenberg's earlier work in the new elaborateness and attempted subtlety of psychological portrayal in the bigger score. At the same time, and with all its detail, the symphonic poem is written on broader melodic lines than is usually characteristic of Schoenberg, and in a very romantic and Wagnerian spirit. Here he is no atonalist, and he is what he essentially remained to the end of his career, the romanticist and tone-painter by nature; the antithesis of musical abstraction and purely linear design, and the colorist in every measure. It is a score well worth hearing, and of at least historic interest.

Mr. Casadesus played the Saint-Saens Concerto, which is a period piece yet a master-work of its kind, with an authority and gusto, and a great musician's evaluation of its architecture and style that carried away the audience. Well and worthily was he called back repeatedly to the stage. We would not care to have heard a less comprehending and sincere evocation of the genius of Saint-Saens, the master.

The enigmatic Mitropoulos, who did so magnificently with Schoenberg, began the program with a reading of the Mendelssohn Overture that sentimentalized the music and made it sag instead of sweep. This was a pity, for the overture is one of Mendelssohn's best, and it has the flavor of the sea that so impressed him on his journey. No doubt, as he gazed upon the spectacle, wet and windy, he took care not to dampen his feet. But he was thrilled by the sight and there is a savor in this score that was lost in the over-particularized performance.

Philharmonic Performs Early Schoenberg Work

By PAUL AFFELDER

Romantic and post-romantic music dominated Dimitri Mitropoulos' program with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall. Strangely enough, one of those romantic scores was by none other than the late Arnold Schoenberg.

The Schoenberg work was his symphonic poem, "Pelleas and Melisande." As can be imagined, this is early Schoenberg. Completed in 1902, it came hard on the heels of his "Verklaerte Nacht," with its strong reminiscenses of "Tristan," and just before the massive but often highly imaginative "Gurrelieder."

The work had not been played here by the Philharmonic since 1915, so it was with considerable surprise that many members of the audience listened to it, expecting twelve-tone dissonances and getting, instead, a highly contrapuntal synthesis of Wagner, Richard Strauss and Cesar Franck.

Perhaps it was from sheer relief at not having to endure a more modern Schoenberg work that they applauded so vociferously at the music's conclusion.

Effort at Detail Unrewarding

Certainly, it could not have been for the quality of the score. Though the composer claimed that he "tried to mirror every detail" of Maeterlinck's drama, he succeeded only in turning out a long, heavy, overblown work.

There is ample and rather good thematic material, but it is treated with such bombast, such overloading of orchestral sound and so much fussy counterpoint that the net result is wearying. Both Wagner and Strauss, for all their complications, said it all before, and in far simpler, more convincing fashion.

Small wonder that the still youthful Schoenberg, surfeited with the richness of the musical diet he had been preparing, turned for relief to the astringencies of atonality.

One must commend Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra for the fire and intensity of their performance. At the same time, however, we had the feeling that, had a litt1 more time been spent on the purely technical aspect of the music, there might have been a bit more clarity, as a result of better cohesion among the players.

Schoenberg provided the novelty, but it was the evening's soloist, Robert Casadesus, who was responsible for the artistic highlight of the porgram. He performed the Saint-Saens Fourth Piano Concerto in C Minor—not one of the world's best concerti—with such warmth, fluency and songfulness that he imparted to the listener the most wonderful feeling of relaxation, well-being and inner peace.

Every chord and sustained tone was made to sing, every arpeggio and run flowed with the smoothness of cream. Conductor and orchestra fell into the spirit of the interpretation, too, so that the net result was a gloriously memorable performance.

Mr. Mitropoulos began the program with a broad, yet amply dramatic and descriptive presentation of the "Fingal's Cave" overture by Mendelssohn, he ended it with a work contemporaneous with "Pelleas and Melisande"—the Interlude and dance from Manuel de Falla's opera, "La Vida Breve."

Coming after the cloying sweetness of the Schoenberg it could have made a refreshing finale to the concert; but the conductor was still immersed in the romantic concept of the music he had just finished, so that he failed to invest the Spanish score with the buoyancy and rhythmic lilt it required.

Steinway Centennial Concert

Oct. 19, 1953, will go down in the history of musical New York, as a red-letter day, because it was the celebration of the 100th anniversary of Steinway & Sons, in which the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York joined with 34 pianists, 35 including Dimitri Mitropoulos, who appeared in the double role of pianist and director of his orchestra. Carnegie Hall was completely filled with one of the most brilliant audiences ever assembled under its roof, and the entire proceeds are to be donated to the Musicians Foundation and the Philharmonic-Symphony Society. A Centenary Committee of Steinway artists was headed by Joseph Hofmann, as Honorary Chairman, and Edward Johnson as Executive Chairman. Executive and Artists Management Committees and the Artists Committee Members read like a musicians' Blue Book.

The program, definitely popular in character, featured ten Steinways placed across the front of the Carnegie stage. In three different selections, thirty of the leading Steinway artists appeared in groups of ten, first in "The Star-Spangled Banner" in Josef Hofmann's piano version; next in Chopin's Polonaise in A major and as a finale in a clever arrangement by Morton Gould for multiple pianos and orchestra of Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" which literally brought down the house. The purely orchestral numbers included Wagner's Meistersinger Prelude, Edward MacDowell's Indian Suite, three movements of which were played, and de Falla's Suite from "The Three Cornered Hat." Conducting from the piano, a newly manufactured model with a transparent top, Mitropoulos played with brilliant effect, the Finale from Prokofieff's Third Concerto. Specially written for the occasion was Morton Gould's "Inventions" for four pianos and orchestra, a work replete with American idioms and rhythms, played by the First Piano Quartet, Adam Garner, Edward Edson, Glauco D'Attili and Frank Mittler, and the orchestra.

Following the concert 1500 invited guests gathered in the Grand Ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria with Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Steinway as gracious hosts. Following an elaborate supper, an enormous birthday cake was cut by young William Steinway, grandson of the host and hostess. Then Edward Johnson, in a few graceful words, commented on the unusual fact of members of one family having directed an organization for a century. He presented the Steinway family with a bound volume, and a thick one, of letters from Steinway artists for the occasion of the Centennial.

On Oct. 20, invited guests viewed the Steinway Centennial Grand designed by Walter Dorwin Teague, bearing, as will all pianos made during the firm's hundredth year, the Centenary plaque of Steinway & Sons.

Philharmonic In U. N. Concert

The Philharmonic Symphony Society dedicated its concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall to the United Nations, with Mme. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, Assembly President, and Dag Hammarskjold, Secretary-General, as guests of honor.

Speaking during the intermission to the orchestra's radio audience on the CBS network, Mr. Hammarskjold said: "Music, and what only music can express, may well have its honored place in the celebration of United Nations week." The week is being observed to mark the signing of the U. N. Charter, on Oct. 24, 1945.

The birth of the Charter "should be recognized as an attempt to translate into action a faith—the faith which once inspired a Beethoven in the Ninth Symphony to his great profession of freedom, the brotherhood of men, and a world of harmony," he said.

Under Dimitri Mitropoulos' direction, the orchestra played Paul Hindemith's symphony, "Harmony of the World," Morton Gould's "Dance Variations," and works of Wagner and Manuel de Falla.

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Jay S. Harrison

The Philharmonic

Arnold Schoenberg's much discussed and rarely heard symphonic poem, "Pelleas and Melisande," and Robert Casadesus' performance of Saint-Saens' Piano Concerto No. 4 were the feature events at last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall under Dimitri Mitropoulos' direction. The remainder of the program listed Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture and an interlude and dance from De Falla's opera, "La Vida Breve."

Composed in 1904, "Pelleas and Melisande" was Schoenberg's tribute to the vanquished and dying era known to history as the Romantic. In writing it, the composer called upon all the resources the nineteenth century had begot, added a few of his own and built thereby a hulking, massive work that is violent, brooding, moody and dull. Like the too-gross giant who could not help tripping over his too-large feet, "Pelleas" no sooner gets under way than it begins to stumble and thrash wildly to keep its balance. It starts, stops, starts, stops. And despite the admitted certainty that Schoenberg's symphonic poem is organized according to a slew of very strict formal procedures, it cannot be disregarded that the piece sounds woefully spineless and lacking in direction.

Orchestrally, of course, "Pelleas" is moulded by a master hand. Even when it grows chromatically hysterical and beats its breast with gigantic whoops of sonority, the work showers sparks of instrumental brilliance. Isolated effects in it, indeed, are ravishing to the ear and there are single moments in which the poignancy of Maeterlinck's drama (upon which the music is based) peeps through the dense and matted score. But in the main, all the worst excesses of fin de siecle Romanticism are present. "Pelleas" is swollen, inflated, bloated. As the composer was later in his career to discover a single sob is often deeply moving, while an half-hour's constant wailing is most emphatically not.

As a performance, Mr. Mitropoulos' reading could scarcely have been bettered. Such work are bread and wine to him; he thrives on them, delivers them with an impact of the grandest proportions. The orchestra, moreover, outdid itself to present "Pelleas'" lavish texture in its clearest, most impeccable light. The band did a job, as the saying goes. And what a job it was.

Mr. Casadesus' playing of the Saint-Saens concerto was unbelievably graceful and refined. Granted the work is no more than pretty and slick, when heard in a delicate rendition it speaks its piece with elegance and makes its points with charm. The pianist, nimble as ever of finger, shaped the concerto precisely, gave its scales and embroidery bright color, took charge in fact, of every measure which fell beneath his hands.

PHILHARMONIC WILL DO FOUR PERFORMANCES OF "MISSA SOLEMNIS" THIS WEEK

The New York Times (by Sam Falk)

Beethoven's great Mass, which is not performed frequently, will be presented on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and next Sunday at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos. In addition to the orchestra the work calls for the services of four soloists and a choir. On the left, Mr. Mitropoulos (seated) discusses the score with three soloists: Nell Tangeman, mezzo-soprano; Harvey Smith-Spencer, tenor, and Eleanor Steber, soprano. The fourth soloist, not shown here, is Jerome Hines, bass. At right, the conductor rehearses with the Westminster Choir, in Princeton, N. J.

YOUNG MR. CASADESUS ALSO A PIANO SOLOIST

It was family week for the Casadesus' with the New York Philharmonic. On Thursday and yesterday, Robert Casadesus was soloist in Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto. On Saturday evening his son, Jean, was heard as piano soloist in Mozart's Concerto in C (K. 467). Too bad that Jean's mother, Gaby, did not join the proceedings somewhere along the line.

Yong Mr. Casadesus' playing of Mozart was direct and forceful. Stylistically it was not very elegant, nor did the pianist show a technique that had enough flexibility to set the Mozart passage work as brilliantly as it should have sounded. He tried to achieve perhaps a bigger volume of sound than the nature of this music demands, even allowing for the fact that the K. 467 is one of Mozart's more objective works in the form.

Dimitri Mitropoulos led off with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture and also included the same composer's "Scotch" Symphony on the program. The symphony received a hectic, rather nervous performance, but what it lacked in repose it made up for in a kinetic type of energy, with Mr. Mitropoulos goading the players through an especially effective, virtuosic second movement. The Interlude and Dance from de Falla's "La Vida Breve" concluded the program.

Jean Casadesus Soloist

Jean Casadesus, son of the noted Robert, was Saturday night's soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos at Carnegie Hall, playing Mozart's piano concerto in C major (K. 467) in a program otherwise mainly devoted to Mendelssohn, with the "Ruy Blas" overture and the "Scotch" Symphony.

He had made a very favorable impression in a previous appearance with the Philharmonic two years ago, and his playing of the Mozart work was distinguished for musicianship as well as for technical mastery. It was constantly clear, fluent and unaffected, marked by momentum without haste and dynamic discretion. The expressive range might have been wider, but the interpretation implied taste and objective understanding.

In Mendelssohn's music, the conductor and orchestra realized the dramatic quality of the overture and the atmospheric color of the symphony. Excerpts from Manuel de Falla's "La Vida Breve" completed the program.

CONCERT AND RECITAL

By Francis D. Perkins

The Philharmonic

Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra and the Westminster Choir in the first of four performances of Bethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in D major last night in Carnegie Hall with Eleanor Steber, soprano; Nell Tangeman, mezzo-soprano; Harvey Smith-Spencer, tenor, and Mack Harrell, baritone, as the soloists. Mr. Harrell sang instead of Jerome Hines, who had to give up this engagement on account of inflammation of the trachea.

Four performances in as many consecutive days is probably a local record for this mighty work, which, in its appeal for peace and its expression of the fear of war in the "Dona Nobis Pacem," has a particularly timely significance. Yesterday's representation, while not the foremost which the "Missa Solemnis" has received here within the last three decades, revealed both its dramatically outspoken and its intimate character, and also the change and development of Beethoven's style during its composition which Ernest Newman has pointed out in the admirable program note commissioned by the Society for this production.

The interpretation under Mr. Mitropoulos told of laudable devotion to the music and an understanding which was also praiseworthy, while not unbounded. The profound meditativeness of the instrumental Praeludium before the "Benedictus," with its prophetic harmonies, was somewhat lessened by a tempo which seemed to lack the necessary breadth. There was stirring momentum and exultation in the closing sections of the "Gloria" and the "Credo," but not the continuous surge and increasing expressive tension which are needed to bring these measures to their ultimate climax, rather than making them a series of episodes. But, with these exceptions and a few others, the emotional content of the music was projected.

The chorus, trained by Dr. John Finley Williamson, deserved high honors for tone, balance, spirited responsiveness and musical and expressive comprehension. Mr. Mitropoulos preserved a just balance between the choral and instrumental elements, with the orchestra in good form. Miss Steber, although she found some of her music vocally exacting, provided considerable delectable and eloquent singing; Miss Tangeman sang with warmth and communicative understanding in the later sections. Mr. Smith-Spencer strove nobly with the tenor solos which, despite his musicianship and interpretative sincerity, over-taxed a voice which, however, fared somewhat better after the intermission, and Mr. Harrell's singing was commendable for tone and style.

FOUR ARE SOLOISTS FOR PHILHARMONIC

Missa Solemnis ..... Beethoven

By OLIN DOWNES

One speaks with mixed feelings of the performance of the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis" by the Philharmonic - Symphony Society, Dimitri Mitropoulos conductor, the Westminster choir and solo quartet, last night in Carnegie Hall.

The Mass looms grander, nobler, more incommensurable with the passing of the years. It cannot be heard without the listener being stirred by its nobility and pathos, the immense power of the tonal structure, the intense feeling of the music and its poignant humanity. But one expects much of the interpreters of this music, almost impossible as are its technical demands.

We need not expect any of this score, with places in it that are almost impossible of actual realization, a performance that is technically impeccable. But we can have genuine feeling, consciousness of the inherent character of the music, and the quality of its magnificent architecture—the relations of each of its tremendous parts to the incommensurable whole.

The performance last night had moments of drama and climax, but it tended to exterior rather than actual emotion, to fortissimos that were overdone and overextended, to a frequent lack of clarity and of good balance of the choral parts, and a lack of this architecture. The atmosphere of many passages was missed entirely—witness what should have been ineffable serenity and radiance of the Benedictus. The violin solo was played as though it were a concerto for a soloist and not a component part of the tonal texture; there was a lack of clarity, balance and fineness of texture in the tone, and a complete absence of mystical spirit.

Nor were the soloists fortunate, neither Miss Steber, in her vocal delivery and tone quality, nor Mr. Smith-Spencer, not happily chosen for his part anyway. The most satisfactory of the quartet was Mr. Harrell, substituting on short notice for Jerome Hines, indisposed. There was a large audience for this occasion, courteous in its approval.

Beethoven Work Full Of Drama

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

There was nothing solemn about Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in Carnegie Hall last night.

It was dramatic, fervid and moving; it was spiritual and liturgical, but never solemn. Solemnity is not Beethoven's style at all and neither is it the style of Dimitri Mitropoulos.

The Philharmonic conductor directed the massive score with all the intensity at his command; but it was a controlled intensity that achieved impact without sacrificing restraint.

Message of Beauty.

Both the orchestra and the Westminster Choir soared with him into the imaginative regions where Beethoven, master of every medium of expression, had found a new message of beauty to deliver to believers of all faiths.

For this Mass has a scope broader than any single ritual, a meaning profound and universal enough for all to grasp and live by; a wondrous calm — in the "Agnus Dei"—that holds a fulfillment of the fondest dream of peace.

Artist of Vision.

Such is Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." It was an artist of tragic vision and enormous hope who conceived it in the spirit of the Great Teacher who inspired it. There is majesty and there is humility to this music and through it all a vast affirmation of life.

It would be a pleasure to report that the soloists were at all times up to the mark last night. The best of them were Nell Tangeman and Mack Harrell. Eleanor Steber was uneven and Harvey Smith-Spencer, the tenor, found the going rough.

Beethoven, of course, wasn't always easy on his solo singers. There have even been rash suggestions that both the Ninth Symphony and the "Missa Solemnis" be done some day without the vocal quartet. After some of the screeching I heard last night I'm prepared to stick out my neck in favor of the experiment.

To come back to Mr. Mitropoulos. Few conductors have his faculty of communicating fervor to a combined chorus and orchestra and of having them, in turn, radiate it out to the audience. He has a way of bringing listeners and performers closer together—almost to the point of becoming a single, indivisible group.

By Harriett Johnson

Philharmonic Gives 'Missa Solemnis'

The Philharmonic-Symphony embarked last night on its most ambitious undertaking thus far during the current season—the first of four performances this week of Beethoven's colossus in sound, his "Missa Solemnis." Dimitri Mitropoulos was on the podium for the combination of forces which included the mighty Westminster Choir and four soloists. To say "mighty" of this chorus is no exaggeration. Under the veteran directorship of John Finley Williamson, it still remains unequaled as a medium for re-creating works of this character.

Its contribution last night was among the most distinguished, along with the soprano singing of Eleanor Steber, who was outstanding among the soloists. Another highlight was the solo violin playing of concertmaster John Corigliano in the Benedictus. Altogether this was one of the happiest sections performance-wise. Mitropoulos extracted a tender quality of pathos with which Corigliano was in complete rapport.

Five Years on "Missa"

Beethoven's intermittent labor over a period of five years on the "Missa" is significant in view of the constant inspiration which it manifests, ever renewed upon re-hearing. The Philharmonic's maestro conducted the work with keen sympathy for its melodic flow and its great vigor was kept alive through his natural instinct for the dynamic. One missed the gigantic architectural conception of Toscanini's performance last spring and also the split-second precision of every entrance. The orchestral sections were not always integrated among themselves and with one another.

One bothersome section was the Allegro Con Moto of the Credo, which was whipped up so fast it was not clearly articulated. But, reservations notwithstanding, Mitropoulos' conception was a big one, profound and moving, and certainly is to be heard.

Of the soloists, Miss Steber disposed of the sustained high soprano part as easily as if she were a distaff Atlas holding up a balloon instead of the world. Mack Harrell substituted nobly on short notice for Jerome Hines, who is ill. This despite the fact that Harrell's baritone cannot comfortably handle the low range, written as it is for bass voice. Nell Tangeman sang the mezzo-soprano portion creditably. Harvey Smith-Spencer, tenor, however, was inadequate.

Beethoven Mass At Carnegie Hall

By DOUGLAS WATT

The singing of the soprano soloist, Eleanor Steber, and of the Westminster Choir were the most consistently good things in last night's performance of Beethoven's monumental "Missa Solemnis" at Carnegie Hall.

The Other Soloists.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who conducted, and the Philharmonic-Symphony Society are to be congratulated for putting on this massive but penetrating and, often, extremely personal composition. But last night's performance was somewhat slack at times and none of the three other soloists could match Miss Steber's warm and expressive vocalizing. She has never sounded better.

Nell Tangeman, the mezzo-soprano, and Mack Harrell, substituting at the last moment in the bass part for the ailing Jerome Hines, were adequate but nothing more much of the time. The tenor, Harvey Smith - Spencer, had a pinched and expressionless voice that proved rather annoying whenever it entered the unfolding score.

Additional performances of the "Missa Solemnis" will be given this afternoon, tomorrow evening and Sunday afternoon.

Premiere Applauded at Carnegie Hall

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Half of last night's program by the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall consisted of novel material. There was a world premiere of a contemporary Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Philip Bezanson, and a local premiere of a much older Fantaisie for Piano and Orchestra by Louis Aubert, both featuring young John Simms as soloist.

Conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos, sandwiched these items between a pair of Brahms eternelles—the "Tragic" Overture and the Fourth Symphony.

Versatile Musician.

Behaving very much like the star of the occasion, Mr. Simms revealed himself as a versatile musician-interpreter, who was as much at home in the abounding modernism of the Bezanson as in the tried and true felicities (separated by long stretches of writing that was just plain dull) of the Aubert.

The Concerto, a motor driven essay in rhythmic contrasts, often sounds in the end sections like the latest of the late Prokofieff. The music shivers and snorts, leaps and lingers, all in good and propitious time and in varying degrees of color and dynamics. However, unlike the Russian composer's writing, the music has no truck with delightful ironies or playful mockery. It takes itself pretty seriously.

Lyrical Moments.

More restrained, though no less idiomatic, the Andante movement offers some beguiling moments. Lyrical ones they are, yet always carrying their quota of surprise in the constant shifting of rhythms.

This Concerto Mr. Simms and the orchestra performed brilliantly, remembering particularly its difficulty-strewn course. And by the time the music ended the piece had taken a definite shape in the listener's mind, had somehow—through all the sound and the mercurial activity—established a strong identity.

Steady Applause.

The audience received both the work and its performance warmly. Strangely the applause, while not deafening, continued long and with increasing volume until the composer, the soloist and the conductor had appeared many times for bows of acknowledgement.

Mr. Mitropoulos' account of the Brahms Fourth, after a first movement of indeterminate purpose, rose to exciting heights in the next three parts. A tempo especially congenial gave to the second movement its perfect setting, with the result tnat the Brahmsian line floated outward serenely and endearingly.

Of the Aubert, all that need be said is that it has its moments, lovely ones, true, but it has also many other sequences of triviality carried to tiresome extremes.

Mitropoulos Offers 'Missa Solemnis'

By MILES KASTENDIECK

BEETHOVEN'S "Missa Solemnis" occupied the full attention of Dmitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. It received a curious performance, difficult to appraise because the soloists were always getting in the way.

Mitropoulos conducted with that dedicated purpose and incandescent sincerity characteristic of him. This approach did not insure a notable interpretation, however.

A tendency to over-brilliance in the first part—Kyrie, Gloria, and Sanctus—drew attention to uneven stretches in the score. A better integrated concept of the Sanctus and Agnus Dei still left this listener unmoved at the end.

Inevitably when the performance came to the "Et Incarnatus" and "Crucifixus" of the credo andi the "Benedict" of the Sanctus the "inner" Beethoven took over. The soloists found themselves more attuned to these passages.

Elsewhere there was more buzzing among them than would have been anticipated from Eleanor Steber, soprano, Nell Tangeman, mezzo, and Mack Harrell, bass. Harvey Smith-Spencer, tenor, could hardly be classified in their company.

It took Miss Steber the whole first part to get adjusted. Even then when Beethoven pushed her voice into the upper register she encountered difficulties. This was just not a good night for her in so strategic a part.

The Westminster Choir came through much more securely than the soloists.

PHILHARMONIC BILL LISTS 2 CONCERTOS

Bezanson and Aubert Works Have Local Premieres — Simms Is Piano Soloist

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting; John Simms, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.

Tragic Overture ..... Brahms
Piano Concerto (first performance) .... Bezanson
Fantasie for Piano and Orchestra (first New York performance) ..... Aubert
Symphony No. 4 ..... Brahms

By OLIN DOWNES

Two works unknown to the musical public of this city were presented by Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with John Simms, pianist, last night in Carnegie Hall. These were Philip Bezanson's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, given its first performance anywhere, and Louis Aubert's Fantasie for the same instruments, composed many years ago, though the program annotator did not tell us exactly when, but heard for the first time in New York. Both of these compositions, the one by young Mr. Bezanson being very difficult, were played with skill, musicianship and virtuoso temperament by John Simms, the soloist, and the orchestra.

The Bezanson concerto is "modern," naturally, in its idiom, its emphasis on rhythmical elements and its elaborate counterpoint, which is on the dissonant side and of a polytonal nature. Indeed, the simpler and unsophisticated souls among us might even go so far as to call much of it ugly. But ugliness is a relative term, and it is an ancient aphorism that music that sounds ugly today may become stimulating and agreeable to the educated ear once the listener has become acclimated to its

Aside from this question of ugliness and its definition we have perhaps a more determinative estimate of the concerto as a work of art. It is a composition excessive length and undue elaborateness in the treatment of insignificant ideas. Where is the justification for this inflation, this jumboism? Half the number of notes, to say nothing of half the length of the present score, would in all probability greatly improve it. This disproportion and excess of detail impresses us as an academism that covers creative immaturity. Will Mr. Bezanson continue to compose in this manner? There were passages of his slow movement that gave passing promise of a capacity for more direct and genuinely expressive communication.

The second of the new works is the antithesis of the first, in its French lyricism and stylistic quality. It is perfectly pleasant in the post-Faure manner, melodious, warm in its sentiment, but again far too long and pretentious for its material. It is the Gallic opposite of the inflated Germanism of the concerto.

Mr. Mitropoulos played Brahms in two of his most notable manifestations at the beginning and end of the concert. He interpreted them very differently. We found his conception of the Tragic Overture to be less tragic and nobly austere than the inherent nature of the music. Whatever "tragedy" the hearer may imagine as inspiring this score, which, whether it be Hamlet or Oedipus, it has the simplicity of statement and the undertone of the grandly impersonal in its measures. To this extent, at least, it is a Greek conception. The overture lost something of its power through its lack of repose and instabilities of tempi.

The Fourth Symphony, on the other hand, must rank as one of Mr. Mitropoulos' most convincing interpretations of Brahms, the architect and classic master. In places he softens its lines, but that is his own reaction to a masterpiece, and one that was never less than logical, cohesive, virile and poetical by turns; an eloquent communication of a great symphony.

A Fine Pianist

THE Philharmonic-Symphony concert that Dimitri Mitropoulos led last night in Carnegie Hall was raised well above banality by the piano playing of John Simms and a little bit by a new piano concerto of Philip Bezanson. Also there were ten minutes of beautiful music making in the middle of Louis Aubert's Fantaisie for piano and orchestra, where the pianist, the conductor and the orchestra (particularly the wonderful Philharmonic horns) were in the most exquisitely relaxed and delicious accord.

The Aubert piece, vintage of 1901, is the ambitious and skillful effort of a young boy. Its sounds are lovely, and its piano-orchestra relationship is both imaginative and brilliant. But its themes have small life in them, and its progress is repetitive. Worse pieces have been played successfully in New York; this one, for reasons unknown, seems never to have been played here before at all. Last night it served as vehicle for the grand technical powers and the richly subtle musicianship of Mr. Simms. Him one wants to hear again.

Philip Bezanson's Piano Concerto also profited from Mr. Simms' fine abilities. This is a neoclassic work in the Prokofiev taste, athletic and of a neat rhythmic complexity. If it is not exactly light on its feet, for orchestral weight keeps the soloist pounding, it does bound about in muscular style. For the statutory three movements it is vigorous and busy. General competence does not quite fill up, however, a certain expressive emptiness. One wished its themes had been more thoughtful or that some passage in it had contained, if only for a few minutes, the quiet and vibrant inner life that briefly raised the Louis Aubert work from mere music writing to music. Mr. Bezanson's concerto would get him a teaching job anywhere, if he did not already have one at the University of Iowa. How far it will get him in the world of free composition remains to be seen. Myself I should hesitate to bet in its favor at even odds.

* * *

John Simms, also a member of the Iowa faculty, seems to me a sound bet. He has surely all the material for a pianist's career—technique, taste, temperament and a mature culture. I realize that one cannot really know about a pianist whom one has heard only with orchestra. But everything I heard last night sounded strongly like the work of a first-class artist.

Philharmonic Symphony:

Concert Offers 2 Premieres

By MILES KASTENDIECK

MITROPOULOS provided several kinds of novelty for the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

There were the world premiere of Phillip Bezanson's piano concerto, the New York premiere of Aubert's "Fantaisie" for piano and orchestra, and the debut of the American pianist John Simms.

There was also the virtuoso conducting of Mitropoulos himself.

Bezanson's concerto is one of those churning pieces, sounding primarily like a jumble of rhythm and notes. Except for a few sections of the andante it is assertively dull.

Its bravura character gives the soloist a workout that demands competency and little else. It probably looks better on paper than it sounds. The audience's applause appeared directed toward the soloist.

Aubert's Fantaisie presented a contrast in styles, if not in nature. Written more than a half century ago, it is a romantic show piece. Its melodic material sounds faded, its general character derivative. As the creation of a youth of 22, it is superficially bright and sentimentally inclined.

Neither work made possible a fair appraisal of Simms. He coped fluently with the stream of notes in the Bezanson. He played the Aubert for its virtuoso worth without being too gracious about tone quality. He is certainly competent; what more is hard to say.

It was Brahms who stabilized the program. Mitropoulos opened with the "Tragic" overture and closed with the Fourth Symphony. The former he treated less seriously than its nature because of a fast tempo. The latter grew steadier as it unfolded.

In matter of individualized tempo and accent the playing of Brahms served to emphasize the virtuoso character of Mitropoulos' conducting.

When he came to the third movement of the symphony, however, he gave it a pacing and inflection quite fitting. Having found himself, he showed his sterling qualities to the end of the concert. The orchestra responded accordingly.

PHILHARMONIC PLAYS LIEBERMANN 'FURIOSO'

The New York première of Rolf Liebermann's "Furioso" was the closing number of the Saturday evening concert by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Liebermann is a contemporary Swiss composer who flirts with the twelve-tone technique.

"Furioso," however, is not twelve-tone. It derives its name from the explosive opening and closing outbursts—outbursts that virtually constitute a concerto for percussion and orchestra. Most of the work is very loud and indignant-sounding, though a rather sentimental middle section offers contrast. There are no "problems" to the writing, which is that of a competent, professional composer.

The soloist of the evening was Mischa Elman in the Mendelssohn E minor Concerto. This was played in the grand old romantic manner, with perhaps a little more sliding and vibrato than today's tastes dictate. A well-planned and cleanly conducted performance of Schumann's Symphony No. 1 was conducted by Mr. Mitropoulos, as was Brahms' "Tragic Overture," a holdover from the Thursday-Friday pair of concerts.

First Violin Comes Out For a Bow

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The entire Philharmonic Orchestra joined last night's audience in giving John Corigliano, the concertmaster, a ringing ovation for his performance of Vieuxtemps' D Minor Violin Concerto.

It was more than a collective gesture on the part of Mr. Corigliano's co-workers. The performance was warm and clean and thorough, and the men would have been just as stirred if the soloist had been someone else. He happened to be their first violinist.

Wealth of Tone.

The audience also responded to the wealth of expressive tone and artistry that Mr. Corigliano put into the music. There are violinists who are said to make the violin talk; Mr. Corigliano made it sing last night, and the singing was like a sweet and heartfelt prayer in the andante religioso.

Dimitri Mitropoulos applied a superb background to his concertmaster's playing. It supported the solo line and was in turn supported by it—a beautiful example of give and take between an orchestra and its soloist.

Mr. Mitropoulos bracketed two "American Premieres" on last night's Carnegie bill—premieres, oddly enough, separated by over a century and a half. One of the novelties, in fact, was by none other than that rampant modernist Joseph Haydn.

The piece was "An Overture for an English Opera," composed in London in 1794 and soon lost only to turn up in Vienna last year. Its bright chatter and bustling urbanity would easily have identified it as Haydn's if the name had not been on the manuscript. I like to think so, anyway.

Much Tougher.

The other novelty was much tougher to take—even though Irving Kolodin clarified its problems ingeniously in the program book. It was a piece called "Ornaments for Orchestra," by the German composer Boris Blacher.

The score is built on a system of multiple rhythms, allowing wider scope for metrical variety and freedom of progression. Somewhere behind it bulks the shadow of Stravinsky, and maybe I heard Schoenberg, or perhaps it was Berg.

No Music.

What I didn't hear was music. There were brilliant flashes; spurts of power; hints of instrumental shrewdness. Most of it, however, sounded like hyenas howling in the abysmal depths of the African night.

I feel sure Mr. Mitropoulos gave the score more than it deserved. After Blacher's "Ornaments" Rachmaninoff's "Symphonic Dances" sounded like the greatest music ever composed. Conductor and orchestra made all three of the dances come alive in a vast surge of tone and drama.

Philharmonic Offers New Works by Haydn, Blacher

By PAUL AFFELDER

Two works new to America made most of the news, but not much of the music, at last evening's Philharminic-Symphony concert, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, at Carnegie Hall.

The first of these was the recently discovered "Overture for an English Opera," written by Joseph Haydn for a performance in London in 1794. It turned out to be a tuneful little trifle, pleasant to listen to, but of no great consequence. Nor did Mr. Mitropoulos give it added stature by his extremely heavy-handed interpretation.

The other novelty was a work called "Ornaments" for orchestra by the contemporary German composer, Boris Blacher. Its chief purpose, as far as we could ascertain, is to put into concrete musical form the composer's theories about the mathematical progressions of varied beats in a measure.

What Arnold Schoenberg and his followers have attempted to do with thematic patterns in "tone-rows," Blacher has been trying to do with a "rhythmic row."

What it all amounts to, really, is an attempt to systematize some of the complex rhythmic ideas set forth by Stravinsky in such works as "Le Sacre Du Printemps." But if one is to judge by the composition heard last evening, the attempt is not yet successful.

On paper it all looks very fine, indeed; in sound, however, "Ornaments" lacks the rhythmic drive and spontaneity to be found even in a minor Stravinsky work. Nor is the music any more daring harmonically than it is rhythmically.

The composer has become so absorbed with the trees that he never envisions the forest. A large orchestra is employed, yet all one hears most of the time are quiet little ensemble passages. In other words, the whole thing just never quite comes off.

Two Anniversaries Marked

Both of the remaining works on the program were concerned with tenth anniversaries. John Corigliano celebrated ten years' tenure as the Philharmonic's concertmaster by appearing as soloist with his colleagues in the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra No. 4 in D minor by Henri Vieuxtemps.

His performance was admirably secure technically and exceedingly warm in tonal texture, his approach to the work most sensitive and fairly reticent. He never forced the issue, always allowing the music to speak for itself.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra gave him sympathetic support and joined the audience in an ovation at the concerto's conclusion.

It is also ten years sinc the death of Sergei Rachmaninoff, and the event was observed with a performance of his last large-scale orchestral composition, the "Symphonic Dances." Though this is not the best Rachmaninoff, there is some mighty attractive music here.

Mr. Mitropoulos began by accenting the rhythm rather heavily, sometimes overlooking the work's more sensuous qualities. Later, however, he warmed to his task, so that the latter part of his reading was quite impassioned and rich in tone.

NEW QUARTET GIVEN BY CHAMBER GROUP

Woodwind Work by Babbitt, 12-Tone Specialist, Played First Time at 'Y' Concert

The first concert of the Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble was played on Saturday evening at the Lexington Avenue Y. M. H. A. As in previous seasons the program was enterprising, containing a mixture of new and old music for combinations not too frequently encountered. And again, as in previous seasons, Dimitri Mitropoulos was on hand to help out his orchestra players. He led fifteen of them through Schoenberg's "Kammer-Symphonie," Op. 9.

One of the contemporary works was commissioned by Mrs. Alma Morgenthau. Because of the cancellation of last summer's Locust Valley Festival, which she sponsors, Milton Babbitt's Quartet for Woodwinds had its world première on this program. It was played by John Wummer, flutist; Engelbert Brenner, oboist; Stanley Drucker, clarinetist, and Manuel Zegler, bassoonist.

Mr. Babbitt, one of the country's leading twelve-tone specialists, has composed a typically difficult, abstruse piece that demands the utmost in concentration from players and audience. It is governed by an inflexible logic and an uncompromising take-it-or-leave-it attitude.

Whether the effort put into assimilating it is worth what one eventually takes out is up to the individual listener to determine.

A quartet of Philharmonic players, with Abba Bogin at the piano, opened the evening with Beethoven's Quintet for Woodwinds and Piano. Bjoern Andreasson and Harry Zaratzian then played Mozart's Duo for Violin and Viola in B flat.

Mr. Andreasson, Leon Temerson and Mr. Bogin also were heard in Manuel Rosenthal's Sonatine for Two Violins and Piano, an urbane and sophisticated example of Gallic writing.

All of these performances were thoughtful and clear. Mr. Mitropoulos' fluent exposition of Schoenberg's heavily post-romantic chamber symphony was the work of a virtuoso who can disentangle the most complicated tonal tangle.

Rich Resources

THE Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble, which opened its third annual series of concerts on Saturday night at the Y. M. H. A. on Lexington Ave., is the richest among all our chamber music groups in instrumental resources. Drawing its players from the whole Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and organized as a co-operative society, this group offers regularly in its programs works for a great variety of instrumental combinations; and the great expertness of the players permits them also to offer works of unusual stylistic and technical difficulty.

The star number of last Saturday's program was Arnold Schoenberg's early Kammer-Symphonie, Opus 9, for fifteen solo instruments, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. Rarely performed at all, on account of its great technical difficulty, this deeply passionate and eloquent piece is at once a monument of late Romanticism and a picture window turned toward twentieth century chromatic experiment. I presume the historians of today would consider it an example of pre-World War I Expressionism. In any case, it is a powerful work that seems to invite (like its predecessor "Verklaerte Nacht") a choreography by Anthony Tudor. Its reading by Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic men was a model of expertness, expressivity and understanding.

No less expert and stylish (in the best sense) was the performance of Beethoven's Quintet for Woodwinds and Piano, with Aba Bogin at the keyboard. Mozart's Duo for Violin and Viola (No. 2, in B flat Major) came off less well. The string players of the Philharmonic, many of them at least, seem less accustomed to the refinements of chamber music execution than the wind players are, used, as are these latter, to the constant playing of solo passages. Nevertheless Leon Temerson and Bernard Andreasson, accompanied by Mr. Bogin, gave a delicious and even brilliant performance of Manuel Rosenthal's Sonatine for Two Violins and Piano. This lively work, composed in 1923 at the age of nineteen, is musically inspired by Milhaud and Poulenc, rather than by Ravel, who was Rosenthal's teacher. It is an outgoing work, frank, vigorous and entertaining. Thirty years later, one can still find it valid. It is not only skillful but, for all its youthful enthusiasms, strongly personal.

Abba Bogin

Milton Babbitt's Woodwind Quartet, an Alma Morgenthau-Locust Valley Festival commission which received its first performance on this occasion, is also a strongly personal work, in spite of its twelve-tone-row tonal syntax. Music composed in this manner has long tended in its finer examples toward a supercharged emotional expression and in its more commonplace ones toward a sterile academicism. It is Mr. Babbitt's distinction to have produced in a twelve-tone technique derived, like that of the contemporary Parisian school, from Webern, rather than from Schoenberg or Berg, music of an airy elegance wholly his own. It is not crabbed like the French stuff, nor does it seek pathos at any point. It is lacy, good-humored, disinvolved, water-clear. At its least concentrated it goes a bit abstract. At its most intense it has a studied relaxation that is very Princetonian, very American and utterly distinguished. Babbitt's Woodwind Quartet is a delightful work, as twelve-tone music goes. Its dry humor must not be mistaken for a lack of expressivity.

John Corigliano Plays Vieuxtemps

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

John Corigliano, the Philharmonic-Symphony's expert concertmaster, made his annual appearance as soloist with the ensemble in Carnegie Hall last night, in the Vieuxtemps Violin Concerto in D Minor. Though the composer, being a violin virtuoso himself, wrote six concerti for his instrument, this, the fourth, is the only one remaining in the standard repertoire. Vieuxtemps wrote the work in 1850.

Corigliano demonstrated his first-rate musicianship and technical mastery throughout the piece and won applause from his colleagues as well as an ovation from the audience at the conclusion of the performance. Though his tone is not large and his vitality not the fiery kind, he played with a silken lyricism that suited the work's character. Its cantilena in the slow movement spirals into big circular melodies that twirl around almost lazily. Corigliano didn't treat them lazily, though, which means that they soared under his bow with just the right elan.

For his American premiere, Dimitri Mitropoulos, who relishes the challenge of a new work, has programmed Boris Blacher's "Ornaments." Blacher, Chinese-born, of Russian parentage, has lived in Germany for more than 30 years. According to Irving Kolodin's program notes, the composer has worked out his composition with mathematical rhythmic precision, and the results on first hearing were just as mathematical. The music sounded like a study in proportion, abstract, unemotional—and I'm sorry to say—dull in its impression.

Mitropoulos opened the program with another American premiere—a delightful, recently discovered Haydn "Overture to an English Opera." This and the closing Rachmaninoff "Symphonic Dances, Op. 45," were performed with savor and welcome restraint by ensemble and maestro. Though the music came through in colorful and live fashion, the ensemble's tone was well balanced and contrasted.

Daniel Wayenberg, Pianist

Daniel Wayenberg, who made his American concert debut yesterday afternoon, is a pianist in the grand manner. Through his performance of Rachmaninoff's C minor Concerto, with the Philharmonic-Symphony under Dimitri Mitropoulos' direction, he brought braves and cheers from a packed house in Carnegie Hall. It was an ovation entirely deserved.

Granted, a Rachmaninoff concerto is no vehicle from which to discover the nature of a pianist's inherent musicality and refinement. But it does offer, for purposes of demonstration, a generous sampling of myriad other skills. And Mr. Wayenberg has them all. His technical facility is downright fantastic; his tone is huge and ringing. If he is not overstocked in the warmer piano colors, he is, at any rate, able to call forth a sufficient number to lend brightness to his work. Additionally, young Mr. Wayenberg, a native of Holland, has a mind of his own.

To this mind, purists among us—if purity may be counted a part of the Rachmaninoff tradition—may take exception. For Mr. Wayenberg is to a substantial degree unorthodox. Yesterday, he constantly brought out inner voices rarely heard and altered tempos to suit his own eccentric design. But this design is so thoroughly vital, so much a part of his virtuoso concept that it proved a stimulating experience rather than an annoying or cloying one. All things considered, Daniel Wayenberg is a welcome visitors to these shores. We will hear more of him. Let no one doubt that.

DUTCH PIANIST BOWS WITH PHILHARMONIC

A 23-year-old pianist from the Netherlands, Daniel Wayenberg, made his United States debut yesterday afternoon as soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Wayenberg chose to exhibit his wares in that most trusty of warhorses, the Rachmaninoff C minor Concerto.

He made a big hit with the audience. He swept up and down the keyboard, worked well with Dimitri Mitropoulos, the conductor, and on one or two occasions, almost drowned the orchestra in gobs of fortissimo sound. Such enthusiasm was infectious, and his work was greeted with something close to an ovation.

But it cannot truthfully be said that Mr. Wayenberg showed much refinement or color. His tone was percussive, emerging in a clangorous manner with little nuance. Nor did his machine-gun delivery make much of the subtlety inherent in the piano writing.

For no matter what you may think of this heart-on-sleeve concerto, there are some remarkable sections of writing in it—writing that demands more imagination than the soloist brought to it.

Mr. Mitropoulos conducted the Brahms Fourth Symphony, presenting a sound performance that veered toward sentimentality in the cantabile measures of the slow movement. Here, Mr. Mitropoulos felt impelled to underscore and italicize melodies that can stand alone without any help. The third movement of Rachmaninoff's "Symphonic Dances" also was on the program.

2 U.S. Premieres Add Little Pleasure

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TWO American premieres added no special pleasures to the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

That of Haydn's "Overture for an English Opera" offered only four minutes of characteristic 18th century style to the repertory. That of Boris Blacher's "Ornaments" for orchestra offered far too much of musical mathematics more mathematical than musical.

A paucity of material to carry out his idea of rhythmic rows made Blacher's work something of a musical treadmill. From fragmentary beginnings it worked into sequential patterns where monotony set in. Only when syncopation entered did flagging interest perk up. Blacher's theory appeared to consume him rather than to inspire him.

Violin Concerto

The interest of this concert came in John Corigliano's fine-toned, musicianly performance of Vieuxtemps' fourth violin concerto and Mitropoulos's playing of Rachmaninoff's "Symphonic Dances."

The Philharmonic-Symphony's concertmaster played with his customary technical finish and singing tone. Within a small-scaled framework he fashioned a sensitively proportioned interpretation which was a delight to hear.

An affinity for Rachmaninoff brought out the best in Mitropoulos. He conducted with relish and with consequent brilliance.

Not so well known as most of Rachmaninoff's other big works, it ranks with the best of them. Last night it supplied the symphonic grandeur this program needed.

ROSE PLAYS 'CELLO FOR PHILHARMONIC

Soloist in Boccherini Concerto Conducted by Mitropoulos—Beethoven Heads Program

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. 'Cello soloist, Leonard Rose. At Carnegie Hall.
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven
'Cello Concerto in B flat.....Boccherini
Schelomo.....Bloch
Rapsodie Espagnole.....Ravel

By OLIN DOWNES

Classicism and modernism — if two works so old that they date from the first quarter of our singularly advanced century can properly be called "modern," made the program of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Dmitri Mitropoulos conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Mitropoulos had changed the program from the one originally announced. In place of Bach he began with Beethoven's Second Symphony, and concluded with Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole." Leonard Rose, solo 'cellist of the occasion, played first the B flat 'cello concerto of Boccherini, and then the "Schelomo" of Ernst Bloch, the masterpiece now familiar to all concertgoers, nevertheless one that remains lonely and incomparable in the unconventionality and dramatic power of its utterance.

There is nothing like this in the literature of 'cello, and in orchestral music, nothing like Bloch's purple-and-gold instrumentation or passion. Now the music, with the voice of solo 'cello, laments with the wisdom and agony of the prophet, anon the orchestra shakes with the fury of his denunciation, and finally the solo 'cello echoes his disillusion and despair—"vanity, vanity, all is vanity," in a way that only music created by genius may achieve.

But the author of "Schelomo" needs no encomiums today. He has written one of his most powerful works, which will long endure. So doing, he has also written passages of recitative and of passionate song for the 'cello, often of singular difficulty, but always extremely eloquent and idiomatic for the instrument. Mr. Rose met all the demands of technique and sonority and tonal beauty that the score makes upon its communicant, and received the applause he deserved for his accomplishment—this although the music has been projected with more of impassioned rhetoric and splendor of style than he invariably gave it.

Not only the "Schelomo" but also Maurice Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," holds its place wonderfully with the passing of the years. The four short pieces that constitute the "Rapsodie" are charged with a spirit of tragedy, haunting even the moments of the gayest festivity, which seems extremely characteristic of at least one aspect, perhaps a predominant one, of the Spanish spirit.

The "Prelude to the night" is necromatic. It is like unto a gypsy incantation. She twirls the cards and repeats in an unknown tongue a magic formula that Ravel transmits by the persistent motive of four notes hypnotically repeated through the piece, and punctuated by the strange gibbering cadenzas of clarinets and bassoons.

The "Malaguena" is shadowy and ominous, sad in its middle section, brutal in its rhythms. "The Habanera," once a piano piece separate from the Rapsodie, is an affair of ghosts. The music of the festival—the finale—has an irresistible brilliancy and swing, and also, in the middle part, bitter and sensuous regret—and all this done with a Goyaesque power of color and line. A brilliantly imaginative piece by a master of impeccable art was made known as such by Mr. Mitropoulos to his audience.

Mitropoulos Inspires His Team to Greatness

BY WILLIAM FLEMING
Behind the Scenes at the New York Philharmonic.

Observing a conductor like Dimitri Mitropoulos at a rehearsal is a fascinating experience, especially when the work is a colossus of such proportions as Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. To whip this huge work into shape, and put all the orchestral, choral and soloistic forces in proper prospective takes a bit of doing with only two full sessions, one on Wednesday afternoon, another Thursday morning, with the first concert that same evening.

William Fleming

Rehearsals can be more revealing than concerts. Here there can be no mysteries about the conductor's desires. He has to communicate his intentions swiftly and efficiently; make quick decisions on how a passage is to be played; and make the necessary compromises and adjustments based on the capacities of the musicians. In a larger sense, he has to inspire, communicate an infectious enthusiasm for the spirit of the music, and generate the spark that will give it the breath of life, come concert time.

Well, here we were in the maestro's workshop. A scattering of people dotted the orchestra stalls of an empty Carnegie Hall. One recognized Bruno Walter, who is to take over as guest conductor later in the season, over in one corner; in another was John Finley Williamson, who had prepared his Westminster Choir for the performance. On stage Mr. Mitropoulos was bustling all over the place, getting the choir seated where he wanted them and greeting the musicians, as they sauntered in, with a handshake and a pleasant word.

When all were assembled, tuning their fiddles, warming up their horns and drums, the stage presented a lively contrast to the more dignified deportment of a concert. The choir, without their crimson robes, were dressed as informally as college men and women usually are. Some of the orchestra men were in sport jackets, others in shirt sleeves; and the maestro himself had on a shapeless suit that looked as if it had been slept in the past few nights.

SOMETHING GOES AMISS

Before many bars of the orchestral introduction went by, it was apparent that many were sight reading their parts, since the Missa falls outside the usual symphonic repertory. "Not clear," shouted Mitropoulos, "I didn't hear a thing. Begin again at F!"

From the cacophonous sounds that ensued it was apparent something was amiss. All the copies, it turned out, didn't have F in the same place. "All right, then, begin four bars before the change of key."

Another stop. Mitropoulos carefully explained that there were only two ways of conducting such a passage. "Since the first way didn't work, we'll do it the other way." Things went better. "OK, is it clear now? Is it comfortable? Tell me, and if it isn't we'll change it."

RHYTHMIC EMPHASIS

Once the woodwinds produced some strange sounds. "Gentlemen, we all know that when Beethoven wrote this piece he was already deaf. Unfortunately, I'm not!" Next the chorus had to be told to sharpen their verbal attacks so as to give a greater rhythmic emphasis. After this the soloists were reminded that they were singing a symphonically conceived work and had to fit themselves into it, and to forego any lingering on high notes while an obliging conductor held up the show for their high C's.

Then the tables were turned, and it was the maestro's time to blush. After stopping the orchestra three times and exclaiming that the violas didn't come in on time, one of them reminded him that they weren't supposed to come in until the next bar. "Well, we're all human," he said, and the tension was momentarily broken.

As the mighty Missa Solemnis slowly began to take shape, the great work gradually took possession of the musicians. To get even greater crescendos, Mitropoulos crouched low, gradually raised himself, and at the climax leaped into the air. To emphasize certain rhythms, he stamped his feet violently. The concertmaster, who up to this point had been placidly chewing gum, snapped to attention as his solo passage began. In short, the scattered fragments of the complicated score all began falling into place just as the rehearsal came to its end.

MIRACLE COMES TO PASS

Next evening, at the concert, the eternal musical miracle came to pass. What had only a few days before been only a collection of dead notes on paper and an idea in the conductor's mind, sprang into life. Out of all the chaos and confusion of the previous day, came form and shape. The Kyrie was now a prayerful introduction; the Gloria burst forth as a magnificent shout of universal praise; the poignant words, Dona Nobis Pacem, were, as the composer intended, a prayer for inner and outer peace, a message as powerful in our time as in Beethoven's. The great work enveloped the audience, and the whole monumental effort was for all concerned a rich and rewarding experience.

Philharmonic Symphony Concert:

Bloch Opus Inspiring

By MILES KASTENDIECK

IT WAS the second half of the Philharmonic-Symphony concert that came alive in Carnegie Hall last night. Bloch and Ravel inspired conductor, soloist, and orchestra much more than Beethoven and Boccherini earlier in the program.

A performance of Bloch's "Schelomo" usually catches fire, for there is so much genuinely deep feeling written into it. Last night the music throbbed with the mellowness of Leonard Rose's cello playing and Mitropoulos's virtuosic urge.

They both found an outlet of expression to which they could respond fervently. The performance won the most enthusiastic applause.

Orchestral Color

All the orchestral color lurking in Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" gave Mitropoulos still further opportunity. He seized it with all the ardor and skill characteristic of him at his best. The result was highly stimulating.

The concert opened with Beethoven's second symphony. In his pursuit of detail, Mitropoulos inclinched toward overlooking the wholeness of each movement. The performance in its entirety lacked both the flow and the geniality inherent in the score though it had its passing moments of insight.

Rose first appeared as soloist in Boccherini's cello concerto in B-flat. He was certainly not in his best form. The performance emerged more as a dutiful presentation than one to hold interest.

Leonard Rose Is Soloist

Leonard Rose was soloist last night with the Philharmonic-Symphony at Carnegie Hall, playing the Boccherini Concerto for cello and Orchestra and Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo." Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted, and the remainder of the program was devoted to a rather standard reading of Beethoven's Second Symphony, substituting for Copland's Short Symphony (No. 2), earlier scheduled to be heard at this concert, and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole."

To some extent, the soloist neglected musical opportunities in both the Concerto and in "Shelomo." On the one hand, the Boccherin irequires stylistic finesse to put it across, a sense of the framework within which it exists, and of the limited possibilities for rhythmic deviation and rhapsodic expression it provides. These qualities were missing from Mr. Rose's performance and, despite loveliness of tone and a general gentility of approach, the concerto, even in its song-like second movement, did not quite come into its own. "Schelomo," by contrast is able to take whatever melodic or rhythmic expansiveness the soloist chooses to provide. In this case, however, the soloist chose a middle course, and the standard affliction of the cellist in this rhapsody, that of sounding like a small voice in a Hebraic wilderness, was to some extent emphasized.

There were beauties galore in Mr. Rose's playing; phrases delightfully turned, passages sung surely and poetically in the upper registers; a level of technical perfection truly admirable. But the opulence called forth on occasion from the orchestra, and implicit throughout the music's duration, were not always realized in the solo part.

Nary a Turkey in Holiday Philharmonic Concert

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Thanksgiving Night in Carnegie Hall and not a turkey in the program of the Philharmonic-Symphony. Come to think of it, the orchestra rarely serves such fare. It has not happened recently. Not while I was present anyway.

It was a program under Dimitri Mitropoulos that adhered to strictly time-ripened and thrice proved material. There was a soloist, Leonard Rose, who was heard in two pieces, one by Boccherini, the other by Bloch. The opener was Beethoven's Second Symphony, the closer Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody."

The cellist was not at his Leonard Rose best in the Boccherini Concerto. Despite that, he did do many fine things. We don't have to talk about the Rose technique and tone any more. They're usually taken for granted. But we do talk about his falls from grace — when they occur.

Little Vitality.

For example, his line in the first movement of the Boccherini had little vitality. Considerable improvement could be noted in the second movement, where there was a world of finesse and continuity. The last section, too, held much that was immensely enjoyable, especially his delivery of the tough cadenza.

In the Bloch "Schelomo" he behaved, however, like the perfect expressionist he can really be. To boot, his playing was companioned by an intensely dramatic account of the orchestral part. In such circumstances "Schelomo" never fails to lift its hearers sky high. And that was just what happened this time.

Rose to Heights.

Mr. Mitropoulos, besides the accomplishments mentioned, rose to remarkable heights of interpretation in the Ravel. Only a firm control of the musicians could have made possible such tantalizing effects as he obtained in the Habanera section of that work. And such crescendos, and such pianissmi to titillate the listener! There are times when the "Rhapsody" makes like Daphnis and Chloe in Spain. Not enough to matter, though, for it does have its own personality.

The Beethoven Second, all in all, was straightforward and clear in the rendition. It's not a patch on the later works of the master in that form. In any case it did get a lovely, affectionate treatment of the Larghetto.

After today's Philharmonic-Symphony concert, Dimitri Mitropoulos will not return to Carnegie Hall until late in January. George Szell, of the Cleveland Orchestra, and Bruno Walter will share the intervening eight weeks. Whether Mr. Mitropoulos will conduct Aaron Copland's Short Symphony later in the season is not yet known; it was taken off the programs for today and last Thursday and Friday because more than the available rehearsal time was needed. Mr. Szell, who conducts the American premiere of Boris Blacher's Variations on a Theme by Paganini Dec. 10, will be in charge through Dec. 13, and will return after Mr. Walter's first fortnight (Dec. 14-27).

The Blacher work and the compositions which Charles Munch's Bostonians will introduce to us Wednesday night, Kabalevsky's Cello Concerto and Ernest Bloch's second Concerto Grosso seem to wind up the list of the major orchestras' New York novelties for December. . . . The Juilliard Orchestra, however, will give American premieres of works by Edmund Rubbra and Maurice Jacobson Wednesday in the first of the five concerts of the school's British Music Festival, and Jean Francaix' Suite in D for violin and orchestra, composed in 1934, will have its formal New York premiere in tomorrow's concert of the Little Orchestra Society. Kurt Woess, the Nippon Philharmonic's Austrian conductor, will introduce Yasushi Akutagawa's Suite on Old Japanese Folksongs to this country when he directs Philharmonic string players Friday in the Carnegie Recital Hall.

King Paul Decorates Mitropoulos

By W. C. ROGERS

NEW YORK—A pianist gave a pianist a medal Sunday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Dimitri

The honor was conferred by Greek King Paul on the New York Philharmonic's Greek born conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos, who led the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra from 1935 to 1946. Mitropoulos likes to double at the piano sometimes while he's leading his orchestra in a concerto.

It was the first concert attended by the King and by Queen Frederika on their current American tour. After the concert the king told newsmen he had been a piano student himself, having studied with Gina Bachauer, among others. He said he plays very little now.

Had he liked Sunday's concert? He answered by remarking with a smile and with an air of regret:

"Frankly, I'm not very fond of modern music."

But he had liked the Ravel he had just heard . . . the concerto for piano and orchestra in G Major, with Nicole Henriot as soloist. It was one of two Ravels on Sunday's program. The concert opened with the American and Greek national anthems.

The ivory and gold beribboned medal, the cross of the commander of the Order of the Phoenix, was presented Mitropoulos in the conductor's Green Room after the usual Sunday broadcast concert.

Carnegie Hall officials rolled out the red carpet for the occasion. They had done this only once before, they said, for Madame Chiang Kai-shek. They remembered presidents and generals listening to concerts, but could not remember any other King and Queen.

Greek King Presents Medal To Carnegie Hall Pianist

NEW YORK, Nov. 29.—(AP)—A pianist gave a pianist a medal this afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

It was the first concert attended by the King and by Queen Frederika on their current American tour. After the concert the King told newsmen he had been a piano student himself, having studied with Gina Bachauer, among others. He said he plays very little now.

"Unfortunately," he said, "I haven't the time for the piano now."

Had he liked today's concert? He answered by remarking with a smile and with an air of regret:

"Between you and me and the lamppost, I'm not very fond of modern music."

But he had liked a Ravel he had just heard . . . the concerto for piano and orchestra in G Major, with Nicole Henriot as soloist. It was one of two Ravels on today's program. The concert opened with the American and Greek National Anthems.

The royal party entered its bo a intermission. The audience, tipped off in part by photographers flashlights, rose in greeting, and the King bowed in return.

The ivory and gold beribboned medal, the Cross of the Commander of the Order of the Phoen was presented in the conducto green room after the usual Sund broadcast concert.

It was not pinned on, nor hu around Mitropoulos' neck, handed over out of a jewele box.

When it was suggested that be placed around his neck, t Queen, indicating the conducto white shirt, collar and tie, answered:

"Not with this."

Carnegie Hall officials rolled ou the red carpet for the occasion. They had done this only once before, they said, for Madame Chiang Kai-Shek. They remembered presidents and generals listening to concerts, but could not remember any other King and Queen.

King Paul Tells Lack of Fondness For Modern Music

New York, Nov. 30 (AP). "Between you and me and the lamppost, I'm not very fond of modern music."

So confided King Paul of Greece yesterday after he and his Queen, Frederika, attended a concert of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

The concert program, the first attended by the couple on their current American tour, included two Ravels and opened with the American and Greek National Anthems.

King Paul chatted with newsmen after the concert, telling them he had been a piano student.

Afterwards he presented philharmonic conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos with a medal, the ivory and gold be-ribboned cross of the Commander of the Order of the Phoenix.

The Greek royal couple leaves the United States Thursday. Former President Harry S. Truman arrives here today to attend a luncheon for them tomorrow.

Mitropolous' First Eight Weeks

By Miles Kastendieck
New York

Dimitri Mitropoulous's first eight weeks with the Philharmonic-Symphony appeared a long span, because few of the concerts were wholly satisfying. Each had its bright moments, but usually the program was problematic. While Mitropoulos excelled in the modern field, his individual way with the standard repertory courted reservations on numerous occasions.

Program Policies

For the most part the intent has been to avoid the most familiar works, and thus programs have been given without the sustaining power of a first-class piece. Such procedure has been disconcerting. On the one occasion when Brahms' "Tragic" Overture and his Fourth Symphony bracketed two premières, the performance of the Symphony turned out to be one of the best that he offered in all this time.

A tendency to contrast old and new music in a single program might have proved more satisfactory had the older works been outstanding. An astutely planned program frequently offered more on paper than in performance. For instance, the one that offered Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, the American première of Einem's Capriccio, Viotti's Violin Concerto No. 22, and Bartók's Second Rhapsody was potentially good. Some might contend that the Mendelssohn Symphony was not first-class, though the point is debatable. It happens that Einem's Capriccio made a most favorable impression as a work of today. The remainder of the program, however, sagged because the soloist, Menuhin, was not in top form.

Almost every program had its new work. The first New York performance of Hindemith's Symphony, "Die Harmonie der Welt," indicated immediately that several hearings would be necessary to hold public interest. Hindemith's skill was immediately obvious, but his intent apparently unfulfilled in content.

World Premières

The world premières of Křenek's Concerto for Two Pianos and Gould's Dance Variations, both commissioned by the duo-pianists, Whittemore and Lowe, caused no special stir. The Gould piece had its share of entertaining measures, cleverly orchestrated. Neither Benzanson's Piano Concerto nor Aubert's Fantasy for Piano and Orchestra arrested attention.

On the other hand, the New York première of Liebermann's "Furioso" scored an immediate success as a virtuoso piece. The American première of Blacher's "Ornaments" for Orchestra posed a problem in musical mathematics, more mathematical than musical. Thus Mitropoulos dutifully presented new works, but unfortunately they offered little that was substantial and less that was stimulating.

A performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" proved disturbing, At times it was difficult to recognize the performance as Beethoven, though Mitropoulos expended a great deal of energy on it. The soloists on this occasion — Eleanor Steber, soprano; Nell Tangeman, mezzo-soprano; Harvey Smith-Spencer, tenor; and Mack Harrell, bass—found Beethoven's vocal intricacies arduous. The Westminster Choir, however, made a definite contribution.

Achievements

One of Mitropoulos's distinctive achievements was his revival of Schönberg's symphonic poem, "Pelleas and Melisande." This was a work where the conductor proved his eminence as well as that of the composer. After 50 years the work holds up well. In the light of the course Schönberg followed thereafter, it has been shamefully neglected. Schönberg's romanticism looks forward as well as backward in this music. The score contains nothing forbidding to the average listener, who might be grateful for the composer's delineation of the Maeterlinck story.

At his virtuosic best, Mitropoulos gave memorable performances to such colorful pieces as Rachmaninov's Symphonic Dances, not frequently played, and Ravel's "Rhapsody Espagnol." Coming as these did at the end of concerts, they frequently made up for earlier disappointments.

In the roll call of soloists should be included Robert Casadesus, for an elegant performance of Saint-Saëns' Fourth Piano Concerto; John Simms for his capable playing of Bezanson and Aubert; Mischa Elman, for a characteristically orthodox offering of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto; John Corigliano for his fine musicianship in Vieuxtemps' Violin Concerto op. 31; and Leonard Rose, cello soloist in the Boccherini Concerto and Bloch's "Schelomo."

Τοῦ τηλεφώνησα μὲ κάποιο δέος ὕστερ' ἀπὸ τόσα χρόνια ποὺ εἴχαμε νὰ ἰδωθοῦμε! Ἰδιότροπος ἦταν πάντα καὶ τώρα μοῦ εἶπαν πὼς ἔγινε ἀκόμα περισσότερο, ἀφοῦ καὶ γιὰ ἀκατάδεχτον ἀκόμα τὸν παρεξηγοῦν. Ἐν τούτοις τὸν συναντήσαμε μὲ τὴ γυναῖκα μου ἀμέσως, τὸ ἴδιο βράδυ. Χαρούμενος μας κάλεσε νὰ φᾶμε μαζί.

Ὅποιος ἀποκτᾶ φαλάκρα νέος, δὲν γερνᾶ καὶ ἀκόμα λιγώτερο ὅταν οἱ νότες ἔχουν αὐλακώσει ἀπὸ μικρὸ τὸ πρόσωπό του. Τὸ μεγάλο του κεφάλι μοῦ θυμίζει τὶς δυσκολίες ποὺ συνήντησε ὁ πατέρας μου ὅταν τὸν ἔβγαλε στὸν κόσμο! Δὲν ἄλλαξε λοιπὸν καθόλου! Οὔτε τὸ εὐγενικό χαμόγελο καὶ ἡ ἁρμονικὴ φωνή του ποὺ προσδίδουν τὴν κοινωνικὴ ἄνεση σ' αὐτὸ τὸ διανοητικὸ ἀγρίμι. Ἀλλὰ νευρικός. Ἀφάνταστα νευρικός. Οὔτε ἡ γλῶσσα του, οὔτε τὰ χέρια του σταμάτησαν νὰ κινοῦνται, ὄχι ὅμως γιὰ νὰ ἐκφράσουν κάτι τὸ συγκεκριμένο, ἀλλὰ περισσότερο γιὰ νὰ καλύψουν τὴ βαθειὰ συγκίνηση ποὺ ἀργότερα ὡμολόγησε καὶ ὁ ἴδιος πὼς αἰσθάνθηκε ὅταν ἀντίκρυσε στὸ πρόσωπό μας... Ἑλλάδα! Θὰ ἔλεγε κανεὶς πὼς αὐτὸς ὁ μεγάλος καλλιτέχνης μὲ τὴν μαγευτικὴ σὲ βαθὺ νόημα καὶ χάρη εὐγλωττία, δυσκολεύεται νὰ διατυπώσῃ τὸ τί αἰσθάνεται παρὰ μὲ τὴ μουσική. Αὐτὴ ποὺ διαμορφώνεται μέσα του γιὰ νὰ ξεσπᾶ στὶς πιὸ ἀπίθανες σὲ λεπτότητα, ἀλλὰ καὶ σὲ δύναμη λάμψεις, αὐτὴ ποὺ ξεπετιέται πότε ἀπὸ τὰ μακρυὰ του δάκτυλα, σὰν νἄναι κρυμμένη μέσα στὰ μανίκια τοῦ ταχυδακτυλουργοῦ, αὐτὴ ποὺ ἀνεμίζεται ἀπὸ τὶς κινήσεις τῶν «φτερῶν» του, αὐτὴ ποὺ πότε τὴν πλάθει, πότε τὴν μαστιγώνει καὶ πότε τὴν θωπεύει, αὐτὴ ἀποτελεῖ νομίζω τὴν μοναδικὴ πραγματικὴ ἐκδηλωτικὴ δυνατότητα τοῦ Μητροπούλου. Γιατί τὰ λόγια του μοιάζουν σὰν τὸ σφύριγμα ἐκείνου ποὺ φοβᾶται τὸ σκοτάδι καὶ ἔτσι, ἀντὶ νὰ ἐξηγοῦν, θολώνουν θελημένα καὶ καλύπτουν σκόπιμα τὴν διατύπωση τῆς σκέψεώς του. Ὅποιος κατάλαβε αὐτὴ τὴν ἀδυναμία του δὲν μπορεῖ παρὰ νὰ καταλάβῃ καὶ τὸ ὅτι ἡ νευρικότητά του, ὅταν συναντᾶ τὸν Ἕλληνα καὶ ἴσως ξαναθυμᾶται καὶ τὰ περασμένα χρόνια, δὲν εἶναι τίποτ' ἄλλο παρὰ συγκίνηση βαθειὰ γιὰ τὴν πατρίδα του. Καὶ ὅταν τὸν ζορίσῃ κανείς, ὁ πολύπλοκος αὐτὸς θαυματουργὸς στὸ τέλος τὸ ὁμολογεῖ σχεδὸν καὶ μιλεῖ μὲ πόνο, μὲ λαχτάρα γιὰ τὴν Ἑλλάδα.

Τὸ πόσο αὐτὸ τὸ συναίσθημα τοῦ Ἕλληνος κυριαρχεῖ μέσα του, τὸ ἔνοιωσα ἀκόμα περισσότερο ὅταν τὸν ξαναεῖδα ἔπειτα ἀπὸ τόσα χρόνια νὰ διευθύνῃ τὴν Φιλαρμονικὴ Ὀρχήστρα τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης στὸ Carnegie Hall. Ἐκεῖ ὁ Μητρόπουλος μοῦ παρουσιάσθηκε πραγματικὰ ὀλύμπιος. Θυμᾶμαι τὴν ἐποχὴ ποὺ ἡ ἰδιοφυΐα του ξεσποῦσε σὲ πολυπλευρη δημιουργικότητα καὶ ἀποτελοῦσε τὸν χείμαρρο τῆς νεανικῆς του ὁρμῆς, ἀλλὰ κάποτε τρόμαζε τὸν συντηρητικὸ θαυμαστή του! Σήμερα ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἔχει χειραφετηθῆ μὲ τέτοια ὑπεροχὴ ἀπὸ τὸ ὄργανο καὶ τὸν ἦχο, ὥστε νὰ χειρίζεται καὶ τὰ δύο σὰν «νενεφελημένης ἐτῆς», μὲ ὅλη τὴν κλασσικότητα, ἀλλὰ καὶ μὲ ὅλη τὴ βαθύτερη φιλοσοφικὴ ἔννοια ποὺ περιέχει τοῦ Διὸς αὐτὸς ὁ χαρακτηρισμός. Καὶ δὲν μπορεῖ κανεὶς παρὰ ν' ἀναγνωρίσῃ μέσα σ' αὐτὴν τὴν ἐξέλιξη τοῦ καλλιτέχνου καὶ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, τὸν «πλούσιο» Ἕλληνα, αὐτὸν ποὺ δημιούργησε τὴ σκέψη, αὐτὸν ποὺ παρέχει καὶ σήμερα ἀκόμα κάποια ἰδιαίτερη γεῦση σὲ ὅλην τὴν ἀνθρωπότητα, αὐτὸν ποὺ ὅταν γίνεται Μητρόπουλος στέκει σὰν πραγματικὸς ἑλληνικὸς οὐρανοξύστης ἐπάνω στὸ καλλιτεχνικὸ στερέωμα τῆς ἐποχῆς μας...

Θυμηθήκαμε μὲ βαθειὰ συγκίνηση τὰ περασμένα. Τὴν παληὰ Ἀθήνα ποὺ μᾶς ἀνέθρεψε, τὸν σύλλογο τῶν ἐρασιτεχνῶν τοῦ πρίγκιπος Νικολάου, ὅπου νομίζω πὼς παιδιὰ πρωτογνωρισθήκαμε. Κι' ἔπειτα τὸ Βερολῖνο, τὴν Ὄπερα καὶ τὸν ἀλησμόνητό μας Πάνο Ἀραβαντινό, ποὺ τώρα πιὰ δὲν ὑπάρχουν, καὶ ἀργότερα τοὺς ἀγῶνες στὴν Ἀθήνα.

Καὶ ξαναϊδωθήκαμε κάμποσες φορὲς μέσα στὴ ζαλιστικὴ πρωτεύουσα τῶν τόσων Πολιτειῶν καὶ τὰ ξανάπαμε — καὶ σὰν νὰ μὴν ἤθελε νὰ χωρισθοῦμε σὰ νἄθελε νὰ τὸν παίρναμε μαζί μας, νὰ ξαναζεσταθῆ στὸν ἥλιο ποὺ βγαίνει πίσω ἀπὸ τὸν Ὑμηττὸ καὶ καλοκυχτίζει τὶς κόρες τῆς Ἀκροπόλεως. Αὐτὸν ποὺ τόσες φορὲς ἐμπνέει τὶς ἀφθαστες μουσικὲς μυσταγωγίες ποὺ χαρίζει ὁ Μητρόπουλος στὸν κόσμο καὶ ποὺ μονάχα ὅταν σταματήσουν ἐπιτρέπουν στὸν ἀκροατὴ ν' ἀνασάνῃ. Μιλήσαμε γιὰ τὴ μουσικὴ στὴν Ἑλλάδα. Μ' ἐνθουσιασμὸ θέλει νὰ βοηθήσῃ. Ἔστειλε ὄργανα στὴν Ὀρχήστρα μας καὶ θέλει νὰ πρωτοστατήσῃ σὲ ὅ,τι μπορεῖ ἀπὸ μακρυά, ἀλλὰ καὶ νὰ ξαναδιευθύνῃ ὡς ἐπισκέπτης τὴν Ὀρχήστρα μας τῶν Ἀθηνῶν ποὺ αὐτὸς πραγματικὰ ἐδημιούργησε.

Δυστυχῶς ὅμως γιὰ τὴν πατρίδα μας, ὁ Μητρόπουλος μεγάλωσε πολὺ καὶ ἡ μόνιμη θέση του εἶναι στὴ Νέα Ὑόρκη, στὴν πρωτεύουσα τοῦ κόσμου ὅπου δοξάζει περισσότερο τὴν Ἑλλάδα καὶ ὄχι στὴν στενή μας Ἀθήνα. Τὴν ἀγάπη του γιὰ τὴν πατρίδα, τὴν δείχνουν ἄφθονες κρυφὲς σεμνὲς φιλανθρωπίες, τὴν δείχνουν οἱ διψασμένες ἐρωτήσεις του γιὰ τὸν τόπο, ἡ χαρά του γιὰ τὴν πρόοδο. Τὴν δείχνουν ἀκόμη ὁ βαθύτατός του σεβασμὸς καὶ ἡ ἀγάπη του πρὸς τοὺς Βασιλεῖς μας ποὺ συνήντησε στὴν Ν. Ὑόρκη.

Ἀλλὰ ὁ Μητρόπουλος εἶναι ὅπως εἴπαμε ἰδιότροπος. Ἀπὸ ὅποιον τὸν πλησιάζει ἀπαιτεῖται «κατανόησις» καὶ αὐτὴ δὲν δημιουργεῖται ἀπὸ μιὰ ἐπιπόλαιη ἐντύπωση τῆς στιγμῆς ποὺ θὰ τύχῃ ἴσως νὰ τὸν συναντήσῃ νὰ σφυρίζῃ στὸ σκοτάδι γιὰ νὰ κρύψῃ κάποιο δάκρυ τῆς μεγάλης νοσταλγίας.

ONE OF THE finest performances of Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony I've heard has been recorded by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic Symphony (Columbia 12 LP).

I liked especially the way the angular Greek maestro plumbs the emotional depths of the long and complex third movement.

The Fifth, most admired in this country of all of the composer's symphonies, is a work of great power and magnetism. If you don't have a good recording of it, try this one.

The music director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra gives valuable hints on

The making of a Conductor

Dimitri Mitropoulos at work on a score

The maestro in a characteristic pose

Time out for a moment of relaxation

From an interview with Dimitri Mitropoulos Secured by Rose Heylbut

THE CONDUCTOR appears to be a fortunate man, the one who has all the advantages. Unlike the soloist, who is in an exposed position and whose every mistake is immediately evident to the audience, the conductor performs with his back to the audience, and only the orchestra can really know what he is doing. He also has to use his hands (or his baton), certainly, but other people do the actual playing, and the blame for mistakes always goes to them. Yet it is the conductor who receives the applause at the end of a performance, like a general after a successful battle, and he even shares it with the soloist who, as everybody knows, had to spend long years of hard study and practice just to master the technique of his instrument.

Definitely, the rôle of the conductor looks attractive. It appears to be not only easy but gratifying, in a cowardly way, and if you add to that his opportunity to satisfy the natural human desire to be the "boss," it is not surprising that many young people ask what they must do to become conductors.

Actually, the conductor must have worked harder and learned more than any of the musicians he is leading. He must be able to perform at a professional level on at least one instrument, if only because that will give him the experience he must have as a performer. Naturally, a conductor who is a performer also, cannot practice being a conductor without an orchestra, and he has not even the right to be entrusted with an orchestra until he has proved himself as a performer. In other words, he has to prove his ability to re-create a work from beginning to end and to communicate it to an audience before he can hope to communicate it to an orchestra.

For that particular purpose any solo instrument will be valuable, although the piano offers extra advantages because with its polyphonic possibilities, which give experience in dealing with many voices and complicated rhythmic patterns as well as various sonorities, it is, in a way, a reduced orchestra, and it can also be helpful in learning scores. That is why so many conductors have the piano as their main instrument.

Does this mean that an accomplished instrumentalist, particularly a pianist, is equipped to become a conductor? Unfortunately not. A conductor has to deal with all the instruments of the orchestra. Therefore he must know about all those instruments, about their possibilities and their problems, and he should be able to play as many of them as possible.

I have spoken so far chiefly about the technical side of musical knowledge. Naturally, the conductor shares with the instrumental soloist the necessity of knowing not only the music of all composers, but their backgrounds as well; the cultures in which they lived, the literature of their times, their individual thinking, all the things which caused them to express themselves as they did. This knowledge is necessary before he can re-create their expressions adequately. And finally, he must know the art of musical composition, its history and its development, not only because this also is necessary for an understanding of the composers of the past, but because he has an obligation toward the composers of today, and he must have this knowledge as a basis on which to evaluate and select what is worthy of performance among those musical expressions which cannot yet have "stood the test of time."

Is the artist who has all this knowledge now ready to learn conducting, and will his success as a conductor be automatic? He is certainly ready to be respected as a professional musician, and he has many possibilities of contributing to the musical world in a useful way. However, a conductor must not only know music from all its aspects, he must know more music than anybody else. Orchestral repertoire includes the major works for all solo instruments as well as the tremendous and always growing list of purely orchestral works.

I have neglected to mention until now the mechanical part of conducting, the standard international gestures for starting an orchestra, indicating rhythms, cueing in sections, stopping the orchestra—those gestures which appear so easy to the audience because they are, in fact, extremely easy. They are the simplest part of a conductor's equipment, and they can be learned in half an hour. But that is not conducting! A conductor is a leader, and he must have the knowledge of psychology and the personal qualities which make a successful leader. He must be able to stand in the exposed position of an example before the musicians whose co-operation he needs. (Continued on Page 61)

His dedication must be evident to them, and his knowledge must be literally "at his finger tips." And he must be able to communicate it to them if he is to work with them successfully.

We find ourselves now before the aspects of conducting which cannot be taught, some of which cannot even be learned. To demonstrate this, I will try to give you a picture of what the conductor has to do. Naturally, he has first to learn the score, to analyze it, to know in advance exactly what he wants to express in every phrase. Then he has to teach that to his men and be able to draw it forth from them at the performance. The gestures and the means by which he conveys subtleties of thought and nuances must come naturally to him, and they will probably come in a different way to every conductor. In other words, each one must find his own way. This is something which cannot be taught. The artist who has all the knowledge and the personal qualities that a conductor needs will know instinctively what to do, and, with experience, he will soon become expert. Those personal qualities are more difficult to describe. A leader must have the ability to communicate to others in a way that will cause them to respond to him. This has to be inborn. It is not a technical process which can be either taught or discovered. The best conductors, I think, are those who have the coordinated ability to think music and convey it simultaneously through motions, by the intensity of their thought and by their establishing a rapport with their men. Those who have this gift will make conductors. Without it, one may become a fine scholar, a teacher, a musicologist, a composer—but never a good conductor.

It is evident from all this that I should not send the would-be conductor to a school of conducting. I will go further than that. I will advise him to forget entirely about conducting.

In the first place, one cannot deliberately become a conductor. Secondly, so few will have either the qualifications or the opportunity to conduct that to have that ambition will have the effect of frustrating and embittering a musician to the point where he will be prevented from being useful in any other kind of musical activity in which, without that ambition, he might have been outstanding. Finally, I would even question whether the ambition to be a conductor is artistically moral. Certainly it is not a musical ambition; it may be only a hidden lust for power, which is a devastating thing.

My advice to students, therefore, is to forget about conducting and concentrate on learning all there is to know about music. This will make certain that they will find useful and happy lives as musicians in any case, and also, if an opportunity to conduct should one day come to them, they will be ready for it.

Toscanini started as a 'cellist; others as violinists, pianists, etc. No one of the leading conductors started as a conductor, or with the ambition to conduct, or as a student of conducting. We made ourselves good musicians; we had proved ourselves as performers and learned all we could about music; and when chance brought us an opportunity to conduct, we were already equipped musicians, ready to develop our own conducting techniques through the experience of conducting. I don't believe there is any other way.

A desire to learn can only serve to make one useful; a desire to hold a position can destroy all possibility of being useful. I cannot emphasize this too much. Everyone must find his own niche in which he can be useful and happy. Not many conductors are needed, but good musicians are always needed; and it is a pity that some who could be excellent musicians are consumed and destroyed by the illness called "conductomania."

ΑΠΟ ΤΗΝ ΜΟΥΣΙΚΗ ΖΩΗ ΤΗΣ ΑΜΕΡΙΚΗΣ

ΣΤΗΝ ΝΕΑ ΥΟΡΚΗ

Μητρόπουλος — Μετροπόλιταν — Χορωδία Ρόμπερτ Σῶ — Συνέδριον Μουσικοκριτικῶν

ΥΠΟ ΤΟΥ κ. ΜΙΝ. ΔΟΥΝΙΑ

Β'

Στὴ Νέα Ὑόρκη ζωηρότατον ἐνδιαφέρον συνεκέντρωνε, βέβαια, ἡ φυσιογνωμία τοῦ Μητροπούλου. Τὸ Στέιτ Ντηπάρτμεντ ἀνέλαβε τὴν φροντίδα νὰ μᾶς φέρῃ σὲ ἐπαφή, ὅμως ἡ προσπάθεια δὲν ἐκαρποφόρησε. Ὁ μαέστρος ἦταν «ἀπησχολημένος». Εἶχα ἀντιληφθῇ ἐπὶ τόπου πόσο αὐτὸς ὁ ἄνθρωπος, ὁ τόσο πολυάσχολος καὶ ὑπερευαίσθητος εἶχε ταλαιπωρηθῇ ἀπὸ διαφόρους ἐντὸς καὶ ἐκτὸς τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης ὁμοεθνεῖς, καὶ δὲν τὸν παρεξηγοῦσα. Ἐν τούτοις, ἔνοιωσα κάποια ἀπογοήτευσι, γιατὶ νόμιζα πὼς οἱ φίλοι αὐτῆς τῆς στήλης θὰ περίμεναν μία ἔστω πρόχειρη σκιαγραφία τοῦ Ἕλληνος μουσικοῦ ἀπὸ προσωπική, ἄμεση πεῖρα μου. Ἡ τύχη ὅμως τὰ ἔφερε ἔτσι, ὥστε μέσα στὴν ἀπέραντη Νέα Ὑόρκη νὰ συναντηθοῦμε στὸ δρόμο! Τὸν βρῆκα φιλικώτατα διατεθειμένο, εὐγενικὸ καὶ ἡ χαρά μου ἦταν μεγάλη. Ἐγευματίσαμε μαζί, ἀνανεώσαμε τὴν παλαιὰ γνωριμία μας καὶ ἀνταλλάξαμε σκέψεις μέσα σὲ ἀτμόσφαιρα ἐγκαρδιότητος. Ἁπλός, ὁμιλητικώτατος, ὁ μαέστρος ὑπεγράμμιζε κάθε του φράσι μὲ πλατειές, γραφικώτατες χειρονομίες, πρᾶγμα φυσικὸ γιὰ ἕνα ἄνθρωπο τῆς μελέτης καὶ τῆς μοναξιᾶς, ποὺ τὸ ἔργον ὁλόκληρης ζωῆς τὸν ἀναγκάζει νὰ ἐκφράζῃ τὸν ἐσωτερικό του κόσμο περισσότερο μὲ τὰ χέρια, παρὰ μὲ τὸν λόγο.

Τὸ μεγάλο πάθος του εἶναι ἡ σύγχρονη μουσική, καὶ χάρις στὸ κῦρος τῆς προσωπικότητός του τὴν ἐπιβάλλει σ' ἕνα κοινὸ ποὺ ἐνδομύχως ἴσως δὲν τὴν ἐπιδοκιμάζει, ἀλλὰ οὔτε δυσανασχετεῖ, οὔτε διαμαρτύρεται. Ἔχει βεβαίως τοὺς ἐκλεκτούς καὶ τοὺς νέους μὲ τὸ μέρος του, ἰδίως τοὺς νέους συνθέτας ποὺ συνδέουν τὸ μέλλον τους μὲ τὴν ἐλπίδα πὼς περισσότεροι ἀπὸ τοὺς μαέστρους θὰ μιμηθοῦν τὸ παράδειγμά του. «Εἶναι γεγονός, μοῦ λέγει ὁ μαέστρος, πὼς ἀπὸ τὴν ἐποχὴ ποὺ ἄρχισα νὰ ἑρμηνεύω μοντέρνα μουσική, ἀκολουθοῦν τὸ παράδειγμά μου καὶ οἱ ἄλλοι».

Τοῦ ἀνέφερα τὰ σχετικὰ μὲ μιὰ πιθανὴ συναυλία τῆς Φιλαρμονικῆς τῆς Φιλαδελφείας στὴν Ἐπίδαυρο καὶ σχεδὸν πειραγμένος προσέθεσε πὼς θὰ ἦταν λυπηρὸ ἂν ἐρχόταν ὁ Ὄρμαντυ πρὶν ἀπὸ ἐκείνον στὴν Ἑλλάδα. Τὸν ἐρώτησα μήπως τὸ συμπέρασμά του ἐσήμαινε ὅτι σκέπτεται συντόμως νὰ μᾶς ἐπισκεφθῇ; Ἐσήκωσε τοὺς ὤμους καὶ μοῦ ἀνέφερε τὶς ἀνειλημμένες ὑποχρεώσεις του στὴν Ἰταλία καὶ Γερμανία τὸ προσεχὲς θέρος. Μὲ ἐνδιαφέρον ἐζήτησε πληροφορίες σχετικὰ μὲ τὴν μουσικὴ ζωὴ τῶν Ἀθηνῶν. Τοῦ ἐξήγησα ὅτι ἡ σημερινὴ Κρατικὴ Ὀρχήστρα εἶναι καλύτερη ἀπὸ ἐκείνην ποὺ ἤξευρε καὶ ὅτι ὑπὸ ὡρισμένες συνθῆκες προβάλλει τὸν καλύτερο ἑαυτό της ξεπερνώντας κάθε προσδοκία.

Ἡ ὑγεία του ἔχει ἀποκατασταθῇ τελείως, ἀλλοιῶς θὰ ἦταν ἀδύνατον νὰ ἀνταποκριθῇ στὸν βαρύτατο φόρτο ἐργασίας καὶ τὴν εὐθύνη τῆς προετοιμασίας καὶ ἐκτελέσεως τῶν κολοσσιαίων προγραμμάτων μὲ τὴν Φιλαρμονικὴ τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης. Ἡ ἀντοχή του στὶς δοκιμές, πολλὲς ἀπὸ τὶς ὁποῖες εἶχα τὸ εὐτύχημα νὰ παρακολουθήσω, εἶναι ἀπίστευτη. Πολλοὶ ἴσως νομίζουν ὅτι οἱ ἱκανότητες μιᾶς τόσο φημισμένης ὀρχήστρας εἶναι ἀπεριόριστες καὶ γοητευμένοι πρὸ τοῦ ἑτοίμου ἀποτελέσματος δὲν ἀντιλαμβάνονται πόση ἐργασία ἔχει προηγηθῇ. Κατὰ τὴν δοκιμὴ ἑνὸς πολυρρυθμικοῦ ἔργου τοῦ Μπόρις Μπλάχερ ἄκουσα τὸν Μητρόπουλο νὰ μετρᾷ μεγαλοφώνως ἐπὶ μίαν ὥραν κάθε μουσικὸ πόδα καὶ νὰ διακόπτῃ συνεχῶς τοὺς μουσικούς, διορθώνοντας κάθε μικρολεπτομέρεια. Ἐννοεῖται ἡ τερατώδης του μνήμη τοῦ ἐπιτρέπει νὰ διεξάγῃ καὶ τὶς δοκιμὲς ἀκόμη χωρὶς παρτιτούρα. Σπανίως μόνον ἐξαντλεῖται ἡ ὑπομονή του καὶ τότε ἡ ἀγανάκτησίς του ξεσπᾷ ξαφνικὰ σὰν θύελλα. Μὲ ἐκπλῆξι ὅμως παρετήρησα ὅτι οἱ μουσικοὶ ἀπτόητοι διατηροῦν τὴν ψυχραιμία τους, δὲν θίγονται οὔτε δυσανασχετοῦν, ἴσως γιατὶ ξέρουν πὼς ἡ ἔκρηξις δὲν εἶναι παρὰ ἕνα παροδικὸ μπουρίνι καὶ γνωρίζουν πρὸ παντὸς τὴν χρυσῆ καρδιὰ τοῦ ὀδηγοῦ των.

Ἐνῷ στὶς δοκιμὲς προσπαθεῖ νὰ ἐξοικονομῇ ἐνέργειες, τὴν ὥρα τῆς συναυλίας ἀφιερώνει καὶ τὶς τελευταῖες ἐφεδρικές του δυνάμεις στὴν ὑπηρεσία τῶν ἔργων. Δίδεται ὁλόκληρος στὴν ἑρμηνεία, ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ ἀπαιτήσεις του πρὸς τὴν ὀρχήστρα εἶναι μεγάλες. Ἂν καὶ πρόθυμος νὰ δώσῃ σαφῶς κάθε ἀττάκα, ἀρνεῖται νὰ ὑποδιαιρέσῃ τὸ μέτρον, περιοριζόμενος σὲ μιὰ τεχνικὴ ἐκφραστικῶν χειρονομιῶν, οἱ ὁποῖες γοητεύουν τὸ ἀκροατήριον, κρατοῦν ὅμως συχνὰ τοὺς μουσικοὺς τῆς ὀρχήστρας σὲ ἀγωνία. Ἡ σποραδικὴ ρυθμικὴ ἀσάφεια, ἀποτέλεσμα τῆς ἐλευθέρας χειρονομίας, ἀντισταθμίζεται ἐν τούτοις ἀπὸ τὴν ὑπέροχη ἐσωτερικὴ δύναμι τῆς ἑρμηνείας. Ἡ ρητορεία τῆς φραστικῆς διατυπώσεως ὁδηγεῖ τὴν ὀρχήστρα κυριολεκτικὰ σὲ ἠχοδυναμικὴ φρενίτιδα. Ἡ νευρικὴ ὑπερέντασις φθάνει τὸ ἀπόγειον στὰ σύγχρονα κυρίως ἔργα, ὅπου ὁ Μητρόπουλος εἶναι ἀσυναγώνιστος. Δημιουργίες, ὅπως ἡ Ἁρμονία τοῦ Σύμπαντος τοῦ Χίντεμιτ ἢ τὸ συμφωνικὸ ποίημα τοῦ Σαϊνμπεργκ «Πελλέας καὶ Μελισάνδη», ἔργα μᾶλλον ἀπρόσιτα καὶ ἀπροσπέλαστα ἀπὸ τὸ πολὺ κοινόν, ἐδόθηκαν μὲ τόσην ἐκρηκτικὴν ἔντασιν, ὥστε παρέσυραν τὸ ἀκροατήριο τοῦ «Κάρνεγκι Χώλλ» σὲ ἀπροσδόκητες ἐκδηλώσεις ἐνθουσιασμοῦ.

Ἀποσπάσματα ἀπὸ τὴν «Σύντομη Ζωὴ» καὶ τὸ «Τρίκωχο Καπέλλο» τοῦ Ντέ Φάλλια κατέδειξαν τὴν ἀπαράμιλλη δεξιοτεχνία τοῦ μαέστρου Μητροπούλου στὸν χειρισμὸ συναρπαστικῶν ρουμπάτι. Δὲν θὰ λησμονήσω ἐπίσης τὸ ἠχητικὸ παραλήρημα, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὴν τεχνικώτατη ἀπόδοσι τῆς ἀντιστικτικῆς πλοκῆς στὴν Εἰσαγωγὴ ἀπὸ τοὺς Ἀρχιτραγουδιστὰς τοῦ Βάγνερ. Ἀπὸ τὴν ἄλλη πλευρὰ ματαίως ἀναζητούσαμε στὴν Εἰσαγωγὴ τῶν Ἑβρίδων τοῦ Μέντελσον τὴν εἰκόνα τῆς μακαρίας γαλήνης, ποὺ μὲ τόση τρυφερότητα ζωγραφίζει ὁ εὐτυχισμένος συνθέτης. Ἀλλὰ ὁ νευρώδης καὶ ἀνήσυχος Ἕλλην ἴσως δὲν ἐγνώρισε ποτὲ τὴν γαλήνην...

Γιὰ τὴν ἐκτέλεσι τῆς «Μίσσα Σολέμνις» τοῦ Μπετόβεν εἶχαν διατεθῇ δύο μόνον πλήρεις δοκιμές. Ὁ συντονισμὸς τοῦ τεραστίου συγκροτήματος: ὀρχήστρας, χορωδίας καὶ σολίστ ἀπετέλεσε ἕνα ἀπίστευτο μαεστρικὸ κατόρθωμα. Ἐν τούτοις, δὲν ἦταν δυνατὸν κατὰ τὸ διάστημα τῆς βραχυτάτης προετοιμασίας νὰ λυθοῦν κατὰ τρόπον ἱκανοποιητικὸ τὰ προβλήματα τοῦ μεγαλόπνου, ἀλλὰ καὶ χαώδους ἔργου.

Ἡ συνάντησις μὲ τὸν Μητρόπουλο, τὸν ἄνθρωπο καὶ τὸν καλλιτέχνη, εἶναι ἕνα ἀπὸ ἐκεῖνα τὰ γεγονότα ποὺ μένουν ἀνεξίτηλα στὴ μνήμη. Σήμερα ὁ Ἕλλην μαέστρος εἶναι μία διεθνὴς μορφὴ καὶ τὸ ὄνομά του βρίσκεται στὰ στόματα ἑκατομμυρίων. Πάσχουμε ἀπὸ μυωπία ὅσοι ἀπὸ μᾶς ἐξακολουθοῦμε νὰ τὸν βλέπουμε μόνον ὡς Ἕλληνα, γιατὶ αὐτὸς τώρα πιά, πρὸς δόξαν τῆς μικρῆς μας χώρας, ἀνήκει στὴν μεγάλην ἀνθρωπότητα. Οὔτε ὀρθοφρονοῦμε ὅσοι τὸν κρίνουμε μὲ τὰ σταθμὰ τῶν καλῶν νοικοκυραίων, γιατὶ ὁ Μητρόπουλος δὲν εἶναι κοινὸς ἄνθρωπος. Σκέπτεται μὲ τὸν δικό του τρόπο μέσα σ' ἕνα κόσμο, ποὺ ἔχει ὁ ἴδιος κτίσει κάπου πολὺ ψηλὰ μακρυὰ ἀπὸ τὸν θόρυβο τῆς ἀγορᾶς. Καὶ ζῇ εὐτυχισμένος στὴν ὑπέροχη μοναξιά του.

Ἀπὸ τὸ πλῆθος τῶν μουσικῶν ἐκδηλώσεων τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης ἂς ἀναφέρω τουλάχιστον τὴν παράστασι τῆς ὄπερας τοῦ Μότσαρτ «Οἱ Γάμοι τοῦ Φίγκαρο» στὴν θρυλικὴ «Μετροπόλιταν». Ἤδη ἡ πρώτη ἐντύπωσις τῆς θαυμασίας αἰθούσης συναρπάζει τὸν ἐπισκέπτη. Ὁ θερμὸς συνδυασμὸς τοῦ κόκκινου βελούδου τῶν καθισμάτων μὲ τὸ μουντὸ χρυσάφι τῶν διακοσμήσεων, ποὺ καλύπτουν τὶς τέσσερες σειρὲς θεωρείων, ἀκτινοβολεῖ τὴν αἴγλη τοῦ παλαιοῦ, κάποιας γιορταστικῆς λαμπρότητος. Παρὰ τὸ τεράστιο ἄνοιγμα τῆς σκηνῆς καὶ τὶς ἀνάλογες διαστάσεις τῆς αἰθούσης, ὁ χῶρος διατηρεῖ τὴν ἐγκάρδια ἀτμόσφαιρα κομψοῦ, ἀριστοκρατικοῦ θεάτρου.

Μιὰ ματιὰ στὸ πρόγραμμα μᾶς πληροφορεῖ ὅτι διασημότητες ἀπὸ τὰ μεγαλύτερα κέντρα τοῦ παλαιοῦ καὶ νέου κόσμου ἔχουν ἐπιστρατευθῇ στὴ δύναμι τῆς φημισμένης αὐτῆς μουσικῆς σκηνῆς. Ἀνάμεσα σ' αὐτὲς παρουσιάζον[ται] γιὰ πρώτη φορὰ στὴν Μετροπόλιταν [ἡ] Ἐλβετὶς Λίζα Ντέλλα Κάζα στὸ ρ[όλο] τῆς Κοντέσσας καὶ ἡ περίφημη Ἰ[ταλίδα] ὑγκραντ Ζέεφριντ, τῆς ὅπερας τῆς Βι[έννης], ὡς Σουζάννα. Βαθυτάτη ἐντύπωσι μοῦ ἐπροξένησε καὶ ἡ παρακολούθησις μιᾶς δοκιμῆς τῆς μικτῆς χορωδίας τοῦ Ρόμπερτ Σῶ. Δὲν θὰ ἐπεκταθῶ στὴν καλλιτεχνικὴ ἐπίδοσι τοῦ συγκροτήματος — ἐμελετοῦσαν τὸ «Μαγκνίφικατ» τοῦ Μπάχ — γιατὶ ἡ φήμη μαέστρου καὶ χορωδῶν εἶναι διεθνῶς γνωστή. Ἀξίζει ἐν τούτοις ν' ἀναφέρω λίγα γιὰ τὴν ὀργάνωσι. Ἡ εἰσδοχὴ νέων μελῶν γίνεται κατόπιν διαγωνισμοῦ ὑπὸ ἐπιτροπῆς ἀπὸ τοὺς ἰδίους τοὺς χορωδούς. Παλαιὰ μέλη ἐπανεξετάζονται στὸ τέλος τριετοῦς θητείας. Ἔτσι συμβαίνει ὥστε νὰ μὴ συμπράττουν ἐδῶ ὑπερῆλικες φωνητικοὶ ἀνάπηροι. Καὶ εἶναι, ἀλήθεια, χαρὰ νὰ βλέπῃς καὶ ν' ἀκοῦς μιὰ χορωδία νέων ἀνθρώπων μὲ φρέσκες, καλλιεργημένες φωνές. Μιὰ συνομιλία μὲ τὸν διευθυντὴ Ρόμπερτ Σῶ ἦταν πολὺ διαφωτιστική. Τὸν ἐρώτησα πῶς ἐπιτυγχάνεται ἡ τακτικὴ παρουσία τῶν μελῶν στὶς δοκιμές. "Ἐλαβα μιὰ ἀπροσδόκητη ἀπάντησι: «Διὰ τῆς ἀποβολῆς»! Δύο ἀδικαιολόγητες ἀπουσίες ἑνὸς μέλους συνεπάγεται αὐτομάτως τὴν ἀπομάκρυσί του. Σπανιώτατα ὅμως γίνεται ἀνάγκη νὰ ληφθοῦν παρόμοια μέτρα. Τὰ μέλη εἶναι προσηλωμένα στὴ μουσική, ἔχουν ἀποκτήσει χορωδιακὴ συνείδησι, δὲν προσέρχονται γιὰ... χατῆρι τοῦ μαέστρου. Ἐτόλμησα νὰ ρωτήσω δειλὰ μήπως οἱ χορωδοὶ ἀμείβονται καὶ πάλι πῆρα τὴν ἐκπληκτικὴ ἀπάντησι ὅτι ἀπ' ἐναντίας πληρώνουν μηνιαῖο δικαίωμα συμμετοχῆς στὴ χορωδία. Σχόλια περιττεύουν.

Κλείνοντας σήμερα τὰ λίγα αὐτὰ σημειώματα γύρω ἀπὸ τὴν μουσικὴ ζωὴ τῆς Ἀμερικῆς, θὰ ἐπιθυμοῦσα νὰ δώσω τὸν λόγο στὰ ἀκαταμάχητα ἐπιχειρήματα τῶν ἀριθμῶν. Στὴν Νέα Ὑόρκη παρακολούθησα ἕνα τριήμερο συνέδριο μουσικοκριτικῶν, στὸ ὁποῖο εἶχα τὴν τιμὴ νὰ προσκληθῶ. Ἀντιπρόσωποι ἀπὸ διάφορες πολιτείες εἶχαν μαζευτῇ γιὰ νὰ συζητήσουν μὲ τοὺς συναδέλφους τῶν τῆς Νέας Ὑόρκης φλέγοντα πνευματικὰ ζητήματα τοῦ ἐπαγγέλματος. DUAL ROLE TAKEN BY MITROPOULOS

He Conducts Philharmonic Unit and Is Piano Soloist in 'Y' Chamber Concert

The Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble gave the second program of its third season Saturday night at the Lexington Avenue Y. M. and Y. W. H. A. Sixteen members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra appeared at this event, with Dimitri Mitropoulos participating as conductor and also as soloist.

The concert reached its climax with a magnificent performance of Chausson's familiar Concerto for Piano, Violin and String Quartet. Mr. Mitropoulos was at the keyboard for this work and Leon Temerson played the solo violin part. These principals in the unfoldment of the masterpiece were assisted by a quartet composed of William Nowinski and Bjorn Andreasson, violins; David Kates, violist, and Anthony Sophos, 'cellist.

This reviewer has heard many a presentation of this concerto over the years, but never one that could remotely compare to this in grandeur of conception, fiery intensity and clarity of architectural design. There was a demonic forcefulness in Mr. Mitropoulos' colorful, virtuosic treatment of the florid piano solo part that inspired his collegues to give of their utmost.

Mr. Temerson provided the sensuous, penetrating tone, and the rich lyricism asked of the violin soloist in this concerto, while the musicians of the assisting quartet furnished admirably balanced and effective support. Played thus, the Chausson opus took on new and unexpected beauties, as well as remarkable sweep and eloquence.

World Première of Octet

Feautured on the interesting schedule was the world premiere of the Octet by John Lessard, the last composition commissioned by the late Mrs. Alma Morgenthau. The performance was dedicated to her memory, and paid tribute to her fervent support of contemporary music.

The novelty was played by John Wummer, flutist; Stanley Drucker, clarinetist; Manuel Zegler, bassoonist; Joseph Singer and Ranier De Intinis, hornists; John Ware and James Smith, trumpeters, and Allen Ostrander, trombonist. It was a bleak, empty creation, which sounded rough and unwieldy, in spite of the care expended on it by Mr. Mitropoulos, who conducted it.

The program began with two seldom-presented, charming and melodious offerings. One of them was Boccherini's Quintet for Strings, Op. 37, No. 7, in C major, with the famous final Rondo, a movement made popular through a version of it for 'cello and piano. The other was the so-called Rossini Woodwind Quartet, No. 2, in G major. In reality, it is one of the five string quartets Rossini wrote at 16 that were expertly arranged for woodwinds by Friedrich Berr in Paris and first published in 1829. The quartet, No. 6, not published until 1929, was the only one originally written for woodwinds by Rossini. N. S.

MET' GUEST POST TO MITROPOULOS

Philharmonic 1954-55 Dates Permit Appearances of Conductor at Opera

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, will join the Metropolitan Opera Company during the 1954-55 season as a guest conductor.

The Metropolitan, which yesterday announced Mr. Mitropoulos' engagement, acknowledged "gratefully" the cooperation of the Philharmonic-Symphony in arranging the conductor's schedule for next season so as to leave time for mid-season appearances at the opera.

It was learned last night that the invitation to Mr. Mitropoulos was extended by the 'Met' about a fortnight ago.

Mr. Mitropoulos will lead the opening six weeks of concerts by the Philharmonic. His appearances at the opera will be scheduled between Dec. 1 and his return to the orchestra at the end of January.

'Salome' on Schedule

It was announced that Mr. Mitropoulos would conduct Strauss' "Salome" and one work still to be chosen. Although neither Metropolitan nor Philharmonic spokesmen would confirm it, informed observers believe the second opera will be "Un ballo in maschera."

Mr. Mitropoulos said yesterday: "I am very happy and honored to go to the Metropolitan, and I am glad that the Philharmonic and the Metropolitan managements were able to arrange both engagements so satisfactorily to all concerned."

Although the Metropolitan engagement will be his first formal appearance with an opera company here, Mr. Mitropoulos has had wide experience in operatic performance. He conducted opera in his native Athens and early in his career was an assistant conductor at the Berlin State Opera.

Enthusiasm for Opera

During his years with the Philharmonic Mr. Mitropoulos has demonstrated continuing enthusiasm for opera, particularly new or seldom-performed works. Operas that he has presented in concert form include Berg's "Wozzeck," "Erwartung" by Schoenberg, Ravel's "L'Heure espagnole" and Milhaud's "Les Choéphores" and "Christophe Colombe."

Mr. Mitropoulos opened the 1951 season of the Philharmonic with the first United States performance of Busceoni's "Arleäcchino." In 1947 and 1948 he conducted performances of "Madama Butterfly" and "Tosca" at Lewisohn Stadium. In 1946 he conducted Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du soldat" at Columbia University under the auspices of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

Mr. Mitropoulos in recent seasons has conducted many European performances of opera, and next spring is scheduled to lead Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West" at the Maggio Musicale in Florence. He also will conduct "Arlecchino" and "Elektra" at La Scala, Milan.

Mitropoulos to Conduct at Met

Dimitri Mitropoulos returned to the podium of the Philharmonic-Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall midst a double-take on news regarding his 1954-55 activities. Fast upon the announcement that he would be back for another season as musical director of the Philharmonic, came the news from the Metropolitan Opera management that the dynamic maestro would conduct "Salome" plus one other opera, "To Be Determined," before the Golden Horseshoe during '54-'55.

These appearances as guest conductor will mark the first time that he has directed opera in this country with full stage performance. In the announcement, the Met Opera expressed its gratitude for the Philharmonic Society's cooperation in arranging rehearsal and performance schedules.

Leading a program last night in which Rudolf Serkin was the star performer, Mitropoulos conducted three concertos for the pianist; the Mozart Piano Concerto in G Major, K. 453; the Strauss "Burleske," and the Beethoven Fourth Concerto in G Major.

The conductor, who appeared lean but rested after his midwinter vacation, was more relaxed on the podium than he has been at any previous time this season. Serkin on the other hand played brilliantly and excitingly, aided not only by his fingers but by his head, his lips, in fact, his whole body.

Having a nine-year-old as my escort prompted me to occupy a couple of vacant seats in the 12th row center instead of my usual place; with result that Serkin's super-dynamic vitality and his overflowing intensity was apparent to us in many ways other than his playing. All of which was quite fascinating as a personality study. It was apparent that the pianist felt the content of the music physically, mentally and emotionally to such an extent that he was about ready to jump out of his skin as well as jump his fingers to the piano.

This resulted in some moments during the Mozart which were too fierce for my Mozartian taste; but, on the other hand, Serkin generally produced a delightfully modulated tone, light but firm in texture, and performed with spirited verve and rhythmic precision.

During the "Burleske" he made full use of the work's many lyrical passages for the expression of beauty of phrasing and tone. The final sections may have been on the slow side but the overall picture was stunning, contrasting as he did, dramatically, the cantilena portions with the big, blustering sections. As indicated by the title, this youthful work, composed when Strauss was only 21, has some whimsical, tongue-in-cheek passages and these were done most ingratiatingly with pert subtlety. Well known as a masterful interpreter of Beethoven, Serkin appropriately followed the grandiose Strauss piece with one of the most beautifully lyric of all concertos, Beethoven's Fourth. Serkin was fervently applauded by the enthusiastic audience.

Mitropoulos in Dual Role

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who returns to the Philharmonic-Symphony podium this week, played a dual role Saturday night in the second of the Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble's three concerts at the 92d St. Y. M.-Y. W. H. A., conducting the first public performance of John Lessard's octet for flute, clarinet, bassoon, two trumpets, two horns and trombone and playing the piano part in Chausson's concert for piano, violin and string quartet. The Lessard work, commissioned by the late Alma Morgenthau, was presented as a memorial tribute; its four movements occupy fifteen minutes. Its musical ideas and their treatment revealed craftsmanship, if not always a sense of destination. The major interest was provided by the composer's skillful and sometimes pungent use of the resources of his instrumental medium. Leon Temerson, violinist, was Mr. Mitropoulos' fellow soloist in the Chausson work which followed the expertly played novelty. A String Quintet by Boccherini and a Woodwind Quartet by Rossini opened the program.

CONTRACT SIGNED BY MITROPOULOS

Conductor Is Re-engaged by Philharmonic as Musical Director of Orchestra

Dimitri Mitropoulos has been re-engaged as musical director of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonic's board of directors announced yesterday.

Mr. Mitropoulos, who made his first appearances with the Philharmonic during the 1940-41 season, was named musical director in 1951. At that time he was signed to a three-year contract, self-renewed annually after the 1953-54 season unless either party wished to terminate it.

The conductor made his first appearance in this country in 1936, with the Boston Symphony at the invitation of the late Serge Koussevitzky. From 1937 to 1949 he was musical director of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

The Philharmonic's board of directors also announced the return next season of Bruno Walter, George Szell and Guido Cantelli as guest conductors. This will be the fourth consecutive season in which Messrs. Mitropoulos, Walter, Szell and Cantelli have served as colleagues in conducting the Philharmonic's subscription concerts.

The 1954-55 season, which will be the orchestra's 113th, will open on Oct. 7 at Carnegie Hall. It will consist of twenty-eight consecutive weeks, ending April 17.

The season of regular subscription concerts will include two Thursday evening series of fourteen concerts each; the same number of Friday and Sunday afternoon concerts, and two Saturday evening series of eight concerts each.

Highlights will be three major choral works—the Brahms Requiem, conducted by Mr. Walter; the Verdi Requiem, conducted by Mr. Cantelli, and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony, conducted by Mr. Mitropoulos. The chorus for all three works will be

moine et chef d'orchestre

PAR GILLES LAMBERT

L'histoire d'un des plus grands musiciens du monde, qui gagne des millions et vit de la charité de ses amis.

DIMITRI Mitropoulos frappa plusieurs coups secs sur son pupitre et leva sa baguette. L'orchestre de la N.B.C. de New-York allait attaquer les premières mesures de la Septième symphonie de Beethoven. La salle, pleine à craquer de milliardaires, de vedettes, de virtuoses, suspendit son souffle.

Mais la baguette du maître demeurait en l'air, comme par vertu magique. Les archets des premiers violons, à l'horizontale, tremblaient... On attendit quelques secondes, et, à la stupeur générale, la baguette toujours levée, Mitropoulos quitta le pupitre et s'enfonça dans les coulisses. Jamais le Carnegie Hall n'avait connu tel scandale. Les spectateurs, stupéfaits, échangeaient leurs impressions. Un machiniste rendit la lumière.

Mais le maître, toujours aussi calme, son visage crispé dans un demi-sourire d'excuse, réapparut ; il regagna son pupitre, et dirigea la Septième symphonie avec un recueillement passionné. Après avoir reçu une des ovations les plus formidables de l'histoire de Carnegie Hall, il répondit aux questions des journalistes. L'un d'eux n'hésita pas à lui demander pourquoi il avait quitté un instant le pupitre avant les premières mesures. Mitropoulos le dévisagea un instant. Puis, sans relever l'indiscrétion de la question, il répondit d'une voix forte :

— J'avais oublié mon rosaire. Et, sans mon rosaire, je me sens trop loin de Dieu...

Dimitri Mitropoulos, un des plus grands chefs d'orchestre de l'époque actuelle, dont la réussite foudroyante éclipsa en quelques années celle du vieux maître Toscanini, traverse la gloire avec la sérénité d'un moine mendiant. Toute sa vie, il restera fidèle aux vœux qu'il a prononcés lorsqu'il n'était que Frère Dimitri dans un couvent du mont Athos. Il gagne des milliers de dollars par semaine, mais vit de la charité de ses amis. A New-York, il habite dans une pièce inconfortable meublée d'un lit de fer. Quand il se rend en Italie, il s'en remet à l'hospitalité de ses amis. Actuellement, il passe l'hiver en Toscane, dans un château où Giselle Selden Goth, une femme mécène, veille sur lui. C'est elle qui le réveille chaque matin vers 9 heures. Et, d'habitude, elle lui annonce que plusieurs visiteurs l'attendent déjà. Ce matin, c'est un dodécaphoniste — un compositeur de musique concrète — qui est venu de Sicile pour rencontrer le maître.

Il y a quinze jours, Giselle a dû éconduire un individu qui venait proposer un concerto où participaient des klaxons et des instruments de cuisine !

Mitropoulos fait entrer le dodécaphoniste dans la chambre, en pensant au jour où il imposa Prokofiev à une salle stupéfaite. C'était à Minneapolis, en 1936. Mitropoulos était à peu près inconnu en Amérique. L'affiche du concert annonçait un concerto, sans aucune indication. On crut à une erreur. La surprise redoubla lorsque Mitropoulos attaqua le concerto alors que le siège du soliste était encore vide.

Il dirigea les premières mesures, puis quitta rapidement le pupitre, s'assit au piano et joua lui-même la partition du soliste, déployant la même virtuosité au piano que celle qu'il avait montrée à la tête de l'orchestre.

Lorsque la salle eut croulé sous sous les applaudissements, Mitropoulos fit annoncer :

— Ce concerto est d'un Russe nommé Prokofiev.

Prokofiev fut célèbre en Amérique du jour au lendemain. Et il entraîna Mitropoulos dans sa gloire. A Athènes, un vieux commerçant déclara :

— Mon fils Dimitri a enfin réussi. Les deux autres ont de bons magasins, je peux mourir tranquille.

Dimitri lui avait donné beaucoup d'inquiétude. A quinze ans, il avait quitté Athènes et était entré dans le fameux monastère du mont Athos. Pendant trois ans, il vit seul dans une cellule, plaquant des accords sur un piano dont il joue déjà en virtuose. Pour sa famille, son départ est presque un soulagement. Il n'a pas la bosse des affaires ! Les moines du mont Athos, en revanche, se plaisent à souligner la facilité avec laquelle il s'adapte aux règles très strictes du couvent. Il se promène seul au bord de la mer dans les immenses jardins de la communauté, dans un des plus beaux décors du monde où tout animal femelle a été exclu. Au mont Athos, il n'y a ni poule ni chienne. Une seule femme, la Française Maryse Choisy, réussit à y pénétrer.

Mais, bientôt, le frère Dimitri met le couvent en révolution. Sa tête est pleine de musique. Il déniche un vieux piano et passe ses journées à jouer du Bach et du Chopin. Malheureusement, l'ordre arrive, brutal, d'interrompre ses exercices. Les moines se sont plaints du tintamarre inhabituel que Mitropoulos déchaîne sur les cimes du mont Athos.

— Vous arrivez à un tournant de votre vie, lui dit le père. Vous devez choisir entre le couvent et la musique.

Son choix est déjà fait. Il re-

prend la route d'Athènes. Sur le chemin surchauffé, bordé de cyprès noirs, il lui vient l'idée d'un troc sans précédent avec Dieu. Il a choisi la musique, mais il vivra comme un moine. Il fumait déjà, avant son entrée au couvent, près de cent cigarettes par jour. Il ne fumera plus. Il vivra seul sans autre fréquentation que celle des musiciens. Enfin, sacrifice suprême, il ne jouera jamais sa propre musique. Le sac de toile qu'il porte sur son dos est plein d'ébauches de symphonies. Il les mettra dans une cassette et il en jettera la clé. Et si, un jour, la tentation de jouer une de ses œuvres, ou de fumer, est trop forte, il demandera le secours de la petite médaille de la Vierge qu'il a emportée du couvent, avec son rosaire.

Jamais il n'a dirigé sans ce rosaire. Aujourd'hui, par la fébrilité avec laquelle il l'égrène, on devine qu'il se rebelle contre certains chefs, comme Stokowsky, ou certaines démonstrations de jazz. Quelquefois, le rosaire ne suffit pas à calmer sa fureur. A Boston, désespéré de ne pouvoir obtenir un effet de légèreté dans Debussy, il se précipite sur un des clarinettistes, et casse sa baguette sur son pupitre. Le musicien s'affole.

Alors Mitropoulos s'arrête : « Je vous demande pardon, Mister Grant », dit-il.

Il fit un jour répéter ses musiciens à six heures du matin, après les avoir conviés à se promener dans la campagne à l'aube, avec une répétition de la Deuxième suite de Daphnis et Chloé, de Ravel. Autre particularité : avant chaque répétition, il se fait remettre la liste des noms de ses musiciens. Aujourd'hui, il sait le prénom de tous les interprètes de Boston, Philadelphie, Minneapolis, et de la N.B.C. de New-York. Sa mémoire prodigieuse égale celle de Toscanini. Il connaît, sans la moindre défaillance et sans le secours d'aucune partition, un répertoire considérable.

Pourtant, une seule fois sa prodigieuse mémoire le lâcha. Il ne put retrouver les quelques mesures d'un mouvement dans l'ouverture de Coriolan, de Beethoven. Pendant deux mois, il se retira, annula tous ses engagements et resta cloîtré dans son appartement. La prière lui rendit toute la souplesse de l'esprit.

Un hasard lui fit obtenir un contrat pour l'Amérique. Il révéla Prokofiev et imposa les modernes. Depuis, les musiciens les plus renommés se sont succédé dans son appartement du 63e étage, le dernier étage d'un immeuble de New-York, occupé par un lit pliant, une bibliothèque et un piano. Avant d'habiter New-York, il refusa tous les appartements qu'on lui proposait à Minneapolis. Il choisit finalement un lit anonyme dans un des dortoirs de l'Université du Minnesota et vint là jusqu'au moment où sa renommée le transporta à New-York à la tête d'un des orchestres les plus célèbres du monde, celui de la N.B.C. Comme d'habitude, ce moine apporta avec lui une véritable révolution. Aux répétitions calmes succédèrent des discussions passionnées. Il fit recommencer cinquante fois dix me-

nuets de Brahms, trouva d'inimaginables comparaisons pour évoquer la grâce de la Pastorale, allant même jusqu'à jeter son mouchoir en l'air en disant aux violons :

— On ne doit pas vous entendre plus que cela.

Il renouvela le répertoire et conquit l'Amérique avec Debussy, Ravel, César Frank et les musiciens contemporains. Ses interprètes, exténués, firent vibrer le continent avec des violences inconnues.

Au milieu de ce brouhaha de la gloire, Mitropoulos collectionne les photos de l'Himalaya pour les murs de sa chambre. Il oppose toujours un non catégorique à toutes les visites qui ne sont pas professionnelles. Une chose, pourtant, le désole : l'habileté diabolique avec laquelle les femmes tournent les contrôles, submergeant les services d'ordre pour toucher l'habit du maître ou recevoir un autographe. Il engagea d'abord à Berlin un colosse autrichien qui lui servait de secrétaire et de garde du corps.

Plus tard, il remplaça son secrétaire par un sosie. A la fin des concerts, celui-ci sortait le premier et drainait des foules d'admiratrices. Le moine pouvait ainsi regagner tranquillement sa cellule, proche du Metropolitan Opera. Malheureusement, la tentation était trop forte pour le sosie ; il dut également s'en séparer.

La dernière fois que Mitropoulos dirigea à Paris, en 1938, on réclama à la Columbia Artist, qui tient le chef d'orchestre sous contrat, d'envoyer d'urgence sa biographie.

Le directeur de la Columbia s'aperçut alors que personne ne savait rien sur Mitropoulos. Il se rendit d'urgence dans la petite chambre. Mitropoulos était absent et son secrétaire alignait des chiffres en face d'une longue liste où l'on reconnaissait la longue écriture du maître.

— Voilà où passent les sommes astronomiques que vous me demandez ! s'écria le directeur de la Columbia en jetant un regard distrait sur le papier.

C'était la liste d'une centaine d'œuvres religieuses, d'associations musicales, de musiciens dans le besoin.

Son prodigieux détachement fait qu'un tiers de ses concerts sont bénévoles et qu'il ne garde, des millions que lui offre l'Amérique, que les dollars nécessaires à l'achat des œuvres de Platon, de saint Thomas et de saint Augustin. Il y a quelques semaines, à Florence, il n'avait même pas sur lui de quoi acheter une partition de Francis Poulenc.

Sa charité est telle, que, non content d'être sollicité, il propose encore son concours quand il le juge nécessaire. Il éprouva récemment une des peines les plus profondes de sa vie, quand on lui refusa de jouer avec Toscanini à Milan pour la reconstruction de la Scala. Il resta huit jours sans sortir de sa chambre. Il avait pensé que, mieux que la prière, la musique pouvait réunir tous les hommes de bonne volonté.

Serkin Featured at Piano With Philharmonic-Symphony

By PAUL AFFELDER

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who has just been signed for another year as musical director of the Philharmonic-Symphony, returned to the orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening after an absence of eight weeks.

But it was not Mr. Mitropoulos who was the center of attraction, though he did contribute immensely to the success of the program. For almost the entire concert was given over to three works for piano and orchestra, in which the soloist was that remarkable keyboard artist, Rudolf Serkin.

First of the three solo offerings and, for us, the best played, was Mozart's seldom-heard Piano Concerto No. 17 in G Major (K. 453). The opening movement had grace and smoothness of line; the long slow movement, with its interesting harmonic progressions, was made to sound deeply expressive, and the final allegretto with variations romped along in fine fashion.

Not only was the solo part performed with impeccable taste and fluency, but the orchestral accompaniment was a model of delicacy and careful balance.

Another composition which is not presented frequently hereabouts is the "Burleske" for Piano and Orchestra which the late Richard Strauss wrote when he was only 21. This is light, frothy, unashamedly romantic music with more than a touch of the Viennese spirit running through its pages.

Waltz Lilt Lacking

Messrs. Serkin and Mitropoulos gave it all the lightness, frothiness and romanticism it required—perhaps even a little too much of the last—but there was none of the lilt of the Viennese waltz in their reading last night.

It needs this added bounce and underlying rhythmic pulse to keep it in motion and to prevent it from dragging and becoming too long-winded. Too much lingering over the lovely melodic passages, mostly by the pianist, kept this from being as great a performance as it might have been.

Finally, there was Beethoven's wonderful Concerto No. 4 in G Major—for one listener, at least, the greatest of all the master's works for piano and orchestra. Mr. Serkin has long been a specialist at interpreting Beethoven concerti, and his delivery of this one last evening was deeply perceptive.

We found him romanticizing rather more freely in the first movement than he has on previous occasions, yet everywhere he displayed excellent taste and a fine feeling for proportion. The slow movement was a dramatic study in contrasts, as it should be, and the final rondo was marked by brilliant glitter and proper lightness of touch.

At its conclusion, there was a long ovation for soloist, conductor and orchestra, all of whom more than earned it for a grand evening of music-making.

To open the concert, Mr. Mitropoulos conducted a sparkling performance of Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Our only objection to it was the use of the involved concert ending provided for it by Ferruccio Busoni. Simpler, more appropriate endings have been devised by others.

Serkin Unforgettable At Carnegie Keyboard

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Dimitri Mitropoulos and Rudolf Serkin teamed up last night for one of the Philharmonic's most unforgettable concerts of the season.

Returning after a short vacation, the Philharmonic director was in excellent form, conducting with the vigor, intensity and command of style that have long endeared him to those who like a combination of art and excitement in their music.

Mr. Serkin, for his part, played the piano in much the same vein. Indeed, he played quite a bit of piano last night, being called on for three solo appearances on a program of four numbers.

Mozart Openers.

The first half of the bill went to Mozart. Mr. Mitropoulos began with a superlative reading of the overture to "The Abduction from the Seraglio"—a reading that breathed life and poetry and comedy all through.

Then Mr. Serkin emerged for his first assignment—the G Major Concerto (K. 453). That went like a dream. It was beautiful as sound and even more beautiful for the implications of that sound. There was no hurry; rather a relished lingering over every note.

If Mr. Serkin was completely in the Mozart frame, utterly at one with the idiom and design of the little master, so was Mr. Mitropoulos. The accompaniment was the answer to every pianist's prayer—and every composer's for that matter—it was aware of the soloist at all times—at once friendly and competitive to the greater glory of both.

Supreme Artist.

Mr. Serkin returned for Strauss' "Burleske" and Beethoven's G Major Concerto, No. 4. Again he was the supreme artist, in control of all the factors going into an authentic and stirring exhibition of interpretive art at its best.

There was brilliance and the headlong sweep of youthful adventure to the Strauss reading, and the Beethoven concerto unreeled in a wealth of lyricism set off by moments of towering drama.

Soloist and conductor were worthy of one another at last night's Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall—and both were distinctly worthy of the composers whose music they so nobly discoursed.

JANIS IS SOLOIST AT PHILHARMONIC

Young American Pianist Plays Rachmaninoff Concerto — Mennin Symphony Heard

Byron Janis was the soloist on the Saturday evening program of the Philharmonic-Symphony, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. The talented young American pianist played Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 3 in D minor and made a gallant try, but at this stage he lacks the drive and authority to handle such a difficult work. Sometimes his playing actually sounded apologetic, with the left hand either inaudible or close to it.

Peter Mennin's Symphony No. 3 was the other large work on the program. It is an imposing score, brilliantly orchestrated, with constant, pulsating rhythms. Melodically, it does not have much to say, but into its composition has gone an enormous degree of technique allied to an uncompromising probity. This remains one of the best contemporary American symphonies, especially as heard with the flair and excitement that Mr. Mitropoulos brought to it.

A Bach suite, arranged by Arthur Honegger, opened the program and Kodaly's "Galanta Dances" closed it. H. C. S.

Philharmonic Concert:

Serkin Piano Artistry Hailed

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ONE of the most extraordinary demonstrations of consummate artistry in piano playing took place in Carnegie Hall last night. Rudolf Serkin performed three concertos with Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony.

His playing was so magnificent that it all but eclipsed the return of Mitropoulos and his part in the evening's superior music-making.

What made Serkin's performances remarkable was his absorption in the music and his complete identity with the style of each composer. Mozart's G major, K. 453, Strauss's "Burleske" and Beethoven's Fourth Concerto offered plenty of contrasts.

Under Serkin's magical fingers, the music came alive in the most dynamic and persuasive fashion. The brilliance of the virtuoso and the poetry of the artist blended in striking proportion.

Of the three works, the Strauss was the least well known, the Beethoven the best. After a beautifully posed and articulate performance of the Mozart, Serkin literally jumped into the Strauss like the fiery virtuoso he can be. His incredible execution of its fanciful pages was a treat in itself.

There followed, nevertheless, an interpretation of the Beethoven that was treasurable for its balance of poetry and drama. It made a perfect culmination to a most memorable evening.

The program began with Mozart's overture to "The Abduction From the Seraglio," its single purely orchestral item.

Serkin and Philharmonic Heard In Program Led by Mitropoulos

Pianist Plays Concertos by Beethoven and Mozart in Carnegie Hall Event

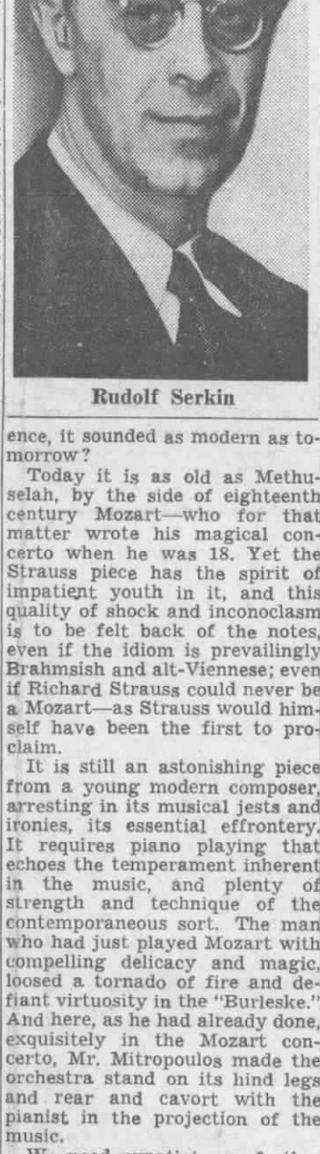
Overture to the Abduction From the Seraglio: Piano Concerto in G (K. 453) ..... Mozart
Burleske ..... Strauss
Piano Concerto No. 4 ..... Beethoven

By OLIN DOWNES



From one point of view, the program of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos, was disproportionate. It was disproportionate especially in the fact that Mr. Mitropoulos' performance of the Mozart Overture to the "Abduction from the Seraglio" was of such superlative quality, so perfectly and joyously in the spirit of Mozart, that one would fain have had more such performances by the orchestra alone than thep rogram permitted. But essentially this was a soloist's concert, in which the orchestra played an important but subsidiary part, and the piano stole the show.

The compensation was that the soloist was Rudolf Serkin, that he played three wonderful compositions for piano and orchestra, and that we had never heard him play so greatly.

The Mozart concerto that he chose is one of the most charming of that master's works in the form, and it would hardly be possible to over praise the art of Mr. Serkin's interpretation, which was, to our mind, as nearly the ultimate of sovereign beauty and simplicity that one could expect a human performance to be. The singing on the keyboard, the precision and nuance of each measure were things to cherish. And with all this there was no false delicacy, no mannered elegance, no prettiness or lack of virility. The playing was classic as it was beautiful.

Furthermore, true to Mr. Serkin's own nature and ideals, it fell upon the ears simply as a revelation of Mozart in very essence, and never as the egotistical display of a virtuoso. Mr. Serkin, playing with everything that was in him of skill and sensitivity and feeling, concentrated everyone upon the music and not upon himself. A lifetime of thinking, feeling and musician's experience went into that achievement, which no lesser qualities than Mr. Serkin's as a musician and no lesser experience than his could have achieved.

He turned from this to a bravura performance of the astonishing piece for piano and orchestra that Richard Strauss composed in 1885, when he was 21. We heard this piece for the first time in student days in Boston, and remember the thrill it gave us by what was then its modernity and audacity, its sardonic and waggish mood. Can it be believed that then undoubtedly to a majority in the audience, it sounded as modern as tomorrow?

Rudolf Serkin

Today it is as old as Methuselah, by the side of eighteenth century Mozart—who for that matter wrote his magical concerto when he was 18. Yet the Strauss piece has the spirit of impatient youth in it, and this quality of shock and inconoclasm is to be felt back of the notes, even if the idiom is prevailingly Brahmsish and alt-Viennese; even if Richard Strauss could never be a Mozart—as Strauss would himself have been the first to proclaim.

It is still an astonishing piece from a young modern composer, arresting in its musical jests and ironies, its essential effrontery. It requires piano playing that echoes the temperament inherent in the music, and plenty of strength and technique of the contemporaneous sort. The man who had just played Mozart with compelling delicacy and magic, loosed a tornado of fire and defiant virtuosity in the "Burleske." And here, as he had already done, exquisitely in the Mozart concerto, Mr. Mitropoulos made the orchestra stand on its hind legs and rear and cavort with the pianist in the projection of the music.

We need expatiate no further upon Mr. Serkin's achievement in saying that he played the concerto that is unque among all Beethoven's compositions for the piano, and all concertos written by all composers for the piano and orchestra with the same adequacy and intimacy with its innermost qualities that he had already displayed in Strauss and Mozart.

Mr. Serkin was applauded, hurrahed and cheered after each performance. The audience also recognized the wholly admirable part that M. Mitropoulos, conducting with and without the soloist, had contributed to the evening.

Janis, Mennin With Philharmonic

Two young Americans were represented on Saturday night's Philharmonic-Symphony program in Carnegie Hall. Byron Janis, pianist, played the third Rachmaninoff Concerto, in D Minor, and Peter Mennin's Third Symphony was performed, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting.

The remarkable pianistic abilities of Janis have been locally demonstrated on previous occasions and they were again manifested in the difficult Rachmaninoff work. This piece is filled with romantic nostalgia expressed through melodies which the young artist played with many shadings of color and feeling, and always with sympathy.

His tone in these lyric passages had a clear, cool quality which was pleasant to hear but which lacked both the warmth and richness needed to give the music its full due.

Mennin's Third Symphony

Mennin's Third Symphony, on the other hand, is a work of extraordinary maturity for a young composer who was only 23 when he finished this piece, first performed by the Philharmonic in 1946. Since this time Mennin has completed three more symphonies, the most recent one, a commission from the Louisville Symphony and played in this latter city during November, '53. There is no doubt that the composer's preoccupation with the symphonic form is justified by his works. The third symphony is music of continuing pulsating rhythmic momentum in its first and last movements, less vigorous, and compelling in its second movement, but significant here also. There is a driving persistence in the score, a sense of inevitability in its architectural building which fascinates the ear as well as compels the attention by its content.

It is also brilliantly scored with the music's polyphonic texture wedded to its instrumentation in a way that heightens the cumulative intensity at every climactic point. Mitropoulos played the piece with a drive and high imagination which dramatized its excellence.

With Mitropoulos at Carnegie

Byron Janis

By MILES KASTENDIECK

MITROPOULOS featured the Rachmaninoff Third Piano Concerto with Byron Janis as soloist in the Philharmonic Symphony's weekend concerts in Carnegie Hall.

The young pianist definitely had the work in his fingers, an accomplishment in itself, but his Saturday night performance suggested that he had not quite caught the pulse of the music.

This is a tricky concerto. It calls for an understanding sensitivity as well as virtuoso brilliance. More of the former than the latter came forth in Janis's performance. It was a matter of more drive. To his credit he clicked about the middle of the last movement, winning the plaudits of the audience thereby.

What showed up otherwise in his playing was a tendency to over-emphasize the melodic line. This often produced a lack of balance between his two hands.

Perhaps Mitropoulos's soft-pedaling of some of the orchestral passages influenced him. Once on keel, both the concerto and performance fared much better.

Mennin's Third Symphony was included in the Saturday program. A rehearing did not ingratiate the listener in its favor. The music sounds both earthbound and time-marking in spite of its rhythmic qualities.

An orchestration of Honegger's selection of movements from Bach's French Suites opened and Kodaly's "Dances of Galanta" closed the program.

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Saturday night was American artists' night along the local musical front.

Up at Carnegie Hall Pennsylvania offered two of its most gifted sons as part of the Philharmonic program conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos. Peter Mennin, of Erie was billed with his brilliant Third Symphony.

As soloist the Saturday—and Sunday—program featured young Byron Janis of Pittsburgh in one of the most dramatic readings in years of Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto.

Meanwhile two of New York's boroughs were doing themselves proud in a "Rigoletto" cast at the Metropolitan headed by Roberta Peters, Richard Tucker and Robert Merrill.

Stirring Score.

Mr. Mennin's stirring score belongs with a small sheaf of American symphonies that will probably remain in the perennial repertory. It is strong, appealing and bursting with a sense of go.

I would put the last movement—a sustained span of broad rhythmic drive—with the three most exciting movements in American symphonic writing. Mr. Mitropoulos made it all sound alive and fresh—as if had been born in the tang of the American outdoors.

I caught Mr. Janis, superb reading of the Rachmaninoff concerto at both the Saturday and Sunday concerts. There were well-deserved cheers at both for the 25-year-old virtuoso.

It was playing in the great tradition of Hofmann, Horowitz and Rachmaninoff himself—full of magnificent sound and that strange keyboard sorcery that is art and poetry and a little frenzy too.

The Philharmonic

By Jay S. Harrison

One masterpiece of the eighteenth century and three of the twentieth were the substance of last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert, under Dimitri Mitropoulos' direction, at Carnegie Hall. The evening began with Haydn's rarely heard Symphony No. 80, in D minor, and continued with Copland's "Appalachian Spring," Debussy's "Images" for orchestra, ("Gigues," "Iberia" and "Rondes de Printempts), and Ravel's "Alborado del Grazioso." Through it all, Mr. Mitropoulos and his men were in snappy form, and they made of the solo-less night an occasion, for the most, of joyous ensemble pleasures.

Not the least of these were provided in the Debussy trilogy, and, in addition, the performances revealed anew that Debussy, of all the masters entrenched in the repertoire, is the most amenable to a highly personal treatment. No two musicians, in my experience, deal with him in the same way, nor, paradoxical as it may seem, does there even appear to be a standard way of reading his music. Each conductor feels him differently, sees his colors in a different light and makes them shimmer in a different way. Also he is phrased by no two people alike. And as a result, what emerges in performance is something ever new, something fresh, untouched and unfamiliar.

As Mr. Mitropoulos approaches him, Debussy loses a quantity of his sensuality only to have it replaced by a kind of burning excitement that is, for all its intensity, controlled and non-hysterical. Sparkle it does not, nor is it luminous in the usual way. What it has is backbone and a firm shape. It is not allowed tos prawl, grow sticky or bog down in the luxuriousness of its own fantastic texture. It is kept on the move, kept active and headed forward, and though in the process it loses something of its vaporous, perfumed beauty, Mr. Mitropoulos' substitutions, tasteful and impressive, are never less than of benefit to the music.

Mr. Copland's remarkable work was presented in an equally remarkable performance. "Appalachian Spring," though scarcely ten years old, is already a reliable friend and a dear one. Its tunes are right, its rhythms bouncy. And its sentiments billow and surge at every turn. Mr. Mitropoulos, in his best twentieth century manner, made the work restless when that state was desired and gently passive when repose was all the need. Much the same might be said of the Haydn symphony which, as opposed to the conductor's usual breathless reading of similar scores, was sanded to perfection with a sure and steady hand.

The Philharmonic

Saturday night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert, directed by Dimitri Mitropoulos at Carnegie Hall, gave repeat performances of Haydn's Symphony No. 80 in D Minor and Debussy's "Iberia," and included the recently rediscovered Haydn "Overture for an English Opera." James MacInnes, young Minnesota-born pianist, made his debut with the orchestra, playing the Mendelssohn Concerto No. 1 in G Minor and, after the intermission, the Schoenberg Piano Concerto, Opus 42, which was receiving its first performance with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society.

Mr. MacInnes came through in fine style with a formidable debut assignment. It would be difficult to determine whether the air of classic freshness which characterized Mr. Mitropoulos' reading of the Haydn Symphony and the performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto by orchestra and soloist alike was equally present in the Schoenberg, for this concerto, like most of Schoenberg's music, does not easily yield itself on first hearing. One would wish to search further among its rather miasmic sensations to determine the details of expressive content. That it has a strong and shapely contour is immediately apparent, as was the high technical competence of its performance and the serious thought with which it had been approached.

Mr. MacInnes is not a musician of the bravura style, nor a Romantic. His piano sound manages to be bright and tensile without lapsing into hardness. It is strong, too, and capable of a cool, airy sort of utterance that rises easily above the orchestra. Whether the degree of understatement the pianist employs would be equally admissible in the entire repertoire is another question. In the Mendelssohn, it was refreshing and well buoyed up by a lilting sense of rhythm. It may have thinned down the Schoenber a bit, but this also would be hard to know on first hearing. Suffice it to say that the performance of this latter work was firm, devoted and keenly intelligent. L. T.

Mitropoulos Leads Strauss Concert

While the domestic life of Richard Strauss by reputation was far from a bed of roses, it did inspire a 40-minute "Symphonia Domestica," which had its world premiere 50 years ago in Carnegie Hall. In commemoration of the event the work returned there last night for a performance by the Philharmonic-Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Also on this all-Strauss program were excerpts from three operas which were composed much later than the symphonic poem, The short bombastic opening prelude was from Act III of "Arabella" which dates from 1933. A "Symphonic Fantasy" from "Die Frau ohne Schatten," first performed in 1919, had been arranged by the composer from original score. Three symphonic interludes from "Intermezzo" completed in 1925, brought us to the intermission.

All of these were interesting to hear because of the infrequent opportunity to do so. Though there were sections of interest and beauty throughout, on the whole, the excerpts were not too satisfactory considered as orchestral works. The "Symphonic Fantasy" was disjointed and grandiose without saying much. The "Interludes" were pleasant but not too significant.

"Symphonia Domestica" Sunday

By comparison with the previously performed music, the "Symphonia Domestica" seemed superbly integrated and inspired. Mitropoulos conducted it with his usual flair from this type of flamboyant piece and it came off in great style. Not usually considered one of Strauss' most significant works, it, nonetheless, contains much beauty and a kind of piquant folksy quality which is appealing.

Sunday's concert by the Philharmonic will again be all-Strauss with the same program repeated except that "Festival Prelude, op. 61, for Orchestra and Organ" will replace the excerpts from "Intermezzo."

All-Strauss Program Thursday

In commemoration of Richard Strauss' first visit to the United States 50 years ago, Dimitri Mitropoulos will conduct three all-Strauss programs during his coming week with the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Mitropoulos will include the "Symphonia Domestica" which had its world premiere in this country in 1904 with an orchestra known as the Wotzler Symphony. Strauss conducted the work which was the subject of considerable comment because the programmatic character of the piece was supposed to have been inspired by incidents in the composer's own life. His wife accompanied him on the trip.

Strauss, also on this visit, scandalized both the press and general public by conducting two afternoon concerts in Wanamaker's department store in New York. During this era John Wanamaker spent hundreds of thousands of dollars both in New York and Philadelphia for free concerts and musical entertainment.

In addition to the "Symphonia Domestica," Mitropoulos has chosen three excerpts from Strauss' later operas for the pair of programs in Carnegie Hall Thursday at 8:45 and Friday at 2:30. These are the Prelude to Act III from "Arabella"; the Symphonic Fantasy from "Die Frau Ohne Schatten," and excerpts from "Intermezzo." Strauss himself prepared the Symphonic Fantasy from the opera.

Because of the tremendous expense of preparation and production of these works, there has been little opportunity to hear them in this country; therefore these orchestral performances have particular interest.

SCHOENBERG WORK FOR PIANO IS HEARD

Arnold Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, which was composed in 1942, received its first performance by the Philharmonic-Symphony on Saturday evening in Carnegie Hall. James MacInnes, a young American pianist, made his debut with the orchestra on this occasion, and also played Mendelssohn's G minor concerto. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted.

The Schoenberg concerto is twelve-tone. Like most of his works in that genre, it is highly dissonant, expressionistic, plotted like an architect's blueprint and uncompromising in the extreme. Some of the orchestral sounds are fascinating. The composer created virtually a new language in his mature orchestral works, and this concerto is full of effects that—strange as they are—make musical and emotional sense, whether or not one agrees with the composer's basic philosophy.

Many hearings will be necessary to fix the plan and organization of the work in one's mind. But one hopes that those hearings will be a little more expert than that offered by Mr. MacInnes. With all the good intentions in the world, he was unable to capture the delicacy of the solo writing. His technique is rather crude, and his performance of the Mendelssohn cruelly laid bare a lack of pianistic discipline. Power there was in plenty; but refinement, dexterity, nuance—these were missing.

Mr. Mitropoulos opened the program with a rather heavy readings of Haydn's Overture for an English Opera and the Symphony No. 80 in D minor. Debussy's "Iberia" concluded the evening.

MITROPOULOS BRINGS NEW TOUCH TO SUITE

The striking part of last evening's concert at Carnegie Hall by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony was Mr. Mitropoulos' reading of the Copland ballet suite, "Appalachian Spring."

Familiar as this work has become to concertgoers, it was a fresh delight to hear Mr. Mitropoulos' skillful evocation of the music. The conductor managed with great adroitness to project the cheerful, energetic, somewhat brash essence of the score.

It was clear that Mr. Mitropoulos as an interpreter felt a close affinity to the music and to its composer's creative turn of mind. He conducted as if he believed in the music, enjoyed it and wished his listeners to do so too.

Conductor and orchestra conveyed with great dexterity the colorful panorama of Debussy's "Iberia." In Ravel's "Alborado del Gracioso," the performers also found a work enormously congenial.

Their least impressive showing was in the Haydn Symphony No. 80, in D Minor, which opened last evening's program. It was an odd reading of the work, full of nervous energy but curiously lacking in power. The serenity and repose so prominent in Haydn's music were little in evidence last evening, Mr. Mitropoulos, so at home in music of our own century, seemed perplexed by that of Haydn. J. B.

Mitropoulos Shines In Great Strauss Bill

By MILES KASTENDIECK

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS outdid himself in a Richard Strauss program with the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night.

Since the "Symphonia Domestica" was included, the occasion became the anniversary celebration. Strauss conducted its world premiere in Carnegie Hall almost a half century ago on March 21, 1904.

Fifty years have in no way dimmed the orchestral virtuosity or the essential quality of this mussic.

Sttrauss's original intention of lettiing it rest on its merits of symphonic development is perhaps even more to the point todaay than the picture of domestic life somewhat literally trannslated into the program notee prepared for its English prenmiere in 1905.

WVith Mitropoulos attuned to this work and the Philharmonic playying for all its worth—monments like these prove how supeerb an orchestra it is—the perfformance of the symphony crowwned an evening which sustainned interest remarkably well.

The program opened with the prelude to act III of "Arabell." For all its brevity it revealed the Strauss idiom characteristically.

There was much more in the fantasy from "Die Frau Ohne Schatten." Here soaring melody with brass commentary so essentially Straussian found the composer true to his singular individuality. merely projecting it in more mature form.

Both works were new to the Philharmonic repertory.

The "Three Symphonic Interludes" from "Intermezzo" offered pleasing variety.

Throughout the concert it was possible to marvel at Strauss's mastery both in writing and in orchestration. The former certainly inspired Mitropoulos, the latter gave the orchestra a field day. Everything conspired to make the concert stimulating, one of the best of the Philharmonic season.

STRAUSS PROGRAM AT PHILHARMONIC

Mitropoulos Leads Prelude to 'Arabella,' Excerpts From the Opera, 'Intermezzo'

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. At Carnegie Hall. Strauss program: Prelude to Act III, Arabella; Symphonic Fantasy, Die Frau ohne Schatten; excerpts from the opera, Intermezzo; Sinfonia domestica.

By OLIN DOWNES

The performance of the "Domestica" Symphony, indeed all of the performances of the program of music by Richard Strauss that Mr. Mitropoulos presented last night in Carnegie Hall with the Philharmonic-Symphony, will be famous in the annals of this Society. This was a triumph of perceptive and creative interpretation that realized, to our mind, the uttermost imagining of the composer. We had not realized before the exceptional musical value of this program-symphony or heard it speak so warmly and poetically, with such strength of structure, such laughter and tenderness and humanity.

The orchestra, aflame with the music, sang gloriously in every melodic strand and tone-color. The balances were of phenomenal sensitiveness and clarity. The score is Mr. Mitropoulos' joy and plaything. He played exultantly with it, and had the last note clearly in view when the first measure sounded. In the mass and the detail the performance was complete, and held one absorbed through the forty minutes of its single movement.

It is plethoric with music and a twentieth too long. Yet the power of the form and the logic of its growth are such that the listener is fascinated and absorbed by its every measure. We do not offer these remarks as personal reflections so much as we merely record what Mr. Mitropoulos showed us. This was music-making of the most vigorous and glowing sort. Those who heard it and who will hear it at other Philharmonic-Symphony concerts of this week are infinitely Mr. Mitropoulos' debtors for the privilege.

The concert had other impressive features. There were first New York performances of music from three operas of Strauss that have not been heard in this country—"Die Frau ohne Schatten" of 1919, "Intermezzo" of 1925 and "Arabella" of 1933. The lustiest and richest of these excerpts proved to be the Prelude from "Arabella." It is lutspiel music—exuberant, instrumentated with the fullness and brilliancy native to this composer and in spirit a relative, not distant either, of "Rosenkavalier." There is not a note in it that is new to those familiar with Strauss' earlier scores, and this holds true of the interesting but over-long Prelude from "Frau ohne Schatten" and the symphonic interludes from "Intermezzo."

All this late music is old-style Strauss. It proved a welcome and warming experience. Perhaps it offers comment on the prevailing thinness of invention and feeling in much music that has since come from Europe, that the audience swam pleasantly in this warm Straussian bath, delighting in the fat sonorities, the exuberance of the counterpoint, the sure touch upon all the elements of the orchestra as Richard Strauss conceived them.

And this was clear: that whatever he wrote, however it may be written according to a familiar recipe and within a frame of workmanship, Strauss is Strauss, a very great musician of indestructible genius. This was realized by all who were fortunate last night in hearing Mr. Mitropoulos' memorable presentation of his art.

CARNEGIE HALL

Prelude to Act III "Arabella" and Symphonic Fantasy, "Die Frau Ohne Schatten" (first performances by the Philharmonic); Excerpts from the Opera "Intermezzo"; Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53.....Strauss

Rousing Occasion

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS, conducting the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night in a Richard Strauss program, brought cheers to the house with a rousing performance of the Symphonia Domestica. He also made lovely sounds. This forty-minute work, long considered a program liability, has of late years come into its own as a grand and eloquent piece. And I must say I have never heard it sound finer or hold the attention of every one more absorbed that it did last night in Carnegie Hall. Here was Strauss at his richest, and here was Mitropoulos at the height of his extraordinary musical and interpretative powers. A more rousing show one seldom encounters.

The earlier part of the evening had exposed three works of later vintage, all of them fairly uncommon here. There was the Prelude to III from "Arabella," an orchestrated fantasy (by the composer) on passages from "The Woman Without a Shadow" and three symphonic interludes from "Intermezzo." All three operas are popular in Central Europe, though none has been given here. The music of all three sounds like music by Richard Strauss. No mistaking its upswing of optimism, its bounce, its busyness, its afflatus, luxury and general good cheer. No mistaking, either, its deliberate desire to charm through references to waltzing Vienna. It smells of showmanship both in its relentless exploitation of sentiment and in its ability to fill a theater with animation. The opera most original in its thematic and orchestral invention would seem to be, judged from the excerpts, "The Woman Without a Shadow." Strauss experts tell me it is even better than could be divined last night from a potpourri compounded of its weaker parts. (There is, I believe, another suite available.)

Perhaps we will hear these operas one day without traveling to Europe, perhaps not. Our lyric establishments seem not to feel a responsibility in the matter. Mr. Mitropoulos, who does, gave us a taste of them all last night. And if that taste seemed not different from the familiar taste of Richard Strauss's music, it did not seem dilute or lacking in strength. With operatic composition at so low an ebb as now, one wonders why no local impresario takes a chance on the later Strauss. Myself I do not greatly care, since for me a little Strauss goes a long way. But there are Strauss addicts, lots of them; he is a popular composer. It might be that his operas, all of them, have the power of survival in them that his symphonic works have. Even "Zarathustra" and the Domestica please nowadays. Among these only "The Legend of Joseph" and the Alpine Symphony remain under a cloud. Producing his later operas could not possibly be a riskier policy than producing no contemporary opera at all, which is suicide.

Philharmonic Marks 50th Strauss Fete Anniversary

By PAUL AFFELDER

Fifty years ago this month, Richard Strauss, paying his first visit to America, appeared in Carnegie Hall, conducting the first of four Strauss Festival concerts. To commemorate the event, the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which also played under his baton during that visit — though not at the Festival — presented an all-Strauss concert last evening in the same hall. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted.

Appropriately enough, the program's principal work was the "Symphonia Domestica," which was given its world premiere during that Festival.

On its 50th anniversary, this autobiographical symphony-tone poem about the family life of Strauss, his wife and their baby son still sounds good, and one wonders why it is not heard more frequently.

True, it has its tedious moments, particularly its overly prolonged closing pages, but it is a generally exciting and often ingenious composition.

Mitropoulos Praised

Mr. Mitropoulos seems to have a certain affinity for music of this sort, and the performance he directed last evening was a memorable one. His climaxes were exciting and well planned, his interpretation had warmth and intelligence, and he saw to it that every thread of the intricately woven orchestral fabric came through with the utmost clarity.

The orchestral players themselves handled the difficult music exceptionally well. Everyone concerned merited the long, loud ovation which came at the concert's conclusion.

Though the "Symphonia Domestica" is a relative novelty, it was a veritable warhorse compared to the music which preceded it on the program. This consisted of excerpts from three of Strauss' later operas, none of which has ever been staged here.

Symphonic Fantasy

Of these, we found the most musical interest in the symphonic fantasy from "Die Frau Ohne Schatten," a fantastic opera about an empress who has no "shadow"—and her efforts to gain one.

The music turned out to be extremely melodious and was characterized by the use of much polyphony. Like most later Strauss, it looks backward, in this case not to "Rosenkavalier," as was usual, but to "Salome" and the major tone poems.

The fantasy itself made a very attractive tone poem and served to whet our appetite for the entire opera. Mr. Mitropoulos' reading of it seemed valid enough, though there were times when we felt the performance lacked a definite personality.

Memories Evoked

The three symphonic interludes from another autobiographical work, the opera "Intermezzo," scored, as they were, for small orchestra, evoked memories — instrumental and stylistic — of Strauss' music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

Especially attractive was the second interlude, which employed a solo string quartet to depict a card game. This little suite was set forth with a great deal of charm and appropriate lightness of texture.

Only the prelude to Act III of the opera "Arabella," which opened the concert, sounded a bit too fussy and pompous, as well as quite ragged in performance. We understand, however, that most of this opera has the same Viennese lilt as "Der Rosenkavalier." Perhaps we shall have the opportunity of hearing other excerpts at a later date.

As it is, we are grateful to Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic for letting us make the acquaintance of so much unfamiliar Strauss music.

All-Strauss Program Is Majestic

By ROBERT BAGAR.

In Carnegie Hall last night the Philharmonic-Symphony, under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos, probably set its standard for the year in the magnificence of its playing of an all-Richard Strauss program. Mr. Mitropoulos has ever been a particular devotee of this composer's music. And if there had been any doubts last evening about his understanding of it, they were surely dispelled by the majesty of his readings, the fire and feeling and refinement they contained.

We have had all-Beethoven, all-Brahms and virtually all-everybody-else programs. Rarely, if ever, though, have we been exposed to a symphonic evening all-Strauss. This was it.

The list offered the Prelude to Act 3 from "Arabella," a Symphonic Fantasy, "Die Frau ohne Schatten"—both given their first hearings by the society—some excerpts from the "Opera Intermezzo," and, to conclude, the "Sinfonia Domestica."

Great Heights.

The orchestra began on its high plane with the very first work and continued up there until the last, when apparently there were still greater heights to attain in matters of interpretation and orchestral playing. And they were attained with some of the most affecting, inspiring sounds. It was almost all too ravishing.

That last work, the "Sinfonia Domestica," had so much meaning, such beauty, that one wondered why it had never before produced such an effect. If it is a "program work"—and Strauss himself said it was not—it probably received as clear and understandable a telling as it may have for a long time. If it is not, then a nonprogrammatic work had an awful lot to say that was programmatic.

We needn't bother too much, though, about a story. The music needs none. It tells its own, whatever that may be, to each separate listener. And if that listener wishes to construe the title "Domestic Symphony" as a musical novel about the home, the family, or all homes and all families, he is entitled to his choice.

What is there to say about the novelties presented to us last evening, except that they both represent the adroit Strauss. Mr. Mitropoulos and his orchestra were doing some tremendous things with Strauss—what difference did it really make what work of Strauss?

I do hope, however, that one day Mr. Mitropoulos, who is so fine an opera conductor, may do in its entirety one of those stage works listed. That would be something to look forward to!

The Philharmonic

By Francis D. Perkins

"Homenajes," which is probably the last work completed by the late Manuel de Falla, had its first North American performance in yesterday evening's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Dimitri Mitropoulos, celebrating his fifty-eighth birthday, began his program with another work new to the Philharmonic repertory, Domenico Cimarosa's overture to "The Beautiful Grecian," and nine parts of Beethoven's music for the ballet "The Creatures of Prometheus," and closed the list with Franz Schubert's Second Symphony, in B flat major.

Falla's score, which has had some performances in Buenos Aires, was finished before he moved from Spain to Argentina in 1939, but three of its four "Homages," to E. Fernandez Arbos, Debussy, Dukas and Felipe Pedrell, were composed earlier. The opening fanfare in honor of the then still living Arbos reappears as a link between the Debussy and Dukas sections. The "Homages" differ in color and atmosphere, but are all notable for orchestral craftsmanship; the proclamatory fanfare provides a striking contrast with the dark-hued, elegiac tribute to Debussy. The other sections are expressively less convincing; the tribute to Pedrell, which cites some of his music, has brightness and animation, but not marked consequence. It might be that the performance, while tonally admirable, was less imaginative here than in the rest of the work.

Cimarosa's melodically copious and pleasant overture is virtually a short symphony in three movements, and might well be a useful addition to the list of available orchestral preludes. The "Prometheus" overture is the most familiar part of the Beethoven ballet music, but the theme which Beethoven used later in the "Eroica" Symphony was an old acquaintance in the finale. Most of this music is typical early Beethoven, with a forward glance or two; it had an admirable performance, with both spirit and sensitiveness. The Schubert symphony, which has more backward glances, was performed with an admirable combination of zest and dynamic judiciousness, plus understanding of style. All three early works were very agreeable to hear, although their appearance in the same program detracted a little from the element of variety, since they do not reach emotional heights or depths.

MILES KASTENDIECK

ALL-STRAUSS programs are not common in the general run of concert fare. Last week the Philharmonic-Symphony indulged in one set up by Dimitri Mitropoulos, and early next month The Little Orchestra Society will offer one planned by Thomas Scherman. Coming as they do within a month of each other tends to throw the spotlight momentarily on his music.

Richard Strauss was born 90 years ago and died five years ago. In his span of 85 years he did not outlive himself as creative artists can in a long lifetime. He did witness a preference for his earlier works and a certain diffidence towards his later ones.

Mitropoulos's program highlighted excerpts from operas unknown here: "Arabella," "Die Frau ohne Schatten," and "Intermezzo."

It is rumored that one of these, "Arabella", is being considered for presentation by the Metropolitan.

Its production would draw even more attention to the "mature" Strauss. The brief excerpts in this program suggested that the music was typical.

Superbly Played

The "early" work played, "Symphonia Domestica," took note of its 50th anniversary. What was interesting about this performance was its freshness and strength after a half century.

People might well have speculated on the work fading out by this time but Strauss's own estimate of its symphonic value rings true.

Audiences can shelve the programmatic aspect and let the music speak for itself. Mitropoulos and the orchestra played it so superbly that one looks forward to its next performance.

The Little Orchestra will present the Suite from "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and "Ariadne auf Naxos" in a new English translation. Both are well known so that nothing new will be added to Strauss's reputation.

The emphasis on Strauss, however, is provocative. Out of it might come more hearings of those works with which we are less familiar.

It could be that the next decade will make possible a better-balanced appraisal of his music by the centennial if further all-Strauss programs are cultivated.

Falla's 'Homenajes' by Philharmonic

Manuel de Falla, Cadiz-born, and inspired by the folk idioms of his country to create some of the most characteristically Spanish are music ever written, chose to spend his final years in the Argentine, where he died in 1946. The last work he completed before departing for South America in 1939, was "Homenajes," given its American premiere last night by the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting.

"Homenajes" pays musical tribute to the violinist, E. Ferdinand Arbos; to Debussy, to Dukas, and to the Spanish composer, Pedrell.

De Falla accomplishes this in four pieces which actually span almost 20 years of the composer's creative life. "To Claude Debussy" was written in 1920 while "Pedrelliana," the longest, most picturesque, and final selection, was apparently completed in the late thirties. This latter piece is most typically De Falla ballet music. Though based on themes from a Pedrell opera, it sounds more characteristically De Falla than either the Dukas or Debussy tributes.

The four together, however, make a provocative suite and provide entertaining listening, especially when done with the delightful color, atmosphere and rhythmic verve of the Philharmonic's performance last night.

"Homenajes" will be repeated Sunday at 2:30 when the Spanish pianist, Soriano, will also appear in Carnegie Hall as soloist in the Schumann A Minor Piano Concerto. Excerpts from Beethoven's "Prometheus" and the Overture to "The Beautiful Graecian" by Cimarosa will complete the program.

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. At Carnegie Hall.
Overture to La Belle Greca.....Cimarosa

Excerpts from Prometheus.....Beethoven
Homenajes (first U. S. performance).De Falla

By OLIN DOWNES

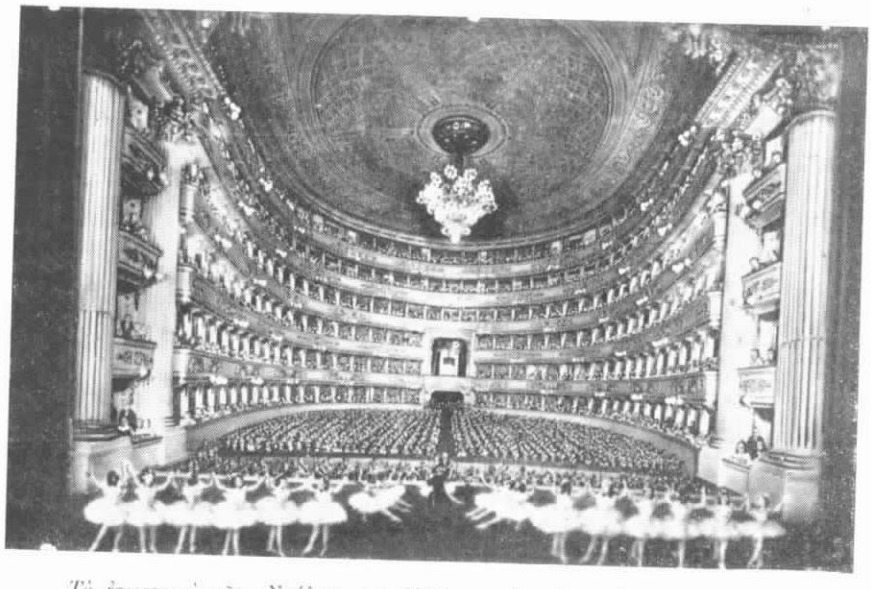
There were first New York performances of music by the eighteenth century Cimarosa and the twentieth century de Falla at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert that Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted last night in Carnegie Hall.

The overture to Cimarosa's totally forgotten opera "The Beautiful Grecian" is an instance of the Italian opera overture of two centuries ago, written pleasantly in the style of that country and period. The performance, clear and, so far as one might ascertain, stylistically correct, was edifying in a polite way that harmed no one!

"Homenajes," by de Falla, pays homage, respectively, to the Spanish conductor E. Fernandez Arbos, and the composers Debussy, Dkas and Pedrell and falls into two categories. The first three pieces, skillfully scored, sophisticated and weak in invention, are in de Falla's later and more modern vein. The last piece, the "Pedrelliana," is based on themes from Pedrell's opera "La Celestina."

In this piece de Falla, composing in his seventies, returns as a consequence of the folk nature of the themes to his earlier style, which made the ballets "The Three Cornered Hat" and "Love the Enchanter" so popular and, in the best sense of the word, successful.

This final piece is by no means so firmly integrated as the other ballet scores to which we have referred, but it is warm, sensuous, Andalusian in its grace, its rhythmical variety and turns of the melody. The many sudden changes of tempo and rhythm and the episodic manner in which the themes are introduced would probably go well—as Mr. Kolodin suggests in his program notes—with dancing.



There was too little contrast between the music of the youthful Beethoven and the youthful Schubert. But it was a pleasure to hear the unpretentious contents of "The Creatures of Prometheus" played with the finish and appreciation that Mr. Mitropoulos bestowed upon them, and to enjoy the songful and adorable symphony of Schubert.

That there are traces — thoughts—of Haydn and Rossini is insignificant; for the whole symphony, by no means a mature work, is nevertheless redolent of the incomparable and essentially inimitable Schubert. And here, too, Mr. Mitropoulos was successful in meeting the composer on his own grounds, and so to speak, at his own age, in conveying the naive and delectable music.

Τὸ ἐσωτερικὸ τῆς «Σκάλας» τοῦ Μιλάνου, σὲ μιὰ παράσταση μπαλέτου.

ποὖχε ἁπλώσει τὰ τραπέζια του στὸ πεζοδρόμιο, ἀνάμεσα σὲ λουλούδια καὶ πρασινάδες. Στὸ διπλανὸ τραπέζι καθόταν ἕνας νέος, ποὺ τὸν προσέξαμε ξεχωριστά, γιατὶ εἶχε τὸ ἀριστερό του χέρι παράλυτο κι ὅλες τὶς κινήσεις στὸ τραπέζι τὶς ἔκανε πιάνοντας μὲ τὸ γερό του χέρι τὸ ἀριστερὸ καὶ μετακινώντας το ἀνάλογα. Ἦταν φανερὸ πὼς ἦταν κι αὐτὸς ξένος. Τὴ συμπόνια μας γιὰ τὸν παράλυτο νέο τὴν ἐξωτερικεύσαμε μὲ τὴ συντρόφισσά μου ἑλληνικά, φυσικά, καὶ γρήγορα παρατηρήσαμε ὅτι ὁ νεαρὸς προσπαθοῦσε νὰ ξεχωρίσει τοὺς φθόγγους τῆς γλώσσας γιὰ νὰ καταλάβει τί γλώσσα μιλούσαμε. Τέλος, μᾶς μίλησε ἀγγλικὰ καὶ γαλλικὰ καὶ πιάσαμε τὴν κουβέντα, ὅπως γίνεται πάντα σὲ τέτοιες περιστάσεις.

Ἦταν Δανὸς φοιτητὴς ἀπὸ τὴν Κοπενχάγη. Κι ἔκανε ἕνα ἐκπαιδευτικὸ ταξίδι στὴν Ἰταλία. Τὸν ἔλεγαν Jens Hermann.

— Τί θὰ κάνετε ἀπόψε; μᾶς ρώτησε. Ἐγὼ πῆρα εἰσιτήριο γιὰ τὴ Σκάλα, ὅπου δίδεται μιὰ Συμφωνικὴ Συναυλία καὶ μάλιστα νομίζω ὅτι ὁ μαέστρος εἶναι δικός σας, Ἕλληνας.

— Ἕλληνας; ἦταν ἡ ἀπορία μας.

— Ναί, γιατὶ τόνομά του εἶναι Δημήτρης. Δὲ θυμοῦμαι τὸ ἐπίθετο.

Εἶναι πολὺ μακρυὰ τὰ ἐπίθετά σας!

Στὸ ἄκουσμα τοῦ «Ντημήτρη» (ὅπως τὸ πρόφερε ὁ Δανός), πεταχτήκαμε κ' οἱ δυὸ μὲ τὴ γυναίκα μου μὲ μιὰ φωνή: «Μητρόπουλο»;

— Ναί, νομίζω κάτι τέτοιο.

— Θὰ ρθοῦμε καὶ μεῖς ἂν βροῦμε εἰσιτήρια.

Φάγαμε βιαστικά, ἀλλάξαμε λίγο τὴν τουριστική μας ἀμφίεση στὸ ξενοδοχεῖο καὶ τρέξαμε γιὰ τὴ Σκάλα.

Πραγματικά, μεγάλες ἀφίσσες ἀνάγγελναν τὸ γεγονός. Ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἀπὸ τὴν Ἀμερικὴ βρέθηκε στὸ Μιλάνο γιὰ νὰ διευθύνει μιὰ καὶ μοναδικὴ ἐκτέλεση τῆς Συμφωνικῆς Ὀρχήστρας τῆς Σκάλας τοῦ Μιλάνου.

Εὐτυχῶς βρήκαμε εἰσιτήρια στὸ ἴδιο θεωρεῖο τοῦ Δανοῦ, στόν. . . ἔκτον ἐξώστη! Ἑβδομος δὲν ὑπῆρχε. . . !

Στὸ ἴδιο θεωρεῖο ἦταν ἕνας Ἀμερικανός, ἕνας φίλος του Ἐγγλέζος κι ἕνας Γάλλος, ἐξὸν ἀπὸ τὸ Δανὸ καὶ μᾶς τοὺς δυὸ Ρωμιούς.

— Βρὲ παιδιά, τοὺς λέω ὅταν γνωριστήκαμε καλύτερα, ἐδῶ βρίσκουνται τὰ Ἡνωμένα Ἔθνη!

Τὸ πρόγραμμα περιελάμβανε τὴ «Βιβαλντιάνα» (πρὸς τιμὴ τοῦ μεγάλου Ἰταλοῦ συνθέτη Βιβάλντι) τοῦ G. F. Malipiero πρώτη ἐκτέλεση στὸ Μιλάνο. Δεύτερο, τὴ Συμφωνία σὲ σὶ ὑφ. τοῦ Γάλλου σηνθέτη E. Chausson πρώτη ἐκτέλεση στὴν Ἰταλία. Ὕστερα ἀπὸ τὸ Διάλειμμα, ἡ 5η Συμφωνία τοῦ Σ. Προκόφιεφ.

— Θὰ μᾶς τρελλάνει ὁ Μητρόπουλος στὶς κακοφωνίες τῶν μοντέρνων, σκεφτόμουνα. Μὰ μὲ διέψευσε ἀμέσως μόλις σήκωσε τὰ μαγικά του χέρια.

Ἡ «Βιβαλντιάνα» ἦταν ἕνα θαυμάσιο καὶ γλυκύτατο ἔργο στὸ ὕφος τοῦ Βιβάλντι, ποὺ θύμιζε καὶ Μότσαρτ. ORCHESTRA BACKSTAGE

Comment on a TV Visit With Philharmonic

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

AN earnest effort to take a large public behind the scenes with a symphony orchestra was made on television last week. The brave enterprise was undertaken by Edward R. Murrow on his program "See It Now," and while it did not quite come off either as a show pure and simple or as an educational guided tour, it was a worthwhile experiment.

Any attempt to strip away the pretentious air of mystery from music-making is to be appreciated. There is, of course, enough mystery for anyone's contemplation in the miracle of creative genius, and there are remarkable examples of performance that have an indefinable illumination. But the day-to-day routine of working at music has been veiled too often in hifalutin nonsense, which would be enough to antagonize an ordinarily sensible person.

Not Patronizing

It is to the credit of Mr. Murrow and his colleagues that in their visit last week with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony they tried to avoid the high-toned approach. They were also careful to eschew that other evil—the oversimplified, cozy manner that ends by patronizing music, performer and audience.

The intention was honest, and yet the program was only partially effective. Too much was attempted in too short a time. The title fixed for the telecast, "Anatomy of a Symphony Orchestra," was an indication of that.

What "See It Now" tried to do was logical enough. Mr. Murrow began by chatting with Dimitri Mitropoulos, the conductor. Then he and his cameras moved into the orchestra room backstage to show the players before a rehearsal; some were warming up, two were playing chess and others were standing around. Next came a shot of the musicians filing out on the stage, and presently the rehearsal was under way, with Mr. Mitropoulos and the men working on the unfamiliar "Homenajes" by De Falla. Finally, the first and last sections of this piece were played at what was purported to be a Sunday afternoon concert.

The most arresting portion of this telecast was the rehearsal. Some of Mr. Mitropoulos' comments were fresh and provocative, like his request for a tone with less flesh on it. Best of all were the close-ups of individual instrumentalists during the rehearsal.

Human Quality

These had an unexpectedly warm and human quality; they were undoubtedly the result of happy chance and not advance stage management. There was a shot of a French horn player scratching his cheek with the mouthpiece of the instrument. There was a shot of a preoccupied violinist tugging at his right ear in a moment of rest. There was a wonderful look of bewilderment and dismay on the face of a fiddler who seemed either puzzled or bored.

Despite the goodwill of all concerned, including the Aluminum Company of America, which had its middle commercial moved to the end, the effect of the program was disappointingly diffuse. One trouble obviously was that this was a novel project. Another, one would guess, was that not enough hard thinking and planning was done in devising the program.

Mr. Murrow's brief chat with Mr. Mitropoulos gave a faithful view of the conductor's personality. But assuming that this telecast was meant to catch the attention of countless people who had never seen an orchestra and its conductor behind the scenes, it would have been more useful to have more precise information from Mr. Mitropoulos as to how he went about his duties and what he would expect from the musicians in the rehearsal to come. When Mr. Mitropoulos spoke of reaching for the soul and even love of the men, he was being true to himself. However, he sounded arty, even if he did not mean to.

Injudicious Choice

The music was chosen injudiciously. "Homenajes" is weak, tired De Falla, and what emerged after conductor and orchestra had worked on it was not exciting or revealing. This was a situation that seemed to call for something more familiar or more juicy.

Finally, the home screen is just too small to encompass a symphony orchestra. In a long shot that catches the full stage, everything is tiny and remote. Close up, individuals, if they are concentrated on too long, throw relative values out of focus. If the camera could stand on the podium with the conductor and see all that he hears, that would be ideal, but obviously that cannot be done. The sound, however, could be managed better.

These observations are set down without a desire to cavil. "See It Now," Mr. Murrow, the Columbia network and the Philharmonic are to be respected for trying the program. The important thing was that it proved that the fundamental idea had exciting possibilities. Will anybody take it from there?

VARIETY

Ed Murrow's "See It Now" held to its high level of interest last Tuesday night (2) with an unusual, offbeat feature—a half-hour spent with America's oldest orchestra, the 111-year-old N. Y. Philharmonic. Usual imaginative quality and professional touch of the Murrow series was manifest again—in Murrow's fascinating opening chat with Maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos, in informal shots of the musicians at ease, in the conductor's department at a rehearsal and at a concert, and reactions of some of the players. It was authentic stuff for the cognoscenti and completely absorbing business to the layman.

Camera work was wonderful, in closeups of the maestro's head or hands, in shots of musicians caught offguard, in glimpses of various orch sections at work. Mitropoulos, with the hands of an artist and the head and beak of a bald eagle, and speaking with his Greek accent but in clear, lucid and very expressive English, was the star of the show—a better tv bet than a lot of more familiar video figures. Murrow threw some sensible questions on music and on conducting, and the maestro had some illuminating, pointed answers. He discussed temperament, communication and the music played. He discarded the baton, using only his hands in conducting, he said, because he got better communication that way, "reaching the souls" of the players.

Orch was next shown relaxing before a rehearsal, playing chess, kibitzing, chatting. Then a rehearsal, with a perspiring Mitropoulos stopping the tooters occasionally to explain how he wanted the music performed singing (or rather croaking) along with the music, huddling with first-desk men over a wrong note, or apologizing for an error ("that was my mistake, gentlemen"). The camera panned to men pencilling in corrections onto their scores. A player rubbed his nose absently; another stroked his chin with the mouthpiece of his horn.

Then to a performance in Carnegie Hall, before a live audience, with the maestro leading the players through a portion of a de Falla tonepoem. Again there were wonderful camera shots—cryptic expressions on some of the players not performing at the moment; a couple of them watching the gesticulating maestro with detached, disgusted or unhappy expressions. One camera threw shadow shots of the maestro in silhouette against solid shots of the orch in action.

And through it all, Murrow's level, clear, interested talk, building atmosphere and interest. Everything was highclass, even the action of the sponsor (Alcoa) consenting to move its mid-commercial to the end, so as not to interrupt a fascinating crowded half-hour in the life of one of the world's great music ensembles. This guy Murrow rates a fanfare.

CHAMBER ENSEMBLE ENDS THIRD SEASON

The Philharmonic Chamber Ensemble completed its third season last night with a program at the Lexington Avenue Y. M. and Y. W. H. A. The program followed the ensemble's regular pattern—that is, it consisted of unusually scored works, both classic and modern, with members of the group taking turns in performing.

The members of the ensemble are all musicians in the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and perhaps it was because they were tired that this program was not performed as well as some of their previous ones. After all, the sixteen participants had reason for feeling a little ragged. It is toward the end of a hard season and they had played in other concerts Thursday night, Friday afternoon, Saturday night and yesterday afternoon.

The brand-new work of last night's program was Richard Donovan's Quartet for Woodwinds. It proved to be a skillful and witty work that had moments of poignance in its slow movements, but which in total effect was piquant and clever. John Wummer, flutist; Englebert Brenner, oboist; Stanley Drucker, clarinetist, and Manuel Zegler, bassoonist, were the players.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, the orchestra's musical director, who had assisted his men in the two previous concerts of the season, also helped them in this one. He led the final work, Mendelssohn's octet. The sound of the strings was a little dry and gray, but this work had by far the best balance and blending of tone of any work on the program.

Bach's Prelude and Fugue, Beethoven's trio, Op 11, and Milhaud's Sonatine a Trois were the other works. The program carried the announcement that the ensemble would be back for a fourth season in 1954-55.

Dimitri Explains A Score

By STEVEN H. SCHEUER

In the midst of the commotion over Edward R. Murrow's now famous See It Now McCarthy report, we'd like to extend a particular vote of thanks to the producers of the show for their program of the previous week on about as noncontroversial a subject as can be imagined—the behind-the-scenes visit with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

The rehearsal scenes captured an extraordinary feeling of intimacy beginning with conductor Dimitri Mitropolous' mobile, friendly face explaining to Murrow why he conducts with his hands to shots of orchestra members correcting notes, playing chess and repeating musical passages under Mitropolous' weaving, graceful hands. It was a session conducted on a level even a layman could understand and a musical treat seldom seen on TV.

Philharmonic to Tour West Coast

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will visit the West Coast for the first time in thirty-four years next season in an augmented tour of five weeks, it was announced yesterday at the Philharmonic offices, 113 W. 57th St.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, musical director of the orchestra, and Guido Cantelli, a guest conductor during the last three seasons, will share the podium on this tour, which will include thirty concerts in twenty-eight cities, including twelve never visited by the Philharmonic before.

The tour will begin on April 18, 1955, with a performance at Detroit, after which the orchestra will continue across country, playing at Pasadena, Calif., on April 28. It will play seven California cities and then continue north to Oregon and Washington before proceeding east, ending its tour with a performance at Ann Arbor, Mich., on May 22.

Most recent tours of the Philharmonic have been limited to two weeks.

The Philharmonic

By Francis D. Perkins

Artur Rubinstein and Dimitri Mitropoulos were the principals in the distinctly generous program presented by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of its Pension Fund. With a capacity audience, gross receipts were approximately $20,000, and, with all participants in the program contributing their services, overhead expenses were relatively small. Mr. Rubinstein was heard with the orchestra in three works, Beethoven's Piano Concerto in G major, Chopin's Piano Concerto in E minor, and Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. Mr. Mitropoulos and his musicians opened the evening with Hermann Boessenroth's transcription of Bach's Chorale Prelude, "Wir glauben all' an einen Gott."

Mr. Rubinstein's appearances as soloist under Mr. Mitropoulos' conductorship have outnumbered those of any other artist with the Philharmonic-Symphony's musical director during the past twenty-seven years; their mutual understanding and unity of interpretative outlook weer apparent throughout the evening. The noted pianist had set himself an exacting task, with three works which all differ in style and atmosphere, but there was no sense of exaction in playing, which was marked by his customary and paramount technical mastery and revelation of the wide range of moods which were inherent in the music; brilliance and intimacy were both at hand. There were momentum and imposing sonority, also subtlety of color and dynamic shading.

The Beethoven concerto was played with a certain spaciousness of scale which also preserved the intimate nature which characterizes many of its measures; the soloist and orchestra set forth expressive distinctions as well as over-all interpretative contrasts. In the Chopin work, there were moments when the element of romantic revery might have been more pronounced, but the essential romanticism of the work and a generous expressive range marked the performance as a whole. The playing of the Rachmaninoff rhapsody gave a complete and convincing idea of its stature and resources; here Mr. Rubinstein's playing was memorable in every detail, including consummate skill, vitality and realization of the kaleidoscope of color and expression which this masterpiece has to offer. The orchestra was in admirable form throughout the fervently applauded program.

Rubinstein Sparkles In Philharmonic Benefit

By PAUL AFFELDER

Artur Rubinstein was the soloist with Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony in three works for piano and orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall. The occasion was the annual concert for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, and all concerned generously donated their services. As a result, the sold-out house enriched the fund by some $20,000.

Altogether, it was a truly remarkable program that included the Beethoven Concerto No. 4 in G Major, the Chopin Concerto No. 1 in E Minor, and Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini.

Mr. Rubinstein was in top form; in fact, despite the herculean task he faced, he treated us to some of his finest playing. The Beethoven Concerto was warm and vibrant; it was made to sing, to be poetic and dramatic where the music so demanded, yet it never lost its basic classical outline. The only thing that was out of place was the unfamiliar cadenza which the soloist employed in the first movement.

Between the Beethoven and the Rachmaninoff, two giant works, the Chopin Concerto, an early work by this keyboard master, sounded just a little thin. Its shortcomings last night were certainly no fault of the interpreters, who succeeded in bringing out every one of its songful phrases with a wonderfully lyrical tone and whose phrasing was the essence of sensitivity and subtle finish.

Unabridged Version

The trouble is that the work itself is inherently weak in structure, despite its strength in melodic content. Chopin just did not know how to write for orchestra; and since Mr Mitropoulos chose to present the concerto uncut—the first time we recall having heard it in unabridged form—the lengthy orchestral passages, particularly in the first movement, wandered on and on without any relief by way of variety in instrumental coloring.

But then, along came the Rachmaninoff Rhapsody. Its interpretation was a real tour de force. One would have thought that by this time Mr. Rubinstein would have been thoroughly exhausted, yet he never once spared himself. True, he never hurried all evening; he was willing to take his time, to linger here and there over a phrase which pleased him, especially in the Chopin.

He didn't hurry in the Rachmaninoff, either, but he managed to engender an immense amount of energy and electric excitement. Each variation was treated with special attention, and each emerged in thrilling fashion.

Not the least of the evening's success was due to the magnificent support provided by Mr. Mitropoulos and his men, who also opened the program with Hermann Boessenroth's transcription of the Bach chorale-prelude, "Wir Glauben All' an Einen Gott." There was just as much care in the performance of the perfectly balanced accompaniments as in the solo parts.

It is, perhaps, superfluous to report that soloist, conductor and orchestra were showered with ovations throughout the concert.

Rubinstein Swells Pension Fund

By ROBERT BAGAR.

To play a marathon of piano concertos, as Artur Rubinstein did last night in Carnegie Hall, requires confidence in three separate factors:

(a) In oneself; (b) In the supporting orchestra; (c) In the audience.

Mr. Rubinstein had confidence in all of these. Also he had the additional good will of everybody, because he had given his services for the benefit of the Philharmonic-Symphony's Pension Fund. Therefore, how could he miss giving just about the most exciting performance of his local career?

It's nice to know, I suppose, when you put yourself out for somebody, that taking the trouble to do so is worth it. It certainly was in this case, since $20,000 was realized for the fund.

Mitropoulos Conducts.

Under Dimitri Mitropoulos' conducting the orchestral share of the evening had vigor, assurance and sympathy. Fact is the program opened with Bach's Chorale-Prelude "Wir Glauben all' an einen Gott, Schoepfer," as arranged by Boessenroth. And there, respecting quality of performance, the evening began. Then the deluge of piano and orchestra scores for, apparently, a drought-ridden multitude!

Beethoven's Concerto No. 4, Chopin's E minor, Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini," these were the challenging works. They became the more challenging, considering the vast differences in styles and idioms to contend with.

It's safe to say that Mr. Rubinstein wasted no time thinking about styles or idioms. As he played the pieces, the distinctions were made.

Master Materializes.

Beethoven is identifiable, when so performed, in almost any work of his. But in his slow movements, I think, the master materializes the most completely before the ears. And who, but Beethoven, could have written so personal an Andante as reposes in the Fourth Piano Concerto?

Chopin, too, is recognizable virtually everywhere in his music. But certainly no other composer could be mistaken for the creator of the lovely Romanza in the E minor Concerto. And what of Rachmaninoff? Well, his musical and emotional being might easily fall apart, without a strong regard for those mercurial rises and falls of his melody and the shifting moods of his modulations?

Artur Rubinstein has lived too long with the Beethoven, the Chopin, the Rachmaninoff of the respective works to fail them—or himself—at such a time. He and his co-workers, on the podium and in the orchestra, earned for themselves the glorification implicit in long and demonstrative applause.

SYMPHONY EXTENDS STINT OF CANTELLI

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony, which announced on Jan. 26 that Guido Cantelli would be one of its guest conductors next season, said yesterday that the length of his engagement would be eight weeks, twice as long as his guest engagements of the last three seasons.

He will conduct double the number of concerts of Bruno Walter and George Szell, the two other guest conductors, and Dimitri Mitropoulos, the orchestra's musical director, will be conducting for only twelve of the twenty-eight weeks of the season. One reason for his reduction from his usual sixteen is that next season Mr. Mitropoulos will serve also as a guest conductor with the Metropolitan Opera.

The conductor's engagement will fall into two four-week periods. The first overlapping January and February of 1955, and the second being the following four weeks of March. In addition to these concerts in New York, he will share the podium with Mr. Mitropoulos in conducting the orchestra on the five-week tour it will make to the Pacific Coast in April and May of 1955.

Μὲ τὸν Κριστιὰν Ζὰκ ἤμουν γνωστὸς ἀπὸ τὸ Παρίσι. Ἀλλὰ τὴν ὄμορφη Μαρτὶν δὲν εἶχα τὴν εὐκαιρία ὡς τώρα νὰ τὴν γνωρίσω. Γι' αὐτὸ χάρηκα πολὺ ὅταν μιὰ εὐγενικὴ πρόσκλησις τῆς Γαλλικῆς Πρεσβείας μοῦ ἐπέτρεψε νὰ πραγματοποιήσω τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν μου.

Philharmonic Symphony Concert:

Rubinstein Hailed

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN, Dimitri Mitropoulos, and the Philharmonic-Symphony created a magical musical moment in Carnegie Hall last night.

The occasion was another of the orchestra's pension fund benefit concerts. A capacity audience paid $20,000 to attend.

Rubinstein gave one of the truly magnificent performances of his long career. In exceptional form and in a poetic mood, he played in the fullness of romantic tradition and with that rare sensitivity for piano tone that is the hallmark of great pianists.

Aside from a brief introductory chorale-prelude of Bach, the program was devoted to three familiar works: Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G, Chopin's No. 1 in E minor, and Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini."

Rubinstein approached them subjectively, placing artistic well above virtuoso achievement.

Liquid Quality

As the evening progressed, the audience became completely mesmerized with the liquid quality of his pianism and the lyrical nature of his performances.

He tended to over-romanticize the Beethoven especially with the Saint-Saens cadenzas, but he was completely in his element in the Chopin. The Rachmaninoff was a miracle of pianistic wizardry and musical realization.

Mitropoulos fashioned orchestral textures artfully. In resorting to a baton, he aroused various kinds of speculation.

Whatever his reasons, he found the orchestra quite responsive to his direction and himself unusually responsive to the romantic qualities of the music.

This was a concert significant in placing these pieces in traditional focus and rich in creating memories of beautiful piano playing.

Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. Rachmaninoff

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Artur Rubinstein helped the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos, to raise $20,000 for its pension fund at Carnegie Hall last night. The redoubtable pianist played three concertos, and, if the orchestra and Mr. Mitropoulos will forgive the expression, he put on a one-man show.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the 100-odd men of the ensemble did their appointed share of the job, but it was Mr. Rubinstein who dominated the proceedings. His playing was in the grand manner, and that is meant to connote not only virtuosity but a command of style—three different styles as exemplified in the works of Beethoven, Chopin and Rachmaninoff.

After the curtain-raiser, a Bach chorale-prelude by the orchestra, Mr. Rubinstein took over. Playing the piano part of Beethoven's G major Concerto, he gave this subtlest and most searching of the composer's piano concertos a performance that suggested power under restraint, intensity without turbulence.

In the slow movement, always the test of an interpreter, Mr. Rubinstein caused the piano to sing with an affecting tenderness; one almost forgot the performer as one was absorbed in the composer's communication.

With Chopin, Mr. Rubinstein moved into a world where the lyricism took on a different texture, and he conveyed this transition in the phrasing and tinting of every passage. Here he was the ardent romanticist—personal but not fragile. In the Chopin concerto, the piano's is the fully realized voice, but Mr. Rubinstein brought it to vivid life.

Finally, there was Rachmaninoff's brilliant Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, written with himself, a sovereign pianist, in mind. Mr. Rubinstein was equal to the demands of the piece. One did not think of technique as one listened to him plunge into it with enormous gusto, but of Rachmaninoff's imaginative use of a familiar theme.

The Philharmonic and Mr. Mitropoulos gave Mr. Rubinstein valuable support all through these achievements. In fact, soloist and ensemble made music together in all three concertos. There is no intention to minimize their contribution. But it has to be faced—Mr. Rubinstein was the principal attraction to the capacity audience, which cheered him, and certainly to his children, who were here on a holiday and allowed to see and hear Daddy put on a whale of a show.

The occasion was not one for adventure along new paths, but it is a safe bet that a great many of the patrons at last night's concert of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall were satisfied. The program was all Tchaikovsky's, and it is no risk to predict that Tchaikovsky is here to stay.

The soloist was Zino Francescatti, the French violinist, and he gave a distinguished account of the D major Concerto. Other fiddlers may stress a lush tone and bravura playing, which are qualities that this concerto can tolerate quite nicely, thank you. Mr. Francescatti could probably manage an interpretation on this order if he chose to, for he has a big, singing tone and plenty of technique. But last night he provided a performance of taste and refinement that had a distinction of its own.

This was a sensitive musician's approach to Tchaikovsky. There was virtually no showiness for its own sake. The line of the music was sustained, and its emotion was conveyed penetratingly. The tone was silken and clean, despite the humid atmosphere that was not exactly propitious for fiddling, and the phrasing had elegance of style. The violinist's restraint was especially welcome in the slow movement.

Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted, and he and the orchestra gave Mr. Francescatti generally well-balanced support, though one felt in some places that the conductor was holding strongly in leash a disposition to make the interpretation more fiery. The audience gave the performance a rousing reception, meant for all hands.

Mr. Mitropoulos began the evening with the Introdution and Fugue from the Suite in D minor, No. 1. Although this is not great Tchaikovsky, it was a pleasure to hear because it is not often played and because it shows the composer's flair for making the orchestra sound. The evening ended with the Fifth symphony, which provided ample opportunity for Mr. Mitropoulos to be dramatic.

The conductor used a baton last night, as he did at the Pension Fund concert on Monday. Evidently his right arm is ailing, and the baton forces him to use it less violently.

Laszlo Varga

Laszlo Varga, the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's first cellist, was soloist with his colleagues under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos in Edouard Lalo's Concerto in D minor on Saturday night in Carnegie Hall.

The program began with Cimarosa's Overture to "The Beautiful Grecian," which had been introduced to the Philharmonic repertory in February, and closed with Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, which will be heard again after the orchestra returns from its fortnight's tour.

Lalo's now seldom played cello concerto, idiomatic from the soloist's point of view and orchestrally well balanced, is suavely melodious, and Mr. Varga's playing was suave and appealing in tone throughout its range, technically deft and polished. It also showed understanding of the style and atmosphere of the music.

Francescatti Teams With Mitropoulos

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who has returned to the Philharmonic podium after a few weeks' absence, featured an all-Tschaikowsky program in Carnegie Hall last night.

Again it was noted that the maestro was using a baton—an innovation forced upon him by a bruised muscle in his right arm, making it painful for him to raise it as high as his left.

Otherwise the Philharmonic's beloved director looked as fit as the Stradivarius that Zino Francescatti employed last night in the Tschaikowsky Concerto.

Exciting Finale.

Actually, for a good part of the journey, Mr. Francescatti's fiddle sounded better than he did. There were slurred passages in the opening allegro and one or two intervals that the noted French artist has negotiated with far more ease and precision in the past.

The first movement was also a little problematic for Mr. Mitropoulos. In places a strange slackening of tempo developed. At such points conductor and soloist seemed prepared to move off in different directions.

But things picked up smartly toward the end of the allegro. The Andante went smoothly, and the finale was as exciting as any concerto movement I have heard this season.

'Fate' Symphony.

The program opened with the Introduction and Fugue from Tschaikowsky's D Minor Suite. For some reason it is hard to associate fugues with Tschaikowsky. Yet this is a brilliant specimen, and brilliant is the word for last night's performance.

Like Beethoven's C Minor, the Fifth is Tschaikowsky's "Fate" Symphony—a "fate," in Irving Kolodin's words, "confronted boldly in the finale, challenged and eventually vanquished." Mr. Mitropoulos gave the symphony the strength and sincerity of a testament of faith.

It is good to have this inspiring leader back at headquarters. His earnestness and idealism are no less exciting than his musical intensity and fervor.

1ST 'CELLIST SOLOIST WITH PHILHARMONIC

Laszlo Varga, the orchestra's first 'cellist, was the soloist at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert Saturday night at Carnegie Hall. The gifted artist was heard in Lalo's Concerto in D minor on a program also containing Cimarosa's Overture, "La Bella Greca" and Prokofieff's Fifth symphony.

Mr. Varga's performance of the Lalo display-piece had elegance, poetry and warmth. All three movements of the opus were accurately dispatched and boasted pure, velvety sound in every measure. Lyricism, impassioned or tender, was the outstanding characteristic of a reading that would have gained in impressiveness by a fuller tone and more sharply defined dynamic contrasts.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, on the podium for the concert, provided finely considered support in the concerto. He was somewhat less successful in bringing lightness of touch and sparkle to Cimarosa's Overture, or perhaps one should say "Sinfonia," for so it is termed on the score of Piero Bormioli, who restored this music of 1784 and published it in 1951. Its three divisions have some interest, but not much importance.

The conductor made up for any lapse in the eighteenth-century classic by a superb presentation of Prokofieff's "War" symphony, one of the greatest works of its kind written in the present century. Rather than suffering or joy, power dominates in this masterpiece. It contains climaxes of overwhelming impressiveness, which were made the most of in an interpretation that captures every fleeting mood of the monumental creation with noteworthy vividness, intensity and color.

When the American Federation of Musicians Local 802 was informed of the proposed tour itinerary for the 1954-55 season, President Al Manuti expressed the sincere gratitude and appreciation of his Executive Board for the Philharmonic - Symphony Society's efforts in creating valuable and additional employment for its members.

This tour, which is being booked through Columbia Artists Management, Inc., will lose the Philharmonic - Symphonic Orchestra's 113th season. In recent years the Orchestra's tours have been limited to a length of two weeks at the beginning and end of its season. Their last major trip was trans-oceanic, rather than trans-continental, when the Philharmonic - Symphony Society received the first invitation to an American Orchestra to perform for two weeks at the Edinburgh Festival in 1951.

Philharmonic plays unusual program here

BY LILY MAY CALDWELL
News music editor

Concert-goers who have been complaining "symphony orchestras always play the same pieces" got a change last night.

The New York Philharmonic and Dimitri Mitropoulos put aside the usual—if greater—works we have to expect and played a program that was different.

It was, of course, an evening of near-perfect music-making, and the audience of more than 4500 from as far off as Florida and Tennessee responded with a torrent of applause.

Conductor Mitropoulos was in fine form, and his high spirits were not lost on the orchestra, which played electrically throughout the evening.

Most exciting moments were in the Prokofieff Fifth Symphony with its steady reitereated staccato accompaniment underlying the melody of the woodwinds in the second movement; the persistent accompaniment, wierd effects of outcries and building tension of the third movement, and its clashing disonance climax.

The Prokofieff was a woodwind revelation, as the Tchaikovsky Symphonic Fantasy 'Francesco da Rimini" was for the orchestra's string choir, which was the haunting and wailing winds in Dante's Inferno, and provided the pizzicati over which the clarinet sang its plaintive melody.

The program opened with the Overture to Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" and closed with the spirited Dances from DeFalla's "Three Cornered Hat."

Music Outdraws The Dodgers

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra outdrew the Dodgers and the Milwaukee Braves in Birmingham, Ala., on April 3, when the gate was 5,603 for the evening concert and 4,823 for the afternoon exhibition baseball game. Many of Dimitri Mitropoulos' musicians watched the game and turned up at the concert with sunburned faces. The Dodgers had red faces for another reason, being on the wrong end of a 17-2 score.

IN SEASON CLOSER

Philharmonic Wins Plaudits of Atlantians

By HELEN KNOX SPAIN

The Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of New York with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting closed the 1953-54 All Star Concert season in a program of forceful and dramatic music. It was a brilliantly gala and monumental occasion.

The conductor and the orchestra seemed animated by the same spirit to project the greatest in music-making. The audience demonstrated its ecstatic delight with wild flurries of applause.

The program, refreshingly different from those offered here in recent years, contained "Overture Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; "Symphony No. 5," Prokofieff; "Symphonic Fantasy, Francesca da Rimini," Tschaikowsky, and "Dances From the Three-Cornered Hat," Falla.

TO THE INSISTENT demand of the audience, Mr. Mitropoulos added two encores at the conclusion of the programmed numbers, including "The Third Movement" of the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 5" and the "Roman Carnival," Berlioz.

The Mendelssohn "Overture" came as a stirring opener of the concert. The vigor of its lines was given with dynamic fervor by Mr. Mitropoulos in his essaying of the score.

THE PROKOFIEFF "Symphony" was treated handsomely by the conductor and orchestra. Each detail of the heroic interpretation was expertly designed and carried out convincingly. Mr. Mirtopoulos was faithful to the composer's description, as being a "symphony about the spirit of man." It was a superbly moving performance.

Next in highpoint of the program was the Symphonic Fantasy "Francesca da Rimini," Tschaikowsky, which was eloquently interpreted.

The closing number, "Dances From the Three-Cornered Hat," Falla, was performed with a joyout spontaneity, and with a brilliant buoyancy.

The concert was an inspired evening of the sheer luster of great in music, long to be cherished.

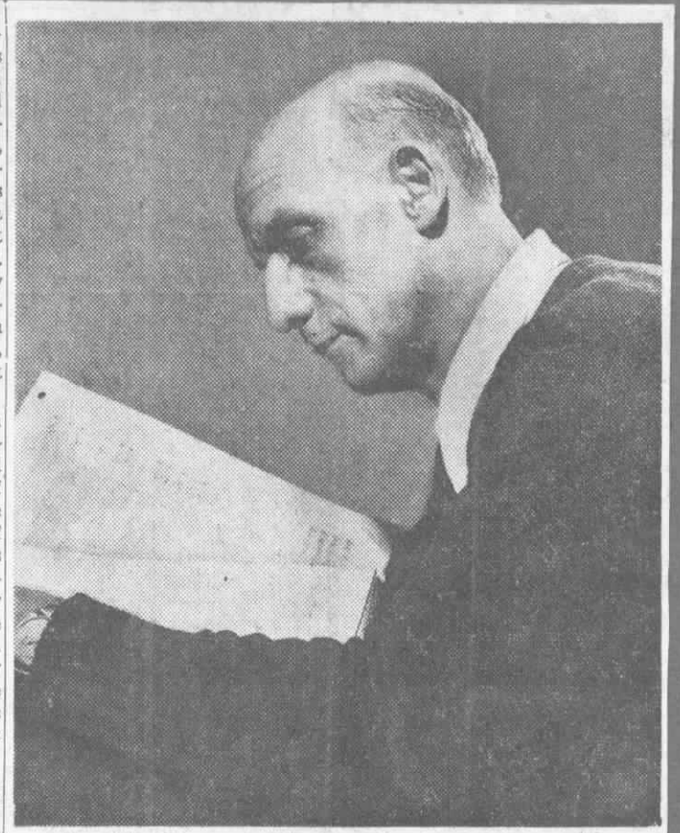
Mitropoulos Gives Flashing View Of Borodin's 'Polovtsian Dances'

With "Kismet" barreling along Broadway on Borodin's musical time, using the score of the Russian's Symphony No. 2 in glittering arrangements, other Borodin music is coming to record counters on disks of serious intent.

Columbia has a new 12-inch, L.P. featuring the boisterously abandoned and wonderously rhythmical "Polovtsian Dances" from "Prince Igor." The work is given a flashing interpretation by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic. Also by Borodin on the same record is "In the Steppes of Central Asia," created by the Russian composer for a performance in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the reign of Czar Alexander II. It is pleasant and easy listening with the Russian mood well signified by the gleaming strings and lamenting oboe.



Reverse side of the same recording is occupied with Mitropoulos' exotic and brightly-stringed reading of "Caucasian Sketches" by that other Russian, Ippolitov-Ivanov, whose entire output has been eclipsed by this, the best known of his works.

THE New York Philharmonic will complete its spring tour this afternoon with a concert conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos in Constitution Hall in Washington, D. C. If the 3,844-capacity auditorium is as full as previous halls have been, the orchestra will have been heard by about 55,000 in a space of two weeks. That figure has been reached by adding the totals of the capacities of all of the fourteen auditoriums of the tour (57,995), and allowing for a few vacant seats.

Such vacancies have been scarce. In the largest of the auditoriums, that of the Memorial Coliseum of the University of Kentucky in Lexington, the concert filled all but 1,000 of the 13,000 seats. In other places the crowds have gone over capacity. In Birmingham, Ala., for instance there were 5,603 in the 5,500 seat Municipal Auditorium. The orchestra is particularly proud of that figure for in the afternoon the Brooklyn Dodgers played the Milwaukee Braves and drew a mere 4,923.

At least part of that baseball crowd, incidentally, consisted of members of the Philharmonic.

New York Philharmonic Scores In Constitution Hall Concert

By Day Thorpe

The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor. Constitution Hall. Program: Ruy Blas Overture, and Symphony No. 5, in D, Mendelssohn; Homages, de Falla; Dances from Galanta, Kodaly; Roman Carnival Overture, Berlioz.

One would never have known from the playing of the New York Philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos yesterday in Constitution Hall that the orchestra was concluding a strenuous tour of the South, and that the men were tired and eager to get home. The orchestra was in top form. The woodwinds were particularly good, and the brass, who had as much to do as in three average concerts, were very impressive in both brilliance and accuracy.

The interpretations of the varied music of Dimitri Mitropoulos were all to my liking, the marvelously live and colorful Reformation Symphony of Mendelssohn being given a performance that proved it once again to be one of the masterpieces, in rhythmic vivacity and orchestral finesse, of nineteenth century symphonies.

"Homages," one of the last pieces of the great Spanish composer, de Falla, was the novelty of the afternoon. It is a major work, a series of four tributes to colleagues of the composer—E. F. Arbos, Claude Debussy, Paul Dukas, and Felipe Dedrell. On the whole the music is more somber and less markedly Spanish in color than El Amor Brujo or The Three-Cornered Hat, but it is much the same in style and technique. The Debussy section, a dirge, is somewhat reminiscent of the slow movement of the harpsichord concerto.

It must be a special talent required of each member of the Philharmonic to know how to interpret Mitropoulos' conducting. The eminent conductor seems visually to establish no beat at all; he waves his arms and bounces around the podium like a doll on the end of a string. This comment is not deprecatory. Mitropoulos gets what he is after, and yesterday that was very good indeed. How he does it is a mystery to the uninitiated.

Of the list of 15 or 20 works the orchestra played on its present tour, those given yesterday were by all odds the most unusual and interesting. As it is the policy of the orchestra to play what the local management selects from its list, we have Patrick Hayes to thank for the good program.

Postlude

New York Philharmonic in Its Farewell Concert Here

By Paul Hume

Dimitri Mitropoulos brought the New York Philharmonic to Constitution Hall in the last of the present series of annual appearances here by the Nation's oldest orchestra.

The Philharmonic undoubtedly will return again, but it will not be next year, for the orchestra is touring the far west and will not be available for eastern tour dates.

For the Palm Sunday concert, Mitropoulos chose a Mendelssohn first half concert, with the Ruy Blas Overture and the 5th Symphony, the one called "Reformation." The overture is one of Mendelssohn's more successfully dramatic scores and it was played with all the fire possible. A handsome brass sonority made much of the frequent horn calls allotted that section.

The symphony is a hopelessly uninspired piece, and, to give the composer's own opinion, a score he came to detest, one he said he would be glad to burn, and one to which he refused publication during his lifetime. He was so right.

Its empty repetitions were well enough played technically, but there is no way to infuse into spiritless music a warmth or heart it lacked from the beginning.

After intermission, Mitropoulos introduced a novelty to Washington, played some seldom heard dances, and a famous overture.

The novelty was Manuel de Falla's "Homages," a series of four tributes to musicians Falla respected: Arbos, Debussy, Dukas, and Pedrell. Except for a mild interest in the orchestration, we regret that this was the first major disappointment we have known in the orchestral writings of Falla, one of the 20th century's musical geniuses.

The final section, named for Pedrell, Falla's teacher, is the most original and successful of the four. The delicate Homage to Debussy, originally written for guitar, and later transcribed for piano, does not work in the larger sonorities.

Kodaly's Dances from Galanta came next, with great verve and power. They remain a notable example of the interplay of folk music and original orchestral writing. The closing overture was the Roman Carnival of Berlioz, which was spirited without that special flavor present in the music, but elusive to some conductors.

Washington has not for some time had one of Mitropoulos's great concerts. We hope he will honor us with something of his especially selective repertoire some time soon.

Just an Appetizer

One concert a season by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is, of course, better than none at all, but it would be nice to hear this outstanding group more often.

The orchestra, with the dynamic Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, drew to Constitution Hall yesterday a near capacity audience that was rewarded with the sort of vigorous, incisive playing that keeps you sitting up and taking notice.

Mr. Mitropoulos has no inhibitions about sound. He lets his brasses go all out when the occasion requires—as it frequently did in the Mendelssohn "Reformation" Symphony—and yet, so fine is this section, that the great fortissimos sang out smoothly.

The Greek-born conductor was not only effective in the forthright Mendelssohn but in the quiet and subtle "Homages" of Manuel de Falla. This work, which the orchestra presented for the first time is fresh evidence of de Falla's genius.

The gayety of Kodaly's Dances from Galanta amd the bounce of Berlioz Roman Carnival Overture sent the audience home in a buoyant mood. That Mr. Mitropoulos was himself quiite satisfied was indicated by the fact that just before the last number he stopped to shake hands cordially with the radio engineers who manned the sound control.

Philharmonic Scores Playing It Straight

A straight symphonic program—without soloist or novelty—absorbed last night's Philharmonic audience in Carnegie Hall.

The absorption came in part from the three scores listed—Bach's D Minor Suite, No. 3; Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, and Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, each a masterpiece of its kind.

But it came, too, from the masterly and vital readings of Dimitri Mitropoulos, who can always be counted on to bring out the living essence of a piece of music.

PROKOFIEFF'S 5TH HEARD AT CONCERT

Philharmonic Program Also Offers Bach Suite No. 3 in D, Williams Fantasia

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. At Carnegie Hall.
Suite No. 3 in D.....Bach
Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis, Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5.....Prokofieff

By OLIN DOWNES

Some wonderful music-making, and some debatable questions of taste, "tradition," "style," etc., distinguished the concert given by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society Thursday night in Carnegie Hall.

The music by Bach, Vaughan Williams and Prokofieff was of the highest order. Its various interpretations demonstrated again how many aspects a given masterpiece may possess at the hands of different interpreters and also, perhaps, why it is not always the part of logic to presume that since a conductor plays a given work otherwise than some other famous conductor, or even all other famous conductors, he is wrong!

The instance in point is the Bach Third Suite. It was a pleasure to us to hear the dramatic treatment that Mr. Mitropoulos gave the long fast fugue of the middle part of the opening movement, which contrasted superbly with the magisterial pomp and splendor of the "corner" movements. And we were delighted to see exploded before our eyes the myth that in Bach there are no gradual swellings or diminishings from a climax, but only "terraced" sonorities, now loud, now soft for long stretches.

Overture Was Exciting

This overture was exciting and passionate and brilliantly colored, what with the trumpets and all. In the next moment, in the famous "Air" that Wilhelmj arranged for the G string, we were deploring the too-sustained accompaniment of the firmly rhythmical 'cellos, whose tones should certainly sound separately and not with the connected "legato" effect that they were given. Their accompaniment should have exactly the opposite effect of the sustained song of the violins overhead. We also thought the "Bourrees" heavy handed.

It might be more just to say that no full-sized string orchestra should play these suites. They are lighter toned, more transparent and agile, too, however crisp the accent, and so forth. But avaunt with the particulars. Mr. Mitropoulos gave a brilliant and exciting performance of magnificent music and no one will accuse him of incapacity to examine a score and come to a singularly gifted musician's conclusions about it.

Poetic Reverie of Williams

Nor do we agree wholly with his idea of that poetical reverie of an olden time of Vaughan Williams upon the old modal tune of the Elizabethan composer, Thomas Tallis. The score is as rich and gray and other-worldly in its spirit as it is modern in its date of composition. It is the work of a born tone-poet, and an English one. It makes one think of the words of Renan about Turenieff—"the reveries of centuries had amassed themselves about his heart." Again, the performance was on the dramatic rather than the mystical side — exquisitely medieval in effect as are the antiphonal responses of the small and large subdivisions of the string orchestra.

But this was all prelude to the thrilling performance of the Prokofieff symphony. This symphony has been played often here since its local première in Carnegie Hall at the hands of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in 1945—a date, by the way, that was four years in advance of the first performance of the symphony in Russia, with whose Government, reportedly, Prokofieff was at odds. What, please, does the symphony "mean"? Prokofieff said that it was not a national affair, that it was "a symphony about the spirit of man."

Sweep of the Finale

The serenity of the beginning; the sense of conflict and stride of power that ensues in the course of highly dramatic development; the wild exultancy of the next movement; the tragic retrospections of the third and, again, the sweep and triumph of the finale, are not easy to separate from the year of the turning point in Russia of the war against Hitler. Perhaps that victory was preeminently, for Prokofieff, a triumph of the soul of man. Be all that as it may, the symphony grows on one with every repetition. It grew the more upon one last night in view of Mr. Mitropoulos' magnificent interpretation. He made us see—hear—in the music, things we had previously only realized.

This was the case, first, in the spiritual unity of whole interpretation, as also in a hundred details of development and instrumentation. Also, and preeminently, the performance had grandly the structural element, the sequence of themes that appeared in related forms in the separate movements, and the steady irresistible growth, from the beginning, of the serene and resolute opening theme to its immense climax at the end. It was both a reasoned and an overwhelming performance, which stirred the audience, at the last, to cheers.

Philharmonic Ends Tour, Program Features Bach

By Francis D. Perkins

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos, were welcomed back to Carnegie Hall last night, after two weeks of travel. The program opened with a spacious and spirited performance of Bach's Suite No. 3, in D major. The other two works were of this century. Ralph Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis and the late Serge Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony. The Fantasy, based on a theme nearly four centuries old, is a remarkable example of preservation of the style and atmosphere of a long past period's music without self-conscious archaism, and also, in its treatment of the string choirs, of elaboration of detail without an elaborate effect. The prevailing impression is one of stately directness in music which is leisurely, but not lengthy. The tone quality of the Philharmonic strings was treasurable, and the interpretation was devoted and convincing.

Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony has missed only two New York seasons since its introduction in November, 1945. Opportunities for rehearing consequential contemporary works such as this are welcome, although repeated listening reveals some unevenness in the appeal of this particular composition, as well as further revelation of its merits. The unevenness seems to lie mainly in the treatment of engaging and savorous musical ideas.

The rise of the first movement to imposing climaxes gives a certain impression of contrivance; the rhythmic liveliness of the second becomes rather relentless before its close, and the dramatic outburst that succeeds the adagio's dominating lyricism loses something of its memorably cumulative effect after the symphony has been heard several times.

But much of it is still eloquent, and the performance revealed emotional nuances as well as more general expressive contrasts. In the Bach suite, there might have been more distinction of mood, but the general interpretative conception and orchestral tone and balance were both satisfying.

Mitropoulos Conducts Schönberg on LP

Louis Krasner Plays Violin in Two Works

From APR 2 0 1954
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Recordings

By Harold Rogers

When Arnold Schönberg composed his Violin Concerto in 1936, he wrote: "I believe that in my new Violin Concerto I have created the necessity for a new kind of violinist."

Louis Krasner is the violinist who has proved equal to the enormous task of performing this work, as well as the Violin Concerto by Alban Berg, the most successful of Schönberg's disciples. Mr. Krasner played the premières of both—the Berg in Barcelona in 1936, and the Schönberg with the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1940.

Now Columbia has issued these two works with Mr. Krasner as soloist—the Schönberg Violin Concerto with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York under Dimitri Mitropoulos, and the Berg Violin Concerto with the Cleveland Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski (ML 4857). (The Berg appears to have been recorded some time earlier.)

Of the two the Schönberg Concerto is the greater work, though it will doubtless find less favor than the Berg for some years to come. In spite of the many musicians and music lovers who have tried to wish Schönberg's music out of existence, the fact becomes more and more evident that Schönberg has made the most significant contribution to music of the 20th century, an influence that cannot be denied. And when the listener becomes conversant with Schönberg's atonal language, it will be found that his works take on new meaning and stature.

Mr. Krasner's performance of the Schönberg Violin Concerto is particularly striking for its amazing blend of the technical and emotional elements. Mitropoulos, too, is thoroughly at home in this idiom.

Very Red Faces

After an hour and a half of superb music making, Conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos of the New York philharmonic symphony orchestra must have been dismayed to discover that his supposedly knowing Thursday night New York audience could not distinguish between Debussy and Ravel.

Debussy's "Three Images" for orchestra was scheduled first. After the second of the three sections, "Iberia," was played, there was such a torrent of applause that the conductor was forced to acknowledge it before turning to the last of the three, "Frolics of Springtime." This, too, brought another deluge of applause.

Then, as the conductor retired for a few moments, the house began to empty en masse, plainly having mistaken the third of the "Images" for the Ravel "Alborada," which was programmed next.

Returning to conclude the program with Ravel, Mitropoulos viewed the half cleared Carnegie hall with obvious concern. He took the unusual step of beseeching the sea of backs: "Please, there is one more number."

Much chagrined, the hundreds within earshot slunk into the nearest seats. The conductor, with an indulgent smile, whipped brashly into the closing piece.

TOSSY SPIVAKOVSKY gave an ingratiating performance of Menotti's violin concerto during the Philharmonic-Symphony's weekend concerts in Carnegie Hall.

The easy, flowing melodies played with disarming fluency and characteristic brilliance found the audiences quite receptive. The spirited cooperation of Dimitri Mitropoulos and the orchestra made the performance the more attractive.

Bach's Suite No. 3, and Vaughan Williams' "Fantasy on a Theme by Tallis" opened the program. Spivakovsky played Mozart's lovely Adagio in E Major most persuasively before offering the Menotti concerto. The inclusion of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture appeared altogether timely.

SPIVAKOVSKY HEARD WITH PHILHARMONIC

Tossy Spivakovsky, the violin soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall on Saturday evening, was heard in two works—Mozart's Adagio in E (K. 261) and Gian-Carlo Menotti's Violin Concerto.

Mr. Spivakovsky's playing of both these works was energetic rather than refined. His tone is of the utmost size and beauty; his mechanics are beyond reproach. But he goes in for a type of wailing vibrato that is no complement to the purity of a Mozart melodic phrase.

The Menotti went much better, mostly because the violin writing is so "busy" that, aside from the slow movement, the solo violinist does not have time to press down heavily and vibrate. Mr. Spivakovsky swept grandly through Menotti's nineteenth-century-derived concerto. In the Mozart he used a short, agreeable cadenza of his own invention.

Dimitri Mitropoulos provided able orchestral backing. The other works on the program were Bach's Suite in D, Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter Overture."

With Tossy Spivakovsky as soloist, Gian-Carlo Menotti's Violin Concerto in A minor was introduced to the Philharmonic-Symphony repertory Saturday night in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Spivakovsky and the orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos' direction also played Mozart's Adagio in E major (K. 261) in a program which closed seasonably with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" Overture.

Mr. Menotti's concerto was first played here by Efrem Zimbalist with the Philadelphians in December, 1952. Mr. Spivakovsky and most of the musicians who were heard with him on Saturday had played it at the Lewisohn Stadium last July. It is consistently effective; grateful for the soloist, whose music is prevalently in the foreground, and appealing and unproblematic for the listener.

The composer has provided a generous and continuous supply of melodies in this well organized and skillfully scored work, which also has an engaging spirit. In the first movement lively activity is almost too constant, before the adagio provides a contrasted lyric calm, but the reasons for the warmth of its reception by the audience were readily evident.

Tonal clarity, fluency and warmth and technical brilliance marked Mr. Spivakovsky's playing, which also scored with its projection of the inherent high spirits of the concerto. Ingratiating tone and expressive dignity characterized the violinist's sympathetic performance of the seldom heard but treasurable Mozart adagio. The orchestra, which gave the soloist sympathetic co-operation in both works, also played Bach's Suite No. 3 and Ralph Vaughan Williams' Tallis Fantasia, which had been heard on Thursday and Friday.

Easter and Farewell Highlight Weekend

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A combination of Easter observance and seasonal farewell marked much of the weekend's quota of music.

The Metropolitan left behind the memory of a moving "Parsifal" on Saturday (distinguished, among other things, by the stalwart voice and style of Hans Hotter as Gurnemanz) before setting out on its hinterland conquest.

Saturday night, at Town Hall, Dame Myra Hess—Britain's first lady of the keys—said goodby to her local admirers by way of Beethoven's Opus 110 Sonata and Brahms' Piano Quintet in F Minor.

The occasion was the third Artur Schnabel Memorial Concert, falling this time on the late pianist's birthday. Participating artists included the Juilliard String Quartet.

Dame Myra was rousingly greeted when she appeared for the Beethoven sonata. Her playing was again in a tradition of warmth and depth and wholehearted devotion to the art she so nobly serves.

The Juilliard ensemble is one of the most eloquent foursomes in the field. This was clear even in Schnabel's long-winded First String Quartet, (dating back to 1918)—a premiere, for all its good points, that might have been tactfully deferred still further.

It is always good to be reminded of Artur Schnabel and his varied contributions as pianist, teacher, editor and earnest spokesman for the musical way of life. As composer his status remains dubious.

The weekend brought back Gian-Carlo Menotti's violin concerto, the carrier being Tossy Spivakovsky, aided by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic. This—to my thinking—is the American concerto likeliest to succeed in future repertories.

Mr. Spivakovsky played the music as if Menotti had had him—and only him—in mind as soloist. Facile technique, smooth tone and bold drive made it seem that way.

Mr. Mitropoulos, always an exciting conductor, was at his exciting best in the Philharmonic's own holiday greeting card—Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture.

Admirable playing and a slightly too generous length marked yesterday's concert, the last of the "odd" Thursday night series in Carnegie Hall, by the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra under the devoted leadership of Dimitri Mitropoulos. The program, mainly of nineteenth century music, overlapped into the twentieth with an American work composed fifty years ago, but new to the Philharmonic repertory, the late Frederick S. Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter."

In seeking out music by American composers of a past generation, as well as those of today, Mr. Mitropoulos has set an example well worth emulating, although this particular work cast light on Converse's problems as well as on his accomplishments. The latter include masterly, vividly hued and highly effective scoring, also the projection of the emotions of the Whitman poem on which this fantasy is based, particularly in the first half of its twenty-minute course. Later the moods were still projected, but less cogently. But Converse could not devise a musical parallel of Whitman's poetic originality; the score was not heterogenous, but yet clearly revealed the influence of various masters, mainly if not exclusively Germanic, including Wagner and Richard Strauss.

In the surging of a dominating idea in the earlier sections, there was a suggestion of Scriabin's three principal orchestral works, but the earliest of these had not been played when Converse wrote "The Mystic Trumpeter." This is honest, eloquent music, but his individuality did not assert itself over what now seem obvious derivations. The early Bizet symphony in C also had its derivations, but these are better absorbed in the work's straightforward melodic simplicity.

Lelia Gousseau, the French pianist who was first heard here last season with this orchestra and conductor, exhibited both technical fluency and taste in Chopin's Concerto in F minor. There was pervasive clarity, also laudable dynamic nuance. But at times the savor of the music eluded her; as in the romantic ascents of the first movement and the brilliant episodes in the finale. Its close, however, fared well, and there was persuasive understanding in her disclosure of the more meditative romanticism of the larghetto.

The orchestral accompaniment was sympathetic and well co-ordinated, and Mr. Mitropoulos and his musicians played the Converse work with memorable enthusiasm, intensity and conviction. They also fared laudably in the rest of the program, including the dramatically presented Lalo overture and the bright Chabrier music.

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A precise and poetic reading of Chopin's F minor Concerto served to reintroduce Lelia Gousseau, French pianist, to Philharmonic patrons in Carnegie Hall last night.

When she first appeared with the Philharmonic two years ago, Miss Gousseau used as credentials the local premiere of a piano concerto by Albert Roussel—a work that had brought her fame and prizes in Europe.

The Roussel concerto was a glib and facile score, made to order for Miss Gousseau's nimble fingers. Last night's reading showed a great deal more than nimble fingers. It showed a quiet intensity and a probing search for inner values.

It wasn't a brilliant performance, but a sound and satisfying one—the kind that lulled you gently into an acceptance of Miss Gousseau's gifts and Frederic Chopin's genius.

Shelved Fantasy.

There was a belated American novelty on last night's bill—the late Frederick Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter."

This work was composed half a century ago, performed in 1905 by the Philadelphia Orchestra and overlooked—or politely sidestepped—by the Philharmonic for the next five decades.

One could understand the delay last night. It is a sincere and deeply felt score, inspired by Walt Whitman's moving lines to cosmic love and brotherhood. But it is a long and rambling score, too, tame and in places very derivative.

The best moments pack a ringing fervor—as at Whitman's far-flung prophecy, "War, sorrow, suffering gone—the rank earth purged—nothing left but joy." The rest is the work of a conscientious craftsman with a good memory.

Dimitri Mitropoulos applied remarkable warmth and zeal to restoring this earnest American score to temporary life. This continual dusting off of forgotten American music may some day uncover a masterpiece. Let's keep trying.

Other numbers on last night's program were Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture, Bizet's Symphony in C and the "Fete Polonaise" from Chabrier's "Le Roi Malgre Lui"—all French and all done in the best French style of clarity and precision.

Philharmonic-Symphony Returns After Triumphant Tour of South

Orchestra Greeted By Sold-Out Houses Throughout Tour—Largest Single Audience Numbered 12,000

After a spring tour of two weeks in 14 cities, the Philharmonic returns to its home in Carnegie Hall for the final three weeks of its 112th season. During the current tour which started in Huntington, West Virginia, and ends in the Nation's Capital, the Orchestra has played in five towns in which it has not hitherto performed and throughout the entire journey has played to sold-out houses.

Perhaps the high point for audience members was Lexington, Kentucky, where, despite rain, sleet and freezing temperature, the three-year old Memorial Coliseum on the University Campus was filled to capacity with an audience of 12,000, all subscribers to the Central Kentucky Community Concerts Series. The Orchestra's opening concert in Huntington was also sold out several days in advance of their arrival.

For the first concerts upon his return to New York, Maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos, Musical Director, will present an all-orchestral program with the Philharmonic-Symphony. Ouening with the Bash Suite No. 3 in D major, the program will continue with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double String Orchestra. Following the intermission, Maestro Mitropoulos will perform the Prokofieff Symphony No. 5 which the Orchestra has included on its recent tour programs.

Written just ten years ago in the summer of 1944, the Prokofieff work was given its world premiere under Alexander Gauk in Moscow on March 3, 1945, and received its first American performances under Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in November of that year. The Symphony was first heard on Philharmonic programs under Artur Rodzinski on March 21, 1946.

For his Saturday-Sunday programs, Dimitri Mitropoulos will have Tossy Spivakovsky as soloist in Gian Carlo Menotti's Violin Concerto in A minor in its first performances by the Society. The Italian-born composer who received his musical education at the Curtis Institute under Rosario Scalero, wrote this work for Efrem Zimbalist, Director of the Institute. The work was first performed by Zimbalist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in December of 1952.

Menotti first came to public attention 15 years ago with a student performance of his opera "Amelia Goes to the Ball" and it is largely through his other operatic works that he has remained almost constantly before the public since that time. His one-act operas, "The Medium" and "The Telephone" enjoyed great success on Broadway and toured the country. They have also been produced extensively abroad, while both "The Consul" and "Amahl and the Night Visitors" have also been widely heard, the latter having become an annual Christmas presentation over television. The Violin Concerto, based on the idea that the violin is a lyric instrument, is composed in a singing style. It is traditional in form, except for the cadenza which appears in the slow second movement rather than in the first movement.

Mr. Menotti has just returnde to this country from Italy where he staged "Amelia Goes to the Ball" for La Scala, Milan, and "The Consul" for the Rome Opera.

Mr. Spivakovsky will also perform the Adagio in E major for Violin and Orchestra (K. 261) by Mozart, a virtuoso piece written by the composer for the Italian violinist, Gaetano Brunetti.

Tossy Spivakovsky made her first appearance as soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on October 14, 1943, presenting the New York Premiere of the Bartok Violin Concerto.

Maestro Mitropoulos will als present on his programs of Saturday and Sunday the Bach Suit No. 3 in D major. Vaughs Williams Fantasia on a Theme b Thomas Tallis and will close th concerts with Rimsky-Korsakov "Russian Easter" Overture.

Philharmonic's Salute To France Proves Bore

By PAUL AFFELDER

A 17-year-old composer outranked his elders on last night's Philharmonic-Symphony program, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos at Carnegie Hall.

The composer was Georges Bizet who, in 1855, as a student at a Paris Conservatory, wrote his Symphony in C Major. This spirited work stood head and shoulders above the other material offered on this occasion. The symphony has much charm and bounce, and came off quite well, even though Mr. Mitropoulos made the scherzo sound heavy-footed and hovered on the brink of catastrophe with his unrealistically fast tempo in the finale.

But then, Bizet had very little competition on a program conspicuous for the poor quality of its content. The concert planned as a sort of unofficial observance of the current "Paris in New York Week," was predominantly French. It began with the long-winded overture to Lalo's opera, "Le Roi D'Ys," which seems to be one of Mr. Mitropoulos' favorites. He succeeded in extracting every ounce of drama and passion from its numerous pages, but even his loving treatment couldn't keep the whole thing from being pretty tedious.

He ended the evening with the attractive, though fairly lightweight "Fete Polonaise" from another French opera, Chabrier's "Le Roi Malgre Lui." Here, however, his excessive use of rubato robbed this tuneful score of much of its gusto.

There was even a Parisian soloist on the program—the pianist, Lelia Gousseau—playing a concerto by a man who spent most of his life in the French capital—Frederic Chopin. But there is nothing Parisian about Chopin's two concerti, both of which were written while he was still in Warsaw. The work heard last night was the Concerto No. 2 in F Minor. Again, excessive retards and other liberties with the underlying rhythmic pulse—this time by the soloist—tended to emasculate the music. Mlle. Gousseau played with a generally warm, singing tone, and there were moments of deep expressiveness in her interpretation. But her overall conception didn't have enough "go" to keep the whole thing from becoming quite boring.

The United States had a representative on the program, too. The late Frederick S. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after a poem by Walt Whitman, was accorded its first Philharmonic performance. It was a good performance, too—so good, in fact, that it only served to throw into bold relief the many dated cliches of the work, which was written early in this century. It was an antique curiosity and little more.

The quality of the orchestral playing was generally high throughout the concert. In addition to Mlle. Gousseau, there were some fine soloists to be heard in the orchestra itself. Performances of a high order were given by Laszlo Varga, first 'cellist, in the Lalo; Harold Gomberg, first oboist, in the Bizet, and William Vacchiano, first trumpeter, in the Converse.

Mitropoulos dug up the American composer, Converse's orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter" for the Philharmonic-Symphony program in Carnegie Hall last night. It took a half century for the country's oldest orchestra to play it.

Though representative of sound musicianship and true sincerity of purpose, this work of 1903-04 nevertheless sounds dated. The Walt Whitman poem that inspired it, however, is not.

One is grateful to have heard the music in the fullness of the performance Mitropoulos gave it. Such a work attests the substantial character of American music at the turn of the century, no matter how conventional it appears now.

Lelia Gousseau was the piano soloist of the evening in Chopin's F Minor concerto. While she gave a technically firm clean-cut account of her part, her performance as a whole made this listener more conscious of the notes than of the music. This was forthright Chopin, somewhat tonally dehydrated in the first and third movements but ingratiating in the second.

The overlong program opened with Lalo's overture in "Le Roi D's," included Bizet's symphony in C, and closed with Chabrier's "Fete Polonaise" from "Le Roi Malgre Lui." The orchestra was in fine form.

The music that made the program of the concert by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society Thursday night in Carnegie Hall was all of the so-called "romantic" persuasion of the late nineteenth century. None of it was monumental, or heaven-storming. This program gave pleasure partly by the fresh feeling and sincerity of the music, partly by reason of the fact that the music was interpreted by Mr. Mitropoulos in as romantic a spirit as it was written.

This was astonishingly the case with the good old overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." Played in routine fashion the piece sounds like a theatrical pot-boiler of the second class. One could have believed Thursday night that he was in at the opera's première, hearing this exciting music for the first time. And how superbly the old-fashioned orchestration sounded.

The tone-poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after Whitman, by F. S. Converse, was played for the first time by the society, fifty-nine years after its première by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. The effect of this music was also much stronger than had been expected. The style and the idioms are those of a half-century ago. The theme of the mystic trumpeter is very much akin to the horn theme of the finale of the Brahms C minor symphony.

This theme, mysteriously prepared in a passage of instrumentation that has the refinement and distinction of color native to Converse, is resourcefully transformed according to the evocations of the poem. The excellent counterpoint is that of the man who studied, as did most American composers of Converse's generation who could go abroad, with Rheinberger of Munich.

The ancestry of the music is evident. One hears some Brahms, as noted, some Strauss, even a soupçon of Debussy, whose "Pelleas" was two years old when "The Mystic Trumpeter" had its first performance. The implied thought of the work is that of the romantic age—love, conflict, salvation, with apotheosis at the last of the trumpet motif.

It is obvious as tomorrow morning, where the manner of the music is concerned. But there is something else than the notes themselves in the work of art, and that is the spiritual approach of its creator. Converse's tone-poem hung together wonderfully well, developed surely and inevitably to its climax and was an unquestioned success with the audience.

As much cannot be said for the effect of the Chopin F minor concerto with Lelia Gousseau as pianist. She played unaffectedly, with musicianship, but not with the temperament or the poetical communication that makes a halo about this early Chopin music when it is adequately performed. Nor was the performance exemplary in point of technical finish.

PianoConcerto'sPremiere

Everett Helm's Piano Concerto No. 1 received its first American performance Saturday night at the Philharmonic - Symphony's subscription concert in Carnegie Hall. Leonid Hambro was the soloist, Dimitri Mitropoulos the conductor, and the remainder of the program listed Lalo's Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Bizet's Symphony in C, and Tchaikovsky's symphonic fantasy "Francesca da Rimini."

Mr. Helm's concerto has its moments of glory and is, for a fact, extremely clean and sturdy in its manufacture. As a whole, however, the work does not quite jell, since its tunes, though never banal, are undefined in profile, and its development procedures, though busy, are rarely engrossing. The concerto is, in the main, conservative in its harmonic and orchestral dress, and the piano writing is ever idiomatic and mindful of the virtuoso bent of present-day pianists. As such the piece on occasion thrusts forward with a firm seminal idea or a handsome keyboard splash. But these instances, while pure and genuine in inspiration, do not occur with sufficient frequency to give the concerto's three movements the hearty substance necessary to sustain its length.

Mr. Hambro, whose talent far exceeds his reputation,, played, as is his fashion, with utter conviction and mastery. His obvious belief in the rightness of Mr. Helm's concerto straightway communicated itself to an audience that recalled both pianist and composer for several rounds of applause. J. S. H.

Renown Of Glass Center Grows

Music Greatly Played, Interpreted By N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony

By BOB LYON

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's visit to the Corning Glass Center Wednesday evening will accelerate the transition of that young institution from one already renowned in the field of fine glass to one celebrated in the wider world of the fine arts.

During the less than three years of the Center's existence, some of the most distinguished artists and thinkers in the land have appeared on its stage. Plays, art films, art exhibitions have been premiered there. But not before last night had Dimitri Mitropoulos and New York's great symphony orchestra been heard within its walls. For the fact that they were on this occasion, the sell-out audience and the community owe their thanks not only to the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York but to the sponsoring organizations: the Glass Center, the Civic Music Association, and Corning's own Philharmonic Society.

It was not the music conducted by Mr. Mitropoulos which distinguished the occasion, for it is not greatly distinguished music. But it was both greatly played and sympathetically interpreted. All of it was of the romantic school, a type more welcomed by audiences than by many of today's classical minded executants, who do not quite grasp its emotional inner meaning.

Just as it is wrong to play music of the classical school romantically, so it is wrong to play romantic music in any other way. It was Mr. Mitropoulos' understanding interpretation and the instantaneous manner in which the orchestra caught and reflected that interpretation, which distinguished this concert. Together they cleared accumulated stains from the canvas and restored the composers' colors to their original brightness.

The featured work, Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2, in E minor, is particularly a case in point. This composition is as romantic as a poet's daydreams, with briefly carefree moods struggling out from woodwind and string tone, only to be opposed by dark warnings in the violins and brass, heard like the comments of a Greek chorus.

Mr. Mitropoulos never muddied these transitions, but through sensitive cuings kept them clear and shimmering as the pastels of the Painted Desert. This applied especially to the fugal passages in the second movement, in which somber introspection is transformed into temporary exuberance. In the adagio third movement the three subjects intermingled in billows of sound reminiscent of the sea 24 hours after a storm. But throughout the performance Mr. Mitropolous judiciously conserved his orchestra's full - volume power until he needed it for the climaxes of the final movement.

Transparent orchestration and full use of instrumental color also marked the playing of the overture to Edouard Lalo's opera, "Le Roi dYs." This tale, which is concerned with the submerging of a mythical seacoast city and with the amorous intrigues which take place within the latter's court, demands gigantic Wagnerian leaps from storming tidal faves to the murmurs of love.

From the Symphony in C major, a sort of glorified class-room exercise written by Georges Bizet at the age of 17, conductor and orchestra extracted everything of value which they could find. The composer of "Carmen" never was a true symphonist, nor did the 17-year-old Bizet possess the maturity of the 17-year-old Mozart. The work, composed in 1855, was not heard in concert for 80 years.

The symphony is frankly imitative, and its execution last night exposed the borrowings without mercy. (Curiously, however, certain Beethovenian cliches which this reviewer previously believed he had found over the ground bass figures in the third movement, did not seem to be there at all. Perhaps they never were!)

To satisfy an insistently applauding audience, Mr. Mitropoulos presented as encore the Fetes Polonaises, taken from Chabrier's opera, "Le Roi Malgre Lui." It is as much mazurka as polonaise, and nearly everyone thought that portions of it were Viennese waltz. Mr. Mitropoulos said after the concert that he, himself, had not discovered the composition until last year.

Everything on the program was straight out of the orchestra's current New York book: The Lalo, Bizet, and Chabrier compositions from last week's Carnegie Hall concerts, the Rachmaninoff from those which will be offered this week.

Watching his masterful conducting, probably few in the audience were aware that Mr. Mitropoulos has been handicapped lately by a neuritic condition which has caused him to employ a baton in a deliberate effort to inhibit the full action of his right shoulder.

CONCERTO BY HELM HAS U. S. PREMIERE

Work for Piano and Orchestra Is Offered at Philharmonic Program—Hambro Soloist

By NOEL STRAUS

The special feature of the concert given by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos at Carnegie Hall Saturday night was the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in G by Everett Helm. Leonid Hambro was the soloist in the work, which received its American première.

The novelty at once established Mr. Helm as one of the best trained and most competent of the younger generation of American composers. Whether one happened to be in sympathy with the type of music his concerto exemplified, one had to admire the skill and musicianship it displayed on every page of the score.

The 41-year-old composer from Minneapolis, now resident in Germany, where he was theatre and music officer for the Military Government in 1948-50, studied with Malipiero, Vaughan Williams and Milhaud. In his concerto, which was first performed in Berlin in 1950, the chief influence stemmed from the polytonalists. But the neo-classic creation was characterized by an imagination for color combinations, a vividness and power quite his own.

One of the reasons Mr. Helm's concerto made a real impression was that in it he does not, like many of his colleagues, scorn the emotions. The Adagio measures of the slow movement, for instance, showed decided subjective feeling, while the ensuing Andante section contained an episode in rapid chromatic figurations remarkable for its evocation of a mysterious mood as well as for its individual kind of orchestral tinting.

Strength and Interest

Mr. Helm proved economical in his thematic material and he knew how to develop it in a way to give his music strength and interest.

The exacting piano part was splendidly played by the gifted Mr. Hambro, who seemed to exhaust the possibilities of the solo passages, whether they asked brilliance and percussiveness or the utmost in sensitivity and suavity of tone. This concerto needed the versatile approach of an artist like Mr. Hambro. He was able to perform it in virtuoso fashion and then turn yesterday afternoon to the quite different demands of Rachmaninoff's Fourth Piano Concerto at Carnegie, with the same forces.

Mr. Helm was fortunate in having his work led by so deeply comprehending an interpreter of contemporary compositions as Mr. Mitropoulos, who made every point in it count at its full value. It was warmly welcomed and there were many bows at the end from the composer, the conductor and the pianist.

The concerto was followed by Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Mr. Mitropoulos gave it a reading notable for sweep, dramatic urge and poetic ardor. The rest of the program had been heard at the preceding pair of concerts.

Renown Of Glass Center Grows

Music Greatly Played, Interpreted By N. Y. Philharmonic-Symphony

By BOB LYON

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's visit to the Corning Glass Center Wednesday evening will accelerate the transition of that young institution from one already renowned in the field of fine glass to one celebrated in the wider world of the fine arts.

During the less than three years of the Center's existence, some of the most distinguished artists and thinkers in the land have appeared on its stage. Plays, art films, art exhibitions have been premiered there. But not before last night had Dimitri Mitropoulos and New York's great symphony orchestra been heard within its walls. For the fact that they were on this occasion, the sell-out audience and the community owe their thanks not only to the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York but to the sponsoring organizations: the Glass Center, the Civic Music Association, and Corning's own Philharmonic Society.

It was not the music conducted by Mr. Mitropoulos which distinguished the occasion, for it is not greatly distinguished music. But it was both greatly played and sympathetically interpreted. All of it was of the romantic school, a type more welcomed by audiences than by many of today's classical minded executants, who do not quite grasp its emotional inner meaning.

New York Philharmonic Pleases Corning Crowd

By BOB SUTHERLAND

CORNING — Maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos and his New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra last night treated nearly 2,000 Corning area music lovers to an extraordinary concert of musicians' music, lesser known works that brought out the finest points of the 104-piece instruments.

The Corning Glass Center, crowded to capacity with one of the largest audiences in its brief history, extended its seating capacity to include upstairs bleachers as well as the entire downstairs area.

The concert, sponsored by the Corning and Painted Post Civic Music Association, opened with the seldom heard overture to "LeRoi D' Ys" by Edouard Lalo.

From the defiant clarinet air which highlights the opening movement of the overture, audience reaction to this exceptional offering was rapt.

The clarity of Mitripoulos' direction and the virtuosity of the orchestra simplified the following of the composer's introduction of operatic voices in the overture, while the sequence of clarion arias from the reed section and trumpet work throughout proved the selection of an overture that superceded its opera.

Another comparative unknown the Symphony in C Major by George Bizet, was a more than suitable successor to the overture.

Though Bizet is noted primarily for his "Carmen" and during his lifetime was unworthily charged with "Wagnerian influences," his C Major, heard for the first time by many in the area shows much of the lightness and grace embodied in his many operas comique.

Written when Bizet was only 17, the symphony shows traces of contemporary influences and not until the adagio's picturesque oboe solo by Harold Gomberg, played against a background of pizzicato violas did the audience warm to the effect.

Two allegro vivaces, which conclude the work, brought in the dance-like minuet theme that remind one more of the gypsy effect that has become Bizet's trademark through his better known works.

Despite a seeming lack of familiarity with the opening selections, the audience showed overwhelming approval of the choices.

The orchestra's choice of its second major presentation, Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2 in E Minor, Opus 27, was like an old friend embellished with the finest instrumental exactness.

Though better known than Bizet's Symphony, the E Minor, with its typically Russian-composer effects, does not now have the popularity it attained early in the 1900s.

This, Corning's first home taste of a philharmonic symphony that has been acclaimed across the country as one of the greatest aggregations of its kind ever assembled, was a meaty dish, long to be savored in the local music appreciation.

Last night's attendance may well be reckoned a demand for the finest available in orchestras and the Corning and Painted Post Association, while accepting well deserved acclaim for its labors, may be encored to do so again.

Another Outstanding Event

Last night's concert by the New York Philharmonic Symphony at Corning's Glass Center is another remarkable event to those in attendance and to the community and area as a whole. The signal achievement of bringing this world famous Symphony to our community was outstanding but the enjoyment of the hundreds who heard the program was even greater.

The Corning and Painted Post Civic Music Association, the Corning Philharmonic Society and the Corning Glass Center deserve the highest of commendation for their courage in undertaking such a program and the support given by the community and area indicate their efforts were appreciated. The support removes any doubt that might have existed as to the reception that would be given such a program.

Dimitri Mitropoulos gave new vigor and interest to the local music lovers for his direction of the 104 piece Symphony through a comparative unknown, yet beautiful overture, and two Symphonies as part of the regular program. The noted conductor then presented a vigorous encore unlike the generally short and commonly known selections used by many such units. It was a program, from start to finish, that demanded the utmost in perfection of play and conducting the Symphony's 5298th Concert—though the first in Corning—was an unique and welcome success. It is to be hoped that another season will provide our community with a return engagement of this outstanding group.

The presentation of the New York Symphony would not have been possible without such facilities as incorporated in the Corning Glass Center. The Center, now an accepted institution to our community, is constantly exceeding the goal set for it during when it was conceived and dedicated. It is clearly becoming a cultural and community center that is the envy of hundreds of larger communities in the country. It is making this community richer in every way because of the opportunities it presents and the leadership it is developing in such enterprises.

Concerto in Bow

By MILES KASTENDIECK

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS and the Philharmonic-Symphony began the final weekend of their season in Carnegie Hall last night.

True to his forward-looking thoughts, Mitropoulos offered the world premiere of Richard Mohaupt's violin concerto with young Michael Rabin as soloist. Both concerto and violinist were well received.

Written in the usual three movements, the concerto achieves an unusual atmospheric quality in the orchestral part. The solo part makes grateful playing in itself and within this setting. The work as a whole is well put together.

Rhythmic interest dominates the score, but there is a strong urge to sustain melody. Most of the themes sound more serviceable than salient.

They start well but their promise seldom materializes into a completely satisfying entity. Some of them tend to work around one note too much. Harmonically the work poses no listening problems.

Violinists should find it worth cultivating. Rabin coped with it in easy fashion. His fine technique, varied tonal hues and temperament made his performance much more than just a presentation of notes. He has progressed definitely in the right direction since his last appearance.

The performance of the evening, however, was Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony. It was not only exceptionally well interpreted but it was impressively played. Seldom have its long melodic lines been so expertly shaped and the orchestration so clearly set forth.

This was Mitropoulos in one of his finest moments. Wholeheartedly with him, the orchestra played radiantly. The old romantic fervor of the work did the rest.

This program opened with the seldom-played overture to Verdi's "Nabucco."

Premiere of Mohaupt Work Conducted by Mitropoulos

By PAUL AFFELDER

Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra began the final week of their season last evening in Carnegie Hall.

It isn't often that one encounters a world premiere at the very tail end of an orchestral season, but Mr. Mitropoulos is unpredictable. Last night he offered the initial hearing of the Violin Concerto by Richard Mohaupt.

The German-born composer, who now lives in New York, wrote the work in 1945. It is in the customary three movements, but the organizational plan of the individual movements is somewhat at variance with traditional forms.

Nevertheless, the work is extremely well put together. Most of the themes are attractive and original; the harmonic treatment is sound, and the orchestration is colorful.

The well-written solo part was expertly played by Michael Rabin, who will celebrate his 18th birthday this Sunday. He was eminently equal to the work's considerable technical demands, and he made the lyrical passages sing with exquisite tone.

To do all this was sufficient accomplishment for one of his tender years. The concerto would have benefited, however, from an interpretation by both soloist and conductor that got farther beneath the surface than that accorded it last night.

As set forth on this occasion, its high point, for us, was its beautiful slow movement, rich, songful and poetic.

The concerto certainly ranks as one of the season's better novelties. Evidently the audience concurred in this opinion, for it gave the work, its composer and its interpreters a warm sendoff.

Overture to 'Nabucco'

Mr. Mitropoulos, as we remarked, is an unpredictable program-maker. He began the concert with the overture to Verdi's early opera, "Nabucco." In its very creation, this curtain-raiser was an afterthought on the part of the composer, and it didn't sound like much more last evening, despite the rousing performance given it by Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra.

This may be fine music for an open-air band concert, but it's scarcely philharmonic caliber—certainly not for the closing week of a season.

But conductor and orchestra did conclude the concert on a gloriously triumphant note with a persuasively warm-hearted performance of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony in E Minor. This is one of Mr. Mitropoulos' favorites, and last night he seemed to revel in every sonorous page.

As a result, he was inclined to linger too long over certain phrases in the first and third movements—he retarded at the end of almost every phrase in the former—but he injected plenty of life and excitement into the scherzo and finale.

The Philharmonic

By Jay S. Harrison

For the final Thursday night concert in its Carnegie Hall series, the Philharmonic-Symphony, under Dimitri Mitropoulos, last night schose to play an all nineteenth century program. And this condition is not in the least altered by the fact that the evening's two major works were written in the twentieth century. Both Richard Mohaupt's Concerto for Violin, given its world premiere on the occasion by young Michael Rabin, and Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony are guided in their travels by a romantic muse, and Verdi's Overture to the opera "Nabucco" is a period piece to stop them all.

Mr. Mohaupt's new work is, in effect, a prolonged rhapsody for violin and orchestra. Its impetus and afflatus are thoroughly lyric, its substance and subject that of song. Throughout, Mr. Mohaupt has made it apparent that he wishes to wash the ear in gracious, spiralling tunes, and to accomplish his purpose he has kept his orchestra respectfully subordinate and has allowed his fiddler to dwell at length on a host of melodies that range in quality from the bold to the maudlin.

Indeed, the composer has even seen fit to dilute his harmonic underpinning lest it interfere with the ecstatic airs he has designed for his soloist. And it is only in the work's rhythmic direction that he has offered these airs any genuine competition. For rhythmically, the concerto has a nervy, aggressive bounce that carries it ahead at moments when its forward motion seems on the verge of faltering. This rhythm, however is super-imposed from above, as it were, and does not actually feed or nourish the piece. It is present for the sake of convenience; it is a brace to support the concerto's arioso limbs when they are about to sag.

Mr. Rabin, who is on the point of reaching his eighteenth birthday, has become an impassioned spokesman for music whose nature is authentically romantic. Ever he plays with heart, and his fingers neither slip nor slide. Perfection is his way, or, at any rate, the goal at which he aims. Last night, in dealing with an untried concerto, he treated the piece as though it were an old and trusted friend. Thus presented, the concerto seemed a regular member of the repertoire rather than a new entry into music's hall of fame.

The remaining portion of the program was given to numbers so resolute in their habits that Mr. Mitropoulos' personal handling of them in no way unsettled their character. Verdi's preface to "Nabucco" is a blood and guts overture with crackling drums and soaring tunes. It was read with these features flying. And though this reviewer, when confronted with Rachmaninoff's E minor Symphony, feels that he has been tossed into a lake of marshmallow whip, he cannot deny the vigor and spirit with which Mr. Mitropoulos drove the work into life.

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Michael Rabin, the local boy who made good on the singing strings, is currently celebrating his 18th birthday with three appearances as soloist of the Philharmonic.

The first of them occurred last night in Carnegie Hall in a world premiere of Richard Mohaupt's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.

The other appearances are scheduled for Saturday and Sunday, Mr. Rabin's anniversary, on both of which occasions he will play the Glazounoff Concerto.

As if that weren't enough, Mr. Rabin is also making the neighborhood rounds as the unseen—but brilliantly heard—virtuoso in the film "Rhapsody."

Great Prestige.

Mr. Mohaupt was fortunate in having this gifted youngster to launch his latest composition. Mr. Rabin gave it the benefit of those qualifications that have already brought him vast prestige.

Those qualifications consisted of a warm and beautiful tone, a technique capable of taking all of Mr. Mohaupt's tricks in stride and an appealing personality.

On the way out, to an obbligato of rousing applause, the boy received a proud smile of approval from one of the first violinists of the orchestra—George Rabin, his father.

Dimitri Mitropoulos conducted a perfectly scaled and balanced reading of the new work—one, moreover, humming with intensity from beginning to end.

This is a good concerto, eminently playable and full of meaty passages frob oth the violin and the orchestra. Mr. Hohaupt has written it for, rather than against, the violin.

Three Categories.

There are three kinds of violin concertos—those that are great music and also good for the violin; those that are neither great music nor good for the violin; and those that are good for the violin without being great music.

Mr. Mohaupt's belongs to the last category. The best movement is the second—a smoothly work-ed-out reverie that borrows a few well-placed moments from the Largo of Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony.

One was grateful to Mr. Mitropoulos for bringing back Verdi's bustling little overture to his early opera, "Nabucco," and for ending the concert with a powerful reading of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony.

RABIN IS SOLOIST AT PHILHARMONIC

Violinist Heard in Premiere of Mohaupt Concerto—Verdi Work Impresses

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting; Michael Rabin, violinist. At Carnegie Hall.
Overture to Nabucco.....Verdi
Violin Concerto (first time).....Mohaupt
Symphony No. 2 .....Rachmaninoff

By OLIN DOWNES

The final Thursday night subscription concert of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society took place under Mr. Mitropoulos' direction last night in Carnegie Hall, and the occasion proved a triumph for conductor and orchestra.

In part the program was unusual, beginning with the early operatic overture to Verdi's "Nabucco" and including the first performance of Richard Mohaupt's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, with the young and exceptionally gifted Michael Rabin as soloist. These works did not lessen the effect of the familiar Second Symphony of Rachmaninoff since Mr. Mitropoulos' inspired performance of a fine work was a fresh and exciting experience.

The overture to Verdi's early opera is remarkable for the obviousness of its harmonies and turns of phrase and, nevertheless, impressive because of the power of its revolutionary spirit. The overture is not a work of symphonic caliber, and is therefore seldom heard at orchestral concerts. Yet it is eminently worth the hearing, not only for its passionate emotion, but also for the fact that in its form and treatment of the themes it is one of the best-balanced of all Verdi's overtures.

Mr. Rabin sacrificed himself generously upon the altar of a work that is difficult and showy enough in the solo violin part to reflect eminent credit upon a capable performer, but that, on account of its inherent dryness, brings little that favors the fortunes of its interpreter. We greatly prefer to this concerto the suite of Mr. Mohaupt, the "Town Piper" music, played in a previous season. That music, not highly original in invention, was nevertheless witty and entertaining and well made.

The concerto of last night is well made, though stretched out in places. Mr. Rabin played it magnificently, and it is anything but a simple work to play. After the performance there were repeated recalls for the soloist, the conductor and the composer of the concerto, who was present and bowed with the others from the stage.

For sheer musical worth, the Rachmaninoff Symphony towered above everything else on the program. Had it been a less felicitous creation than it is, Mr. Mitropoulos' interpretation would have made the occasion. No more sensitive, intimate and dramatic performance of this splendid work, with its fine Slavic pomp and gloom and lyricism, and its endless fertility of ideas and resource in their development, could, we believe, have been provided. And now that the years are passing, this absolutely sincere and inspired symphony, in which there is not a chord that was strange to Mendelssohn or Weber or Schubert of more than a century ago, becomes not weaker or aged, but greater and more alive, because of the heart in it, with every hearing.

This is probably Rachmaninoff's strongest symphonic composition. It will be played for many years to come and long outlive our generation.

At the conclusion of the symphony, the audience cheered Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra and continued cheering for minutes before it would let the conductor go. The Philharmonic-Symphony has reason to pride itself upon this concluding program of its 1953-54 subscription season.

Philharmonic Final

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra closed its busy 112th season of 135 concerts Saturday night and yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, with Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Both sessions included Glazounoff's Violin Concerto in A minor, with Michael Rabin as soloist; George Szell's arrangement of the "Perpetual Motion" finale of Weber's Piano Sonata in C, Op 24, and Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony. Saturday's concert also brought the public premiere of James Dalgleish's "Statement for Orchestra," which shared the B'nai B'rith Victory Lodge's latest $1,000 George Gershwin Memorial Award with Kenneth Gaburo's "On a Quiet Theme." The latter work will be introduced next season. Both composers received their winners' checks from Mr. Mitropoulos and Maurice B. Leschen on behalf of Victory Lodge's George Gershwin Memorial Foundation in Carnegie Hall's Green Room before the concert.

"Statement for Orchestra," whose prevailing dissonant idiom provided an effective contrast with the continuously melodic nature of the rest of the program, is the first movement of a symphony. Mr. Dalgleish, a twenty-six-year-old New Yorker, here shows a notable command of orchestral resources; the constructive plan is interesting and ingenious. An extensive theme of salient profile pervades the twelve minutes of the work in various guises; a shorter, plangently announced theme also vies for attention. The possibilities of its constructive plan did not seem, however, to be fully realized; the sense of progress and destination varied. But the style was individual and homogenous, and there was expressive content in these often dourly meditative measures.

Mr. Rabin played Glazounoff's concerto on Saturday with thorough technical mastery and general understanding of its fluent romanticism, although here and there this element could have been more positively asserted. The orchestra was a little overbearing in the first movement. Yesterday, when he repeated the concerto, was the violinist's eighteenth birthday. George Szell's Weber transcription, made fourteen years ago but new to these concerts, is expertly wrought and entirely successful in making the swift-flying music seem as though it was originally conceived for orchestra. This was played with lightness and brilliance, and Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic were again thoroughly at home in the generously lyric Rachmaninoff symphony.

SEASON IS ENDED BY PHILHARMONIC

Two Concerts Over Week-End Conclude Stint—Rabin Plays Glazunoff Violin Concerto

With its week-end pair of concerts, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony brought to a conclusion its 112th season. Dimitri Mitropoulos was the conductor, and Michael Rabin was the violin soloist in Glazunoff's Violin Concerto in A minor.

Mr. Rabin, a veteran, now all of 18 years old, is, as everybody knows, phenomenally gifted. He gave a poised, accurate reading; one that may have been a little too careful, perhaps, just a shade too reticent, but superbly articulated and beautiful in tone.

Besides the Rachmaninoff Symphony No. 2, which had been played earlier in the week, the Saturday evening program contained two novelties. One was the first performance by the orchestra of George Szell's arrangement of Weber's "Perpetual Motion" from the C major Piano Sonata. It was effective, brilliant, quite unnecessary and will make a good "pops" item on summer programs.

James Dalgleish's "Statement for Orchestra" had its world premiere. This work was co-winner of the current Gershwin Memorial Award. The other was composed by Kenneth Gaburo and is scheduled for performance by the Philharmonic next season.

Both composers were present in the Green Room of Carnegie Hall before the concert on Saturday evening. In a brief ceremony they each received a check for $500. Mr. Mitropoulos made the presentation for the Gershwin Memorial Award. The conductor himself received a gold watch from members of the B'nai B'rith Victory Lodge.

Mr. Dalgleish's "Statement," which was played on Saturday evening only, proved to be a thoughtful, well-organized and well-orchestrated piece of music, about ten minutes long. If it did not have very many original melodic ideas, it is not thereby unique in the contemporary scheme. At least it was composed with skill and taste. H. C. S.

ORCHESTRA SEASON 46

Philharmonic Retrospect As Concerts End

By OLIN DOWNES

THE records of the 112th season of the New York Philharmonic - Symphony Society are imposing, if only as witness to the extraordinary industry and productiveness of this historic organization in the performance and dissemination of an immense literature of orchestral music.

From both social and artistic points of view it is unfortunate that the immense burden of symphonic performance that the Philharmonic-Symphony Society has to undertake alone, as New York's only resident orchestra, cannot be divided between two or more representative symphonic bodies. But that issue was settled as long ago as 1928, when, owing to the fact that the expenses and the deficits of two competing orchestras were more than the purses of their patrons and guarantors could meet, the New York Symphony and the New York Philharmonic amalgamated as an economic necessity. Even so, in the course of the last quarter-century, the expenses of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony have constantly mounted and will probably continue to rise, in ways that will require the utmost energy and ingenuity to meet the annual deficits.

In this situation, of course, it is not alone. The orchestras work harder and more intensively to serve their communities with every year that passes. They can never expect to balance their budgets by the sales of seats, even with the added emoluments in the form of radio and record contracts and other perquisites that the leading symphonic bodies of the nation can count on to a greater or lesser extent. To pay the musicians and conductors the salaries that are necessary today and that are amply justified by the nature of their work requires the aid of generous spirited persons who still exist and who still, despite heavy taxation, generously cooperate in meeting the deficits.

Heavy Schedule

To earn as much money as possible the schedule of concerts of every variety possible for the orchestra to give is crowded about as heavily as the traffic will bear and human endurance meet the requirements. That is why our Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, the oldest body of its kind and rank in America, must bestir itself to provide the number of services which would suffice for two orchestras going at full tilt through the season. It is too much. But the Herculean task is conducted with an efficiency which, under the circumstances, can only arouse wonder and admiration for the accomplishment.

Dimitri Mitropoulos.

The present season began Oct. 6, 1953, and ends this afternoon. The orchestra will have given in eight months, and including fourteen concerts on tour, a total of 135 concerts.

The conductors this season were Dimitri Mitropoulos, the musical director of the society; and guest conductors Bruno Walter, George Szell and Guido Cantelli. André Kostelanetz conducted three semi-popular programs on Saturday nights, and the concert for Yeshiva University; Franco Autori, assistant conductor of the orchestra, conducted two of the subscription concerts; Wilfrid Pelletier was conductor of the children's concerts.

First Times

Seventy-six composers whose works outlined over three centuries of musical development were represented on the programs. There were five world premières — Bezanson's Piano Concerto, Dalgleish's "Statements" for orchestra, Gould's "Dance Variations" for two pianos and orchestra, Krenek's Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra, Mohaupt's Violin Concerto. There were eight first performances in America, of Aubert's "Fantasie for Piano and Orchestra"; the Bach-Webern "Ricercare No. 2" from "The Musical Offering"; Blacher's "Ornaments" for Orchestra; von Einem's "Capriccio"; de Falla's "Homenajes"; Haydn's "Overture for an English Opera"; Helm's Piano Concerto in G; Malipiero's "Vivaldiana."

New York premières were those of Bloch's "Sinfonia Breve"; the Frescobaldi-Autori "Bergamasca"; Hindemith's symphony, "Die Harmonie der Welt"; Liebermann's "Furioso"; Prokofieff's "Wedding Suite" from "The Stone Flower"; Tchaikovsky's "Queen of Spades" Suite for Orchestra.

For the first time at those concerts were heard Luigi Dallapiccola's "Symphonic Fragments" from "Marsia"; Gabrielli's "Canzona for Voices"; Busoni's "Dance-Waltz"; Cimarosa's overture, "La Bella Greca"; Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter"; Menotti's Violin Concerto; Mozart's "Exsultate Jubilate" for soprano, orchestra and organ; Rachmaninoff's Fourth Concerto; Schoenberg's Piano Concerto; Stamitz's "Symphonie Konzertante"; Richard Strauss' Prelude to Act III of "Arabella" and Fantasy from "Die Fraue ohne Schatten," and the Weber-Szell "Perpetuum Mobile."

Of the seventy-two composers represented, Mozart led with sixteen works; Beethoven followed with thirteen; Brahms with ten; Mendelssohn and Richard Strauss with eight each; Rachmaninoff and Tchaikovsky, six each; Wagner and Ravel, five; Prokofieff, Rossini and Schumann, four each.

Program Balance

It is clear from the evidence of these lists that the public, in a great majority, prefers music of the "classic" to that of the "modern" persuasion. (By the word "classic" we mean here the works which in the course of the years have found a place in the established repertory.) This is natural, inevitable, and completely logical. Nor is it the slightest reflection upon public taste that it is so.

In the course of the years a little, comparatively a very little, of the new music that is performed outlives its generation. When it does so it is because of the music's strength and interest, and for no other reason.

This music is indispensable to us, and logically makes the greater part of the repertory. But this does not excuse conductors for neglecting new music and new ideas of composers of contemporaneous schools of thought. Their music also is necessary to us, and to the life and unfolding of the art. This art is constantly renewing itself, passing through myriad forms and technics as the stream of tone flows on its way, running now deep and strong, now more slowly and in less volume, through the ages. But always music is being produced which is reflective of its era. To know that era and its art—in other words, the better to know ourselves—we need to be closely in touch with these manifestations of the spirit.

Public Preference

It is always a question, where programming is concerned, what percentage of unfamiliar music shall be played. Whole concerts of the works of the avant-garde would be self-defeating, and besides unfair to the public, which is not interested in cliques of composers or their henchmen, but wishes to gain as balanced a perspective as possible of the music of every nation and school and every period, past and present.

It is a pleasure to observe in the programs of the Philharmonic-Symphony of the season now at an end an excellent balance of the old and the new, and the manner in which Mr. Mitropoulos, never a man of complacent routine, or disposed to follow in the conventional path, honors the creative thought of our day, and zealously advances it.

Standout Programs

By MILES KASTENDIECK

AS THEY BEGAN their seasons together last October, so the Philharmonic-Symphony and the New York City Opera Co. closed them yesterday. The Philharmonic's season was, of course, continuous, except for the fortnight's tour this Spring. City Center Opera had a Fall and a Spring season.

Mitropoulos ended the Philharmonic concerts with a repetition of the exceptional performance of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony heard last Thursday. The remainder of the program listed Weber-Szell's "Perpetual Motion" and Glazounoff's Violin Concerto in A Minor with Michael Rabin as soloist.

Philharmonic Season Proved Satisfactory

MILES KASTENDIECK

IN general this Philharmonic-Symphony season proved more satisfying than the last. Several questions arose as to program policy, but these appear to be perennial. Mitropoulos planned his concerts carefully to give fair representation to standard and contemporary composers alike.

The selections from standard composers became one of the novelties of the season because they were frequently chosen from less familiar compositions. While some of these may be acknowledged as not quite topnotch, it does not follow that they were not worth the occasional hearing afforded them during this season. Some curious combinations resulted in which the overall effect upon the audience may not have been duly weighed. On the whole, however, the general impression is favorable in retrospect.

Two events stand out for their unusual character: the all-Strauss program commemorating the 50th anniversary of the composer's first visit to America; and the concerto program in which Rudolf Serkin was the soloist.

Mozart Leads

Of the five world premieres, Gould's "Dance Variations for Two Pianos" and Mohaupt's Violin Concerto aroused the most interest.

Of the eight American premieres Einem's "Capriccio" stood out above the others.

Of the seven New York premieres, Bloch's "Sinfonia Breve," Hindemith's "Die Harmonie der Welt," and Liebermann's "Furioso" fared best

In the inevitable compilation about frequency of performance, Mozart led with 16 works; Beethoven followed with 13; Brahms with ten; Mendelssohn and Strauss with eight each. For the first time in ten years Mozart dominated where Beethoven, except for one year, had usually preempted first position.

As usual, performances of American music have not been extensive. The reappearance of Copland's "Appalachian Spring," for instance, amounted almost to a major event. It remains surprising how year after year contemporary works which have been well received are not cultivated. Instead of looking up seldom-heard compositions or recognized composers, it might be better to stimulate reacquaintance with some of these accepted modern works.

Philharmonic Ends Season at Carnegie

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The Philharmonic-Symphony gave its last concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. It was a successful season—artistically speaking, anyway—and certainly the old orchestra showed more life and ingenuity than it had in some years.

A good deal of new music was performed, and also a good deal of music not new, but unfamiliar hereabouts. Conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos has become something of a revered pillar of our musical society. In some quarters they still find faults with his tempo, when it's not a question of fault at all, but one of choice and taste.

Man of Culture.

Mr. Mitropoulos, a man of exceptional culture, can be trusted by now, I think, in such matters, and I am sure he has reasons for all the things he does.

This, the 112th season of the Philharmonic-Symphony, closed with a program of pieces including the Glazounoff Violin Concerto, the "Perpetual Motion" from Weber's Piano Sonata in C Major, transcribed by George Szell, and the Second Symphony of Rachmaninoff.

Gifted Violinist.

Performances were just, and the orchestra got most out of the several scores. Michael Rabin, a gifted young violinist, did some quite excellent things with that old war-horse of a Concerto by Glazounoff. He is not, incidentally, given to showy playing at all, and a blessing that can be in a work that has got the gypsy once-over for lo those many years.

Saturday evening a piece entitled "Statements for Orchestra" was given its premiere. The composer is the 26-year-old James Dalgleish, from this city. He seems to have it, as they say, for the music he wrote reveals a knowing hand and a mind considerably devoted to order. What's more, he isn't afraid to get emotional every so often.

Mr. Dalgleish is this year's co-winner of the George Gershwin Memorial Foundation prize, the other participant being Kenneth Gaburo, whose "On a Quiet Theme" will be premiered by the Philharmonic-Symphony next season.

Manhattan Orchestral Season Ends

By Miles Kastendieck
New York

Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony closed the orchestra's 112th season with a week end of memorable performances of Rachmaninov's Symphony No. 2 in E minor. With the musicians in top form and the conductor especially attuned to interpreting Rachmaninov, the performances culminated three weeks of notable music-making.

The orchestra returned from its southern tour of 13 cities in excellent shape. It was five years since it had been on tour. Though relatively short, the excursion proved rewarding in many ways. Next spring it will go to California and the Pacific Northwest, but that tour will come at the close of the season and will last five weeks.

On its return to Carnegie Hall on April 15, the orchestra sounded particularly well in a program that listed Bach's Third Suite, Vaughan Williams' Fantasy on Tallis's Theme, and Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony. It was the Prokofiev that dominated the concert, not only for its intrinsic worth, which appears to increase every year, but also for the insight with which it was played. Once again Mr. Mitropoulos demonstrated his forte in the interpretation of modern scores.

First Performances

Thereafter the programs usually included some kind of first performance for the Society and a soloist. Menotti's Violin Concerto received brilliant treatment from Tossy Spivakovsky. Everett Helm's Piano Concerto No. 1 revealed plenty of earnest craftmanship and pianistic consciousness, which Leonid Hambro made quite clear during its first American performance. Richard Mohaupt's Violin Concerto also revealed substantial craftmanship, rhythmic life, and conservative harmonies in its world première, given with Michael Rabin as soloist. It suggested serviceability for concert violinists.

A matter-of-fact, technically precise performance of Chopin's F-minor Piano Concerto added little to Lelia Gousseau's reputation as a pianist. The style of Rachmaninov's Fourth Piano Concerto escaped Mr. Hambro in an otherwise capable performance. The Glazounov Violin Concerto found 18-year-old Rabin more a master of his instrument than a brilliant interpreter of the piece.

One of the curious discoveries that Mr. Mitropoulos exhibited was an Orchestral Fantasy by Frederick Converse, called "The Mystic Trumpeter." Composed a half century ago, it reflects the solid musicianship and the sincerity of its composer and speaks well for the substantial character of American music at that time. Today it sounds dated, though the Walt Whitman poem that inspired it does not. Since the Philharmonic had never played it, the performance was illuminating.

For the record it might be noted that the Philharmonic-Symphony season comprised 135 concerts, in which the works of 76 composers were heard, 20 of them in premières. In a brief glance backward the new works that stand out in memory include:

Gould's Dance Variations for Two Pianos; Mohaupt's Violin Concerto; Einem's "Capriccio"; Bloch's "Sinfonia Breve"; Hindemith's Symphony "Die Harmonie der Welt," Liebermann's "Furioso"; and Dallapiccola's Symphonic Fragments from "Marsia."

THE Philharmonic opened its final week of concerts on Thursday evening of last week at Carnegie Hall, presenting, under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos, a new violin concerto by the German-American composer Richard Mohaupt. The soloist in this work was the eighteen-year-old violinist Michael Rabin, who played with a notably clean and brilliant technique. The concerto itself appeared to me to be a valuable addition to the literature of its kind. Its style derives unmistakably from Prokofieff and Shostakovich, and I detected no evidence in it of pronounced originality. But the composition is full of vigorous rhythm, and the portions allotted to the solo violin are quite effectively written for the instrument. The other memorable feature of Mr. Mitropoulos's program was a performance of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, which I had not heard for a long time and which struck me as well worth reviving, since it is, in its brooding and lush romantic way, an altogether pleasing work. Mr. Mitropoulos apparently found it music of the most congenial sort, for he conducted it with real fire and eloquence. His conducting reminded me of certain sterling virtues that have manifested themselves in several of his concerts during the season, and perhaps this is the time to comment on them. I have never regarded Mr. Mitropoulos as the most profound current interpreter of well-worn classics. He seems to me a conductor of the brilliant, inspirational type, who is capable of very revealing and exciting performances when the spirit moves him and of rather rough-and-ready ones when it does not. He gives consistent evidence of a restless and interesting musical mind—a mind that has been responsible for a great many of the past season's most unusual and provocative symphonic events. The quality of his performances seems to depend a great deal on his personal enthusiasm, and this enthusiasm seems particularly stirred by difficult contemporary compositions and by the work of such flamboyant romantic composers as Rachmaninoff and Richard Strauss. Here, Mr. Mitropoulos becomes a conductor of the most compelling sort. He is, moreover, an artist with a distinct and authentic personality. For one thing, he has managed to stand aloof from the domination of Arturo Toscanini, whose numerous imitators have made a hard-driving metronomic exactitude the prevailing fetish in the field. For another, I have generally found that Mr. Mitropoulos approaches his interpretive tasks with rare technical musicianship and a fresh and individual ear. These attributes, in my opinion, make him a conductor of considerable stature.

LE PRIME ALLA SCALA

MITROPOULOS FRA STRAUSS E BUSONI

Più tragica l'ironia di Arlecchino della scomposta furia di Elettra, eroina freudiana strozzata dai suoi complessi

Buffa cosa l'arte. Uno si crede di muovere passi coraggiosi e spregiudicati in campi mai osati. Passano pochi anni e vien catalogato fra gli epigoni di una corrente che con lui se ne tira le cuoia. Un altro crede di divertirsi con un piacevole scherzo, e gli esce di mano una polemica atomica. Passano altri pochi anni e le arditezze e le polemiche si spuntano, e i programmi si svuotano e le opere dell'uno e dell'altro rimangono, se mai lo ebbero, con puro valore d'arte da un lato, o con valore storico di fedele specchio di un'epoca e di un gusto.

Ma anche più buffo può sembrare che a volte l'opera d'arte sia talmente impregnata del gusto della sua epoca, sia talmente abbarbicata alla data del suo battesimo, che il sapore troppo acre del momento, solamente pochi anni dopo, ne impedisca il retto giudizio.

E' avvenuto così ieri sera al ritorno di Elettra di Richard Strauss alla Scala. Preso di petto dalla violenza tutta carnale di questo atto unico di Hugo von Hofmannsthal, il pubblico nell'intimo ne è rimasto offeso. Quella che alla nascita dell'opera era parsa una geniale interpretazione di un personaggio e di un dramma, modernamente ricreato in un clima nuovo, ardito, osato, ieri si rivelava null'altro che la conclusione della mitica tragedia degli Atridi risolta nell'alone del faro allucinante di un romanticismo esasperato e ammalato di estetismo. Ed era un faro da palcoscenico, il riflesso di una cupola Fortuny.

Questa Elettra scatenata, nata dalla fantasia del poeta e tenuta in vita dal musicista, che sembra nella sua veemenza travolgere gli stessi autori, si rivelava alla fin fine niente di più che un groviglio di bassi istinti che inutilmente tendono a sublimarsi nell'antica legge della giusta vendetta, lasciando invece scoperte, sotto gli strappi del suo abito, tutte le trame dei più avvilenti e terrificanti complessi. Un personaggio così evidentemente freudiano, così moderno, ma solo in quella Germania 1909 che lo vide nascere, che al pubblico d'oggi non ha più niente da dire, o ben poco, e finisce per apparire puramente rivoltante nella sua bestiale tensione, nei suoi contorcimenti compiaciuti nella propria sozzura, da cui cerca ispirazione e forza all'ultimo carnaio della madre già demente di rimorso e del padrigno ebbro di vizio. Oggi alla mente dello spettatore meno avvertito, ma pratico dei moderni metodi di cura, dei reparti psichiatrici degli ospedali, questa Elettra appare solo come un caso patologico. Niente più di eroico riesce ad ammirare nella sua volontà di avvilimento, niente più di sacro nel suo amore innaturale per il padre trucidato, niente più di magicamente grande nel suo odio per la madre impura. Gli è che su tutto questo amore del tenebroso, dell'abbietto esasperato fino alla grandezza, dell'eroismo del male, del gusto del maledetto, è passato l'inesorabile aspirapolvere del tempo.

I gusti sono mutati, questi personaggi maledetti appartengono ad altra epoca. Oggi possono ripugnare, ma che convincano e piacciano è difficile, è quasi impossibile. E risalendo a respirare aria pura fuori dai vortici mefitici della corte oscura degli Atridi, dove Elettra si voltola nel fango covando la sua vendetta, si rimpiange la serena tragicità del mito classico grandioso, che la morbosità hofmannsthaliana è quasi riuscita a insozzare.

Ma con questo? Forse che perchè il nostro sentire non aderisce più completamente alla creazione del poeta e del musicista, saremo talmente ciechi da non avvederci della sua potenza? Proprio in questo generale senso di nausea che la tragica vicenda riesce a ispirare, proprio perchè questa furia, questa menade pazza, ci ripugna sino in fondo, vuol dire che è nata come una granitica statua, che supera i tempi e le stagioni.

E tale è veramente l'Elettra di Strauss. Sarà un'Elettra in vesti principio di secolo, sarà annegata in tutte le scorie dell'ultimo romanticismo, sarà avviluppata in una sonorità di wagnerismo quintessenziato, sarà decadente, malata, sostanziata di estetismo. Sarà inaccettabile eppure è necessaria.

Conclude un'epoca. Più degli altri personaggi straussiani, questa Elettra è la più palpitante dimostrazione della ricchezza del musicista. Il tema putrido del poeta riceve vita dal grido del musicista e si inebbria di un canto che raggiunge i limiti ultimi delle possibilità del melodramma romantico. A fianco a lei i personaggi wagneriani sono dei saggi filosofi che fanno della accademia. Questa si butta a capofitto nella materia sonora per strapparne non una melodia, ma un urlo infinito per il suo vociare, travolgendo con sè una orchestra che è sempre al limite della tensione, della vibrazione più alta. Esasperazione di romanticismo, esasperazione di wagnerismo, esasperazione di lirismo. E' il bubbone che scoppia, non c'è dubbio. Ma scoppia con una girandola di fuochi d'artificio da sbalordire e togliere il fiato.

L'ultimo melodramma romantico muore, ma muore urlando tutta la sua grandezza, tutta la sua forza, tutta la sua ricchezza. Sulla fine di Elettra esausta di ebbrezza, si farà il silenzio di un'epoca conclusa, di una sonorità spremuta, di un lirismo squassato fino alle radici e devastato dalla potenza stessa della sua ultima espressione.

Ma il romanticismo non è morto. Solo si è fatto vergognoso di sè. L'uomo, l'artista si ripiega su se stesso, preferisce l'ironia, anche se amara e dolorosa, al grido appassionato e scoperto. Al dramma preferisce lo scherzo. Al melodramma sostituisce il capriccio scenico, il grottesco. Ferruccio Busoni scrive il Saggio di una nuova estetica musicale e a velario alzato, come nel suo Arlecchino, risospinge sul palcoscenico lirico i suoi personaggi. Ma non osa più, o non ancora, riprendere il linguaggio puramente lirico. Essi parlano e cantano. Non urlano più la loro tragedia. Ne ridono, ne sorridono. La recitano e la cantano. E non osano più staccarsi completamente dal pubblico. Lo mettono a parte della loro recita, lo portano con loro sul palcoscenico, o dal palcoscenico lo apostrofano. Hanno paura dell'intervallo che può creare fra loro e la gente, il cunicolo dell'orchestra. La lasciano suonare appena, la interrompono, la prendono a confidente, la sfruttano. Ma in definitiva la temono e la sorvegliano. Ne nasce uno spettacolo come questo Arlecchino o Le finestre, che Dimitri Mitropoulos ha voluto ieri far seguire all'Elettra con geniale contrasto, che non sa cosa vuole, che non riesce ad avviarsi, e non riesce a concludere, che si muove a tentoni per una strada che non conosce e che, come ogni tentativo, ha improvvise illuminazioni e vuoti d'aria insospettati, accosta pagine squisite di delizioso umorismo, a folate di amarezza, a presentimenti d'arte, a risate un po' grosse, a ironie un po' facili, a discorsi inconcludenti nel cui inutile chiacchiericcio tuttavia si avverte qualche cosa di non maturato, qualche cosa che sta per nascere, che di qui prenderà le mosse, anche se qui ancora non trova la via giusta e il giusto equilibrio.

Ne nasce il personaggio di Arlecchino, che parla e non canta, che dovrebbe dire la confessione dell'autore, ma che invece dice ben poca cosa e si vorrebbe spesso fare tacere. A un certo punto lo sentiamo dal tetto di una casa apostrofare il pubblico. E' già Petrouchka che maledice gli uomini e la sorte, ma non ne trova ancora nè le parole nè la tragicità espressa in forma d'arte. Ne è solo un presentimento.

Ma ne nasce anche quel capolavoro di umorismo musicale, tuttora insuperato nella letteratura teatrale, del quartetto fra Colombina, il dottor Bombasto e l'abate Cospicuo ubriachi fradici, e il cavalier Leandro che dovrebbe essere moribondo, ma si rialza da terra per cantare, mentre lo asinus providentialis che dovrebbe portarlo via, a terra si distende ad aspettare la fine del concerto.

Ne nasce una commozione lirica se si cantano le lodi della Toscana (ma non nasconde anche questa nella sua improvvisazione una sottile ironia?) e soprattutto una commossa amarezza per la bonaria cecità del sarto Ser Matteo che pare gocciolato dalla penna di Anatole France.

Non è un'opera riuscita. E' uno splendido presentimento di quanto uno Strawinski avrebbe poi saputo fare, non molto dopo. E' la produzione di un critico troppo intelligente per essere un creatore felice. Proprio come Elettra è la torbida creazione di un musicista troppo artista per essere l'intelligente critico della propria opera capace di liberarla dalla moda.

Ma proprio per questo contrasto sostanziale dei due atti unici, il loro accostamento ha assunto un valore polemico inestimabile. Come anche ci ha dato il ritratto di due epoche vicinissime, eppure divise dal baratro della prima guerra europea, meglio di qualsiasi sagacissimo studio di costume.

L'accostamento l'aveva voluto da tempo Dimitri Mitropoulos con quella prontezza di intuizione e sagacità di penetrazione nei valori delle partiture che caratterizza da sempre la sua carriera teatrale. L'interesse di questo affiancare l'ultima esasperazione romantica di Elettra, con la prima ricerca di un nuovo indirizzo dello spettacolo lirico di Arlecchino, sorvolando nell'intervallo dei due spettacoli i pochi anni che separano le due date di nascita (1909 e 1917) e il contrasto del clima di anteguerra con quello dell'immediato dopoguerra, già presentito nell'antibellicismo busoniano, era evidente. Bisognava attuarlo in pratica e soprattutto presentarlo come ha saputo farlo Dimitri Mitropoulos. Restituendo cioè in pieno all'una e all'altra delle due opere il clima d'arte dal quale erano nate: l'esasperazione malata di Elettra, l'intellettualismo solo esteriormente sarcastico e disumano di Arlecchino. Facendo balenare inconfondibili al di sotto del fragoroso vociare straussiano la sincerità di una ispirazione e la quadratura magistrale di una composizione senza sbavature, e illuminando di un affetto indulgente e di umana simpatia l'ironia talvolta raggelata del capriccio busoniano. A Mitropoulos è riuscito il miracolo, il doppio miracolo. Ci ha presentato due orchestre e due teatri, effettivamente due mondi.

E al miracolo hanno contribuito egregiamente ognuno per la loro parte, l'orchestra, il coro di Veneziani e tutti gli interpreti: Christel Goltz, una Elettra incisiva la cui recitazione invasata non permette nemmeno di avvertire se qualche intonazione sia qualche volta per avventura un po' meno che perfetta, Elena Nicolai (ben tornata alla Scala!), una Clitennestra giustamente inchiodata alla sua follia spaventata, Dorothy Dow, tremante Crisotemide dagli accenti delicati, Ramon Vinay e Nicola Rossi Lemeni, più che corretti nei ruoli di Egisto e di Oreste. Marcello Moretti recitava la parte di Arlecchino ed era più piacevole a vedersi, che ad ascoltare, Giulietta Simionato, Rolando Panerai, Fernando Corena, Pietro Monteanu, Mario Petri e Tilde Baroni hanno gareggiato fra di loro di abilità e di spigliatezza divertendosi e divertendo il pubblico nel garbato gioco scenico del capriccio di Busoni, recitando con gusto e cantando con raffinatezza.

Alla fine di Elettra parlare di entusiasmo del pubblico è dire poco. Costretto al silenzio per 100 minuti che dura l'opera, è scoppiato al calar del velario in una ovazione che non voleva più finire. Dodici minuti esatti di ininterrotti applausi, di grida di bravo al direttore e di brava alla signora Goltz e di acclamazioni a tutti gli interpreti, al regista e al bozzettista. Gli applausi si sono poi rinnovati, con la platea in piedi, con la stessa affettuosa intensità al ricomparire di Mitropoulos sul podio per dirigere l'Arlecchino.

Ed è stata l'ultima favilla di entusiasmo della serata. Alla conclusione del capriccio busoniano, qualche dissenso si è fatto qua e là sentire, pochi applausi, e tutti all'indirizzo degli interpreti, poi il teatro si è rapidamente svuotato.

Claudio Sartori

Marcello Moretti
Arlecchino suo malgrado

Elettra e Arlecchino: l'accostamento è molto più ardito di quanto si possa rilevare in un primo momento. Due opere differenti oltre che nel loro carattere spettacolare per le opposte concezioni creative dei rispettivi autori.

E allora vien fatto di convincersi ancora una volta che dal punto di vista artistico ciò che conta è la riuscita del capolavoro.

Una volta abbracciato un credo, sia questo rettorico, espressionista, oggettivista o addirittura politico, l'importante è saper giungere al termine ultimo: all'opera d'arte.

Strauss o Hofmannsthal da una parte e Busoni dall'altra, partirono alla conquista della loro arte da strade certo ben diverse, ma le avevano tracciate così dritte e a perpendicolo che il punto d'incontro si è risolto sul palcoscenico scaligera con il successo, ieri sera, di entrambe le opere anche se il giudizio del pubblico per l'Arlecchino s'è dimostrato particolarmente severo.

Ma non potremo tacere fin d'ora dell'interpretazione meravigliosa data alle due opere da due grandi attori — e sotto questo punto di vista si limita appunto il compito nostro di giudicarli —, rispettivamente la signora Christel Goltz che ha impersonato un'Elettra così drammatica ed espressiva, dai movimenti ferini eccitati e convulsi, tragici e seducenti nella loro tragicità, cosicchè non potremo cancellare mai dalla nostra memoria una simile interprete, e Marcello Moretti, l'Arlecchino per antonomasia della prosa italiana e che ieri sera ha prestato la sua voce e i suoi lazzi all'opera di Busoni.

Herbert Graf, il regista di entrambi gli spettacoli è riuscito a centrare nei punti essenziali il carattere dato dai loro autori provandoci un'acutissimo spirito d'osservazione e adattamento. Per «Elettra», Graf s'è mantenuto d'un rigore eccezionale lasciando solo esplodere la figura principale che i composti e brevi movimenti delle masse — quasi sempre presenti, ma pressochè non visibili —, hanno fatto risaltare ancor più nella travolgente impersonificazione data dalla signora Goltz.

Una Elettra dai balzi inquietanti con quel tanto di carica espressionista o semplicemente dannunziana che Hofmannsthal volle darle. Quando si agitavano gli altri personaggi, Graf imponeva ad Elettra una significativa quasi immobilità E quando era sola, o con Clitennestra o con Crisotemide, eccola eccitarsi e divampare nel suo odio vendicatore: ossessionante. E così pure tutti gli altri interpreti si sono mossi ad opera del regista con una tragicità impressionante e nuova. Per le eccezionali qualità d'attori ricorderemo in particolare la signora Elena Nicolai Clitennestra, dai movimenti larghi, primitivi e nel contempo regali, Rossi Lemeni, un Oreste contenutissimo (quell'abbraccio alla sorella amata lungamente sofferto) e, ancora, la signora Doroty Down, una Crisotemide timida e timorosa.

La scenografia di Elettra era stata affidata a Ludwig Sievert che ha lodevolmente impostato centralmente la scena, con il grande portale, affidando una certa severissima asimmetria agli elementi architettonici dal prepotente fascino ammonitore. Una scenografia quella di Sievert essenziale e senza sdolcinature decorative classicheggianti. Realizzatore come sempre ammirabile, Gino Romei.

Per l'Arlecchino il compito di Herbert Graf era in un certo senso facilitato e suggerito dal testo arguto del libretto. L'azione si svolge nella patria stessa di Arlecchino, Bergamo, e in pieno settecento.

Marcello Moretti ha indossato un'altra volta il costume che lo rese celebre dapprima al Piccolo Teatro e quindi negli altri centri europei. Nei prossimi giorni sarà infatti sostituito da Cesco Ferro poichè attraverserà l'Oceano per raggiungere la compagnia di Strehler e Grassi in America. Eppure Moretti si compiace di affermare d'essere sempre stato un Arlecchino suo malgrado. Ma forse è una butade o, per dirla in veneziano, una ciacola arlecchinesca. Moretti sulle tavole scaligere ha riaffermato ancora una volta le sue doti mimiche e recitative degne ormai d'essere celebrate accanto a quelle dei più grandi attori-mimi del nostro tempo.

La scenografia di Arlecchino, dovuta a Busoni figlio, ci ha lasciato perplessi. Non già perchè troppo moderna o troppo antiquata. Il fatto è che una volta montata dai danzatori-macchinisti (e la trovata, a sipario aperto, è assai notevole) ci è parsa volgare e, diciamolo pure, indegna del palcoscenico che la ospitava. Un pessimo servigio, infine, alla opera paterna. Ma, ad essere sinceri, con lo svolgersi dell'azione, per non so quale malia, virtù registica o pittorica, ci parve trasformarsi fino a essere del tutto gradevole, con l'abbassarsi delle luci della ribalta. La volgarità e la grossolanità della scena ci parve adattarsi proprio al clima burattinesco dello spettacolo. Il sipario verde è comunque rimasto brutto. Pregevoli pittoricamente le due case che chiudevano ai lati la scena. L'allestimento scenico di entrambi gli spettacoli è stato curato con l'attenzione e intelligenza ben nota di Nicola Benois.

"Elettra„ di Strauss e "Arlecchino„ di Busoni concertati e diretti da Dimitri Mitropoulos

Nuovo allestimento di Elettra, stavolta con interpreti levantini, tedeschi, italiani e americani. Tuffo d'un'ora e tre quarti nell'atmosfera greve della Micene antica, fra le ciclopiche mura che l'Hofmannsthal e lo Strauss hanno fatto risorgere dalle ceneri illustri del poema omerico e dalle creazioni fatalistiche o umanamente strazianti dei maggiori tragedi della leggenda ellenica. Ritorno al sinfonismo architettonicamente colossale e verbosamente piramidale, ritorno alle visioni drammatiche d'una angosciata, aspra e morbosa modernità, ritorno al teatro nordico: un teatro evoluto ed involuto nello spirito e nella forma, che manifesta l'amore del mastodontico già esemplato in Wagner ma qui accentuato dalla moltiplicazione dei gesti orrendi. La partitura è una enormità, anzi una abnormità. In essa il fattore tecnico assume un'importanza sovrana, scapitandone la legge della misura che appare soffocata dalla sproporzione fra le idee misere e la elaborazione magniloquente. La fase veramente costruttiva dell'Elettra sta tutta e soltanto nell'epilogo che si fa attendere a lungo, che si delinea dopo ottanta minuti d'una musica unicamente chiamata a schiarire l'antefatto, che si concreta con l'azione del matricidio e s'affoca e incide nel delirio febbrile della protagonista, accesa dall'odio e dalla esecranda volontà di una vendetta contro natura. Qui la forza fonica ed espressiva del dionisiaco Strauss attinge altezze figurative e rappresentative gigantesche; ma rimane forse un esclusivo prodigio di turbinoso virtuosismo.

Dopo l'Elettra, come a raddolcire la bocca, lo scherzo scenico Arlecchino di Ferruccio Busoni. L'autore lo ha chiamato « capriccio ». E' un atto unico, seminato dalle punte aguzze dell'ironia le quali sferzano a pelle coriacea degli uomini d'ogni tempo, con i loro eterni vizi e debolezze. I personaggi sono cristallizzati nelle maschere italiane tradizionali; quando non sono maschere, risultano tuttavia dei poveri fantocci goffamente impagliati. Molta amarezza sotto i loro lazzi, qualche dissimulata lagrima in fondo all'azione — un'azione pretesto senza capo nè coda — che si svolge nella Bergamo settecentesca, antica culla di Arlecchino, e che serve a presentare i vari tipi per la loro parodia: la parodia dei benpensanti tra cui sono un sarto dandomane, un prete, un nobile, un dottore e un asino quadrupede. Anche la musica si adegua al concetto « morale » e all'argomento farsesco della commedia. Ridevole e deridevole, faustica e brillante, la musica di Busoni canzona il mondo e i suoi legiferatori, canzona se stessa e i propri schemi e i propri critici in un gioco, invero alquanto stanco, di irriverenti monellerie, di ciniche positure e di bravate smorfiose. Musica intelligente e intenzionalmente corrosiva, musica lampiccata da un talento aguzzo e pure fondamentalmente trito e non benedetto dalla grazia. Interessa abbastanza anche quando urta i nervi e le convinzioni. Diverte poco, non commuove mai. L'autore vi si confessa perchè evidentemente l'autore si identifica in Arlecchino, il solo personaggio che pare salvarsi dalla satira siccome simbolo del libero amore e della natura integra e fedele. Forse perciò Busoni-Arlecchino si esprime parlando frammezzo agli stolti che sanno soltanto cantare. Così Busoni-Arlecchino era sicuro del fatto suo, poichè se non facile a dirsi è la parola asciutta d'un artista senza pace e alla ricerca d'una verità che intravede e che gli sfugge, infinitamente più difficile è cantare quella parola in modo da farsi intendere.

L'esecuzione di entrambe le opere è stata affidata a Dimitri Mitropoulos, concertatore e direttore d'orchestra dal finissimo intuito e dalla vasta cultura, modellatore e coloritore scrupoloso e contenuto delle labirintiche immagini straussiane; disegnatore sottile, quasi in punta secca, delle caricature busoniane, queste assai meglio riuscite. In linea d'importanza, e direi d'invadenza sul terreno dell'interpretazione, è venuto buon secondo il regista Herbert Graf, che soprattutto nell'Arlecchino, liberamente scontornato e parafrasato, si è levato tutti i capricci immaginabili da una mente spregiudicata e rivistaiola, dimostrando di possedere, con la mano pesante, un senso del comico assolutamente personale. Due compagnie complessivamente di ferro, la prima delle quali non ha peraltro lasciato percepire una sola sillaba del testo tradotto da Ottone Schanzer, hanno cantato ed agito in palcoscenico. Le componevano per l'Elettra, facente perno intorno all'onnipresente, resistentissima ma scenicamente elementare protagonista Christel Goltz, gli artisti Dorothy Dow, Elena Nicolai, Nicola Rossi Lemeni, Ramon Vinay, Antonio Zerbini, Mirella Fiorentini, Luisa Villa, Carlin, Campi, Zanolli, Amadini, Canali, Senni, Rapisardi e Vercelli; per l'Arlecchino, dominato dalla maschera ciarliera di Marcello Moretti, e riprodotto nella versione italiana di Vito Levi, gli eccellenti Giulietta Simionato, Rolando Panerai, Fernando Corena, Pietro Monteanu, Mario Petri e Tilde Baroni, Coro istruito appuntino da Vittore Veneziani; allestimento ingegnosamente curato dal Benois; giustamente severi ed eruditi i bozzetti e figurini della tragedia straussiana, dovuti a Ludwig Sievert; eleganti e gustosi, intonandosi a un moderato gusto d'avanguardia, quelli del « capriccio » busoniano, tracciati dal pittore Rafaello Busoni, figlio del compianto autore.

Cronaca delle serate per così dire ambivalenti. Molte chiamate calorose agli interpreti di Elettra; poche, con sensibili contrasti, a quelli di Arlecchino.

Il Popolo 27-5

L'Elettra di Strauss e l'Arlecchino di Busoni: una fine e un principio. Molti avevano considerato maggiormente l'Elettra, al suo apparire nel 1909 a Dresda, che la Salomè. O meglio, la avevano amata di più.

Poichè di amore solo si può parlare nel caso di una opera come questa, di amore per quella franca quasi ingenua antiproblematica accettazione della concezione wagneriana, non ancora divenuta il sinfonismo elaborato, denso, della certamente più personale e più costruita Salomè.

Accettazione da parte del musicista, accettazione e compiacimento di quanti non vedevano che Wagner era già di per sè un caso limite, soprattutto un genio a sè stante, un fenomeno unico nella storia della musica, infecondo, contrariamente a quanto egli stesso aveva creduto.

Elettra non denuncia un volto devastato dal tempo, non la si sente invecchiata, ma vecchia dalla sua nascita, già allora al di là dei limiti del tempo, già allora nell'orbita di un momento passato. Ma forse proprio per questo, per questa sua genuinità, quasi un atto di fede, può avere un certo sapore. Anche se i personaggi della tragedia greca sono diventati i mistici semi-dei del Walhalla. Cantano come Brunilde, come Wotan, si alternano nei loro monologhi con il tipico taglio scenico wagneriano, le loro passioni hanno il cupo profumo delle foreste nibelungiche. Alla esasperata ipertensione romantica di Hofmannsthahl che esclude evidentemente l'arsi della tragedia greca si sovrappongono le estreme conseguenze del romanticismo wagneriano. Su Clitennestra, la regina carica di gioielli di amuleti e di paura sulla dolce Crisotemide incombe Elettra invasata fin dal principio. La musica è sempre tesa, forse si può dire, a esprimere la follia omicida della protagonista, quasi un lungo poema sinfonico sulla sua sete di vendetta, anche se qualche volta pare che essa voglia sfociare nelle soluzioni tipicamente straussiane.

Impervia parte quella di Elettra: essa era sostenuta da Christel Goltz, che ne ha superato le faticose difficoltà con grande impegno vocale e scenico, anche se la sua voce, di notevole volume, ha avuto qualche volta le emissioni un poco calanti delle voci tedesche. A lei si affiancavano egregiamente Dorothy Dow, quale Crisotemide, ed Elena Nicolai, meno penetrante, quale Clitennestra. Unica vera difficoltà, soprattutto per le prime due, la dizione pressochè incomprensibile: era meglio allora dare l'opera in tedesco, visto che anche altre volte, e a ragione, si preferì la lingua originale. Nobili Oreste ed Egisto erano rispettivamente Nicola Rossi Lemeni e Ramon Vinay.

Le scene e i costumi di Ludwig Sievert: convenzionali e convenzionalmente buie le prime, piuttosto buoni i secondi, anche se per la verità l'abbigliamento di Clitennestra ci è sembrato un po' « voyant ». Per contro affrettata l'armoniosa composizione finale che conchiude così la furia di « Elettra ».

Seguiva Arlecchino di Busoni. Se Elettra era una fine, Arlecchino può essere detto un principio; se Strauss dimostra di chiudere con le sue stesse mani la strada davanti a sè, che Wagner aveva già solcato, Busoni indica chiaramente, nella sua straordinaria preveggenza di musicista europeo, che sente il mondo in dissoluzione intorno a sè, le nuove possibilità di evoluzione della musica del '900, non solo, ma pare sintetizzarle in sè stesso.

L'enfasi, gli atteggiamenti, la retorica, non erano per lui: li fuggiva nell'arte come nella vita. Alla ricerca di simbolismi preziosi, di estetismi raffinati, preferiva la musica pensata e scritta dietro un impulso semplicemente creativo, pura astrazione, dopo un processo di filtrazione del suo meraviglioso cervello.

In Arlecchino tutto questo si compone in un mondo che è vivo, attuale adesso più di quanto non lo fosse quando Busoni era ancora in vita: anticipatore a quel tempo, dimostra la preveggenza del suo autore in una costruttiva sintesi delle due correnti più importanti della cultura musicale del '900: Strawinski e Schönberg.

Quanta scienza, dietro l'apparente semplicità di quel tessuto orchestrale, quanta fantasia, quanta costruzione in quella partitura così elegante! Il sorriso di Mozart s'è fatto un po' amaro, per un certo spirito di vecchia saggezza mediterranea: canta, Colombina, che non vuole essere tradita ma tradisce; insiste Ser Matteo a leggere la sua « Commedia » senza capirne niente, e a non vedere che gli si invola la moglie; canta d'amore Leandro, ma trema alla vista d'una spada; chiedono aiuto i due compari, Bombasto e Cospicuo, ma non ne trovano; solo Arlecchino parla, e dice che egli può tradire ma non vuole essere tradito, dice « la vita è mia... e l'amore è libero ». La morale? Piuttosto amara evidentemente: tutti arlecchini il più fortunato è quello che fa quello che vuole, senza tradire se stesso.

Marcello Moretti ha portato alla Scala le felici esperienze di Arlecchino del Piccolo Teatro, dove evidentemente la musica non gli impediva la recitazione più sciolta; Giulietta Simionato era graziosa e disinvolta nella parte di Colombina, e soprattutto ottima cantante come sempre; Mario Petri, quale abate Cospicuo, Pietro Monteanu nei panni di Leandro, Rolando Panerai in quelli di Ser Matteo, tutti ottimi cantanti e ottimi caricaturali attori. Gustosissime le scene e i costumi di Rafaello Busoni, figlio di Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni. La regia per tutte e due le opere era di Herbert Graf, e alquanto movimentata: nell'Elettra con risultati quasi espressionistici, ma soprattutto col risultato di far desiderare una controfigura nella danza finale della protagonista, poichè non è obbligatorio che una cantante, anche brava, possa pur danzare. Nell'Arlecchino, movimentata sì, ma certamente con un senso di sicura spigliatezza.

Direttore per tutte e due le opere era Dimitri Mitropoulos: cioè un grande direttore che dalla musica cava fuori quello che c'è da cavare, il bello e il brutto, l'attuale e l'inattuale, insomma quello che c'è scritto, così che un'opera venga collocata giustamente in un senso artistico e storico. L'incontro di Elettra con Oreste, per esempio non è di stampo prettamente wagneriano, al punto da far pensare a pagine famose? Tant'è, è così, e così ha da esser fatto: non acquista esso in genuinità così come l'ha fatto Mitropoulos? Non ha più dignità? Non dà la possibilità di una più chiara collocazione? E nell'Arlecchino si potranno dimenticare la freschezza il ritmo, la vitalità di questa esecuzione? La mirabile intuizione dell'esecuzione del quartetto finale, che è il vero gioiello di tutta l'opera? Tutto ha messo in luce Mitropoulos: mettere in luce nel senso appunto di una completa comprensione del valore artistico e storico di un'opera, della padronanza assoluta dell'orchestra, che ieri sera è apparsa con il nitore e la compattezza dei suoi momenti più felici, del dominio sui cantanti. Festeggiatissimo, egli è comparso più volte alla ribalta alla fine di ogni opera insieme ai cantanti, anch'essi accolti da numerosi applausi. Qualche contrasto.

ALLA S

ARLECCHINO

Mentre la stagione operistica sta ormai volgendo al termine, abbiamo assistito ieri sera, nel nostro massimo teatro, ad uno spettacolo che senz'altro possiamo definire uno dei più interessanti e significativi dell'intera annata.

Si sono infatti rappresentati due lavori teatrali generalmente poco eseguiti, Elettra di Strauss e Arlecchino di Busoni. Abbiamo avvicinato così due musicisti che pur appartenendo allo stesso periodo (Strauss nacque nel 1864 e Busoni nel 1866), sono per cultura e formazione artistica in netta antitesi riallacciandosi il primo al romanticismo tedesco ed al mito wagneriano, il secondo alla tradizione classica tedesca rappresentata soprattutto da Bach e da Mozart.

Elettra ed Arlecchino, due mondi assai distanti, due personaggi: il primo, tratto dal mondo omerico, drammatizzato attraverso la spasmodica tensione dell'orchestrazione straussiana, il secondo, la figura della popolarissima maschera italiana ricreata con arguta invenzione e con tersi colori dalla controllata fantasia di Ferruccio Busoni.

Elettra fu composta da Riccardo Strauss nel 1909 su testo di Hugo Von Hofmannsthal il quale si ispirò alla tragedia greca trasformando l'infelice figlia di Agamennone in una furia forsennata incupita nell'odio verso la madre adultera e assassina e tesa con ogni forza alla vendetta.

Interprete del personaggio di Elettra è stata Christel Goltz, che ha sostenuto con foga implacabile, sorretta da una potenza vocale inesauribile, le difficoltà della tessitura straussiana. Doroty Dow, ha reso con limpidità di voce e accorati accenti la parte di Crisotemide; Elena Nicolai ha dato drammatico rilievo alla parte di Clitemnestra; Nicola Rossi Lemeni è stato potente e dignitoso Oreste. Ricordiamo infine tutti gli altri lodevoli artisti che sono apparsi nei ruoli minori: Ramon Vinay, Antonio Zerbini, Mirella Fiorentini, Luisa Villa, Mario Carlin, Enrico Campi, Silvana Zanolli, Maria Amadini, Bruna Ronchini Senni, Anna Maria Canali, Greta Rapisardi, Angelo Vercelli. La regia di Herbert Graf ha mirato soprattutto ad appesantire l'azione con trovate a volte poco felici. La scena ed i figurini di gusto piuttosto eterogenei erano di Ludwig Sievert.

La ripresa di Arlecchino di Ferruccio Busoni, che era già stato dato nel 1943-44 al Lirico, sede in quegli anni degli spettacoli scaligeri, segna un doveroso omaggio verso la figura del grande musicista italiano che, vissuto per lo più all'estero, più noto come pianista che come compositore, è bene sia conosciuto ed apprezzato, come si merita, dal pubblico italiano.

Troppo lungo sarebbe qui riportare un profilo di Busoni, lo ricordiamo ai lettori come grande pianista e profondo interprete; studioso di Bach del quale lasciò importanti trascrizioni, critico dotato di una cultura formidabile; infine compositore eclettico. Portato a considerare tutte le esperienze moderne, vissuto nel clima artistico tedesco, legato alla tradizione musicale italiana, Busoni è essenzialmente classico e proprio per questo suo spirito, poco è stato capito in Italia nell'epoca in cui l'attenzione musicale era per lo più tesa verso il melodramma verista.

Il Capriccio scenico — Arlecchino — ovvero Le finestre, *fu terminato nel 1916 e rappresentato per la prima volta a Zurigo nel maggio del 1917. Il testo, scritto originalmente in tedesco, è dello stesso Busoni e si rifà alla commedia dell'arte. L'*Arlecchino è una breve spiritosa farsa che si svolge nella Bergamo settecentesca ed in essa rivivono alcune nostre maschere: prima di tutte Arlecchino, che a differenza delle altre non canta ma recita, imprimendo molta vivacità all'azione. Compare il sarto Ser Matteo del Sarto, piuttosto attempato, maniaco per Dante e per Mozart, che non si accorge, mentre legge la Divina Commedia, delle trame che ordisce Arlecchino per portargli via la bella e giovane moglie.

Troviamo poi due gustosissime macchiette, il dottor Bompasto e l'Abate Cospicuo, amanti delle donne e del buon vino dei quali l'autore si serve per satireggiare la scienza e la religione. C'è anche Colombina, la tradita moglie d'Arlecchino che si consola poi con Leandro, nobile cavaliere spasimante, il «tenore per antonomasia» che rappresenta parodisticamente la tradizionale figura del gigione. Non manca il duello tra Arlecchino e Leandro; compare pure l'«asinus providentialis» che risolve una difficile situazione. Tutto si conclude per il meglio, Arlecchino ha involato la bella moglie a Ser Matteo, Colombina se ne va con Leandro, rimane solo sulla scena Ser Matteo che continua a leggere Dante e non si accorgerebbe che lo spettacolo è finito se il direttore d'orchestra non si recasse sul palcoscenico a smuoverlo.

La musica che accompagna l'azione è tutta uno scintillio di colori; assai spigliate le allusioni a Mozart, a Rossini, inserite e legate tra loro con mano maestra; arie, marcette, duetti, romanze, si susseguono senza stanchezza; all'apparire dell'asino troviamo un quartetto veramente geniale in cui si rivela l'abilità contrappuntistica di Busoni.

L'edizione presentata ieri sera alla Scala è stata realizzata con molto decoro e con massima accuratezza. Assai gustosa la scena della piazzetta bergamasca, opera di Raffaello Busoni, figlio del musicista. Spiritosa e ben condotta la regia di Herbert Graf.

Assai ammirata la dizione ed il gesto dell'attore Marcello Moretti. La compagnia dei cantanti era formata da nomi illustri quali Giulietta Simionato, brava e vivacissima Colombina, Rolando Panerai (Ser Matteo), Mario Petri (Abate Cospicuo), Pietro Monteanu (Leandro), Fernando Corena (dottor Bompasto). Inutile dire che ognuno di essi ha dato il meglio di sè contribuendo in massima parte all'ottima riuscita dello spettacolo.

Un elogio particolare a Dimitri Mitropoulos, che ha meravigliosamente condotto l'orchestra della Scala, prima attraverso le difficoltà sonore di Strauss e poi attraverso la chiara partitura busoniana.

Serata felicissima, successo vivissimo con molte chiamate al direttore ed agli interpreti.

IERI SERA ALLA SCALA CON BACCHETTA DI MITROPOULOS

"Elettra" e "Arlecchino" contrasto all'antica

SE v'è un artista la cui «posizione» occorra riesaminare da cima a fondo — oggi che quella specie di follia critica ed estetica che fu l'oggettivismo appare definitivamente superata — costui è certamente Riccardo Strauss. All'oggettivismo, infatti, dopo aver destituito la musica d'ogni significazione spirituale, non rimaneva che frugare ciecamente nella «materia» fonica, per trarne fallaci spunti a catalogazioni e classificazioni: e Strauss col suo gigantismo orchestrale, con le sue fitte ondate contrappuntistiche, con le sue sfrenate perorazioni sonore, non poteva apparire, agli orecchi degli oggettivisti, se non «l'ultimo dei romantici». Un Wagner minore, insomma: «Riccardo secondo». Oggi fortunatamente ricominciamo a distinguere il fenomeno sonoro dall'«in sè» musicale; e soprattutto non dimentichiamo che scopo e ragione dell'arte è d'essere rivelatrice d'umanità. E constatiamo, dunque, come non basti assumere il wagneriano sistema del leit-motiv, nè sia sufficiente inturgidire ulteriormente la compagine orchestrale nibelungica, per esser definito erede e continuatore del lipsiense Riccardo. In questa Elettra, (data ieri sera alla Scala) costituita da un solo atto — sia pur della durata di un'ora e tre quarti — sono stati riconosciuti ben quaranticinque «temi», e la falange orchestrale è moltiplicata, famiglia per famiglia, in proporzioni addirittura mostruose (gli archi divisi «a tre», quattro elementi nel gruppo dei flauti, quattro negli oboi, otto nei clarinetti, sei trombe e tromba bassa, e così via, in proporzione).

Ma basta tutto ciò a fare di Elettra l'opera di un romantico, sia pur dell'ultimo dei romantici? Quando a Hegel e a Schopenhauer, quali numi tutelari, si è sostituito l'equivoco dottor Freud; quando, mediante la musica, si concepisce il dramma non come anelito alla «liberazione» attraverso la rinunzia bensì come scatenamento dell'inconscio e apparizione della libido trionfante, non si è più wagneriani, cioè romantici. Si appartiene a buon diritto a quella che noi soliamo chiamare «modernità», cioè a una esperienza umana ancor difficilmente caratterizzabile e delimitabile, da noi che in essa viviamo immersi; ma che certamente ha fra i suoi eroi lo «sportivo» Tarzan, il primitivo il cui istinto selvatico è proposto alla nostra ammirazione, mentre il romanticismo incarnò il proprio ideale in Sigfrido, l'ignaro che intuisce e ricerca l'amore.

Nel dramma musicale di Elettra ogni legame con la classica tragedia ellenica è assolutamente spezzato. Anche qui non dobbiamo lasciarci fuorviare dalle apparenze. Alla nostra modernità inquieta non è concessa l'apollinea contemplazione che fu luce della classicità. La nostra serenità è sempre solo apparente: ha la sua radice in un cinismo malcelato che può magari giungere a «fissare», ogni lineamento sentimentale; ma in una quiete «fossile», che è l'opposto dell'olimpica sublimazione. Le esperienze di Strawinski sono tipiche, a questo proposito: e dovremo pur finire per riconoscere a Strawinski e a Strauss una fondamentale fraternità, nell'espressione della nostra condizione tragica. Perciò sono entrambi artisti grandi, in quanto, con mezzi differenti, rappresentano la crisi morale della nostra epoca, e ne propongono le uniche soluzioni estetiche possibili. Privi entrambi d'una fede si abbandonano l'uno a una equivoca ascesi fonica, a un aguzzo fachirismo ritmico, l'altro all'orgia istrumentale e melodica. In entrambi domina un diverso virtuosismo, ch'è il segno esteriore della loro personalità. Il virtuosismo straussiano è quello che aduna e dispone materiali sonori di diversissima provenienza, e imprime su tutto quel coacervo il segno d'una fisionomia immediatamente riconoscibile. Tutte le esperienze musicali ribollono e vengono alla luce, evocate freudianamente da un egoismo artistico smisurato.

L'Elettra propone — come fu acutamente osservato — la «tragedia della neurastenia»: rappresentazione terribilmente coerente d'un «complesso» di cui la protagonista è preda. Inutile ricerca affinità tra il dramma straussiano e le tragedie di Eschilo, Sofocle e Euripide. Pur nelle notevoli differenze esistenti nelle concezioni dei tre tragici greci, dominava in essi la cosicenza del fato incombente sulla stirpe dei Pelopidi. L'alastor, il demone vendicatore (etimologicamente: «colui che non dimentica») era il deus ex machina dal quale ogni delitto e ogni incitamento al delitto riceveva una sua moralità. Nel testo di von Hofmannsthal, così come la musica straussiana ce lo illumina, Elettra, continuamente presente sulla scena, non ha invece altro movente che la bramosia sessuale repressa, da cui traggono origine tutti i suoi atteggiamenti coscienti: l'amoroso rimpianto per il padre Agamennone, l'odio per la madre Clitennestra, l'idolatria per il fratello Oreste, colui che, col duplice delitto, determina appunto in lei la catarsi, intesa freudianamente come sfogo di istinti repressi, come scatenamento di cariche oscuramente giacenti nell'imo inconscio.

Nella rappresentazione di un simile trionfo della libido, l'arte di Strauss giganteggia e trova la sua completa giustificazione. Non compiacenze estetistiche; ma un solo grande arco dinamico, teso sempre più, fino allo schianto finale. Di tale tensione il convulso virtuosismo del musicista segna magistralmente i momenti fondamentali: l'entrata di Elettra, il dialogo Clitennestra-Elettra, in cui l'odio atroce sembra provocare lo sconfinamento della musica dall'ambito tonale, poi il culmine spasmodico del riconoscimento di Oreste da parte di Elettra. Dopo i due delitti, infine, l'eroina si abbandona alla danza sfrenata, come segno esteriore della raggiunta liberazione. E' la fine. Il trionfo degli istinti l'ha condotta a perdere qualsiasi caratteristica umana. Null'alto v'è in lei di «musicabile».

Fu detto che Strauss «rappresenta» magistralmente; ma non «eleva». Più giusto forse riconoscere che proprio ciò che egli rappresenta non consente alcuna trasfigurazione. Che egli non la tenti nemmeno è prova della sua fondamentale onestà artistica; che la nostra nevropatica modernità non conosca trascendenze è constatazione che ovviamente esula dalle competenze del critico, e riguarda il moralista.

Dopo l'Elettra, l'Arlecchino di Ferruccio Busoni. Non si potrebbe immaginare contrasto più grande; eppure la scelta — con cui il direttore d'orchestra Dimitri Mitropoulos ha voluto rendere omaggio a colui che fu il suo maestro — ha una sua ragion d'essere. Non si dava, nell'antico teatro greco, dopo una trilogia tragica, un «dramma satiresco»? Non si dava, nel vecchio cinema muto, dopo un drammone, una «scena comica finale»? Dopo l'Elettra è indispensabile distendere un po' i nervi: l'Arlecchino può servire a tal scopo. In realtà, questo «capriccio scenico» mostra l'altra faccia della modernità musicale, quella «strawinskiana», cui accennavamo. E si dice «strawinskiana» per intenderci, che è invece proprio Busoni il precursore e il polemista, cui Strawinski deve certamente alquanto, come altri compositori contemporanei. La gaiezza di questo Arlecchino è finta; la spensieratezza della sua tenue trama è apparente; la sua olimpica serenità è «quiete fossile», appunto raggiunta con l'abile rifacimento di stili d'autori del passato. La sua ironia è — o vorrebbe essere — amarognola: il melodramma che prende in giro se stesso. Perchè mai, dunque, nelle accoglienze del pubblico Busoni ha avuto la peggio, rispetto a Strauss?

Busoni, purtroppo, arriva in ritardo. Questo nobile e ferratissimo artista italiano gode oggi della riconoscenza dei musicisti di certa tendenza, che lo accettano come il loro profeta; ma non gode della simpatia del pubblico, appunto perchè la sua è la sorte di tutti gli iniziatori. E' stato di troppo superato, da Strawinski e da altri. La «giocosità», l'intellettualismo di questo Arlecchino non possono far dimenticare la ironia terribile con cui Strawinski, con ben altra genialità, ha affrontato il compito di «ripensare» tante musiche del passato. Vuol essere antilirica, questa partitura, e canta, invece, ancor troppo: e come ci sarebbe possibile dimenticare che Strawinski ci ha insegnato persino a gustare una strumentazione in cui i timbri vengano usati in funzione polemica; una orchestrazione in cui il trombone tenti la «sviolinata» e i violini la facciano da strumenti a percussione? Insomma, s'è avuta una prova di più di ciò che sapevamo: Busoni era un artista fornito più di capacità polemica che di energia creatrice, più di idee e d'aspirazioni che di musica. Arlecchino non giunge nemmeno a diffondere la sua lambiccata allegrezza; annoia, e il suo «rifacimento di stili», attuato cautamente e senza prepotente genialità, può persino apparire mancanza di stile.

Mitropoulos ha dato dei due lavori un'esecuzione meravigliosa. Alla fine di Elettra, insieme col pubblico entusiasmato, anche l'orchestra applaudiva freneticamente: e si sa che gli orchestrali scaligeri sono i giudici più severi dei direttori d'orchestra. In Elettra ha primeggiato, quale protagonista, Christel Goltz, una vera artista, capace di prodigarsi, in gesti e voce, fino allo spasimo. Accanto a lei hanno grandeggiato Nicola Rossi Lemeni (Oreste), Elena Nicolai (Clitennestra), Doroty Dow (Crisotemide), Ramon Vinay (Egisto). Incensurabili tutti gli interpreti minori. In Arlecchino, accanto allo spigliato «recitante» Marcello Moretti, sono stati assai apprezzati la Simionato (Colombina), il Panerai (Ser Matteo), il Petri (Abate Cospicuo), il Corena (Bombasto), il Munteanu (Leandro) e la danzatrice Tilde Baroni.

Elettricità e strapaese

La tragedia (l'«Elettra») del remoto tempo mitico di Micene, tradotta prima in periodo classico, ripresa in fase floreale, c'era il pericolo che la regia Herbert Graf la degenerasse nel pletorico, nell'enfasi, nell'eccessivo. Ed in questo errore era incorso nelle prove generali. Ma, da artista avveduto, alla prima rappresentazione ha sfrondato l'azione scenica, pacato il gesto, misurato l'equilibrio dell'insieme tanto che in qualche istante è persino riapparsa la statica wagneriana. Così lo spettacolo è riuscito espressivo e dignitoso.

La ben piantata scena unica della reggia degli Atridi ideata da Ludwig Sievert col suo colore tetro e plumbeo, col suo aspetto di prigione o di fortificazione, col suo carattere arcaico che ben risponde ai secoli micenei, ha egregiamente funzionato da sfondo alla tragedia della dannazione.

Nell'«Arlecchino» lo stesso Herbert Graf, che ha il merito di muovere e far vibrare le masse secondo le sue direttive passando dal fosco all'allegro, ha studiato una spassosa regia sulla quale ha poggiato gran parte dello spettacolo. Nello scalcinato teatrino con gli antiquati lumi a petrolio e la conchiglia del suggeritore alla ribalta, appare una piazzetta bergamasca ben ironizzata da Raffaello Busoni (figlio dell'autore del «capriccio scenico»). Questo divertente quadretto volutamente infantile ornato solo con qualche accenno settecentesco pare dipinto sulla fragile carta usata nelle rappresentazioni strapaesane. Si tratta di una critica burlesca ai vecchi teatrini e, nella regia, di una satira caricaturale tessuta sulla vicenda di un Arlecchino che vuol godere l'amore libero. Sul tessuto del libretto il Graf ha imbastito sì tante buffe trovate che a noi riesce impossibile citare.

DUE OPERE IN PRIMA ALLA SCALA

"Elettra" di Strauss e "Arlecchino" di Busoni

Per l'allestimento delle due opere è stato mobilitato un complesso di eccezione

Per merito di una serie di iniziative tendenti a riproporne e valorizzarne le opere, la figura di Ferruccio Busoni si delinea sempre più in tutta la sua importanza, inserendosi finalmente al posto che gli compete nella cultura musicale italiana; e la sua arte si va imponendo, sia pure con lentezza, anche presso il pubblico, abituato generalmente a considerarlo solo in virtù delle trascrizioni bachiane.

Musicista poliedrico, natura sensibilissima e aperta a ogni nuova espressione artistica, il Busoni fu lo spirito vivo che più acutamente avvertì nell'armonia postwagneriana ancora mascherata sotto le apparenze di un processo evolutivo, la saturazione dell'accordo tonale e i sintomi della sua crisi imminente; e nella formulazione di un'estetica che mirava a ridare alla musica una sua completa autonomia liberandola dalle scorie del descrittivismo e del «programma», dalla sensualità e dall'impressionismo — un'estetica che tendeva a una «musica assoluta» — il Busoni anticipò in sede speculativa e artistica quella ricerca del linguaggio musicale che poco più tardi, con gli espressionisti, avrebbe assunto un contenuto e un preciso significato storico e sociale.

Ora se il suo esempio fu seguito e fece scuola all'estero, la sua parola rimase inascoltata in Italia, dove la sua produzione giunse con notevole ritardo.

Arlecchino, «capriccio scenico» (composto nel 1915) il cui libretto si deve allo stesso compositore, è una vivace farsa nella quale agiscono le maschere del Teatro italiano; attraverso i modi dei loro buffoneschi e divertenti bisticci si profila e man mano ingigantisce una gustosa parodia del melodramma tradizionale, argutamente beffeggiato nei convenzionalismo dei suoi personaggi e delle sue situazioni, nel giuoco di una satira garbata e insieme pungente che non risparmia, naturalmente, nemmeno il pubblico.

La musica scintillante, dalla quale scaturisce in un continuo alternarsi di intelligenza e di sottili emozioni un'ironia appena venata di scetticismo, è un capolavoro di leggerezza e di limpidità; una partitura geniale, magistralmente cesellata in contrappunti di suoni e di timbri.

Confrontare Arlecchino con un'opera come Elettra può riuscir utile, e sia pure limitatamente, in quanto Strauss rappresenta solo un aspetto del mondo contemporaneo a Busoni; accostare questi due musicisti significa comunque rendersi conto della distanza che separava le aspirazioni dell'italiano a un rinnovamento — a una musica cui fosse restituita la sua pura immaterialità e il suo equilibrio di forme — dal sensualismo turgido e malato d'elefantiasi che nel tardo sinfonismo tedesco esprimeva le esigenze di una società guglielmina tronfia e nutrita di positivismo.

E in questa Elettra, come del resto, ma con più equilibrio, in Salomè, sembrano esplodere con estrema violenza tutti i motivi del sensualismo più fosco e decadente: l'ossessione sessuale, l'istinto cieco, la passione perversa vi confluiscono e vi si mescolano in un quadro acceso e rutilante.

Per l'allestimento delle due opere la Scala ha mobilitato un complesso di artisti d'eccezionale valore, a cominciare dal direttore Dimitri Mitropoulos, per l'arte del quale abbiamo ormai esaurito tutte le possibili lodi.

Protagonista di Elettra è stata Christel Goltz, che ha superbamente superato la durissima prova dando vita frenetica a un personaggio d'intensa drammaticità. Ugualmente valorosi, nelle singole parti, gli altri interpreti — Elena Nicolai, Dorothy Dow, Ramon Vinay, Nicola Rossi Lemeni — a loro volta non meno provati dalle difficoltà dell'impervia tessitura vocale.

Arlecchino ha avuto per protagonista (che ha una parte esclusivamente parlata) il bravo attore Marcello Moretti, a noi già tanto simpaticamente noto, se pur non dal palcoscenico scaligero. I cantanti, il Panerai, il Corena, la Simionato, il Monteanu e il Petri, sono stati da parte loro ben all'altezza della situazione, in un lavoro che l'impegnava seriamente sia dal punto di vista vocale che scenico.

Regia di Herbert Graf, appropriatissima per l'Arlecchino, forse eccessivamente appesantita per l'Elettra, a parte s'intende il ridicolo combattimento tra le quinte.

Successo molto vivo.

VICE

IERI SERA ALLA SCALA

Dalla tragicità di "Elettra" alle beffe di "Arlecchino"

Dapprima l'incubo della tragedia ellenica che matura nella reggia degli Atridi dove Elettra si aggira, invisa alla madre che vede in lei la vivente testimonianza del suo delitto, preparando la vendetta; poi la capricciosa serenità della burlesca vicenda ordita da Arlecchino; ecco le due contrastanti atmosfere in cui si è trovato avvolto il pubblico di ieri sera alla Scala. Alla scena solenne di cupezza costruita da Ludwig Sievert già sfiorata dalle tenebre, rotte dalle fiamme delle fiaccole e dal bagliore degli incendi, attraversatta dall'urlo straziante di Clitennestra a cui fa eco l'incitamento dell'indemoniata a ferire ancora, ha fatto riscontro la risata che riempie la piazzetta bergamasca nella quale le maschere settecentesche di un mondo di commedia si muovono intorno ad un Arleecchino che non canta, ma parla, ride e moraleggia, lepido e innamorato personaggio dial vestito a toppe multicolori e una spatola di legno a mo' di spada alla cintola. Egli precconizza la fine del mondo al sartto dantofilo Matteo e, placate le gelosie di Colombina conscolatasi presto con un altro, gli soffia bellamente la moglie.

Il trapasso è parso certamente forte, tanto più che il lungo atto di Strauss è stato, ancor più che dall'atmosfera orchestrale, ossessionato dall'esecuzione, alla quale Herbert Graf ha mantenuto una continua tensione di demenza morbosa. Christel Golz, come protagonista, non si è certamente risparmiata per apparire una furia, invasata da un demone distruggitore, implacabile e instancabile che ha cantato, agito, danzato divampando sempre di una sinistra follia. La Golz ha riempito di sè la scena con i suoi vaneggiamenti, la resistenza e la potenza dei suoi mezzi vocali, esagitata sino a stordire, possente nella drammaticità delle sue emissioni. Sono fioriti, e non certo a suo svantaggio, i ricordi di altre precedenti straussiane figlie di Agamennone, e Christel Golz, continuamente ammirata, ha ricevuto alla fine della sua impressionante fatica feste entusiastiche, sotto forma di innumerevoli chiamate da sola al proscenio.

Da meno di lei non è stata Elena Nicolai nella cinica figura di Clitennestra, e Dorothy Dow come Crisotemide, la prima quanto a vigore di canto ed efficacia di scena, la Dow con accenti sicuri ed appassionati, mentre Nicola Rossi Lemeni ha dato compostezza di atteggiamenti e vigore di accenti ad Oreste, e Ramon Vinay, anche se il suo Egisto non era statura di artista, non vi è certo rimasto inferiore. Nè Antonio Zerbini, Mirella Fiorentini, Luisa Villa, il Carlin, il Campi, la Zanolli potevano fare meglio, e così per l'armonia delle figurazioni e il gioco canoro le ancelle, Esse, e schiave, servi, guerrieri, negli appropriati figurini sempre dello Sievert, sono state ubbidienti all'aderente regia.

Quanto all'orchestra scaligera, si è comportata come già le altre volte in cui ha affrontato, senza mai un momento di stanchezza nella tensione, la lunga, aspra fatica dello spartito straussiano, le cui esasperazioni del resto non sono più fatte per sorprendere. Dimitri Mitropoulos non ha risparmiato nulla in ricerca laboriosa attraverso il magistero tecnico dello spartito per trasfondere la sua raffinata sensibilità nella lampeggiante dinamica dello spartito stesso; è stato pure evocato più volte, e con lui sono apparsi al proscenio il regista e lo scenografo.

Un senso di freschezza si è annunciato quando, a sgombrare definitivamente dall'uragano il cielo della serata, si è aperto il velario sulla scena di Arlecchino, pittoricamente e con filiale amore realizzata da Rafaello Busoni. La confidenzialità dell'opera, essa pure con la regia di Herbert Graf, si è subito annunciata. Meglio che di vicenda vera e propria, che non riesce a concretarsi, è lecito parlare di comunione fra astanti e palcoscenico, in quanto dei personaggi si vede la figurazione e si intende la virtuosità canora sotto specie essenzialmente parodistica.

Ferruccio Busoni si è accontentato della fatuità di Colombina e di Leandro, della comicità di quella specie di Don Basilio che è l'abate Cospicuo e di Balanzone che è il dottor Bombasto, e li ha collocati, insieme ai birri che mal si reggono in piedi e persino ad un asino provvidenziale, come contorno alle trovate di un Arlecchino, nella realizzazione affidata a Marcello Moretti recitante, conquistatosi il «ruolo» da quando, beffardo ed acrobatico, figurò come servo di due padroni nella famosa commedia goldoniana. Egli è stato applaudito insieme ai cantanti: da Giulietta Simionato che, tra le inflessioni vocali, ne ha trovata qualcuna felicemente grottesca, al tenore Pietro Monteanu, ai comici Mario Petri e Fernando Corena, a Rolando Panerai che, durante il congedo, mentre i macchinisti smontavano già le scene, è stato accompagnato alla ribalta da una guida di eccezione: il maestro Mitropoulos, salito anch'egli sul palcoscenico e anch'egli salutato da lunghi applausi.

LE GRANDI PRIME ALLA SCALA

"Elettra„ di Riccardo Strauss e "Arlecchino„ di Ferruccio Busoni

A lungo si è dibattuto e si dibatte sulla convenienza di dare opere straniere nella loro lingua originale. Noi stessi abbiamo parlato di codesto problema e siamo venuti alle seguenti conclusioni: 1.a) quando il testo di un'opera straniera non presenti alcun valore letterario (vedi Carmen, ved. Faust, vedi Haensel und Gretel, vedi Manon di Massenet,) non esiste ragione per mettere gran parte del pubblico nel l'impossibilità di intendere una sola parola; 2.a) quando il testo di un'opera abbia qualità letterarie, o sia strettamente legato con la prosodia musicale (vedi il Ring, il Tristano, il Parsifal, I maestri cantori, Pelléas, Salome, Elettra, Cavaliere dalla rosa,) le esecuzioni in lingua originale sono ammissibili o anche desiderabili. A patto, tuttavia, che si tratti di esecuzioni di primo ordine, presentate come veri e propri saggi di un modo stilistico, di una scuola, di una specialità, di una fondata tradizione; a patto, infine, che la cosa non diventi regola. La gente, infatti, potrà meglio apprezzare un'opera « in lingua originale », quando già la conosca per averla udita in traduzione italiana. Anche senza comprendere le singole parole, essa gente in tal caso, possiederà un orientamento ben diverso da quello che non possa trarre dai soliti riassunti stampati sul programma (un programma, alla Scala, costa duecento lire), o da una lettura del libretto, naturalmente priva della simultaneità musicale. Alle due considerazioni già fatte potremmo aggiungere che la rappresentazione in lingua italiana appare tanto più conveniente quando un'opera offra caratteri di commedia più che di dramma, con battute di dialogo per se stesse importanti e prontamente funzionali in rapporto alla polifonia orchestrale (Maestri Cantori, Cavaliere della rosa) o quando, per strana combinazione, si possa disporre di un testo tradotto con fedeltà, con aderenza alla ritmica originaria e con qualche eleganza. Ottone Schanzer ha appunto recato in italiano Salome, Elettra e Cavaliere della rosa, raggiungendo quegli ardui obbiettivi.

In tali condizioni, la Scala ha ben statuito nello scegliere la versione italiana pel quarto melodramma straussiano, ossia per la tragedia in un atto che riguarda la vendetta operata dai figli di Agamennone contro la traditrice madre Clitennestra e contro Egisto usurpatore del trono. Senonchè, anche stavolta, l'operazione non è andata a buon fine. L'artista prescelta a impersonare la figura di Elettra, l'artista che deve stare in scena a parlare e a cantare per un'ora e cinquanta minuti, non era un'italiana, bensì (come sembrerebbe dal nome) una tedesca. Accanto a lei, un'artista americana sosteneva la parte di Crisotemide, pure importantissima agli effetti dell'azione. Ne venne fuori una inintelligibilità quasi assoluta delle parole; e noi pensammo che, se le due cantanti avessero eseguito Elettra in tedesco (lingua che si adatta alla musica conservando uno spirco assai maggiore dell'italiano per via del suo impianto sulle consonanti e per via dell'emissione, notoriamente basata su nette differenze fra vocale e vocale), quel cinque o sei per cento di spettatori, in grado di capire l'idioma germanico, sarebbe rimasto soddisfatto. Così, nessuno afferrò nulla e ciascuno perse molto dello spettacolo. D'altronde, noi non crediamo che il maestro direttore Dimitri Mitropoulos, nella sua qualità di greco residente in America, si trovasse nelle condizioni per controllare questo specifico settore della esecuzione di Elettra.

Per fortuna, la sostanza di tale esecuzione non consistette, unicamente, nel sopra ricordato aspetto di « nè carne nè pesce ». Ci fu, innanzi tutto, la partitura straussiana; la quale, pur essendo stata composta fra il 1906 e il 1908, resta ancora vivissima come risultato di unità drammatica, non certo imitabile, ma risponden te a un desiderio d'espressione elaborato per molti anni nei segreti dell'arte europea. Lo strano connubio fra realismo e preziosismo estetico, lo strano connubio da cui sorse la poesia « decadente » sul finire del secolo scorso, ha in Elettra (forse ancor più che in Salome) un documento non soltanto storico. Un documento che può ancora convincerci per la sincerità assoluta del suo essere, per il perfetto adeguarsi dell'invenzione musicale a quel determinato tipo d'immagini e per la maestria tecnica spiegata dal principio alla fine. In certo qual senso, noi potremmo applicare all'intiera opera la frase pronunciata da Elettra all'inizio della sua danza trionfale: « Mi chiedete s'io non oda la musica? Ma non sentite ch'essa sgorga da me? » Così, ancora, il passaggio dal subcosciente alla piena consapevolezza (questa e, in fondo, la trovata del poeta Hofmannsthal nel rintracciare, sulle orme di Sofocle, il personaggio della protagonista) è reso chiaramente accessibile, per mezzo di un'intuizione armonica, ritmica e contrappuntistica, per mezzo di violenze orchestrali, a timbri apposti e spesso isolati, che contengono già buona parte dei procedimenti cari alla « scuola viennese » di Schönberg e Alban Berg. Non pochi torceranno le labbra a simile affermazione; ma è un fatto che, esaminato da presso il brano orchestrale dove vien descritta la vertigine di Elettra nel riconoscere il fratello Oreste (dal numero 144a al numero 148a della partitura), noi troviamo autentici modi politonali e atonali, così come ne troviamo, sia pure meno estesi, in altri punti. E' indubitabile che, in Elettra, a un clima forsennato corrisponde con esattezza una musica forsennata, la quale, tuttavia, vien sempre dominata e illuminata da un senso mirabile della « spazio ».

Se, dunque, il dato musicale dell'opera è tuttora importante, l'interpretazione di Dimitri Mitropoulos è apparsa splendida per slancio fantastico, per scatto [illegible] pronti, impressionanti, [illegible] ne, per una vittoriosa ricerca di equilibrio in particolari di chiaroscuri. Qui bisogna anche notare che l'orchestra scaligera, trascinata da un grande animatore, si è prodigata con estrema generosità e con assoluta sapienza.

Della protagonista Christel Goltz sono stati senza dubbio ammirabili l'attività scenica, l'ardore impiegato, l'impegno artistico, la coscienza audace e avventurosa. La sua voce, però, è oscillante; i suoi « attacchi » sono incerti; l'intonazione non sempre sicura; e il timbro « cantabile » (che pure è necessario, come ad esempio nel saluto ad Oreste « nessuno muove ») quasi del tutto manchevole. Anche gli atteggiamenti plastici e i movimenti della Goltz non ci sono piaciuti. Conosciamo benissimo le « intenzioni » di Hofmannsthal e di Strauss riguardo alla follia, all'isterismo, se volete, di Elettra; ma ricordiamo come la Krucheniska, la Marcel, la Pauly, la Tess e l'ultima udita alla Scala con von Hessling (di cui ci sfugge il nome) raggiungessero pienamente lo scopo (ciascuna nella sua maniera), senza darci impressione di pesantezza, o di artificio, o di affettazione.

Dorothy Dow, a parte il suaccennato appunto circa la pronunzia, è stata una Crisotemide vocalmente espressiva e, scenicamente, ben delineata. Elena Nicolai ha cantato Clitennestra con autorità d'artista superiore, rendendo in modo assai suggestivo il complesso di rimorsi, di terrori, di orgogli che stanno in fondo all'animo della figlia di Leda. Oreste è riuscito misterioso, solenne e regale (così come dev'essere) per virtù del basso Nicola Rossi Lemeni; mentre Egisto è stato impersonato da Ramon Vinay con straordinario vigore e con rara intelligenza. Non tutte bene, ma parecchie bene, le parti minori.

La scena di Ludwig Sievert ha certo calcato la mano sulla grevità « simbolica » della reggia degli Atridi; si è compiaciuta eccessivamente del monolitico, dell'imponente, ma è risultata funzionale agli effetti della regia. La qual regia, curata da Herbert Graf ha alternato tratti naturalmente suggestivi, a ricercatezze improducenti. Alla tragedia di Strauss fu pensato di far seguire un « lieto fine », e, per raggiungerlo, fu deciso di rappresentare Arlecchino ovvero le finestre, capriccio scenico in un atto di Ferruccio Busoni. La trama di cotal capriccio, dovuta allo stesso Busoni, parte come una arlequinade alla Florian e narra di tradimenti coniugali e beffe svariate, giuocati dalla famosa maschera nella nativa sua Bergamo. Il male è che vuol accompagnare il tutto con « significati ». E allora abbiamo la tecnica della commedia dell'arte, la scena montata dai macchinisti a sipario aperto, una cantante che si riposa sedendo su una passerella sovrapposta all'orchestra, un cantante che va dal suggeritore a consultare la sua parte, una luna che viene accesa in cielo ed altre piacevolezze, già barbogie nel 1918 quando il lavoro venne composto. Più grave di tutto è la « morale » arlecchinesca intorno alla libertà, all'uomo autore del proprio destino e via discorrendo. Per noi, sono cose estremamente noiose, estremamente tristi e ammuffite.

In quanto alla musica, restiam sempre del parere che Busoni, così grande pianista, così acuto pensatore etc. etc., mancasse di autentica vocazione al comporre. I suoi pasticci di Mahler, di Bruckner, di Mozart, di Donizetti, di Rossini, è inutile, non potemmo mai digeririli. Può darsi benissimo ch'egli abbia suggerito qualcosa ad uomini come Strawinski o Casella; ma questo, agli effetti puramente artistici, conta poco. Il comicismo di Busoni, poi, era una cosa assolutamente priva di luce, di allegria, di umore; era un modo disperato per evadere da un fondamentale e deteriore romanticismo. Busoni tuonava contro il romanticismo, ma vi era dentro fino al collo. Un grande peccato. Perchè si trattava di uno spirito affascinante.

Arlecchino ha avuto una ottima esecuzione. Anche qui ha brillato Mitropoulos, e, insieme con lui, hanno brillato Giulietta Simionato, deliziosa, magistrale Colombina; Rolando Panerai, divertentissimo e bravissimo Ser Matteo; Fernando Corena e Mario Petri che hanno disegnato con magnifici coloriti le macchiette del Dottor Bombasto e dell'Abate Cospicuo. Il tenore Pietro Monteanu ha supplito con la dizione mordente e con il gusto musicale a certa crudezza di voce. In quanto al protagonista, che mai canta e solamente recita, diciamo che l'attore Marcello Moretti, tranne il modo mediocre con cui ha declamato i ben più mediocri versi iniziali, è riuscito poi frizzantissimo, interessante, oltremodo simpatico. La scena e i figurini, qui, erano di Rafaello Busoni; piacevoli, arguti gli uni e gli altri. La regia, ancora di Herbert Graf, ci sembrò ben curata in proporzione alla modestia del testo.

Le due opere hanno avuto esito diverso. Dopo l'« Elettra », l'intero teatro è scattato in una ovazione che pareva non voler più finire all'indirizzo del direttore e della interprete. Gli applausi al direttore si sono rinnovati al suo salire al podio per dirigere l'« Arlecchino » di Busoni; ma alla fine dell'opera invece qualche dissenso si faceva sentire dalla platea e dai palchi. Pochi applausi e il pubblico ha svuotato in fretta il teatro.

CORSI E RICORSI SCALIGERI

Mitropoulos fa l'«en plein»

Era stato un successo delirante. (Come ai giorni di « Lucia » e di « Medea »). Il sipario si era appena abbassato sul corpo immoto di Elettra, finalmente placatasi nella vendetta, che il pubblico — tutto ,dalle gallerie alla platea — scatta in un applauso poderoso, infinito. Per la magnifica protagonista Crhystel Goltz, ma soprattutto per lo straordinario, fiammeggiante direttore Dimitri Mitropoulos, che, a distanza di tre anni, ha ripetuto l'en plein scaligero del Wozzek.

Qualcuno ricordava lo sciopero degli artisti che, si erano rifiutati, alla prima italiana, di assumere ruoli così inumani, per la massacrante partitura da maratoneti dell'ugola. E ciò andava a maggior gloria della Goltz, che per un'ora ininterrotta, ha squittato, danzato, saltato, con una resistenza da granfondista.

Meno persuasivi gli atteggiamenti scenici, che arieggiavano le pose languide e rapinose di Francesca Bertini e Italia Almirante, quando si aggrappavano affrante d'amore alle pesanti cortine di vellute.

Modestia di Mitropoulos: invocato a piena voce, ha preferito comparissero i suoi interpreti e quando si è fatto sul proscenio con quell'aria timida e riservata, si faceva piccino e ringraziava tutti i colleghi.

Dopo l'Elettra, la bautta di Arlecchino ha rischiato di far naufragare la serata. Se fosse stato per Busoni (meglio per la sua musica) ci sarebbe perfettamente riuscito. Invece solo pochi fischi hanno punteggiato gli scarsi applausi distribuiti dalla claque e dai volontari della seconda galleria (di quelli cioè che applaudono per distinguersi).

Unica novità la passerella, a colori arlecchineschi, traverso cui sono agilmente saliti in palcoscenico gli attori in borghese, come ai « Sei personaggi ».

Entusiasma l'«Elettra» delude l'«Arlecchino»

Formidabile, l'opera dello Strauss per la vastità delle sue linee formali, l'intensità espressiva, la strapotenza dei suoi effetti sonori: straripante, si può dire, in tutti i sensi. Minuta, inconsistente, un nulla di nulla quella del Busoni. E il pubblico ha applaudito con entusiasmo la prima, ascoltata con spasmodica attenzione, disapprovato decisamente la seconda. Sono ancora una volta d'accordo col responso pubblico, e mi stimerei fortunato se ne potessi rivelare il senso intimo. Devo però notare che l'esito felicissimo dell'atto unico straussiano l'ha provocato, in buona parte, anche l'esecuzione. Ne ricordo una superiore a questa? Strauss, va bene, ma questi suoi interpreti!

Riccardo Strauss si ama, certo, e si può anche non amare: difficile, se non impossibile, non ammirarlo. La sua arte ha tutta i segni di una creazione superiore: originata da motivi d'alta levatura spirituale, scritta col magistero di una mano tecnica che più agguerrita non si saprebbe immaginare.

Musicista, ai suoi tempi, di tutte le audacie, quindi delle battaglie più insistenti e violente, oggi assunto sugli altari, non più combattuto, canonizzato, appartenne a quella schiera di innovatori o rivoluzionari, come egli stesso ebbe a osservare, che conquistarono a servare, che conquistarono a grado a grado il favor pubblico, pur con la continua pertinace opposizione della critica. (Tutto all'inverso dei novatori dei dì nostri, che hanno per sè gli osanna dei critici dotti e il crucifige popolare).

Canonizzato sia pure giustamente, è però accettato e accettabile su tutta la linea, senza riserve e senza limitazioni, sia per ognuna delle sue opere teatrali che sinfoniche? Senza riserve anche per l'« Elettra »?

Non vorrei essere preso per un antistraussiano e non lo sono, tutt'altro (l'autocitazione mi valga a sgravio di possibili accuse d'antipatia preconcetta), ma proprio per la « Elettra » non mi sento di prender partito.

L'« Elettra » è tutta spiritualmente di fondo perverso, di quel perverso che lo stesso Strauss già disse apertamente e superbamente che gli apparteneva. E' tenuta costantemente nella corda dell'esasperazione passionale tesa sino alla frenesia. I suoi personaggi vivono agendo e parlando come allucinati, quali forsennati, anzi. Una verbosità diluviante, inarginabile, carica degli esplosivi verbali infiammati e più vituperevoli, li scatena l'un contro l'altro: la figlia contro la madre, la madre contro la figlia, la sorella contro la sorella. Non c'è un momento di sosta nel loro agitato combattersi e ingiuriarsi: mai che s'aprano a un sentimento, non dico gentile, ma pacato, mai che sfugga a loro una parola conciliativa, buona. Pur l'orrido orripilante della omonima tragedia di Sofocle è superato in questa dello Strauss, apprestatagli dall'Hofmanstal. Là il sentimento materno trova tuttavia una sua umana espressione. Qui tutto e tutti sono tremendamente inarrestabilmente implacabili, tutto è obbrobrioso, feroce. Ci sono dei fiori verbali come questo: « Il nostro corpo s'impietra ne lo sterco, di cui le schiave ignobili noi siamo », e non è il peggiore.

Ora, tutto questo non poteva non avere un suo proprio riscontro in musica. La musica, in « Elettra », è esasperata ed esasperante, a chilometri come i lunghi monologhi e dialoghi del libretto.

C'è lo Strauss delle sue mirabolanti bravure con gli immancabili percettibilissimi echi wajneriani, polifonista e orchestratore strabiliante. C'è un ammasso di musica caotica, che tale appare, specialmente sornuotando a quando a quando su di essa il tema di figli, il solo di una larga, quadrata lineatura. Insomma, scritta la « Elettra » a seguito delle fortune di « Salomè », ne è una copia, un bis in idem, e i bis, in fatto di creazioni artistiche, son ripetizioni di maniera, peggiorativi, diminuzioni.

Anche l'« Elettra », dunque, se non si può amare, chi non l'ammira e non deve ammirarla?

Decisamente, l'« Arlecchino » del Busoni è stata una delusione. Ma sino a un certo punto. L'autor suo, grandissimo, insuperato e insuperabile interprete-pianista, salendo dai piani inferiori artistici della interpretazione a quelli superiori della creazione, non raggiunse quasi sempre, che modeste seppur nobili quote. Non ci si immedesima nella musica altrui tutta una vita, e non ci si sostanzia di essa senza soffocare il proprio io creativo. O interprete o creatore: l'uno non può essere che a detrimento dell'altro.

L'« Arlecchino » è tutta una parafrasi tutta una parodia, un controluce, azione scenica e musica. Quella riporta sulla scena, più o meno precisati, i vecchi personaggi della commedia dell'arte dando luogo ad una puerile, per quanto aggrovigliata e pretenziosa vicenda comica. La musica ricalca o riplasma o riecheggia altrettanti vecchi motivi e forme del nostro melodramma comico. Ma quei personaggi riescono della più frusta maniera, l'azione cui dànno luogo s'immiserisce in un garbuglio infantile, tanto più infantile quanto accenna a non so quali riposti sensi filosofici.

Ma la musica sa troppo di fabbricato, non ha il frizzo della comicità spontanea e geniale.

Vorrebbe essere un discorso gaio e semplice, ma mostra più che altro lo sforzo di apparire tale e non può nascondere la sua origine dottrinale.

Busoni, italiano di nascita e tedesco di educazione, ingegno vario, aperto, acuto, coltivatissimo, è rimasto schiacciato, nella sua personalità di italiano e di artista, nel maturarsi e nel vivere fuori dai confini patri, e dal peso del suo culturalismo. Egli ha riso nel suò « Arlecchino » puerilmente, come sanno ridere i tedeschi, secondo quel che diceva Arrigo Heine nel suo « Atta Trol ».

Dicevo dell'esecuzione. Sotto la guida del maestro Mitropoulos « Elettra » è risultata come pesata sul bilancino dello speziale e animata dal più eccitato spirito dionisiaco: una maraviglia, casa del virtuosismo direttoriale d'eccezione. Altrettanto buona, se non così al superlativo, quella degli attori scenici.

In primo luogo per parte della protagonista, impersonata da Christel Goltz, che se non ha una gran voce, è un fortissimo eccezionale temperamento artistico, e ha resistito, precisa ed espressiva, al peso della sua smisurata arduissima parte da stupire e mandare in visibilio. Bene adeguati a lei tutti gli altri interpreti, care vecchie e valorose conoscenze scaligere: Dorothy Dow, Crisotemide, Elena Nicolai (felice ritorno alle sempre agognate sponde scaligere) Ramon Vinay e Nicola Rossi Lemeni, assi autentici anche in questa stagione come s'è constatato.

Nella regia si è avvertita la mano disciplinatrice fantasiosa e geniale di Herbert Graf.

Per l'« Arlecchino » si sono avuti degli attori di primo rango, ma sciupati nelle loro insulse parti. Si è fatta però valere simpaticamente la Simionato, come quella vocalmente meglio servita, e nominerò i suoi compagni: Panerai, Monteanu, Petri, meritevoli di una lode generica. Protagonista era Marcello Moretti. Impressionante per la tetra e larga struttura architettonica la scena dell'« Elettra » dello Gievert, e carica fresca d'ingegno colorito quella dell'« Arlecchino. Dovuta a Raffaello Busoni.

AL TEATRO DELLA SCALA

L'«Elettra» di Strauss

Con Elettra, la carriera di Richard Strauss tocca il punto più alto e più distante della sua parabola intorno al moribondo astro della musica di Wagner, da cui ebbe principio col remoto Guntram, del 1894, e in cui ebbe fine con l'Amore di Danae, del 1944. La data di Elettra, il 1909, potrebbe offrire qualche buon pretesto a uno studioso tedesco amante delle simmetrie e dei cicli vitali e creativi; per noi, increduli e alieni dalle suggestioni mistiche, è inutile tentar d'indovinare che cosa sia accaduto in Strauss dal 1909 al 1911, ossia tra Elettra e il Cavaliere della Rosa. Il consueto abbinamento di Elettra a Salomè è, infatti, arbitrario, o del tutto esteriore; in Salomè l'estetismo e il sensualismo di Strauss, appoggiandosi sul dramma di Oscar Wilde, vigoreggiano in tutta la loro lussureggiante vitalità, riempiono di sè il teatro e penetrano di forza nell'animo degli ascoltatori soggiogati dal crudele impulso sinfonico; in Elettra, invece l'orrendo viluppo degli antichi delitti greci, elaborato da Hoffmansthal, raggiunge una temperie belluina; i personaggi toccano al mostruoso, le situazioni sono protratte e scatenate sino ai loro limiti estremi, le voci e gli strumenti in gara forsennata concorrono a svolgere e a concludere il dramma in un delirio di dissonanze, a cui gli episodi di eufonica melodia dànno un risalto anche maggiore. Strauss dietro i passi della sua Elettra, invasata di vendetta e di sterminio, si è fatto sino alle soglie di quel mondo estetico che dieci anni dopo si disse « espressionismo ».

Accade allora, verso il 1910, che Strauss rischiasse di perdere il suo pubblico; un pubblico dal gusto pletorico e liberty, che nei suoi poemi sinfonici aveva trovato appagamento alla lussuria strumentale inoculatagli da Wagner. Fu un vero e proprio choc, e tanto più duro in quanto lo stesso Strauss lo aveva subito, in sè; ed ecco la palingenesi, il mutamento, la sorpresa: due anni dopo, la fosca reggia di Micene, echeggiante degli urli di Clitennestra, ammorbata dalle esalazioni del sangue e dalla furia omicida di Elettra, si tramuta nella Vienna rococò della Marescialla, nella morbida galanteria d'un Settecento inzuccherato e soavemente libertino. Nei teatri europei si trasse un sospiro di sollievo; e il valzer del Cavaliere della Rosa, in un'aria equivoca di grand'operetta, si portò via, nelle sue spire eleganti, ogni traccia dei tetri sentieri per cui si era inoltrato Strauss con la gagliardia d'un bavarese abituato a toccare il fondo d'ogni bicchiere, anche se colmo dei più amari fermenti.

Ieri sera alla « Scala » la « tragedia in un atto » e in un'ora e tre quarti di Strauss ha avuto un impareggiabile animatore in Dimitri Mitropoulos, che ha ricavato da un'orchestra quanto mai docile e generosa tutti i fuochi lividi, le violenze e le evanescenze di cui è ricca la partitura, e dai cantanti la massima espressione conciliabile con le inverosimili pretese di Strauss. Elena Nicolai, Christel Goltz e Dorothy Dow, nelle parti, rispettivamente, di « Clitennestra », « Elettra » e « Crisotemide » hanno gareggiato in bravura drammatica e vocale e in resistenza, meritandosi l'ammirazione di tutti. Ramon Vinay, quale « Egisto », e Nicola Rossi Lemeni, quale « Oreste », hanno disegnato con vigore i loro personaggi, mentre una eletta schiera di cantanti ha collaborato efficacemente al buon esito dell'esecuzione nelle parti minori. D'effetto assai appropriato e architettonicamente ben costruita sembrò la scenografia di Ludwig Sievert; del tutto impropria, invece, la regia di Herbert Graf, che ha imposto ai personaggi una mimica esagitata e convulsa e ai cantanti una fatica aggiuntiva, di carattere ginnico, del tutto inutile. Una sobria gesticolazione tragica, e non di più, richiede Elettra; tutto il movimento è in orchestra, e i gesti sinfonici non debbono essere « doppiati » in palcoscenico.

A Elettra seguiva, con saliente e brillantissimo contrasto, il « capriccio scenico » di Busoni Arlecchino ovvero Le finestre. Qui, siamo ben oltre il Cavaliere della Rosa, oltre il melodramma, e oltre l'espressionismo, anche se la data del lavoro è il 1917; siamo nel cuore del nostro secolo, e un musicista geniale come Busoni sembra sembra rivolgersi a un pubblico tuttora inesistente: un pubblico che ha del tutto « digerito » le opere musicali del passato, che sa quali sono i veri capolavori, che ha condannato le produzioni troppo legate ai gusti dell'epoca in cui furono allestite, che è ansioso di una nuova parola nell'arte e a essa si dispone con uno sguardo disincantato per i dorati feticci d'un tempo. Arlecchino è il documento ancora difficile di un artista che fu difficile nella sua altera maestria, nella fedeltà a se stesso e ai propri ideali. Il « capriccio scenico », per chi lo ha inteso, è opera tanto chiara e perfetta, che è del tutto inutile aggiungervi parole, se ci si adegua al suo felice sarcasmo, alla sua scorrevole invenzione, agli innumerevoli particolari del libretto e della musica. La esecuzione è stata ammirevole, sia musicalmente sia come spettacolo. Mitropulos ha riprodotto la partitura, che è un miracolo di equilibrio e di stile, con chiarezza di proporzioni e perspicuità di timbri; in palcoscenico, l'attore Marcello Moretti ha recitato con gusto e misura la parte « parlata » del protagonista, mentre Giulietta Simionato, Rolando Panerai, Fernando Corena, Pietro Munteanu, Mario Petri e Tilde Baroni sono stati perfetti attori-cantanti da commedia, dimostrando viva intelligenza anche laddove Busoni ripensa in chiave di parodia alcuni modi del melodramma ottocentesco. La scenografia di Raffaello Busoni è di piacevole effetto, e la regia di Herbert Graf, estrosa e divertente, si attiene in tutto alle indicazioni di Busoni e alla sua particolare ironia.

Il duplice spettacolo, tra i migliori di tutta la stagione, è stato accolto con unanime e ripetuto favore; interminabili applausi al maestro Mitropoulos e agli interpreti dopo Elettra, e applausi anche allo sconcertante Arlecchino, che è un capolavoro di musica, ben oltre i suoi assunti di polemica e di autobiografica confessione. Ai suoi persistenti negatori, Busoni può sempre ripetere, dalla più alta finestra di Bergamo: « Voi Arlecchini... ».

CONQUISTA FIRENZE
LA FANCIULLA DEL WEST

Nel 1910 Puccini creò un originale esempio di "opera western"

Cronaca musicale di Teodoro Celli

Quando fu noto che Dimitri Mitropoulos avrebbe diretto, nel corso del "Maggio fiorentino", La Fanciulla del West di Puccini, molti stupirono. Molti pensarono che "il motore fosse troppo grosso per la barca"; in altre parole: che un maestro, come il grande direttore greco, avvezzo a dipanare le aggrovigliate matasse di partiture ben altrimenti complesse, fosse "sprecato" per questa partitura.

Ha fatto, in realtà, opera di squisito artista. Una audizione per radio dell'opera, ritrasmessa da Firenze, ce ne ha dato conferma. Ma noi lo prevedevamo; e non soltanto perché Mitropoulos, come tutti i veri "interpreti", sa sempre adeguare la propria tecnica alle esigenze delle più diverse partiture, per delicate, esili che siano; ma anche perché eravamo e siamo convinti che La Fanciulla del West è poi, a conti fatti, tutt'altro che una "esile partitura".

La Fanciulla del West è un'opera che, nella generale rivalutazione del teatro pucciniano attualmente in corso, dovrà ancora salire, in graduatoria.

È l'opera con cui Puccini tentò, con maggior consapevolezza, di rinnovare il proprio teatro, ampliando il ristretto quadro operistico che gli era consueto. Il "fiasco" della Butterfly (1904) lo aveva ammonito che il mondo sentimentale che in Bohème (1896) aveva toccato la più equilibrata espressione, non poteva ulteriormente esser fonte di ispirazione. Quando, nel 1910, al Metropolitan di New York, apparve la Fanciulla (cantata da Caruso, dalla Destinn e dall'Amato, e diretta da Toscanini), si disse che Puccini aveva commesso l'errore di assumere un argomento drammatico che superava le possibilità della sua vena teneramente elegiaca; lo stesso errore commesso musicando Tosca. Ma se la censura aveva qualche fondamento per Tosca, non ne aveva alcuno per la Fanciulla. Poiché se in Tosca spesso gli avvenimenti scenici avevano "forzata la mano" al musicista, obbligandolo all'enfasi e persino alla truculenza, nella Fanciulla la vicenda era stata, ed è da considerare, davvero realizzata in musica: una musica "nuova", un panorama musicale nuovo, alla tavolozza pucciniana. Con Fanciulla del West Puccini dava vita a un tipo di opera che è stata giustamente chiamata "opera western".

Ancor prima che i "film del West", i film dell' "arrivano i nostri" si diffondessero e divenissero popolari, il nostro operista aveva intuito le possibilità drammatiche d'un tal genere, e ne aveva dato l'equivalente musicale. In realtà la storia del melodramma annovera parecchi esempi, ante litteram, di un genere siffatto; possono esservi ricollegate le cosiddette pièces de sauvetage, molto in voga nel periodo della rivoluzione francese, fra cui è da annoverare anche il Fidelio di Beethoven. Ma la Fanciulla adotta risolutamente l'ambiente che diverrà poi tipico dei film dell' "arrivano i nostri", l'ambiente del West inesplorato. Lo adotta, intendiamo, mediante la musica: in nessun altro spartito, forse, Puccini riesce a configurare musicalmente le dimensioni d'un paesaggio come è riuscito per la selvaggia California dei cercatori d'oro, nella Fanciulla. E la tensione drammatica d'un intervento all'ultim'ora, che valga a salvare una situazione, nella Fanciulla è accortamente suscitata e risolta in musica, assai più d'una volta: al primo atto, con la entrata di Minnie, mentre l'orchestra esplode nel "tema" di lei, estremamente incisivo e persino turbolento, e la rissa fra i minatori viene sedata; al second'atto, quando, dopo aver vinto — barando — allo sceriffo la partita a poker che le rende la vita dell'amato, Minnie si abbandona al grido disperato "Ah, è mio!..." (e quanta efficacia, in quel "tema" ora disperatamente erompente, che già prima avevamo udito supplice e affannoso); al terz'atto, infine, quando la "figlia del West" irrompe in scena a cavallo, pistola in pugno, appena in tempo per salvar l'amato dall'impiccagione. Ma qui il gran cuore di Puccini, quel cuore da cui era sgorgata la commovente "canzone della nostalgia" al prim'atto, risolve il conflitto drammatico con una serie di finissimi trapassi sentimentali. Minnie deve commuovere i minatori, perch'essi consentano per amor di Minnie a rinunciare alla vendetta; e Puccini deve commuovere noi, perché la "conversione" divenga credibile. E Puccini vince, e conduce la sua Minnie alla vittoria, con lo squisito melodismo di "Anche tu lo vorrai, Joe..." e pagine seguenti, così piene di dolcezza e di pietà.

Poi i due innamorati se ne vanno, felici, verso una nuova vita. Anche qui, i censori hanno rimproverato a Puccini questo finale che, a loro dire, "disperderebbe ogni concitazione drammatica"; non comprendendo la finezza di questa dissolvenza, e la poesia di questo allontanarsi dei due protagonisti. È un finale patetico originalissimo, da accostare ai "finali" cinematografici di Charlie Chaplin.

INCONTRI D'ECCEZIONE AL COMUNALE DI FIRENZE

Magnifica realizzazione al «Maggio» della «Fanciulla del West» di Puccini

La presenza di Dimitri Mitropoulos e di una Minnie straniera - Nulla è affidato al caso - I meriti degli interpreti - Caloroso successo

L'ULTIMO spettacolo del «Maggio» è ormai per tradizione un avvenimento destinato a richiamare, insieme all'attenzione delle cerchie ristrette dei musicisti o dei critici, anche quella di grandi masse di pubblico: e ieri sera, con l'allestimento della «Fanciulla del West» di Puccini, il «Maggio» non è venuto meno a questa sua tradizione dando vita ad uno spettacolo che non ha dato davvero l'impressione di aver perso in valore d'arte e di cultura quello che ha guadagnato in popolarità. E questa «popolarità» suggerisce una considerazione: a vedere ieri sera quel nereggiare di folla entusiasta in ogni ordine di posti del Comunale, a sentirne gli applausi fragorosi e insistenti veniva fatto di pensare: ma tutta questa gente è a conoscenza delle polemiche che sono state fatte, e che forse si faranno, sugli «artisti stranieri in Italia»? Si preoccupa dello «stile italiano» che qualcuno crede irrimediabilmente compromesso dalla presenza di qualche nome (non importa se illustrissimo) di artista straniero? Questa gente sa che di fronte ad un direttore come Mitropoulos sono stati posti, nei mesi scorsi, numerosi veti in nome di rivendicazioni sindacali? E che c'è gente che va dicendo che, per un'opera come la «Fanciulla del West», l'Italia può disporre di qualche decina di direttori, di una dozzina di cantanti capaci di impersonare l'ardimentosa Minnie come la soprano americana Eleonor Steber?

Si capiva ieri sera dagli applausi che tutto quel pubblico non conosceva certe avvilenti polemiche, e che ascoltava ammirato l'opera d'arte e gli interpreti, senza domandare a nessuno i dati dello stato civile. Come fa il pubblico di tutto il mondo quando ora sente cantare Del Monaco; e come il pubblico faceva quarant'anni fa — proprio in occasione delle prime rappresentazioni della «Fanciulla del West» — quando sentiva cantare in italiano la boema Emmy Destinn o la celebre soprano dell'opera di Vienna Marie Jeritza.

Non compromessa, dunque, la popolarità dell'opera di Puccini dalla presenza di un grande direttore d'orchestra straniero (ma questo aggettivo sembra perfino ridicolo, a questo «livello»), o di una brava cantante americana, la «Fanciulla del West» di Puccini è sembrata nell'allestimento di ieri sera, uno degli onori più giusti che potevano esser tributati a quel musicista «europeo» che fu Giacomo Puccini: a quell'uomo di teatro che, senza dimenticare le sue più profonde ragioni di artista italiano, non si chiuse in un gretto provincialismo, e capì anzi che l'arte stessa stava per allargare i suoi confini nazionali, si preparava a nuovi linguaggi. Ma i nomi degli artisti, gli «incontri» (come si disse presentando il programma di questo «Maggio») conterebbero poco, se il risultato non fosse sul vero piano dell'arte; se, per esempio, la musica di Puccini non fosse apparsa ieri sera in tutta la sua forza sinfonica e in tutta la sua chiarezza teatrale attraverso un'organica — e per certi aspetti «nuova» — realizzazione scenico-musicale. Ed ieri sera, invece, ne siamo sicuri, anche molti tepidi ammiratori di Puccini hanno sentito per il musicista lucchese una nuova simpatia, lo hanno inquadrato in una luce che non sapeva più di retorica, di provincia musicale, di teatro «minore». La nitida e drammatica sinfonia teatrale della «Fanciulla del West» è in molti aspetti come rinata: nel frammentario primo atto che pure racchiude le cose più da antologia di tutta l'opera, e che è apparso quanto mai organico nei suoi trapassi; nel secondo così carico di vita e di tragedia nel terzo così colorito di varie passioni.

E il merito di tutto questo (lo diciamo senza timore di apparire persone... di cattivo gusto) è stato dato dalla concezione musicale di Dimitri Mitropoulos, perfettamente assimilata e resa viva da un complesso veramente eccezionale di interpreti di canto. E' superfluo ricordare le eccezionali doti di musicalità, di temperamento e di tecnica di questo direttore (certi suoi atteggiamenti hanno davvero qualcosa di prodigioso) ma non si può non restare meravigliati della passione e dell'amore dimostrati da Mitropoulos (che non è — forse a torto — un «uomo di teatro») per inquadrare tutta quanta l'opera nel suo spirito di sinfonia teatrale, con la sua crudezza e le sue concitazioni, con le sue pagine di passione e di lirismo. Nulla è affidato al caso; orchestra, cantanti, coro si muovono come i segni di una partitura ideale in cui la musica indica persino il gesto, il ritmo generale del dramma.

Tutti gli interpreti, si è detto, hanno vissuto in questo clima di perfezione formale, di pucciniano sintonismo. Il temperamento di Mitropoulos ha lasciato in certi episodi venature di un'impensata elettricità, senza tuttavia allontanare il pathos di un'atmosfera generale quanto mai chiara e sentita. Scaldati da questa insistente presenza di un unico coordinatore musicale (Mitropoulos) i cantanti non hanno avuto incertezze: Eleonor Steber mirabile attrice e musicalissima cantante (anche se la sua voce non è fra le più indicate a sostenere questo tipo di opere), Mario Del Monaco con il tono della sua bellissima voce che ripaga anche di certe improprietà di atteggiamento scenico, e Gian Giacomo Guelfi (per non ricordare che tre degli artisti di primo piano) esemplare nel dominio dei mezzi vocali e nell'evidenza del personaggio da lui realizzato, hanno comunicato al pubblico brividi d'intensa emozione. E i meriti di tutti gli altri interpreti non sono stati, per molti aspetti, minori: tanto che resta difficile, in così ordinata e convinta partecipazione di tutti, stabilire una graduatoria di merito fra Piero De Palma, Vito Susca, Giorgio Tozzi, Enzo Viaro, Virgilio Carbonari, Brenno Ristori, Lido Pettini, Valiano Natali, Enzo Guagni, Agostino Ferrin, Giorgio Giorgetti, Laura Franchi, Paolo Washington, Mario Frosini e Alberto Lotti Camici.

Ad accrescere il senso di piacevole euritmia della parte musicale (a cui ha dato valido contributo, insieme all'orchestra, il coro diretto da Andrea Morosini) sono state anche le scene di quel toscanissimo uomo che è Ardengo Soffici: scene disegnate con sicurezza di linea, con soluzioni teatralmente intelligenti, ma soprattutto dense di un senso poetico del «vero» che solo un artista autentico può creare.

La regìa di Malaparte, salvo rare eccezioni (che resta difficile stabilire quanto siano da attribuire ai collaboratori dello scrittore-regista e quanto alla stessa iniziativa di Mitropoulos, si è mantenuta in una linea di gusto tradizionale, senza impennate di eccezionale interesse, ma tuttavia suggestiva e elegante nel tratteggiare il clima generale del dramma.

La cronaca della serata, come si è accennato, è stata fra le più liete. Fino dalla chiusura del primo atto, che è il meno adatto a suscitare forti emozioni, il pubblico ha tributato calorosi applausi a Del Monaco, alla Steber e a Guelfi, come pure a tutti gli altri artisti di palcoscenico. Mitropoulos, che si è presentato per la prima volta alla ribalta soltanto alla fine del secondo atto, ha riscosso un vivissimo successo personale. Seppure, nel corso del terzo atto, qualcuno possa aver male interpretato il fatto che, con molta opportunità, il celebre direttore non abbia voluto fermare l'azione musicale dopo la popolare romanza del tenore. E' stato un momento quasi drammatico: visto che l'orchestra continuava a sonare, gli applausi rivolti a Del Monaco si sono come sdoppiati in clamorose proteste e in forti zittii. Poi, improvvisamente, tutto è cessato quando il direttore si è voltato per un attimo verso la sala con un gesto di giusto disappunto.

L'opera si è conclusa con nuovi calorosi applausi, rivolti ai principali interpreti di canto, a Mitropoulos e a Malaparte.

IL NUOVO CORRIERE - LA GAZZETTA

AL MAGGIO MUSICALE FIORENTINO

LIETO RITORNO
DE "LA FANCIULLA DEL WEST,,

Dopo Verdi, è Puccini indubbiamente il più popolare degli operisti italiani. Ozioso sarebbe ricercare se ciò sia dovuto al fatto che il suo teatro, musica e personaggi, interpreta come nessun altro le aspirazioni lirico-drammatiche del popolo, o se invece l'anonima folla spontaneamente modelli la sua sensibilità nella personale creazione artistica del musicista. Altrettanto ozioso sarebbe qui, addentrarsi nel problema quanto mai spinoso per la critica di collocare la produzione operistica pucciniana ad un adeguato livello d'importanza nella storia del nostro melodramma; livello che, come quasi ogni altra produzione del genere, soffre di continue necessarie revisioni, e tali a volte da capovolgere addirittura i primitivi giudizi sulle opere stesse e sugli indirizzi spirituali in cui si concretano. E ciò perchè non sempre ci è dato di cogliere d'un subito nell'opera stessa gli elementi necessari alla sua valutazione, in special modo quando prevenzioni, come quella dovuta alla particolare popolarità dell'opera pucciniana che l'ha fatta considerare sempre con sospetto dalla critica ufficiale, ostacolano una spassionata indagine. Oggi, però, poichè le caratteristiche formali del musicista lucchese vengono appurate con maggior chiarezza ed obbiettività, la revisione di giudizio evolve con costante progresso verso un serio doveroso riconoscimento dell'arte del grande Maestro toscano. Ad esempio, l'assimilazione di processi tecnici stranieri un tempo censurata, ora invece è vista come attributo di forte personalità.

A questa caratteristica emotiva va ancora aggiunta la nostalgia, il cui pregnante sentimento informa, colora, pressochè tutta la ricca tematica dell'opera, e che specificamente si fa sentire al prim'atto nel suggestivo canto del cantastorie Wallace, e all'ultimo negli addii degli avventurieri a Minnie e a Johnson, tale da costituire l'atmosfera nella quale tutti i personaggi soffrono le loro elementari passioni. Vanno indicati quali momenti di massima compiutezza espressiva, oltre il canto della nostalgia, l'ultimo duetto al primo atto tra Minnie e Johnson, con lo stupendo finale di Minnie sola, per il loro intenso lirismo, e nel secondo atto il racconto che Johnson fa della sua vita (pagina di profonda bellezza); l'entrata di Rance, la partita a poker e la conclusiva vittoria della protagonista per la potente drammaticità che lega in un crescendo tutti gli episodi, ed ancora il finale dell'ultimo atto.

Per l'incisiva adeguatezza dell'invenzione musicale alla figura dei protagonisti ed al movimento scenico, nonchè per l'intrinseca bellezza e proprietà dello strumentale «La fanciulla del West» può considerarsi come decisiva al fine della definizione della personalità artistica del musicista; con i successivi «Trittico» e «Turandot», segna un felice ritorno all'immediatezza lirico-drammatica che caratterizza la lontana «Bohéme», differenziandosi però da questa per «un deciso orientamento di linguaggio tipicamente europeo del principio del nostro secolo».

Le eminenti qualità interpretative e direttoriali del maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos si sono ancora una volta dimostrate nella loro piena efficienza: aperto per cultura e sensibilità ad ogni indirizzo d'arte — di lui ancora vive sono nella nostra memoria le stupende esecuzioni di qualche anno fa dell'«Elettra» di Strauss e della «Messa da Requiem» di Verdi —, egli ha saputo penetrare nello spirito dell'opera pucciniana e renderlo presente e vivo in ogni episodio, in ogni dettaglio con un compiuto rilievo di plastica e poetica evidenza.

Dell'ottimo complesso solistico sono anzitutto emersi per proprietà di canto e di scena il tenore Mario Del Monaco, nella parte di «Johnson», e Gian Giacomo Guelfi, in quella di «Jack Rance» (ambedue «voci e stile» del tutto corrispondenti alle esigenze del teatro pucciniano), ed accanto a loro la soprano Eleanor Steber è apparsa una lodevole «Minnie», soprattutto nei momenti di lirica dolcezza, dove appunto l'artista rivela pregevoli qualità vocali e di studio. Vanno ancora nominati per l'adeguata interpretazione del personaggio Giorgio Tozzi («Jake Wallace»), Enzo Viaro («Sonora»), il De Palma («Nick»), Giorgetti («Larkens») e Natali («Harry»); a posto tutti gli altri cantanti nelle parti collaterali. Efficace il coro istruito dal maestro Andrea Morosini e perfetta l'orchestra.

Il regista Curzio Malaparte ed il bozzettista e figurinista Ardenzo Soffici, coadiuvati da P. Caliterna per l'allestimento scenico, si sono attenuti, con apprezzabile risultato, alla tradizionale convenzione in cui quest'opera viene realizzata nel movimento e nella scena.

Stasera la consegna dell'«Oscar italiano»

Dimitri Mitropoulos riceverà dai dodici apostoli la statuetta in oro e bronzo rappresentante S. Luca

I dodici apostoli consegnano stasera al maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos l'« Oscar italiano », cioè la statuetta in oro e bronzo che lo scultore Antonio Berti ha plasmato per il premio internazionale che il nuovo cenacolo fiorentino intende ogni anno assegnare ad una personalità del mondo culturale. Quest'anno, come si sa, il premio toccava alla Musica e il maestro Mitropoulos, di cui si è potuta sentire in questi giorni una splendida edizione della « Fanciulla del West », è stata la personalità prescelta dai dodici. La consegna dell'« Oscar » avverrà alle 19,30 alla presenza di autorità, scrittori, giornalisti, e personalità nella trattoria di Vincenzo Sabatini che, da munifico oste, ha voluto contribuire alla realizzazione del premio internazionale.

Come è noto i dodici apostoli formano un originale cenacolo che ogni mese si riunisce a discutere su di un argomento di cultura invitando come « Giuda », cioè come contraddittore, una personalità della stessa arte alla quale appartiene l'oratore. La conversazione avviene mentre si sorseggia il caffè, vale a dire senza alcun pericolo di accademia o di ufficialità. Ciascuno dei dodici rappresenta un arte o comunque una attività nel campo culturale: Gino Bechi la lirica, Umberto Benedetto la regìa, Antonio Berti la scultura, Mario Borgiotti il collezionismo d'arte, Ugo Capocchini la pittura, Giorgio Gigli il giornalismo, Amerigo Gomez il cinema, Paolo Malchiodi l'architettura, Renato Mariani il teatro, Arnaldo Miniati la ceramica, Marino Parenti le letteratura ed Emidio Tieri la musica. Gli « apostoli » hanno un curioso regolamento e imbandiscono la loro tavola secondo la figura dell'affresco di Leonardo da Vinci. Essi hanno già tenuto cinque o sei riunioni con accanitissime discussioni che si sono protratte fino all'alba. Stasera, tuttavia, le discussioni sono sospese: la cena è in onore di Dimitri Mitropoulos che riceve per primo l'« Oscar italiano ».

AL MAGGIO MUSICALE FIORENTINO

La Fanciulla del West applaudita a scena aperta

L'edizione affidata alla direzione di Mitropoulos e alla regia di Curzio Malaparte ha soddisfatto le più difficili esigenze

FIRENZE, 16.

Invitare Puccini al « Maggio musicale » ha quasi un sapore di presa di posizione nella polemica che da anni si svolge attorno all'opera del musicista lucchese; polemica che ha fatto non di rado sentire il suo peso anche nella compilazione dei cartelloni operistici per quelle manifestazioni che avevano impegni di ben definita intellettualità e di alta cultura. Strano si è che i primi solidi riconoscimenti sian venuti dai paesi di lingua tedesca; e che, dall'altro lato, non si voglia tener conto di tutti quegli elementi di scrittura che hanno fatto di Puccini il musicista italiano senz'altro più affinato dell'epoca sua, consentendogli tuttavia di diventare e rimanere « popolare » nel senso più ampio del termine.

In questo senso La fanciulla del West (da « The girl of the golden West », dramma a forti tinte e a sfondo folklorico americano di un tal Belasco) è una delle creazioni pucciniane maggiormente significative. Siamo anche qui in pieno esotismo — perchè esotica non poteva non apparire, negli anni attorno al 1910 l'America dei pionieri e dei minatori — ma anche in una vicenda scenica e musicale, semplicissima ma di universale portata.

Con La fanciulla del West è imminente l'atmosfera del Trittico; c'è, ancora attuale, la tendenza al declamato; una fusione fra orchestra e voci che preclude in modo quanto mai suggestivo alla concezione strumentale del cantante; infine c'è una abilità di strumentatore e di armonista che non è mai giuoco di bravura, ma si pone quale istintiva esigenza della frase melodica al suo stesso nascere. Poichè è noto che Puccini quasi mai componeva alle due righe del pianoforte; frasi ed elementi tematici fluivano dalla sua fantasia già armonizzati e già strumentati; e di qui la singolarità del manoscritto autografo pucciniano, disteso in varie righe con tutte le sommarie indicazioni della futura elaborata e affinata partitura orchestrale.

Già per questa sola esigenza Puccini si pone come il primo, e forse il solo compositore italiano di melodrammi dopo Verdi che sia rimasto «attuale»; e anche se si può dissentire da certe rudezze veristiche, bisogna arrestarsi di fronte a un magistero strumentale solidissimo, a un gusto sonoro di una raffinatezza squisita, ad una continua e severa ansia del nuovo, di impadronirsi di audacie e conquiste quali andavano maturandosi in tutta Europa, sotto i segni di Ravel, di Strawinsky, di Bartok, di Schoenberg. Si può così cogliere nella Fanciulla più di una atmosfera dolcemente debussiana, una onomatopea alla Strauss (il « battito del cuore » scandito dai timpani durante la scena della partita a poker), onomatopea che ottiene, con assoluta semplicità di mezzi e di idee, un effetto addirittura parossistico di tensione. E infine va osservato che Puccini non fa mai dell'autoantologia, poichè possiede, da Manon e da Bohème in poi un suo mondo espressivo così ben definito e così personale che riesce a imporsi in una inconfondibile originalità.

Puccini non si è mai atteggiato a rivoluzionario, nè ha voluto creare una scuola, nè di fatto è esistito un « puccinismo »; ma l'aver saputo mettere a profitto del proprio vocabolario tutte quelle nuove parole, con un gusto e un equilibrio tutto toscano è forse uno dei lati più appariscenti della sua personalità. Che, specialmente in quest'opera, non si esaurisce nella facilità del cantabile, nella semplice emozione di qualche più nota e più sentimentale romanza, ma si fonda su un prepotente senso del teatro, senza il quale ogni melodramma è destinato a cadere.

Attesissima, questa ripresa de La fanciulla del West ha soddisfatto in pieno le più difficili esigenze. Affidata a Dimitri Mitropoulos, la partitura è apparsa non soltanto nel più vivo splendore della sua magistrale tessitura, ma con un impeto drammatico e una dolcezza nostalgica inesauribile. L'energia inesauribile di questo grande direttore ha creato grandi immagini sonore, contrasti e lucentezze, e un senso di emozione calda, immediata, vitale. In piena rispondenza con Mitropoulos tutti i cantanti; Eleanor Steber, attrice abilissima, padrona del palcoscenico, agile e irruenta, e vocalmente piacevole particolarmente nelle espressioni più dolci e affettuose; Mario Del Monaco, voce squillante, maschia, sicura, temperamento robusto e vibrante, scuola di alta classe; una interpretazione entusiasmante. L'altra parte di rilievo è stata assegnata a Gian Giacomo Guelfi, che, in pochi anni dal suo inizio si è acquistata una esperienza profonda, ed ha messo in luce sempre maggiore del brillanti qualità del suo bel registro di baritono e della sua viva musicalità.

Eccellenti tutti gli altri interpreti, ed eccellente il coro, che Morosini ha istruito con particolare cura.

Regìa di Curzio Malaparte, e scenografia di Ardengo Soffici hanno mirato più a trattare con spregiudicata spigliatezza gli elementi abituali della rappresentazione melodrammatica che a creare le premesse di un nuovo costume; il loro impegno è stato accolto con vivissima soddisfazione. E i grandi applausi a scena aperta, le entusiastiche ovazioni ripetute alla fine degli atti hanno allietato la cronaca della serata.

16 giugno 1954 - LA NAZIONE ITALIANA

UN'OPERA POPOLARE E RAFFINATA

"La fanciulla del West,, nella splendida edizione del Maggio

Agli intellettuali raffinatissimi e a tutti i musicisti che scrivono o fanno la musica « come se non vivessero, non mangiassero, non dormissero », potrà forse esser dispiaciuta l'idea di concludere questa edizione del « Maggio musicale » operistico con Puccini, poco valendo per giustificazione il fatto che le esecuzioni di « Fanciulla del West » si riducono a pochissime, e che forse molti fra i giovanissimi non l'hanno neanche mai potuta ascoltare.

Eppure, polemiche, a parte, la musica e il teatro di Puccini — uno degli ultimi, e uno dei rarissimi per i quali i due termini sono tanto stretti da confondersi fra loro — sono un fenomeno d'arte fra i più vistosi del mondo melodrammatico e, almeno per noi, un qualcosa che appartiene strettamente alle nostre naturali disposizioni: una musica, insomma, di casa nostra, impastata di terra toscana, di buon mare della Versilia e di semplice amore, istintivo, per le semplici cose della « nostra » campagna; una musica che rimane nostra, toscana prima ancora che latina, anche dove l'ambiente ci trasporta negli esotismi di Turandot e di Butterfly, e nel lontano West de La fanciulla. Perché non è a dire che Puccini sia rimasto insensibile di fronte al patrimonio di folklore degli Americani; degli Americani bianchi, s'intende, anche se più di un inciso, di un ritmo, di un colore rappresentano il primissimo eco, nella musica europea, di quel lavorìo primordiale che doveva sfociare nello « spiritual » e poi nel jazz di New Orleans. E il tema forse più significativo e più bello dell'opera intera, la canzone della nostalgia, è talmente americano da far pensare a un imprestito diretto, ma insieme così inconfondibilmente Puccini che se ne deve concludere come, qui specialmente, Puccini sia riuscito proprio a risolvere il problema fondamentale del teatro per musica, e cioè a « inventare il vero ».

Se la canzone della nostalgia è il momento più suggestivo dell'opera, è ugualmente il leit motiv psicologico che ne domina le vicende di azioni e di musica. Siamo al verismo, anzi, ancor più siamo al cinematografo e al western, che del cinema primitivo è stato l'espressione più gloriosa; ma tutte le complicate avventure di Minnie son travisate in chiave di malinconia e di dolcezza, e l'opera, iniziatasi con una espressione di nostalgia per la casa lontana — un'eco, strettamente cittadina, degli affetti degli emigrati lucchesi per la terra lontana? — si chiude con un addio, anche questo ampiamente corale, anche questo carico di malinconia e di rimpianti, di dolcezza e di tristezza.

Anche per questa ripresa, il « Maggio musicale » ha fatto appello ai nomi più sonanti che il mondo degli interpreti avesse a disposizione. La bacchetta direttoriale è stata affidata a Dimitri Mitropulos, che sembra divenuto ospite abituale del « Maggio », ed è ospite fra i più graditi. La partitura esce in musica attraverso un collaudo approfondito, filtrata nei suoi aspetti di tessuto orchestrale e ancora più ricondotta alla sua funzione di creare ambiente psicologico. E soprattutto permeata da un singolare calore, e da un vigore stilistico che son valsi a riscattare tutto il generico, l'indistinto, l'approssimativo in cui sta vivacchiando, da anni, l'esecuzione del teatro pucciniano. E a « rivelare » quanto vi sia di geniale, di poetico, di « nostro » in questa opera così stranamente relegata nel dimenticatoio.

Di non minor rilievo è stata la compagnia di canto. Nuovo per noi il nome della soprano Eleanor Steber; un'attrice disinvolta e spigliata, e una voce che ha degli aspetti quanto mai gradevoli. Essa si è imposta per il temperamento aggressivo della recitazione, condotta con ogni raffinatezza e con ogni irruenza dell'attrice consumata, più che per le pure qualità vocali; le quali si son messe in assai maggior risalto nei toni dolci e patetici che non nelle grandi espressioni drammatiche. A Mario del Monaco è stato assegnato il ruolo del bandito redento: che il tenore ha sostenuto con una voce bella e maschia e calda, e con una immediatezza di atteggiamenti vocali che ben si accordava con le caratteristiche del personaggio e che incarnava in maniera perfetta l'ideale del tenore pucciniano.

Assai precisi e intelligenti, tutti gli altri interpreti nelle loro rispettive parti; pronto e preparato brillantemente il coro di Morosini, che anche ha saputo trovare una buona scioltezza di movimenti di scena.

Per scenografia e regìa molto assegnamento si è fatto sui nomi, risonanti, di Soffici e di Malaparte. Due figure di primo piano nel mondo della cultura italiana, che, si pensava, avrebbero inteso il loro compito con un piglio addirittura garibaldino. Ma scenografia e regìa non hanno in realtà compiuto passi troppo rivoluzionari e sono da notare per il molto gusto e la molta attenzione. Scenografia e movimenti di masse, quest'ultimi assai sciolti e vivaci, sembravano orientati verso tendenze notevolmente cinematografiche, ed hanno trovato un valido aiuto nella eccellente realizzazione scenica di Caliterna.

In un'atmosfera di sottile mondanità, La fanciulla del West è stata accolta dal pubblico del « Maggio » con entusiastico, incondizionato favore. Tutto ha trovato prontissima rispondenza negli ascoltatori, che sono stati trascinati a clamorose ovazioni a scena aperta ai cantanti, al direttore, allo scenografo e al regista. Innumerevoli le chiamate alla fine degli atti, e festosissime le accoglienze a Dimitri Mitropulos.

GIORNALE DI TRIESTE

AL «MAGGIO MUSICALE FIORENTINO»

Superba esecuzione di «Fanciulla del West»

Firenze, giugno

Dobbiamo stupirci perchè «La fanciulla del West» ha costituito, per i più, lo spettacolo di maggior interesse e di effettiva attrattiva di questo «XVII Maggio musicale fiorentino» giunto, ormai, al suo termine? No davvero! Per Puccini — e per i compositori della cosiddetta «scuola verista» — vi è, in sede di festival fiorentino, fin dalle origini, un paragrafo a parte, polemico, e spesso negativo. Rammentiamolo velocemente.

Il «I Maggio» aveva escluso, pur quale celebrazione del melodramma ottocentesco nostrano da Spontini a Verdi, i compositori della «giovane scuola». Eravamo nel 1933. Anni difficili, appunto, da un punto di vista estetico, per la popolarità di Giacomo Puccini e degli altri campioni, più o meno qualificati e meritevoli, del verismo musicale nostrano. L'atteggiamento critico (che altri definì snobistico e contraprovinciale) durò a lungo. Del resto la critica ufficiale appoggiava siffatto comportamento. Le riviste in voga ignoravano, nel migliore dei casi, l'operato pucciniano. Senza ritornare ai celebri precedenti negativi di Torrefranca e di Pizzetti (il quale ultimo ha, in seguito, riveduto l'antico giudizio, aderendo alla concezione operistica pucciniana, da un punto di vista egegetico), diremo che si contano sulle dita i saggi obiettivi, se non positivi, dedicati al maestro lucchese. Guido M. Gatti e Vittorio Gui tracciarono note, in tal senso, degne di ricordo e di elogio. E, per quanto mi concerne, mi vanto che la «Rassegna musicale», diretta dallo stesso Guido M. Gatti, ospitasse, nel 1935, un mio saggio pucciniano che, per il fatto di essere decisamente positivo nei confronti del grandissimo compositore toscano, mi alienò parecchie simpatie e indusse i più a mettermi all'indice, ad additarmi quale esempio di cretineria congenita e di assoluta incomprensione dinanzi alle faccende musicali. Così, dunque, procedeva, nella nostra dolce penisola, poco meno di venti anni or sono, la imbarcazione pucciniana, pur acclamata dal popolo, pur contesa dai teatri di tutto il mondo, pur considerata all'estero con serena e leale simpatia. Parlare bene di Puccini era una macchia indelebile nell'esistenza di chi che sia. Proclamare «Bohème» o «Tabarro» capolavori significava addossarsi, indirettamente, la perenne taccia di indegnità di curare e scrivere di cose musicali. E il sottoscritto ne sa qualcosa.

Ma torniamo ai «Maggi». Finalmente, nel 1940, il «VI Maggio» aprì, per la prima volta, le porte a Puccini, inscenando «Turandot», con evidente intendimento comparativo nei confronti dell'omonima opera di Ferruccio Busoni, allestita nel medesimo festival. Fu un successo anche per l'ottima esecuzione, diretta da Ettore Panizza con Gina Cigna, Licia Albanese e Todor Mazaroff nei ruoli principali. Anche il «VII Maggio» — quello del 1941 — vide nuovamente Puccini presente con una memorabile «Bohème», diretta da Victor de Sabata, con Beniamino Gigli, Mafalda Favero e Tancredi Pasero quali cantanti di grido. (In quel medesimo «VII Maggio» Pietro Mascagni, autore e direttore, fece la sua unica comparsa al festival di Firenze che inscenò «L'amico Fritz»). Da allora, da ben tredici anni, Giacomo Puccini era assente dai «Maggi Fiorentini»; nè altri esponenti del movimento melodrammatico post-verdiano furono, comunque, ospitati nei severi e raffinati cartelloni della celebre festa musicale di Firenze.

Dopo questa premessa, dopo questa recriminazione che non vuole esaurirsi in se stessa ma che si illude di essere, per l'avvenire, uno spunto critico non del tutto inascoltabile e rifiutabile a priori, diremo che il giuoco valeva la candela, diremo che la lunga attesa è stata, in un certo senso, integralmente soddisfatta sia per la scelta dell'opera che per la dovizia del fatto esecutivo.

E' noto che «La fanciulla del West» costituisce la prima, fondamentale tappa di una crisi sviluppatasi gradualmente nella geniale mente creatrice dell'operista lucchese. Crisi non solo in quanto anelito verso una forma espressiva sempre aggiornata e consapevole ma — ciò che più conta — in quanto rinnovamento di una posizione poetica scontata, talvolta, anche pena una meno efficiente e memorabile originalità. Il vocabolario de «La fanciulla del West» riecheggia i tratti di un impressionismo che, dal patrio suolo francese, aveva varcato la catena alpina, molto efficacemente addossandosi alla statura musicale pucciniana. Sarebbe ingiusto additare siffatto elemento di provenienza linguistica senza lodevolmente inserirlo nella manomissione estetica che ha luogo con «La fanciulla del West». In questo spartito sembrano capovolti, per lo meno in buona parte e non certo negli episodi meno determinanti, i termini espressivi del Puccini che più amiamo. Ascoltando l'ambiente singolarissimo nel quale si svolge la vicenda, Puccini ascolta se stesso. Ne nascono pagine ragguardevolissime quali tutta la metà del primo atto dall'esordio al dialogo tra Minnie e lo Sceriffo. Ne proviene, ancora, quel terzo atto che, non si sa perchè, viene stolidamente considerato incompleto e calante, nel finale ultimo, agli effetti della tensione drammatica. Oggi si tratta proprio di vedere, al contrario, la validità di questo atto, incominciando a valutare la calettatura amareggiata e malinconica dell'avvio, con quell'insistente armonia che salda e modula la conversazione dello Sceriffo con Nick. In quanto al finale, bisogna intendere il valore psicologico del medesimo rispetto allo svolgimento di tutta la vicenda. Allora si capirà la risonanza patetica particolarissima che sorge dalla partenza dei due innamorati. Dopo tante avventurose vicende, dopo il riscatto di Johnson da parte di Minnie, dopo quel mirabile stillicidio di addii con cui Minnie riesce ad ottenere il suo uomo dalla folle collera dei minatori (e qui Puccini ha dettato una pagina che non ha, forse, riscontro, in quanto ad adeguatezza patetica, in tutta la operistica dell'autore; alludo, per l'appunto, all'avvio della donna sulle parole «E anche tu lo vorrai...»), ha inizio — per così dire — l'ordinaria amministrazione; con l'unione delle due creature finisce la tempestosa e tumultuosa esperienza che pur ha messo a contatto l'uno con l'altro. E' un po' come nelle pellicole di Charlie Chaplin (è di Teodoro Celli, questa sottile e indovinata constatazione critica) quando il protagonista, esaurite le sue amare e sfiduciate vicissitudini, se ne va mestamente, ancorchè il volto degli spettatori debba atteggiarsi al sorriso. E qui torna opportuno ricordare come il «lieto finale» de «La fanciulla del West» non riesca ad asciugare la lacrima che vela, in precedenza, l'occhio dell'ascoltatore. E' un lieto finale pagato a caro prezzo; è un congedo rinunciatario per troppi dogliosi ricordi che non possono non lasciare solchi e ferite non rimarginabili nella memoria e nel cuore. Per questa ragione ho sempre ritenuto — e lo ritengo tuttora — che con «La fanciulla del West» Puccini ha scritto l'opera sua più pessimistica ed amara. Non vi è la liquidazione definitiva causata dalla morte o dal suicidio. Non vi è un traguardo conclusivo che concerna l'aldilà e che, come tale, Puccini affida alla fede, quale che sia (ma non certo la sua), dell'ascoltatore. Ne «La fanciulla del West» il traguardo è la vita da vivere; ne «La fanciulla del West» la strada da percorrere è il più amaro e doloroso scotto che resti a Minnie ed a Johnson per una felicità supposta e tanto duramente conseguita. In tutto potevano cangiare l'apparenza e la sostanza estetica del teatro pucciniano. Ma dalle origini al suicidio di Liù permane, perenne e indelebile, sui suoi personaggi questo marchio disperato: l'insoddisfazione e l'inappagamento che s'accompagnano durante il nostro travagliato quotidiano itinerario terreno.

«La fanciulla del West» è stata inscenata al Teatro Comunale di Firenze con superbo sfoggio di mezzi realizzativi.

Sul podio direttoriale, Dimitri Mitropoulos ha dominato lo spettacolo con una concertazione concitata, avvampante, galvanizzatrice, pienamente in coerenza con le risorse patetiche della bellissima partitura. E ancora una volta l'insigne direttore ha voluto riservare a Firenze una nuova esperienza: quella di direttore di un'opera pucciniana.

Nel settore registico lirico Curzio Malaparte era al suo esordio. Con l'intelligenza e l'abilità che contraddistinguono le di lui numerose realizzazioni di letterato e di giornalista, Malaparte ha agito con gusto e con buon senso, rispettando costantemente — perfino a costo di apparire accademico — le tradizioni connesse allo spartito pucciniano. In ciò ha agito docilmente sui bozzetti e figurini di Ardengo Soffici, anch'egli al suo esordio nel campo operistico. Particolarmente felice la scena del terzo atto per respiro e per elasticità di concezione. Sul palcoscenico ha signoreggiato Mario Del Monaco, il più resistente ed irresistibile Johnson della nostra epoca. Il soprano Eleanor Steber cantava per la prima volta in Italia. Si tratta di artista di vasta notorietà oltre Oceano che ha collaudato soltanto l'anno scorso le scene europee a Bayreuth in «Lohengrin» e a Vienna nella «Donna senza ombra» di Strauss. Alle prese con una figura scenica tra le più impegnative è strenue del repertorio lirico novecentesco, la Steber è stata apprezzata, soprattutto per qualità interpretative consapevoli ed efficienti. Come Eleanor Steber, anche il baritono Gian Giacomo Guelfi affrontava per la prima volta «La fanciulla del West» ed ha saputo imporsi magnificamente al consenso dell'uditorio. Molteplici e di varia natura, in ordine a quanto sopra segnalato, erano i motivi per i quali l'allestimento fiorentino dell'opera di Puccini era atteso con tanto interesse. Ed il successo dell'iniziativa è stato superiore alle più liete previsioni.

A Dimitri Mitropulos l'« Oscar » dei Dodici Apostoli

Dimitri Mitropulos riceverà a Firenze, la sera di sabato 19 giugno, il primo premio annuale del « Cenacolo dei dodici apostoli », quest'anno destinato alla musica.

Al direttore d'orchestra verrà consegnata una statuetta d'oro e bronzo raffigurante San Luca, protettore delle arti, opera dello scultore Antonio Berti, realizzata dal fonditore Bruno Bearzi, cesellata dall'orafo fiorentino Bini. Questo « Oscar italiano » viene assegnato da un « cenacolo » di dodici apostoli della cultura e dell'arte, che, come è noto, si riuniscono, una volta al mese, nella trattoria fiorentina di Vincenzo Sabatini e discutono su un argomento di cultura.

Nei prossimi anni, il « cenacolo » premierà di volta in volta le altre arti, affidando la scelta al sorteggio.

MUSICA

Il soprano a cavallo

Firenze, giugno

Per anni Puccini è stato vittima delle volgarità altrui. Tenori smanierati hanno urlato le sue romanze di amore, direttori d'orchestra svogliati hanno esagerato il suo sentimento trasformandolo in sentimentalismo ed impresari astuti hanno sfruttato la Tosca e la Bohème, presentandole in miserevoli edizioni, sicuri di un facile successo popolare. Non c'è quindi da meravigliarsi che vi siano ancora oggi persone di buon gusto che considerano Puccini un compositore di second'ordine, giacchè le intelligenti rappresentazioni dei suoi lavori sono altrettanto rare quanto quelle delle opere di Monteverdi e di Orazio Vecchi.

La Fanciulla del West, pur essendo dal punto di vista scenico la più ingenua delle opere pucciniane, è dal punto di vista musicale la più raffinata; e l'edizione che il Maggio Musicale Fiorentino ne ha dato la scorsa settimana dovrebbe far cambiare idea a coloro che ancora resistono al fascino di Puccini. Sotto la direzione della bacchetta di Dmitri Mitropoulos, La Fanciulla del West è stata, difatti, un mirabile esempio della sensibilità del Maestro ed ha rivelato quello che vi è in essa di buono e che di solito viene oscurato nelle edizioni a buon mercato e lacrimogene che correntemente se ne danno.

E' facile comprendere perchè quest'opera sia meno popolare delle altre. Intanto, ad eccezione di uno o forse due pezzi, non vi sono quei belli « a solo » che piacciono tanto ai cantanti. L'opera è, del resto, molto meno melodiosa della Bohème, per esempio. La protagonista stessa non ha nessuna romanza del tipo di « mi chiamano Mimì ». Ciò nonostante la parte del soprano è, a nostro parere, una delle più commoventi creazioni del compositore. E questo vuol dire che Minnie deve mostrare nel suo canto gusto, senso drammatico, senza pretendere, tuttavia, applausi a scena aperta, premio ambito di ogni cantante.

Eleanor Steber è stata ammirevole. La sua voce, leggera ma perfettamente educata, ha saputo esprimere una tenerezza che raramente è dato sentire. E' stata veramente una fanciulla; una fanciulla sola nel mondo dell'uomo. Una fanciulla che si impone con la sua innocenza e, alla fine, con il suo amore. Abbiamo sentito altre Minnie e tutte cantavano a voce spiegata, come se dovessero vincere la battaglia con la forza invece che con la dolcezza. La Steber ha sfidato e sfatato la tradizione. Ed altrettanto eccezionale è stata come attrice. Si è mossa sulle scene con una disinvoltura stupefacente; è stata padrona assoluta della « Polka » ed ha dimostrato persino le sue capacità d'amazzone provetta (sebbene alla prima il cavallo fosse piuttosto eccitato dal fatto di trovarsi sulle scene).

Mario del Monaco ha una bella voce; forse più adatta alla parte di Dick Johnson che a quella di Otello. Ma non è stato un ottimo attore; si è preoccupato di conquistare il pubblico più col canto che con la perfetta adesione allo spirito della parte. Avremmo voluto vedere le sue ginocchia piegarsi mentre camminava e ci sarebbe piaciuto che si fosse dato la pena di apprendere come i cowboys (e probabilmente anche i banditi) maneggiano le selle delle cavalcature. Anche il suo canto è stato un po' trascurato. « Ch'ella mi creda » è gia una bella aria e non vi è ragione alcuna di rovinarla con eccessivi singhiozzi. E' vero che Dick Johnson è sconvolto dal fatto di dover essere impiccato, ma è anche un uomo coraggioso. Persino le istruzioni di Puccini lo precisano: « ... col viso freddo e quasi sorridente... ».

A parte queste critiche di poco conto, questa edizione della Fanciulla è stata musicalmente ottima. Gian Giacomo Guelfi ha cantato la parte dello Sceriffo con la dovuta pomposità. Tra gli altri minori, tutti perfettamente a posto, merita una speciale menzione Giorgio Tozzi che nella parte di Jack Wallace, ha interpretato la bella nostalgica scena del primo atto con notevole abilità drammatica e ha cantato con piacevole voce baritonale.

Il più entusiastico applauso della serata è andato a Mitropoulos e con ragione. Egli ha saputo trarre tutto il colore possibile dall'orchestra mantenendo un ritmo vivace, ma non eccessivamente veloce. Sebbene conoscessimo bene l'opera, l'abbiamo ascoltata — grazie all'interpretazione creativa di Mitropoulos — come se fosse una novità. Ed è questa, dopo tutto, la funzione di un direttore d'orchestra.

L'aspetto negativo della Fanciulla del West, nella sua nuova edizione, rimane ovviamente quello scenico. Il melodramma non è il cinema. Ardengo Soffici si è saggiamente ricordato di essere pittore e non scenografo, cosicchè le sue tre scene evocano con successo tre ambienti, dei quali ci è particolarmente piaciuto quello del secondo atto per la calda femminilità data alla capanna di Minnie (che nelle edizioni tradizionali appare sempre come un magazzino disordinato).

Curzio Malaparte ha dato la sua supervisione alla regia con estrema modestia. Il suo intervento si è limitato, generalmente, a far scomparire, per quanto poteva, certi abituali aspetti ridicoli della messa in scena. Così nel primo atto i cercatori d'oro si salutano normalmente senza troppi colpi battuti sulle spalle e senza troppe strette di mano, come uomini che sono abituati a vedersi ogni giorno. Troppo spesso abbiamo visto cercatori d'oro che appaiono simili a cortigiani del Duca di Mantova, stranamente travestiti.

Sulle scene non vi è stata alcuna azione incomprensibile. Quando gli uomini si sono battuti, abbiamo compreso perchè lo facevano; quando hanno danzato di gioia, abbiamo capito che il bandito era stato catturato. Non vogliamo con questo dire che la regia è stata un esempio di perfezione; ma è stata davvero più che notevole se si paragona a quelle cui siamo abituati.

FIRENZE. IL SOPRANO ELEANOR STEBER.

A proposito della regia, c'è un appunto però che dobbiamo fare. L'opera non finisce in modo tradizionale: si dissolve gradualmente senza giungere alla carneficina con una mezza dozzina di cadaveri sulla scena. Questo pone al regista un vero problema. Malaparte ha tentato di risolverlo proiettando (contro la bianca montagna che si vede sulla scena all'ultimo atto) un paesaggio di sogno con alberi verdi e cielo azzurro che vorrebbe evidentemente rappresentare i « nuovi orizzonti » dove Minnie e Dick potranno costruire la loro nuova vita di redenzione. Sfortunatamente il risultato è stato veramente scoraggiante: è apparso come una di quelle irritanti pubblicità che si proiettano negli intervalli sugli schermi dei cinema, mentre le maschere vanno in giro a vendere gelati. In questo caso, Malaparte avrebbe dovuto avere maggiore fiducia in Puccini.

In ogni modo la rappresentazione è stata un successo; il pubblico era entusiasta ed altrettanto i critici. Puccini, che come un padre ha amato più delle altre le sue opere meno fortunate, come Suor Angelica e La Fanciulla, si sarebbe certamente compiaciuto dei sinceri applausi della scorsa settimana.

Dimitri Mitropoulos e San Luca

L'altra sera, a Firenze, i dodici apostoli (un cenacolo di artisti: Parenti, Tieri, Capocchini, Miniati, Benedetto, Gomez, Gigli, Berti, Bechi, Mariani, Malchiodi, Borgiotti, hanno consegnato al maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos il "San Luca 1954 per la musica", (una statuetta di San Luca, protettore delle arti, opera dello scultore Berti), che la stampa ha chiamato impropriamente l'Oscar italiano, dimenticando che Oscar, in fiorentino, vuol dire qualcosa fra lo stupido e il rompiscatole.

Oscarre, non far confondere
se no ti mando a scuola

dice una canzonetta popolare di cinquant'anni or sono: ma il popolo la canta a modo suo, mettendo « non fare il b... » al posto del non « far confondere ». Dunque, il San Luca consegnato solennemente a Dimitri Mitropoulos, è tutto fuorchè un "Oscarre" italiano. E' un San Luca fiorentino, cioè un santo di spirito. Mitropoulos, accogliendo il dono, appariva commosso: stringeva la statuetta fra le mani contemplandola con affetto, e ogni tanto alzava gli occhi sul sindaco La Pira, presente alla cerimonia, battendo le ciglia come se avesse i lucciconi.

Mitropoulos è greco, è nato ad Atene da famiglia di contadini, (due suoi fratelli sono monaci nel famoso convento del monte Athos), e dei contadini greci porta sempre con sè il grande rosario di legno di rosa. Ha un viso magro, ascetico, bruciato dal sole, e due larghe orecchie aperte. Un corista del Comunale, durante le prove della "Fanciulla del West", mi ha detto, guardando Mitropoulos illuminato di sotto in su dalle luci dell'orchestra: sembra « un frate coi pipistrelli in testa ». Un frate di legno, che par scolpito da Pericle Fazzini. Quando va in giro per Firenze, col suo passo lungo e smemorato, la gente si volta a guardarlo. Un ragazzo, ieri, all'angolo di via Strozzi, ha detto a un suo compagno: « O chi gliè: Savonarola? ». Ma se ha l'aspetto di un frate (e di che frate) ha il cuore di un bambino. Ti guarda come un bambino guarda un adulto, come un bambino guarda un giocattolo, come un bambino guarda una cosa strana, nuova. Fin dal primo giorno, mi sono accorto che mi guardava la camicia. Gli piaceva la mia camicia. Le mie camicie son bianche, di cotone, ma Mitropoulos le contemplava affascinato, come se fossero fatte di ali di libellula. Finalmente ha preso il coraggio a due mani, e mi ha domandato « dove me le ero fatte fare ». Gli rispondo che le ho comprate bell'e fatte, da Neuber. Non mi crede, non vuol credermi. Ha l'aria di un bambino infelice. Sospetta che io non voglia rivelargli il mio segreto. Poi, alle mie insistenze, si persuade. E il giorno stesso manda Trudy Goth, (Mitropoulos è ospite della villa delle signore Goth, al viale dei Colli), a comprargli una valigiata di camicie Neuber. Ora è fiero delle sue camicie bianche, leggere, trasparenti come un velo. La sera della prima della "Fanciulla del West", quando ci siamo presentati alla ribalta tenendoci per mano, Mitropoulos, commosso dall'interminabile ovazione, mi ha bisbigliato all'orecchio: « Applaudono le nostre belle camicie ». Ed era felice. Era felice che al pubblico fiorentino piacesse la sua camicia nuova, di cotone bianco.

Quando ha terminato il suo lavoro, esce dal Comunale e va in giro per Firenze, nelle stradine che da via Calzaioli, scendono verso la via Del Proconsolo e giù verso Santa Croce. Gli piace il popolino di Firenze, i suoi modi vivi e garbati, il suo sorriso cortese e ironico. Ed io so perchè gli piace il popolo fiorentino: perchè assomiglia a quello della sua città, di Atene. Le viuzze intorno a Santa Croce, i vicoli di San Frediano, son come quelli dei quartieri ai piedi dell'Acropoli. Hanno lo stesso odore di frittelle, di miele, di anice, di caffè tostato, l'odore del Chianti è un odore magro, secco, simile a quello del vino "resinato" greco. Tutte queste cose io pensavo l'altra sera, seduto alla tavola dei dodici apostoli, mentre il maestro Emidio Tieri, dopo le parole di saluto di Marino Parenti, consegnava a Mitropoulos la statuetta di San Luca.

Ed ecco che Dimitri Mitropoulos si prepara a rispondere, si vede che fa un grande sforzo per vincere la timidezza e la commozione: che cerca, con gli occhi socchiusi, di leggere misteriose parole sull'invisibile partitura degli affetti. Vorrebbe dire qualcosa, qualcosa che ha dentro, e ha paura di parlare; poi, finalmente, curva la fronte, e pronunzia a stento le sole parole che un grande artista greco può dire a Firenze, che un grande artista ateniese emigrato in America può dire in questa Firenze che è figlia di Atene, più che di Roma. Dice: « Qui a Firenze mi sento a casa mia ». E tace. "Casa sua" per Dimitri Mitropoulos non è New York: è Atene.

ALLA SCALA

Concerto Mitropoulos

Non sappiamo se la Sinfonia dell'opera buffa La bella greca di Domenico Cimarosa, eseguita la prima volta al teatro Valle di Roma nel 1784, e il cui autografo è ora conservato nella biblioteca del Conservatorio napoletano S. Pietro a Majella, sia stata riprodotta nella attenta revisione moderna fatta conoscere una quindicina d'anni fa dal Bonnioli. Certo è questa Sinfonia — che ieri sera apriva il concerto diretto da Dimitri Mitropoulos — una delle tante piccole meraviglie del compositore aversano: pagina perfetta nella architettura tripartita dell' « Allegro con brio », dell'« Adagio » e del « Rondò » finale, seducente nella spontaneità dei disegni guizzanti o soavemente fluenti e cadenzati, arguta e spedita nei ritmi, asciutta nelle ornamentazioni. Se è vero — come pare — che l'Ente autonomo sia alla vigilia della inaugurazione della Piccola Scala, nulla di meglio, crediamo, che allestirvi intera La bella greca come Dio e Cimarosa l'hanno fatta. Davvero ne incoraggia il gioiellino di questa iniziale Sinfonia, che Mitropoulos, da quel musicista greco ch'egli è, ben degno della terra d'origine e ancora più degli insegnamenti del suo maestro Busoni, ha realizzato ieri sera con lievità rara di movimenti e vivacità commossa di nervature e d'accentazioni.

Seguivano altre due Sinfonie del periodo romantico e neoromantico ottocentesco: la N. 5 in re minore di Mendelssohn, detta « della Riforma » e generalmente poco eseguita perchè, nella sua pomposa eloquenza, ha voluto dire tutto dicendo troppo; e la Domestica di Strauss, dagli sfrenati impulsi sentimentali e descrittivi. Qui, nella Domestica, ma soprattutto nell'opera mendelssohniana, Mitropoulos ha fatto e strafatto, conseguendo risultati senza fallo esemplari in linea espressiva e coloristica. Pieno il suo successo, che addirittura lo ha indotto a concedere il bis dell'« Andante » della Sinfonia di Mendelssohn, lo stesso da cui prende nome il pezzo per il Corale luterano sul quale si edifica.

LA PATRIA

I CONCERTI ALLA SCALA

Per Mitropoulos bruciante entusiasmo

Per il suo concerto di ieri sera (ultimo della stagione sinfonica al Teatro Scala) Dimitri Mitropoulos ha voluto mettere insieme un programma di musiche raramente eseguite o forse decadute dall'amore del pubblico per ragioni connesse con il loro intrinseco valore. Se la seconda ipotesi è quella buona, ecco che un'idea, in se stessa lodevole, può tramutarsi in un mezzo equivoco. Perchè, quando si trovi sul podio direttoriale un maestro della forza di Dimitri Mitropoulos, accade che il contenuto delle composizioni eseguite passa in seconda linea. Così, vicino ad una prova di incomparabile grandezza interpretativa, sta una prova assai meno convincente dal punto di vista essenzialmente artistico. Questo discorso vale, in special modo, per le due ultime opere eseguite ieri sera, cioè la Quinta di Mendelssohn, ancor chiamata Sinfonia della Riforma, e la Sinfonia domestica di Richard Strauss. La Quinta di Mendelssohn è il lavoro, oltremodo impegnativo, di un grande maestro, di un uomo tutto impastato di musica, di un'anima, quante altre mai, generosa e convinta della propria fede nel modo caloroso e commovente di tutti i neofiti.

Ma, appunto perchè scritta sotto l'impulso di un'idea piuttosto che di una libera immaginazione, non ha la freschezza, lo scintillio, la chiarezza giovanile del vero Mendelssohn. Non dimentichiamo che Mendelssohn, fra tutti i romantici tedeschi, fu il più indipendente da influssi letterari e da riflessioni estetiche. La sua letteratura, per funzionare, doveva esser fiabesca e colorata di tinteggiature fantastiche come nel Sogno di una notte d'estate, nelle Grotte di Fingal, nell'Italiana, nella Scozzese etc. La Domestica di Strauss è sempre la Vita d'eroe, con lo svantaggio che il proposito di mettere al posto di un personaggio ideale, nietschiano, l'autore medesimo, padre di famiglia, la moglie, il bamboccio, le culle e i giocattoli, crea una sproporzione, un'ambiguità, una confusione di mezzi veramente allarmanti.

A studiarla, la Domestica è un prodigio di contrappunto; sulla carta è un vero documento di maestria quasi impossibile. Ma quando la carta, esplicandosi in suoni, dovrebbe perdere ogni peso e sfumare fra le cose impalpabili, noi sentiamo ch'essa diventa un pastone, che s'indurisce sempre più fino a tradursi in macigno. Accanto alla Riforma e alla Domestica, la piccola ouverture di Cimarosa, messa in testa al programma, parve (e forse non è) un autentico capolavoro. Per la sua purezza, per lo spazio che resta giustamente occupato, delineato, trasformato una volta ch'essa è finita. Detta ouverture cimaroslana ci venne presentata come appartenente all'opera La bella greca. In realtà, un'opera di Cimarosa intitolata La bella greca non esiste. Esistono I matrimoni impensati (Teatro Valle di Roma, 1784) sulla cui partitura, mancante di titolo, venne scritto molto più tardi La bella greca in quanto uno dei personaggi dell'opera è « Irene, bella greca ». L'errore, ripetuto dal Florimo, è stato emendato da tempo; vale a dire, da quando si trovarono copie del libretto a stampa.

Inutile è riferire come la maniera direttoriale di Dimitri Mitropoulos, così caratteristica, così capace di plasmare le frasi sino a renderle quasi tattili, così pronta a sollevare ogni spirito dal mare della polifonia, così profonda nell'indagare ogni ragione poetica o drammatica, così ferma e sicura, così ardente e volitiva, abbia trascinato il pubblico al più bruciante entusiasmo. Si verificò un fatto unico, io credo, nella storia della Quinta di Mendelssohn: Mitropoulos dovette replicare il terzo « tempo », il meno bello dei quattro. Anche la Domestica, dove Strauss, oltre al resto, prescrisse quattro sassofoni « ad libitum salvo casi estremi » (e casi estremi di tal genere alla Scala non dovrebbero verificarsi, ma i sassofoni non c'erano) sollevò tempeste di applausi.

L'orchestra scaligera, sotto la bacchetta di un direttore impareggiabile, ha così chiuso in bellezza la sua lunga stagione 1953-1954.

Concerto a Santa Croce

Questo, che doveva essere l'ultima manifestazione del « Maggio Musicale » 1954, è divenuto l'inaugurazione di una stagione sinfonica estiva, che per la prima volta il Teatro Comunale organizza a Firenze, trasportando la sua sede nel limpido chiostro di Santa Croce.

Il programma di questa manifestazione inaugurale, affidato alla bacchetta illustre di Dimitri Mitropoulos, comprendeva tutte le musiche di rara o di nuova esecuzione; di Cimarosa abbiamo ascoltato la sinfonia da « La bella greca », nella versione orchestrale di Bormioli, con un orchestrale assai accresciuto di organico per le necessità dell'esecuzione all'aperto; esecuzione che, come sempre, diventa di necessità approssimativa e sommaria per inevitabili conseguenze di acustica; perchè l'orchestra, cioè, non è strumento adatto a suonare all'aperto. In questa ouverture, nella assai complessa sinfonia della « Riforma » di Mendelssohn — un Mendelssohn assai diverso dall'abituale e, orientato piuttosto apertamente, almeno nei presupposti psicologici, verso la musica detta « a programma » e verso edifizi orchestrali che troveranno solo più tardi una pratica e generale attuazione — Mitropoulos ha confermato, con la riserva che si è detta, le sue eccezionali qualità di direttore d'orchestra.

A concludere il programma, la sinfonia n. 2 di Schumann, dove la personalità eccezionale del maestro greco ha ottenuto una ancor maggiore unità di stile e un profondo calore.

Pubblico assai numeroso, assai attento, e entusiastici applausi all'indirizzo del maestro Mitropoulos e dell'orchestra del « Maggio ».

Il secondo concerto di Mitropoulos in Santa Croce 27/6/54

Il fascino personale è una qualità indispensabile al direttore per conquistare ed avvincere l'orchestra, mostruoso strumento dalle innumerevoli dita e dalla prismatica sensibilità, e per portarla a comunicare la sua propria visione artistica.

Questo fascino Mitropoulos lo possiede al massimo e l'orchestraa lo ha corrisposto con la sua solita prontezza, sempre fresca nonostante la faticosa stagione del « Maggio Musicale » appena terminata. Sotto la sua infervorata direzione la partitura non si sfalda mai, esplicandosi in un discorso musicale sempre teso e vivificato dal temperamento mediterraneo del maestro. Ieri sera sono state eseguite nel chiostro brunelleschiiano di Santa Croce musiche di EBrahms, Ciaikowsky, Kodàli e Verdi.. Folto pubblico, applausi vivissimi.

L'ITALIA

Concerto di chiusura alla "Scala"

Dimitri Mitropoulos, cui è toccato chiudere in raffinata bellezza la stagione dei concerti scaligeri, ha saputo portare a tale altezze ieri sera il rendimento dell'orchestra, come s'addiceva, d'altronde, a un evento finalistico, che il pubblico lo ha ripagato con consensi di trascendente entusiasmo. Al punto che — rara avis alla Scala — egli ha concesso una replica del celebre « andante » della sinfonia così detta « della riforma » di Felin Mendelsshon. Della prima parte della quale egli aveva reso la consolante e riposante soavità con morbidissime pacatezze, riuscendo poi, nella seconda, col brillio dei ritmi e il nitore del disegno melodico a mitigare ciò che vi è in essa di manieristico e di retorico.

Il concerto era stato iniziato con la sinfonia di Cimarosa «La Bella greca» raramente inserita nei concerti sinfonici.

Il Mitropoulus l'ha presentata in una «revisione» di P. Bormioli, che, probabilmente, in qualche punto è rinvigorimento e in altri accentuazione ritmica, affrancante il compimento da ogni incertezza, approssimazione, e luogo comune.

In complesso n'è risultato un lavoro di una freschezza, una luce, una purezza, da politissimo diamante, di cui l'orchestra ha mirabilmente mostrato ogni sfaccettatura.

La serata si è conclusa con quella « Sinfonia domestica » di Riccardo Strauss nella quale il compianto maestro Cesari che all'erudizione del pubblico italiano fu di essa esegeta scrupolosissimo ed entusiasta, trovò espressa una ricchissima sequenza di doviziosità narrative, esaltatrici di tutti i possibili sentimenti che possono, volta a volta, accendere le ore della vita famigliare. Una vita, evidentemente, molto agitata e anche parecchio involuta, a giudicare dalla esasperazione soventa barocca che caratterizza il terzetto domestico. Il Mitropoulos ha dominato da gran condottiero la composita e vibrante materia, presentandola con stupenda incisività soprattutto nell'epilogo apologetico delle tre personalità familiari.

L'orchestra scaligera che pur avrebbe avuto diritto di essere stanca dopo dieci mesi di ininterrotte fatiche sinfoniche e melodrammatiche, è stata ieri sera di una forbitezza e di un fervore esemplari. Fuse agli applausi si son udite voci del pubblico dirette al maestro: « Torna presto ». Un auspicio che è anche una certezza, perchè si sa che nella stagione 1954-55 Mitropoulos sarà chiamato a dirigere parecchio. Stasera il concerto si replica.

CORRIERE LOM

L'ULTIMO CONCERTO DELLA STAGIONE SCALIGERA

Missionario Mitropoulos

SAREBBE errato ritenere Dimitri Mitropoulos unicamente un virtuoso che si compiace della propria formidabile capacità di suscitare tempeste orchestrali, che si inorgoglisce della propria bravura mnemonica, che si insuperbisce della straordinaria efficacia con cui scatena le potenze timbriche dell'orchestra. Sarebbe errato, perchè egli — e lo riconosciamo, ammirati — è soprattutto un interprete, un missionario della musica, pieno di zelo, pervaso dall'amore per i suoi autori, si chiamino essi Puccini o Alban Berg, Strauss o Busoni, Cimarosa o Mendelssohn. Mitropoulos intende la bellezza delle musiche che esegue, e vuol farla intendere; e qual altra mai è la «posizione» d'ogni vero interprete? Nulla di esibizionistico, insomma, in questo grande maestro; semmai il continuo riaffiorare di quella vocazione di missionario ch'egli una volta ci confessò come la sua più vera.

Ma, detto questo, sarebbe poi inutile nascondere come le innate attitudini, il lungo studio e il prodigioso «mestiere» acquisito in tanti anni di gloriosa carriera, abbiano attribuito a Mitropoulos anche le caratteristiche del virtuoso, di colui che sa superare le più terribili difficoltà tecniche, cioè; e che di tale sapienza sembra compiacersi. Pura apparenza, tale aspetto virtuosistico dell'arte sua; apparenza che tuttavia s'impone particolarmente quando più scarso è il valore strettamente musicale della pagina eseguita. Per riferirci all'acclamatissimo concerto tenuto ieri sera alla Scala, è evidente che solo l'aspetto virtuosistico dell'arte di Mitropoulos è riuscito a tenere in piedi quell'immensa congerie di cascami musicali che è la Sinfonia domestica di Strauss, dello Strauss più barocco e meno simpatico. Una sinfonia che il compositore ha dedicato all'illustrazione dei casi propri e della propria famiglia e della propria dimora e dalla audizione della quale si può dedurre che in casa Strauss c'era spesso un chiasso infernale, e che i coniugi erano vittime, sistematicamente, d'un figlio estremamente maleducato.

Ben altrimenti ha rifulso la sensibilità interpretativa di Mitropoulos nei brani che componevano la prima parte del programma: la pressochè sconosciuta sinfonia dell'opera La bella greca di Cimarosa e la raramente eseguita Sinfonia N. 5 «della Riforma» di Mendelssohn. Quest'ultima, col suo carattere severo, con la sua drammaticità, con l'afflato religioso che la pervade, sottolineato dall'apparizione — quasi prestigioso personaggio — del più celebre corale di Lutero nel finale, ha svelato bellezze notevoli. Il pensieroso e patetico andante è sembrato a Mitropoulos degno d'esser ripetuto, quando, al termine della Sinfonia, il pubblico ha chiesto insistentemente il bis. Vorremmo forse inarcar le sopracciglia, lamentando l'infrazione a una tradizione strettamente scaligera, quando anche noi, come tutto il pubblico, del resto, abbiamo ascoltato con commozione la replica del brano?

T. C.

Questa sera alle 21,15, con la ripetizione in abbonamento «B» del concerto Mitropoulos, si chiude la stagione sinfonica di primavera. Domani alle ore 17 si svolgerà il saggio della Scuola di ballo del Teatro.

Dopo il concerto una sigaretta per Dimitri Mitropoulos.

Dimitri Mitropoulos alla Scala

E' raro che alla Scala si concedano i bis. Ciò accade solamente quando si tratta di esecutori di eccezionale levatura, e in serate particolarmente felici. Ieri sera è stata la volta di Dimitri Mitropoulos, che alla fine della «sinfonia n. 5 (della riforma)» di Mendelssohn, ha dovuto ripeterne un brano. Si può dire che oggi questo direttore sia fra i massimi. La sua arte è assolutamente scevra da ogni artificio teatrale, da ogni esibizionismo; si può fin dire che il suo gesto alle volte può riuscire inelegante. Ma è sempre essenziale e perentorio nel richiedere con chiarezza, nel'additare il filo di una situazione espressiva, nel calibrare la forza di una sonorità, nello stendere il canto degli strumenti elevandolo in un clima poetico teso ed intenso.

Il suo contatto con la musica si trasforma in una partecipazione totale al mondo stesso da cui è nata l'opera d'arte, con un'assimilazione in profondità del linguaggio stilistico, con gli stessi slanci, con la stessa maniera di concepirne la poesia.

Occorre dire però che oltre al direttore grande, ieri sera anche la musica eseguita era assai bella. Mendelssohn sta proprio nel periodo migliore del romanticismo, pieno ancora di un'ingenuità poetica fervida. Con questo artista e con altri pochi (Schubert, ad esempio) non si è ancora arrivati a sfornare inutili confessioni di fatti strettamente personali assolutamente insignificanti, ma c'è ancora un pudore che fa da freno e che porta alla superficie solamente la parte migliore di una umanità, legata ancora per fili invisibili ai grandi fatti dello spirito secondo una morale strettamente selettiva. Il romanticismo di Mendelssohn sa ancora contenersi entro certi limiti d'equilibrio, che pur lasciando una piena libertà di espressione, sa non arrivare all'abuso. E forse anche questo è un ricordo del Settecento.

D'altra parte l'abuso di un motivo, sia esso di ordine tecnico o espressivo o riguardante la fantasia, è una prerogativa di chi ha poche monete da spendere. E Mendelssohn certamente non appartiene a questa categoria. Il programma iniziava con una deliziosissima «Sinfonia» dell'opera «La bella greca» di Cimarosa. E siamo grati a Mitropoulos di avercela fatta conoscere, perchè è un miracolo di leggerezza discorsiva e di freschezza melodica. La revisione di Bormioli non sappiamo fino a che punto sia intervenuta sul testo originale; tuttavia ci è sembrata assai vigilata e felice. Chiudeva il concerto la mastodontica «Sinfonia domestica» di Riccardo Strauss. Una faccenda piuttosto complicata e pletorica, piena di sottintesi, che confessiamo di non aver mai potuto digerire; anche se è scritta magistralmente. L'esecuzione, inutile dirlo, è riuscita eccezionale. E il pubblico ha applaudito con gli applausi delle grandi occasioni. Niente da dire: ha fatto bene, perchè sia Mitropoulos che la magnifica orchestra scaligera se lo meritavano.

IL POPOLO — Sabato 3 luglio 1954

LE PRIME A MILANO

Vibrante successo alla Scala del concerto diretto da Mitropulos

Rientrati in sede da poche ore, ci è stato dato iersera di assistere, alla Scala, all'ultimo concerto della stagione sinfonica di primavera: esattamente due mesi or sono arrivando a Nuova York ci era data simile ventura, assistendo all'ultimo concerto della stagione della Filarmonica, alla Carnegie Hall; per combinazione l'uno e l'altro concerto erano diretti da Dimitri Mitropulos, là direttore stabile, qui direttore ospite.

Ma ospite è parola che può suonare stonata per chi ha assistito all'enorme successo riportato dal direttore iersera, successo che il pubblico scaligero sembrava covare e che era lieto di poter fare esplodere in pieno con una interminabile ovazione alla fine del programma e con un'altra a metà programma, ovazione che aveva termine solo per la gentile concessione di un bis: fatto eccezionale alla Scala, fatto che conferma come Mitropulos può considerarsi nel nostro teatro non un ospite, ma un amico, un beniamino.

E iersera le ragioni di questo successo sono state evidentissime: se l'orchestra della Scala tradisce (e ben a ragione, troppo a ragione) qualche stanchezza così che l'abituale smalto è offuscato, la volontà espressiva di Mitropulos ha risollevato le qualità della nostra orchestra in tre esecuzioni di prim'ordine. Il programma iniziava con la Sinfonia dell'opera La bella greca di Cimarosa, una delicata pagina resa con levigata e pur aerea sonorità, con uno scorrevole e pur castigato ritmo; continuava con la Sinfonia n. 5 di Mendelssohn, detta della riforma, com'è noto, per l'immissione di un tema di corale luterano. Delle cinque sinfonie di Mendelssohn, questa è, a parer nostro la meno mendelssohniana, anche se evidenti sono gli spunti lirici, tipici del musicista; la più compiessa, la più lavorata, la più (se così si può dire) «intelligente», il che non vuol dire che sia la migliore. La cosa più sensazionale è quella che, non conoscendo le date, si potrebbe dire la citazione wagneriana del tema del Graal nel primo tempo e ancora il sapore russo del tema del corale che è il tema dell'ultimo tempo.

Il concerto si chiudeva con la esecuzione della Sinfonia domestica di Riccardo Strauss, opera come si sa, estremamente autobiografica e a noi, con tutto il rispetto per la personalità del musicista, assolutamente insopportabile nella sua prolissità e nella sua stanchezza romantica, nel suo stemperamento sentimentale che arriva alla vacuità; dei poemi sinfonici di Strauss, questo ci sembra il meno vertebrato, il meno atto a sopravvivere al musicista: strano destino (ammesso che si compia) per la più autobiagrafca delle opere sue!

L'esecuzione di tutto il programma è stata straordinaria: la chiarezza d'espressione s'è unita alla fermezza d'eloquio così che le tre opere, pur nei loro diversi aspetti, sono apparse perfettamente illuminate.

E il pubblico l'ha riconosciuto ed ha applaudito, come già abbiamo detto, con insolito calore, richiedendo e ottenendo un bis dell'adagio mendelssohniano e richiamando alla fine innumerevoli volte al podio il maestro Mitropulos.

Dimitri Mitropoulos

..... brilliant Greek conductor of New York Philharmonic Orchestra, has been conducting closer to home. Here TRUDY GOTH describes his triumphant version of Strauss's Electra recently given at La Scala in Milan.

Some years ago, Dimitri Mitropoulos, gave a concert version of Richard Strauss «Electra». Everyone in the audience hoped then that the opera would soon be put on the stage. This hope has now been fullfilled by performances given at La Scala in Milan, an opera-house of highest tradition and artistic standards.

These are some of the comments of the Italian press about Mitropoulos «a director endowed with phenomenal and prodigious ability», «imperative power and artistic greatness,» «utter devotion and inspiration», «he pairs all the strength of his suggestive personality into the interpretation of the work,» «he missed none of the burning heat this music requires, to bring out the intensity and gripping quality of the score.»

Under Dimitri Mitropoulos' direction the Scala orchestra gave a reading of Strauss' score which one feels it would be impossible to surpass. His dominating and inspired perpersonality galvanized the public into fervent hero-worship.

Though the merit of the performances emanates from the conductors stand, the twenty-two curtain calls were meant also for the singers and the creators of the admirable production. The physic and spiritual realization of the protagonist's character, by Christel Goltz, won great admiration both for the singer's acting performance fascinating expression finess of the voice and Ellena Nicolai, was a great Clytemnestra, and Nicola Rossi Lemeni, was an idea Dresres, with a great range in his voice.

Mitropoulos at the head achieved a full understanding of the problems involved and showed a special flair for the kind of music. His influence over the whole cast and his collaborators, ensured that the opera emerged in the spirit of its creator.

At the end a crowd assembled at the stage door to applaud the conductor and all those who made this an unforgetable evening.

ΜΙΛΑΝΟΝ, Ἰούλιος. (Τοῦ ἀνταποκριτοῦ μας). —Ἡ λήξασα περίοδος τῆς Σκάλας δὲν ὑπῆρξε ἀπὸ τὶς καλύτερες. Ὁλόκληρο τὸ πρόγραμμα τοῦ ἐφετεινοῦ χειμῶνος ἦταν μέτριο, ἡ δὲ ἔλλειψις ἐκτελεστῶν ἐπεδείνωσε τὴν κατάστασι. Οἱ περιπέτειες ἄρχισαν ἀπὸ τὸ ἐναρκτήριον ἔργον τῆς Σκάλας, τὴν «Βαλλὺ» τοῦ Καταλάνι, ποὺ ἔπρεπε νὰ διευθύνῃ ὁ Ντὲ Σάμπατα, ἀλλὰ δὲν τὴν διηύθυνε λόγῳ ἀσθενείας. Ἀσθένεια πραγματικὴ ἢ σύγκρουσις μὲ τὴν διεύθυνσι τῆς Σκάλας; Μᾶλλον καὶ τὰ δύο, ἀλλὰ κυρίως ἀσθένεια. Μετὰ τὴν «Βαλλὺ» ἀνεβάσθηκε ἡ «Μήδεια» ἡ ὁποία, χάρις στὴ Μαρία Μανεγκίνι Κάλλας (Καλογεροπούλου), ὑπῆρξε μία ἀπὸ τὶς λίγες ἐφετεινὲς ἐπιτυχίες. Ἀκολούθησε ὁ «Ριγολέττος» ὑπὸ τὰ...σφυρίγματα τοῦ κοινοῦ. Ἡ ὄπερα αὐτὴ παρουσιάσθηκε ὅπως δὲν θὰ παρουσιαζόταν οὔτε ἀπὸ περιοδεύοντα θίασο. Σὲ κάθε παράστασι ἄλλαζε καὶ ἕνας ἀπὸ τοὺς πρωταγωνιστάς. Ὁ μόνος ποὺ ἔμεινε ἀπὸ τὴν ἀρχὴ ὡς τὸ τέλος ὑπῆρξε ὁ Νίκος Ζαχαρίου, διὰ πρώτην φορὰν ἐμφανιζόμενος στὴ σκηνὴ τῆς Σκάλας στὸν ρόλο τοῦ Σπαραφουτσίλε. Καὶ ὁλόκληρη ἡ κριτικὴ τὸν ξεχώρισε. Καὶ μιὰ ποὺ μιλοῦμε γιὰ ἀποτυχίες, θὰ ἀναφέρωμε τὴν «Λεονώρα 44» τοῦ Ἐλβετοῦ συνθέτου Λίμπερμαν καὶ τὴν «Ἐκδρομὴ στὴν ἐξοχὴ» τοῦ Περεγκάλλο. Ἡ δεύτερη αὐτὴ ὄπερα κατέβηκε ἀμέσως μετὰ τὴν πρώτη παράστασι. Γιὰ νὰ σώσῃ τὴν κατάστασι ἦρθε καὶ πάλι ἡ Μαρία Καλογεροπούλου μὲ τὴν «Ἀλκηστι» τοῦ Γκλοὺκ καὶ τὴν «Λουτσία ντὲ Λαμερμοὺρ» τοῦ Ντονιζέττι. Ἡ Ἑλληνὶς σοπράνο ἀπεθεώθη καὶ ἀπὸ τὸ κοινὸν καὶ ἀπὸ τὴν κριτική, ποὺ δὲν ἐδίστασε νὰ τὴν ὀνομάσῃ «ἡ Μάλιμπραν» τοῦ 20οῦ αἰώνος».

Μ' αὐτὲς τὶς πολλὲς ἀποτυχίες καὶ λίγες ἐπιτυχίες, ἔφθασε στὸ τέλος της ἡ ἐφετεινὴ «στατζιόνε» τῆς Σκάλας. Καὶ ἐπειδὴ φαίνεται πὼς ὁ Θεὸς δὲν ἤθελε νὰ κλείσῃ μὲ τόσο θλιβερὸ ἀπολογισμὸ ἡ σαιζόν, προτελευταία ὄπερα ποὺ ἀνεβάσθηκε ἦταν ἡ «Ἠλέκτρα» τοῦ Ριχάρδου Στράους. Διευθυντὴς ὀρχήστρας ὁ μεγάλος Μητρόπουλος. Ὁ μόνος ποὺ μποροῦσε νὰ ἀποζημιώσῃ «ἴλ πούμπλικο Σκαλίτζερο» γιὰ τὶς τόσες ταλαιπωρίες αὐτῆς τῆς χρονιᾶς. Καὶ πράγματι τὸ ἀπεζημίωσε. Σπάνια παρουσιάσθηκε στὴν Σκάλα ἕνα τόσο τέλειο ἀνέβασμα. Ἀπὸ τὰ χέρια τοῦ Μητροπούλου ἢ μᾶλλον ἀπὸ τοὺς ὤμους του, γιὰ τί διευθύνει περισσότερο μὲ τοὺς ὤμους, νομίζει κανεὶς ὅτι ἐκπέμπεται ἕνας ἠλεκτρισμὸς ποὺ καταλαμβάνει ὁλόκληρη τὴν αἴθουσα.

Ἡ «Ἠλέκτρα», ὡς γνωστόν, εἶναι μία ἀπὸ τὶς δυσκολώτερες ὄπερες. Δύσκολα βρίσκει κανεὶς δραματικὴ σοπράνο ποὺ εἶναι διατεθειμένη νὰ ἀναλάβῃ τὸ βάρος τοῦ ρόλου τῆς Ἠλέκτρας, ποὺ βρίσκεται συνεχῶς ἐπὶ σκηνῆς καθ' ὅλη τὴν διάρκεια τοῦ ἔργου, ποὺ διαρκεῖ μιὰ ὥρα καὶ τρία τέταρτα. Ἡ Κρίστλ Γκόλτς ποὺ ἐνεφανίσθη στὸν ρόλο τῆς Ἠλέκτρας, ὑπῆρξε πράγματι ἀπαράμιλλη. Στὰ χέρια τοῦ Μητροπούλου, ἡ ἄξια αὐτὴ τραγουδίστρια, ὅπως ἄλλως τε καὶ ὅλοι οἱ ἄλλοι ἠθοποιοὶ καὶ ἡ ὀρχήστρα, παρουσίασαν τὴν πιὸ τέλεια ἐκτέλεσι ὄπερας. Καὶ παρ' ὅλες τὶς ἀντιρρήσεις, ὡρισμένων κακοπίστων γιὰ τὸ δεύτερον ἔργον ποὺ ἐδίδετο μαζὶ μὲ τὴν «Ἠλέκτρα», τὸν «Ἀρλεκίνο» τοῦ Μπουζόνι, ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἀποθεώθηκε πραγματικὰ ἀπὸ τὸ δύσκολο αὐτὸ κοινόν, ποὺ εἶναι γνωστὸ σ' ὅλον τὸν κόσμο μὲ τὸ ὄνομα «ἴλ πούμπλικο Σκαλίτζερο».

Χαρακτηριστικὸν τῆς ἀξίας τοῦ Μητροπούλου, εἶναι τὸ γεγονὸς ὅτι κατὰ τὴν γενικὴ δοκιμὴ τῆς «Ἠλέκτρας» εἰς τὸ τέλος ὁλόκληρη ἡ ὀρχήστρα ἐξέσπασε σὲ χειροκροτήματα. Σπάνια διευθυνταὶ ὀρχήστρας ἔχουν ἀγνώστου ὅπερας καὶ γι' αὐτὸ ἔχει προκληθῆ ἡ γενικὴ περιέργεια. Ἐπίσης θὰ μετάσχῃ στὸ φεστιβὰλ τοῦ Σαλτσβούργου κατὰ τὰ τέλη Ἰουλίου.

Καὶ μιὰ ποὺ μιλῶ γιὰ τὴν εὐρωπαϊκὴ δράσι τοῦ Μητροπούλου κατὰ τὸ φετεινὸ καλοκαίρι, πρέπει νὰ σημειώσουμε τὴν «Φαντσούλλα ντὲλ Οὐέστ» ποὺ διηύθυνε στὴν Φλωρεντία.

Ἂς τελειώσουμε μὲ μιὰ διάσι: Εἶναι ἀρά γε ἀλήθεια ὅτι ἡ Μαρία Καλογεροπούλου (Κάλλας) καὶ ὁ Μητρόπουλος οὔτε κἂν γνωρίζονται;

Neue Musik aus Amerika und Rußland

Dimitri Mitropoulos auf dem Podium des Kölner Funkorchesters

Nach dem erregenden Abend des ungarischen Amerikaners Ormandy, der das Kölner Rundfunkorchester bei den Ruhrfestspielen in Recklinghausen dirigierte, stand in Köln der griechische Amerikaner Dimitri Mitropoulos vor dieser wendigen, fast schon unvergleichlichen Musikantenschar. Abermals hörte man ein ungewöhnliches Musizieren, fesselnd durch die unmittelbar anspringende Interpretation der Werke, — doppelt fesselnd, weil auf dem Programm nur Werke standen, die in der kurzen Spanne zwischen 1939 und 1944 entstanden und das in den Vereinigten Staaten und in Rußland.

Zwar stammten die amerikanischen Werke nicht von Amerikanern sondern von Emigranten, und das erste war nicht einmal ein Original sondern eine Bearbeitung. Dennoch zeichneten sich da Welten ab. Darius Milhaud stand zu Beginn mit einer notengetreuen Instrumentation einer Ouvertüre und eines Allegros von François Couperin. An der Substanz der über zweihundert Jahre alten Klavierstücke des alten Meisters hat Milhaud nichts geändert; das barocke Pathos blieb erhalten, aber es erschien in farbig ungemein differenzierten Nachzeichnungen (köstlichste Episode: Flöten zu gestopften Trompeten und gestopfter Posaune) modern und neu empfunden.

Arnold Schönberg war der zweite Komponist des Programms. Sein Violinkonzert, das erste größere Werk, das er „drüben" schrieb, hat man hier noch nicht so gehört, wie es nun von Mitropoulos und dem Geiger Louis Krasner, einem russischen Amerikaner, als eine trotz aller unerhörten Schwierigkeit doch zunächst vom Erlebnis her bestimmte Musik vorgestellt wurde. Alle Problematik war hier — in noch ganz anderem Maße als bei den Hindemith- und Strawinsky-Wiedergaben Ormandys, anders auch als bei den von unseren Dirigenten gewohnten Auseinandersetzungen mit dem Werk — aufgehoben in einer verblüffenden Sicherheit und Selbstverständlichkeit ausdrucksvollen Musizierens.

Mitropoulos hatte das Werk so im Kopf, daß er bei den Proben, ohne eine Partitur vor sich zu haben, Einzelheiten und sogar die (bezeichnenderweise einzeln numerierten) Takte angeben konnte. Mehr als alle theoretisierenden Rechtfertigungen überzeugte dieses „Im-Kopf-Haben", das die Franzosen nicht zu Unrecht als ein „Im-Herzen-Haben" bezeichnen, daß diese oft so unerreichbar scheinende Musik doch erreichbar ist — wenn zen, in denen sie sich erst als meisterhaft zeigt, steil und eng gewählt haben: hier wurden sie nicht als Beengungen fühlbar. Kasners Spiel, besinnlich selbst noch bei den technisch kühnsten Doppelflageoletts, ließ den Solopart vor dem souverän geführten und genau ausgeführten Orchesterpart in jedem Augenblick emotionell verstehen. Den im tiefsten Grunde romantischen Charakter der Schönbergschen Musik kann man nicht deutlicher hervorheben, als es in dieser vollendeten Aufführung geschah.

Dagegen stand dann Prokofiews Fünfte Sinfoni: ein glanzvolles, aber letzlich doch äußerliches Feuerwerk. Virtuos entfaltete Mitropoulos die rhythmischen Kaskaden der vier Sätze, ihre voluminöse Klangpracht und oft amüsante Lebendigkeit. Ein moderner Liszt, ins Spielerische gewandt, blendend wie jener, doch ohne dessen humanistisches Pathos. (Uebertragung im NWDR am 13. September auf Mittelwelle).

Breitenwirkung und Lauterkeit

Dimitri Mitropoulos dirigierte in Deutschland / Schönbergs Violinkonzert

Es scheint undenkbar, daß ein Dirigent auf größte Breiten-, ja Massenwirkung bedacht sein kann, ohne auf die Dauer ein Pultstar zu werden und damit aus der Reihe der Diener am Kunstwerk auszuscheiden. Daß das Undenkbare dennoch möglich ist, erwies sich bei Dimitri Mitropoulos' beiden Konzerten, als er zum ersten Mal seit seiner Lehrzeit bei Ferruccio Busoni und seiner Tätigkeit an der Berliner Staatsoper wieder nach Deutschland kam. Der 58jährige, gebürtige Grieche wirkt seit fünfzehn Jahren in den Vereinigten Staaten, unter anderem als ständiger Dirigent der New Yorker Philharmoniker.

Im Kölner Sendesaal — wo sein Auftreten die Reihe weithin beachteter Dirigentengastspiele für dieses Jahr abschloß — gewann er das Publikum mit einem Schlage für sich. Was die beiden Rahmenwerke des Programms angeht, so würde der stürmische Erfolg über Mitropoulos' persönlichen Wert noch nicht das Wesentliche aussagen. Robuste Rhythmik und orchestrale Exaltation finden überall rasch ihren Anklang, nicht nur im Rheinland, sondern wohl auch im „vitalistisch-antiformalistischen" Rußland — Serge Prokofiews Fünfter Sinfonie nach zu urteilen. Wer da weiß, wie viele Hoffnungen einst auf den jungen Revolutionär Prokofiew gesetzt worden sind, der hört mit Kopfschütteln, wie in diesem späteren Werk die PS- und Umdrehungszahlen sich ins Übermaß steigern, wie ein recht „westlich" anmutender Rausch sich im Saal verbreitet — und wie sich trotzdem nichts an der thematischen Grundsubstanz verändert, deren harmloser Optimismus bei einiger Gehässigkeit fast von Boieldieu herzuleiten wäre ...

Vor dem Nach-Außen-Wirken steht bei Dimitri Mitropoulos nun allerdings ein Nach-Innen-Forschen von fanatischer Unbestechlichkeit. Dieser in ihrer Art einmaligen Spannung gab sich das Kölner Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester sofort hin — schon bei den Stücken von François Couperin, die von Darius Milhaud ins neuzeitliche Orchestergewand hineingesteckt worden sind wie kleine Prinzessinnen in die Versailler Prunktracht. Nahezu brucknerisch wirkt die Gestalt des Dirigenten auf dem Podium, barock expansiv und bäurisch weltfremd in einem. Manchmal spiegeln die Gesichtszüge ein wenig linkische Heiterkeit wider, sonst aber erinnern sie an Schönberg, und die Geste ist autoritativ bis ins letzte.

Eine Entdeckertat seltenen Ranges war die Wiedergabe des Violinkonzerts von Arnold Schönberg. Ohne Partitur dirigierend, entwirrte Mitropoulos das scheinbar Unentwirrbare, griff die Motive und Motivkomplexe dutzendweise aus dem luftleeren Raum des Vorstellungsbildes heraus und gab ihnen — vermöge einer ziemlich einfachen, darum um so suggestiveren Schlagtechnik — die volle Ausdrucksgewalt mit. Den Solisten Louis Krasner, den ebenfalls in den USA lebenden Russen, soll Schönberg einen Geiger mit sechs Fingern genannt haben. Anders kann man die beinahe schlichte, gar nicht brillante, dabei absolut treffsichere Meisterung unglaublicher Schwierigkeiten in Stil und Technik auch kaum charakterisieren.

Es erwies sich: Schönbergs Einfälle, wiewohl aus Zwölftonreihen gewonnen, sind allemal aufs höchste inspiriert. Wenn sich ihr inneres Gesetz schon nach wenigen Takten erfüllt hat, so daß sie abreißen und auf Nimmerwiederhören verschwinden, so mag das verwirren oder abschrecken. In Wahrheit stellt der konzessionslose Schönberg uns nur vor harte musikgeschichtliche Tatsachen, nämlich daß Beethoven der letzte wahre Sinfoniker gewesen ist — daß die Themendurchführungen und -fortspinnungen, seit Schumann allzuoft kräfteleer, nur noch den schönen Schein sinfonischer Formen aufrechterhielten — und daß, von einigen Großen abgesehen, die Tonsetzer von heute sich unsicher oder unehrlich an diesen Schein weiter anklammern.

Wie Schönberg sich von der unsicheren Tradition ganz gelöst hat, wie er die einzelnen Einfälle dahinfahren läßt, dafür in immer neue Einfallssphären hinein vorstößt und dennoch die Herrschaft über die auseinanderstrebenden Klangkräfte behält: das alles zeugt von einer Disziplin, die sich nie allein von der Zucht der Zwölftonreihe her wird erklären lassen. Hier bleibt nur das Geheimnis eines gewaltigen Künstlercharakters als Urheber der Formkraft übrig.

Fesselnde Begegnung mit Dimitri Mitropoulos

Schönbergs Violinkonzert im letzten Sinfonieabend des NWDR Köln

B>10/1

Vielgestaltig war der Eindruck der „Moderne", den das zwölfte und letzte Sinfoniekonzert des Kölner Rundfunk-Sinfonie-Orchesters vermittelte. Vielgestaltig waren zumindest die drei Werke, die das Programm des nun fast sechzigjährigen griechischen Meisterdirigenten Dimitri Mitropoulos ausmachten.

Wenn wir auch Milhauds Instrumentierung der Sultanin-Suite von Couperin in diesem Zusammenhang mit zur Moderne zählen, so nur, weil es sich um einen der zahlreichen neueren Versuche handelt, die Klavierkompositionen des außerordentlich fruchtbaren Franzosen für unsere Zeit zu beleben. Milhaud beschränkte sich darauf, die Suite notengetreu ins große Orchester zu übersetzen, konnte aber bei aller „Werktreue" nicht verhindern, daß der Klang für die zierliche Musik zu dick wurde. Mitropoulos tat wenig, diese Klangmassierungen zu durchlüften. Diese kraftvolle Fülle, in der Lautstärke hier und da bis an die Grenzen des Aufnahmevermögens vorstoßend, stand der Fünften Sinfonie von Serge Prokofieff weit besser an, einem Werk von ungewöhnlichem Erfindungsreichtum und blendender Brillanz, aber — wie meist bei Prokofieff — auch von einer gewissen Oberflächlichkeit der Verarbeitung.

Arnold Schönbergs Violinkonzert war Mitte und Mittelpunkt der außerordentlich bereichernden Begegnung mit Mitropoulos. Der greichische Künstler leitet seit fünf Jahren das Orchester der New-Yorker Philharmoniker. Wie er Schönbergs 1936 geschriebenes, eminent schweres und „unfreundliches" Konzert bewältigte, war allein äußerlich eine Intelligenz- und Gedächtnisleistung sondergleichen: er dirigierte von der ersten Probe an ohne Partitur. Wie ein großes dramatisches Gespräch vollzog sich das strenge, ernste, in seiner Zwölftontechnik völlig konsequente Werk. Louis Krasner, amerikanischer Geiger russischer Herkunft (ihm ist Alban Bergs Violinkonzert gewidmet) beherrschte den wohl schwierigsten Solopart, den die Literatur aufzuweisen hat, mit einer fast bescheidenen, dienenden Souveränität, die schließlich so unmittelbar auf die Zuhörer wirkte, daß selbst „Zwölfton-Erduider" aufsprangen und in die Bravorufe der „Fortschrittler" einstimmten.

Dimitri Mitropoulos

Unter den wechselnden Dirigenten des Kölner Rundfunk-Sinfonie-Orchesters erschien jetzt ein Gast von außergewöhnlichem Rang: Dimitri Mitropoulos, seit 1949 ständiger Leiter der New-Yorker Philharmoniker und einer der Dirigenten der in wenigen Tagen beginnenden Salzburger Festspiele. Der heute 58jährige wurde in Athen geboren, war Schüler von Busoni und einige Jahre nach dem ersten Weltkrieg Korrepetitor an der Berliner Staatsoper. Als Dirigent kam er jetzt, wie kürzlich Eugen Ormandy, zum ersten Male nach Westdeutschland.

Wer der Leistung eines Dirigenten gerecht werden will, sollte nach Möglichkeit seine Proben anhören. Mitropoulos' Art zu probieren, seine selbst in der stärksten Klangentwicklung des Orchesters noch immer völlig locker führende Hand, gibt allein äußerlich ein faszinierendes Bild. Aber selbst ein von vielen guten Dirigenten verwöhntes Orchester gerät in Erstaunen, wenn ein mit soviel rhythmischen und klanglichen Problemen gespicktes Werk wie Arnold Schönbergs Violinkonzert — von dem hervorragenden amerikanischen Geiger Louis Krasner gespielt — auswendig probiert wird. Selbst die Taktzahlen, in die Hunderte gehend, werden aus dem Gedächtnis angesagt: „Bitte, meine Herren, zwei Takte mit Auftakt vor Ziffer 270." Der Solist muß sich erst mal in der Partitur orientieren, er hat die Taktzahlen selbstverständlich nicht mit auswendig gelernt.

Nicht anders geht es bei Prokofiews langer fünfter Symphonie, die allerdings gegenüber Schönbergs zwölftöniger Konstruktion geradezu naiv wirkt. Mitropoulos ist indessen kein „Sechzehntelfuchser", der alle Augenblicke unterbricht und das Orchester damit rebellisch macht. Laute Ansagen hört man nicht ein einziges Mal. Bei allen notwendigen Korrekturen und Unterbrechungen herrscht die höfliche Stille der Achtung vor dem großen Dirigenten. Begeisterte Stimmen konnte man aus den Reihen der Orchestermitglieder in den Probepausen hören.

Mitropoulos wiederholt das gleiche Programm bei den Salzburger Festspielen. Die Begeisterung der Wiener Philharmoniker dürfte nicht geringer sein als im Kölner Funkhaus.

KÖLNER STADT- ANZEIGER, vom 2o.7.54

Schönberg, vollendet interpretiert

Dimitri Mitropoulos und Louis Krasner im 12. NWDR-Konzert

Der 58jährige, aus Athen gebürtige Dirigent Dimitri Mitropoulos, einst Schüler Busonis in Berlin und heute ständiger Leiter der Neuyorker Philharmoniker, soll nach amerikanischem Urteil ein hervorragender Mittler klassischer und romantischer Musik sein. Im zwölften Sinfoniekonzert des Nordwestdeutschen Rundfunks Köln begriff man, was ihm einen fast noch bedeutenderen Ruf verschafft hat: die gewaltige Überzeugungskraft, mit der er Musik unserer Zeit, vor allem das Werk Arnold Schönbergs, interpretiert. Der Abend — mit Schönbergs Violinkonzert von 1936 im Mittelpunkt — gab die Gewißheit, daß für den großen Unbequemen des Konzertsaals die Stunde jederzeit anbricht, wenn man ihn nur erst mit letzter Klarheit offenbart.

Hier war sie nämlich, diese seltene letzte Klarheit. Sie war das Ergebnis richtig verstandenen Eingefühltseins (des Dirigenten wie des Solisten) ins Werk. Das Ergebnis der vollkommenen geistigen Durchdringung seiner Gestalt, jener unerbittlich analysierenden Denkarbeit, die gerade Schönberg vom Interpreten verlangt. Bei Schönbergs Violinkonzert muß man den Anteil des Dirigenten an der Wiedergabe ausführlich werten. Da wirkte es wahrhaft verblüffend, wie Mitropoulos das reiche und kühne, rein zwölftönige Konstruktionsgeflecht bis ins subtilste aphoristische Detail und in die entferntesten Tonbezüge übersah, ohne die Gedächtnisstütze der Partitur zu benötigen. Eine unerläßliche Übersicht; denn diese noch gleichsam neben der klingenden Wirklichkeit zu leistende Vordisposition des Materials artikuliert erst das Werk im Schönbergschen Sinne und gestattet, seine Anwendung von Formtradition (der klassischen Dreisätzigkeit, der Arbeit mit Themen und Themenkontrasten, der Einbeziehung konzertanter Konventionen wie der Solokadenz) als das zu sehen, was sie ist: als Gewinn einer neuen Freiheit des Ausdrucks im sinnlichen Klang. Es war das Überraschende dieser Aufführung, bis zu welcher Intensität auch der rein klanglichen Expression der harte und spröde Schönberg geführt werden kann. Mitropoulos legte diese Ausdrucksschicht im Orchesterpart mit einer geradezu ekstatischen Hingabe bloß, die in konvulsivisch anmutenden, dennoch völlig konzentrierten Bewegungen des ganzen Körpers sichtbar wurde. Mit höchster Bewunderung ist auch von dem Geiger Louis Krasner zu sprechen, der schon der Solist der Uraufführung des Werkes unter Stokowski im Jahre 1940 war. Er hatte wirklich so etwas wie den „sechsten Finger" für die enormen technischen Schwierigkeiten des Solos, für das Äußerste an Intervallsprüngen, Flageoletteffekten und halsbrecherischem Lagenspiel, das hier gewagt wird. Und mehr: seine minuziöse Darstellung erhob sich zu einem großartigen Zug von Geschlossenheit und vergeistigter Virtuosität. Für die vollendete Schönberg-Aufführung gab es einmütigen Beifall; er galt nicht zuletzt der wunderbaren Präzisionsleistung des Kölner Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchesters.

Den Abend eröffneten zwei von Milhaud instrumentierte Sätze aus einer Klaviersuite François Couperins: dünne französische Clavecinistenkunst, in den starken Farben des Provenzalen zu einer modernen Klangwelt geglüht, durch die das barocke Moll mit schwerer, funebrer Pracht zieht. Mitropoulos wußte an den Schlüssen überwältigende Crescendos orchestralen Glanzes anzubringen.

Dimitri Mitropoulos im NWDR Köln

Triumphaler Ausklang der Konzertspielzeit im Funkhause

Mit dem 12. Symphoniekonzert fanden im Großen Sendesaal des Kölner Funkhauses die öffentlichen Musikveranstaltungen der Spielzeit 1953-54 ihren Abschluß.

Neben den kunstpolitischen und musiksoziologischen Wirkungen, die der Musikfunk als solcher zeitigt, haben diese öffentlichen Abende ihre besondere Bedeutung im Kunstleben des deutschen Westens erlangt. Das sind zunächst die „zusätzlichen" Dinge: das Funkhaus mit seinem schönen, zweckmäßigen, mit allen Schikanen der modernen Raumakustik ausgestatteten Konzertsaal, das mit unvergleichbaren Vorbereitungsmöglichkeiten in denkbar künstlerischer Freiheit arbeitende Orchester, dessen Können die besten Dirigenten der Weltklasse anzieht, da sind die verschiedenen Konzertreihen, deren jede ihre besondere Note und ihr Publikum hat.

Mit der zahlenmäßigen Anreicherung verbunden ist die Aufstellung neuer Qualitätsmaßstäbe, die, durch das Musizeren vor dem Mikrophon bedingt, nun auch in den Konzertsaal hineingetragen werden, und die geeignet sind, auf die Veranstaltungen der dichtgedrängten Musikstädte der näheren und weiteren Umgebung anregend und befruchtend zu wirken. Nichts war in dieser Hinsicht belehrender als die Parade der nordrhein-westfälischen Kulturorchester in der diesjährigen Reihenveranstaltung des NWDR Köln. Alle, die es angeht, werden Gelegenheit genommen haben, selber zu prüfen, bzw. es sich von kompetenter Seite sagen zu lassen, was ihr Konzertinstitut und der Mann an seiner Spitze vergleichsweise wert ist. Zugleich zeichnet sich eine Rangordnung ab, bei der weniger die Größe der Stadt als ihre kulturelle Regsamkeit, weniger die starke Besetzung des Konzertapparates als die Wirkkraft der führenden Persönlichkeiten zählt.

Vor dem Orchester des NWDR erschien in diesem zwölften Konzert der griechisch-amerikanische Dirigent Dimitri Mitropoulos, 1896 in Athen geboren, Schüler Busonis, nach Vorbereitungsjahren in Berlin 1924 Dirigent des Athener Symphonieorchesters, 1939 Kapellmeister in Minneapolis, 1949 ständiger Leiter der Neuyorker Philharmoniker.

Wer ihn herankommen sieht, würde alles andere als einen Musiker in ihm vermuten. Das ist also der Mann, von dem man sich so merkwürdige Dinge erzählt. Er habe griechisch-orthodoxer Priester werden sollen, aber der Drang zur Musik sei stärker gewesen, an der kindhaften Frömmigkeit, an seinem schlichten, asketischen Leben habe sich nichts geändert, als er weltberühmt wurde.

Von den außerordentlichen Fähigkeiten des Musikers und von der Art, wie er seine ganze geistige Kraft der Arbeit widmet, berichten die Kölner Musiker Wunderdinge: die nur sechs Proben, die er für die Vorbereitung des Programms, einer Suite von Couperin-Milhaud, des Violinkonzerts von Schoenberg und der Fünften von Prokofieff in Anspruch genommen, habe er ohne Partituren aus dem Kopf geleitet; er beherrsche jede Note dieser Werke und jede Phrase eines jeden Instruments.

Dem entspricht das äußere Bild des Dirigierens. Es geht ganz ohne sichtbares Theater von visionärer Schau und so, die ganze Arbeit zielt auf den einzelnen Mann im Orchester, auf die gespannte und genaue Wiedergabe und auf die Präzision des Zusammenwirkens; sie ist einhelfende Kraft für die Instrumentalisten ebensogut wie Uebertragung der eigenen Konzeption von dem Wesen, der Struktur und der Klangwelt der Werke auf ein Orchester, das virtuos, klanglich aufgelockert und mit spürbarem Respekt vor dem außerordentlichen Manne da oben musiziert.

Couperins Suite klingt bei Mitropoulos genau so, wie sich der Instrumentator Milhaud es sich gedacht haben mag, trotz beibehaltener Notentreue aus der zarten Klangwelt der Entstehungszeit herausgehoben, als ein glanzvoll aufgemachtes und dynamisch hochgetriebenes Konzertstück für großes Orchester.

Das nachfolgende Violinkonzert von Arnold Schoenberg brachte es, ähnlich wie vor vier Jahren die Düsseldorfer Aufführung unter Rosbaud mit Tibor Varga zu einem ausgesprochenen Publikumserfolg. Solist war in Köln der bei Flesch in Berlin ausgebildete Russe Louis Krasner, derselbe, der 1940 mit dem Philadelphia-Orchester unter Stokowski die Uraufführung herausgebracht hat. Wie immer, wenn Meister ihres Fachs mit Ueberzeugung für ein bedeutendes Werk der Kunst eintreten, bahnen sie dem aufnahmebereiten Hörer den noch so schwierigen Weg. Louis Krasner gehört zu den großen, technisch unfehlbaren und ausdrucksintensiven Geigern unserer Zeit.

Prokofieffs Fünfte Symphonie, ein Koloß von Pathetik, gehäuften Instrumentationseffekten, rhythmischem Raffinement, mit ansprechender Melodik hat es beim Publikum leichter, um so mehr, als Mitropoulos keinen konzertanten Effekt ausläßt. Dem hinreißenden Musizieren entsprach der Beifall, für den sich der berühmte Gast mit dem Orchester ungezählte Male zu bedanken hatte.

Dimitri Mitropoulos in der „Musica viva"

Wenn das dubiose Wort „Sensation" überhaupt bei einem so ernsthaften Unternehmen wie der Musica viva gebraucht werden darf, so brachte das letzte Konzert der ausgehenden Saison in der Tat eine Sensation: Die Begegnung mit dem Dirigenten Dimitri Mitropoulos. Der gebürtige Athener, in Paris und Berlin (von Feruccio Busoni) zum Musiker ausgebildet — eine Zeitlang war er Korrepetitor an der Berliner Staatsoper —, von 1924 an in seiner Vaterstadt dirigierend, dann in den USA über das Minneapolis-Orchester zum Leiter der berühmten New Yorker Philharmoniker avanciert — dieser schlanke, kahlköpfige Mann mit der beschwörend vibrierenden Linken Furtwänglers und der rhythmisch regierenden Rechten Strawinskys, ist eines der dirigentischen Urphänomene, bei denen man nicht weiß, wo die immerhin noch kontrollierbare Souveränität des Handwerks in die sich jeder Kontrolle entziehende, rein geistige Magie der Inspiration übergeht, bei denen aus strengster Disziplin höchste Freiheit erwächst und aus minutiösester Arbeit die Faszination vollkommener Spontaneität aufblitzt. Was äußerste Sensibilität ohne jede Nervosität, was stärkste Spannung ohne jeden Krampf, was elementares Temperament ohne jede Willkür bedeutet — dies und noch vieles andere, was das Geheimnis größter Dirigierkunst ausmacht, kann man bei Dimitri Mitropoulos studieren, sofern der Bann, in dem er seine Zuhörer hält, einem dazu überhaupt die Möglichkeit gewährt. Sein Klangsinn ist ebenso einzigartig wie sein Gedächtnis, das ihm gestattet, selbst ein Werk von der abenteuerlichen Kompliziertheit des Violinkonzerts von Arnold Schönberg von der ersten Probe an aus dem Kopf zu realisieren. Nichts an seiner dirigentischen Gestik ist Parade, alles ist Suggestion. Die Qualität des Rundfunk-Symphonieorchesters erfährt unter ihm ihre denkbar höchste Steigerung.

Gottfried Einems Orchestermusik op. 9, eines der profiliertesten und in der konstruktiven Logik seines aus der kanonischen Form entwickelten Aufbaus konzisesten Werke des österreichischen Komponisten, gab in einer Darstellung von grandioser Plastik und rhythmischer Energie — welche Spannung hatten die „schweren" Achtel des einleitenden und abschließenden Adagios! — den Auftakt zu Schönbergs 1936 in Amerika entstandenen, streng zwölftönigen Violinkonzert, dessen „sechsfingrige" Schwierigkeiten der phänomenale Geiger Louis Krasner (USA) mit einer aufregend ruhigen Überlegenheit meisterte. Schönbergs fast exzessiver Ausdruckswille, hier nicht nur mit dem Konstruktivismus seiner unerbittlich konsequenten Formidee, sondern auch mit der Absicht, in dem Solopart einen virtuos-konzertanten Stil zu entwickeln, gekreuzt, erfuhr in der idealen Musizierpartnerschaft von Dirigent und Solist eine Wiedergabe von kristallhaft durchsichtiger Klarheit. Die geistvoll aphoristischen, mit den Zauberkunststücken der Prinzipalgeige konkurrierenden Instrumentaleffekte des Finales, entschädigten, mit höchster Brillanz vorgetragen, das Ohr für die rhythmische Verschwommenheit eines nur bei seinem Beginn marschartig konturierten Satzes, der einen beinahe witzigen Gegensatz zu dem romantischen Pathos und der sensitiven Lyrik der vorhergehenden Sätze bildet.

Statt der angekündigten Werke von Krenek und Alban Berg gab es zum Schluß die Fünfte Symphonie von Serge Prokofieff. Dieses opus 100 ist entstanden, nachdem der Komponist dem „westlichen Formalismus" abgeschworen und seine au fond geniale musikalische Phantasie in jene Linien gelenkt hatte, denen treu zu bleiben den Verzicht auf die Freiheit eben jener schöpferischen Phantasie bedeutet. In den schnellen Sätzen sind noch berückende Reminiszenzen an die Rossinische Grazie der „Sinfonie Classique" und den kapriziösen Parodistengeist der „Liebe zu den drei Orangen" zu entdecken; der erste und dritte Satz aber zeigen den schwungvollen Schwulst und pathetischen Lyrismus staatlich diktierter Lebensbejahung, den wir, allerdings weit schlechter komponiert, aus nicht lang zurückliegenden Zeiten auch noch bei uns in fataler Erinnerung haben. Unter den Zauberhänden von Mitropoulos freilich, dem orkanartige Beifallsstürme und die Rufe „Wiederkommen!" ein triumphales Münchner Debüt bestätigten, ließ eine betörend farbige und vollkommen transparent bleibende Klangregie alles ideologisch Peinliche hinter dem naturhaft Musikalischen verschwinden, das Prokofieffs bestes, russisch-vitales Erbteil gewesen ist.

Dimitri Mitropoulos im letzten Konzert ihres neunten Jahres — mit keinem großartigeren Aspekt konnte die Musica viva den Ausblick auf ihr zehntes eröffnen. Wir hoffen, daß der vom leierschlagenden Apoll seiner Heimat so begnadete Grieche in diesem Jubiläumsjahr nicht fehlen wird.

Radikalist des musikalischen Ausdrucks

„Musica viva" mit Dimitri Mitropoulos und Louis Krasner

Daß ein Pult-Musiker (Superlativ von Dirigent!) wie Dimitri Mitropoulos Weltkarriere machen konnte, spricht für den oft angezweifelten Geschmack der Welt. Denn Mitropoulos ist eine der unbedingtesten, unbürgerlichsten und unkonziliantesten Dirigentenpersönlichkeiten: ein Radikalist des musikalischen Ausdrucks, ein musikalischer Fanatiker, eine Prometheus-Natur und ein Könner, für den dirigieren ein Werk zu Ende komponieren bedeutet. Er dirigiert auswendig, weil er auch auswendig probiert. Seine scharfen, energiegeladenen Bewegungen holen aus dem Orchester (Symphoniker des Bayerischen Rundfunks) das Äußerste an Ausdruck, vom schattenhaften Pianissimo bis zum atemraubenden Fortissimo.

Das Verdienst, den Chefdirigenten der New York Philharmony zum ersten Male nach München gerufen zu haben, fällt Karl Amadeus Hartmann zu. Die „Musica viva" bestätigte durch dieses Engagement ihren internationalen Rang. Das zentrale Ereignis des Konzerts im Residenzsaal war Arnold Schönbergs Violinkonzert. Mitropoulos und der Meistergeiger Louis Krasner, der Solist der Uraufführung, zeigten, wie sehr Schönbergs Musik in ihrer einsamen, zerrissenen Größe eine musikalische Glaubensfrage ihrer Interpreten ist. Gottfried von Einem dürfte seine von echter Musikalität und melodischem Einfall zeugende Orchestermusik noch nie so vollendet gehört haben. (Den pseudo-avantgardistischen Pfeifern sei ins Stammbuch geschrieben, daß einer, der noch den vierstimmigen Satz beherrscht, nicht unbedingt ein Kulturbremser sein muß.) Die 5. Symphonie von Serge Prokofieff enthüllte ein tragisches Schicksal: eine der stärksten Begabungen unserer Zeit wird durch die politische Bannbulle gegen den „Formalismus" dazu gezwungen, den Kolchosen-Bruckner und Stalins leibeigenen Tschaikowsky zu spielen. Mitropoulos dirigierte das Werk mit so rasanter Ausdrucksgewalt, daß es einem den Atem verschlug.

Mitropoulos wurde seinem Range nach gefeiert, als eines der sieben noch lebenden Weltwunder des Taktstocks. München ist einem der größten Musiker unserer Zeit begegnet.

In der Musica Viva:

Esoterik und Musik für die Masse

Ein Programm der grellen Kontraste: hier das Violinkonzert von Schönberg, Werk eines schrankenlosen Individualisten und Esoterikers, in dem sich eine fieberhaft subjektive, ekstatisch übersteigerte Gefühlswelt bis ins Unkontrollierbare verliert, dort die V. Symphonie von Prokofieff, in welcher der begabte russische Komponist dem Idol einer himmelblauen, treuherzigen Allerwelts-Verständlichkeit nachjagt. Schönbergs Musik führt in die erzromantischen Gebiete des Nächtigen und Zwielichtigen, des Schwelenden, Beunruhigenden, der psychischen, ja psychopathischen Erregungen und Exzesse. Durch eine Tonsprache von höchster Kompliziertheit und Differenzierung versucht er seine verwirrenden (und bisweilen verwirrten) Visionen künstlerisch zu bändigen. Mit ungeheurer Betriebsamkeit ist der Solist unablässig mit seinem Instrument beschäftigt, ein Regen gepfefferter Kombinationen und Effekte geht hernieder, es hagelt Kniffe und Tricks reihentechnischer, rhythmischer und kontrapunktischer Art, und die Musik ist ständig am Ächzen und Stöhnen, am Prusten, Keuchen und Schwitzen. Aber Schönberg übersieht, daß eine Häufung noch keinen Reichtum bedeutet, daß seiner Musik die Hauptsache fehlt: die überzeugende und immer aufs neue in ihren Bann ziehende Inspiration.

Im Gegensatz zu Schönberg neigt Prokofieff in seiner „Fünften" zu Pathos, zu harmonischer und melodischer Leutseligkeit und zu billigem Optimismus. In der Meisterung der Form und im Reichtum der Einfälle spürt man immer noch die Klaue des Löwen. Aber es stimmt wehmütig, den genialen Schöpfer der „Liebe zu den drei Orangen" und der „Symphonie classique" nach seiner Maßregelung und dem obligaten anschließenden Schuldbekenntnis in den Bahnen einer philiströsen Gemeinverständlichkeit wandeln zu sehen. Wir hörten Prokofieffs Symphonie bereits vor drei Jahren unter dem Namen „Die Größe menschlichen Geistes". Der bombastische Titel wurde jetzt schamhaft verschwiegen.

Gottfried v. Einem fiel in dem Programm die schwierige Aufgabe zu, zwischen den zerfallenden musikalischen Welten eine „Mitte" zu bilden. Seine „Orchestermusik" ist verständlich, ohne konventionell zu sein, motivisch kunstvoll gearbeitet, ohne unübersichtlich zu wirken, und zeigt Anklänge an Strawinsky, an Romantiker und sogar an Beethoven, ohne in Epigonentum zu verfallen. Sehr schön die ruhig fließende, zarte und innerliche Adagio-Einleitung!

Dimitri Mitropoulos, Chef der New Yorker Philharmoniker, leitete das gesamte Programm auswendig. Insbesondere seine Interpretation Schönbergs war außergewöhnlich, gehörte zum Exzeptionellsten, was wir in München an dirigentischer Leistung erlebten. Zweifelsohne ist Mitropoulos' Wiedergabe aus Liebe, ja aus einer gewissen Verliebtheit in Schönbergs Musik geboren. Schon seine hochexpressive, fast exaltierte Zeichengebung kommt Schönberg entgegen. Wunderbar, wie er das dichte motivische Gewebe auflockert und durchsichtig macht, wie er dem Orchesterklang Beseelung und Farbe verleiht! Auch der Solist Louis Krasner überzeugte durch die schlechthin souveräne Überlegenheit, mit der er die immensen Schwierigkeiten des Schönbergschen Violinpartes technisch und geistig beherrscht. Stürmischer Beifall rief Dirigenten und Solisten immer wieder aufs Podium. Für den ebenfalls anwesenden Komponisten v. Einem gab es neben reichem Beifall auch laute Pfiffe — anscheinend von einigen Heißspornen, denen seine Musik wohl zu zahm war.

LE MANIFESTAZIONI MUSICALI AL TEATRO VERDE

Dimitri Mitropoulos e l'orchestra del Maggio

Se è vero che la grandezza di un interprete si misura, si deve misurare, tutte le volte, da capo, sulle singole musiche nelle quali si impegna (ed è questo il suo duro limite ma anche la possibilità di una sempre rinnovata affermazione), è pur vero che le esperienze precedenti, le quali contribuiscono a tracciare il profilo di quell'interprete, non possono non influire sul giudizio complessivo.

Ieri sera, al Teatro Verde, abbiamo ascoltato, con l'Orchestra del Maggio Musicale Fiorentino, Dimitri Mitropoulos in opere di Cimarosa, Mendelssohn e Schumann. Ma nel seguire queste interpretazioni ci era impossibile non ricordare le altre precedenti, da Mozart a Brahms, da Liszt a Mahler, da Verdi a Strauss, un intero mondo musicale, con esigenze stilistiche ed espressive, con problemi tecnici, assolutamente diversi, e che ci avevano data intera la misura della grandezza di questo interprete eccezionale, ci avevano fatto capire le particolari caratteristiche che formano la sua straordinaria personalità musicale.

Musicista dalla sensibilità acutissima, si direbbe persino inquieta, nell'acceso romanticismo, tecnico formidabile che gli consente l'assoluto dominio della materia sonora e di risolvere qualsiasi problema tecnico, Mitropoulos c' apparso sin dalla prima volta che lo ascoltammo e si confermò, via via, con una sempre maggiore profondità, nei successivi incontri.

Il suo modo assoluto di immergersi nella partitura musicale, di farsi egli stesso musica è forse oggi, insuperabile. Un modo che, altra volta, definiamo dionisiaco, ditirambico, per taluni attributi poetici, sentimentali, essenzialmente drammatici che caratterizzano la sua personalità.

Ma questo suo acceso, persino parossistico romanticismo, questa sua «stimmung», Mitropoulos libera e trasfigura nella bellezza formale ed espressiva. In ciò rivela un altro aspetto della sua umanità di interprete, quel suo modo, pur necessario, di essere classico, di ristabilire un goethiano equilibrio nella sintesi del contenuto e dell'espressione.

Rimane, risultato logico e provvidenziale di questa interiore duplicità di esigenze, una spontanea tensione espressiva. La partitura, sotto il formidabile cervello e le magiche dita di Mitropoulos, non conosce cedimenti, abbandoni, la continuità del discorso musicale è costante, la chiarezza tecnica, l'equilibrio fonico, sono problemi superati in partenza.

La classica, tutta superiore, geniale versatilità dell'interprete, si è potuta misurare anche dal programma di ieri sera. Una bellissima, preziosa sinfonia di Cimarosa dalla «Bella greca», ha dato a Mitropoulos il modo di presentarsi quale interprete di uno dei momenti più puri del settecento italiano. E lo ha fatto con una misura, con un raccoglimento, con un pudore espressivo d'una raffinatezza eccezionale, non disgiunta dalla necessaria stilizzazione e da una cantabilità assolutamente italiana. Un capolavoro di misura, di classico equilibrio.

Poi due momenti diversi del romanticismo tedesco, la Sinfonia N. 5 in re min. di Mendelsshon e la Sinfonia N. 2 in do magg. di Schumann.

In entrambe le opere, Mitropoulos s'è immerso con un calore, con una voluttà uniti al più assoluto e lucido dominio. Ha ricreato, battuta per battuta, l'incanto di questi due severi eppure liricissimi capolavori. Analizzare l'interpretazione delle due Sinfonie, per ciascuno dei quattro tempi che le compongono, non è possibile. Ma ad indicare quale altissima misura espressiva, quale profonda intensità lirica e tecnica Mitropoulos abbia raggiunto, basta ricordare lo stupendo «Andante» della Sinfonia di Mendelsshon, ripetuto, alla fine del concerto per bis, e lo «Scherzo» di quella di Schumann.

Al concerto ha preso parte, come pure domani sera, l'Orchestra del Maggio Musicale Fiorentino, una magnifica compagine, dal suono potente e duttile, dalla tecnica agguerrita, dall'equilibrio mirabile.

Il pubblico, convenuto per questo primo eccezionale concerto, ha rivolto al Maestro Mitropoulos gli applausi più calorosi dopo l'esecuzione di ciascuna opera e l'ha evocato più volte sul podio.

Domani sera secondo dei due concerti annunciati con un nutrito e vario programma, in cui figurano capolavori come la Sinfonia dalla «Forza del destino» e la IV Sinfonia di Brahms.

CONCLUSE LE MANIFESTAZIONI MUSICALI AL TEATRO VERDE

Secondo Concerto Mitropoulos

Programma vario, sostanzioso e di tale natura da permettere anche all'ascoltatore meno provveduto, di constatare le caratteristiche, le grandi qualità di questo straordinario interprete, con quel curioso ed esteticamente errato sistema dei «confronti» di cui i più si valgano per giudicare una interpretazione ed un interprete.

La Sinfonia della «Forza del destino» parla, seguendo questo criterio, un linguaggio universale. Sinfonia di un'opera, avranno pensato ancora taluni, quasi con disprezzo, sinfonia popolare (certo, come se la grande arte non possa essere anche popolare), comunque, anzi proprio per queste ragioni, sinfonia nota a tutti, eseguita da troppi, e ridotta dalla consuetudine, dalle incrostazioni del mestiere pressocchè irriconoscibile.

Da Mitropoulos, noi la ascoltammo la prima volta quando diresse, lo scorso anno, tutta l'opera. Non dobbiamo che confermare il giudizio di allora. Anche ieri sera i primi squillanti accordi, secchi, rapidi, decisi, hanno chiarito subito le intenzioni dell'interprete sullo strumentale, sullo stile, sull'espressione verdiani. Rigoroso, ritmicamente implacabile, Mitropoulos ha fatto saltare ogni pigra consuetudine, rendendo il discorso con una chiarezza radiografica, d'una lucentezza splendida, con una espressione sempre attenta a cogliere ogni momento lirico e drammatico.

Poi la IV Sinfonia di Brahms, uno dei linguaggi che più si addice forse al complesso romanticismo di Mitropoulos. Le poderose arcate strumentali, l'intricata polifonia, l'amplissimo periodare, la ricchezza e varietà timbrica, l'arco dinamico, del discorso brahmsiano, hanno trovato in loro ideale realizzazione. Mitropoulos sente Brahms nella sua sostanziale fisionomia drammatica, intulsce, con straordinaria acutezza, il nordico romanticismo, ma non dimentica, un solo momento, tutto il sinuoso, pungente lirismo della poesia brahmsiana, quella sua intima, solitaria malinconia, e quelle introspezioni psicologiche, che egli realizza attraverso un gioco dinamico di contrasti d'una ricchezza persino pericolosa, con una tensione inquieta e talvolta morbosa. Le predilezioni liriche dell'interprete si sono potute constatare soprattutto, nell'Andante, questa stupenda elegia drammatica, in cui Mitropoulos ha indugiato con visibile compiacimento. Negli ultimi due tempi, ma specie nell'Allegro, ha dato intera la misura del suo straordinario senso drammatico, del suo dominio tecnico.

Il concerto si è concluso con le «Danze di Galanta» di Kodaly, e la fantasia «Francesca da Rimini» di Ciaicowski, due partiture profondamente diverse nello spirito ma egualmente fantasiose, virtuosistiche; due partiture da realizzare, quasi interamente, sul fatto timbrico e strumentale. E questo Mitropoulos sa fare come oggi forse nessun altro. L'inizio delle «Danze di Galanta» ce lo ha detto senza alcun dubbio. E sino alla fine è stato un saggio sbalorditivo d'un virtuosismo lirico, mai aridamente intellettuale fine a se stesso, ma sempre in funzione d'un fatto espressivo.

Ottimo anche ieri sera il contributo della Orchestra del Maggio Musicale Fiorentino che, nel difficile programma, ha confermato i pregi già ammirati.

Successo calorosissimo. Il pubblico che esauriva il teatro ha applaudito a lungo e intensamente il Maestro Mitropoulos, dopo l'esecuzione di ciascuna opera e alla fine del concerto con il quale si sono concluse le manifestazioni musicali di quest'anno al Teatro Verde.

Hoher Gast bei der Musica viva

Nach jahrzehntelanger Tätigkeit in New York und an den Musikmetropolen der alten und neuen Welt dirigiert Dimitri Mitropoulos heute im Rahmen der „Musica viva" zum ersten Male wieder in einem deutschen Konzertsaal. Auf dem Programm stehen Orchestermusik von Gottfried von Einem, das Violinkonzert von Arnold Schönberg und die 5. Symphonie von Serge Prokofieff. In dem heute um 19.30 Uhr im Herkulessaal beginnenden Konzert ist der amerikanische Geiger Louis Krasner zum ersten Male in München zu hören. AL TEATRO VERDE DELL'ISOLA DI S. GIORGIO

Il Concerto Mitropoulos con l'orchestra del "Maggio"

Vivissima è l'attesa per il primo dei due concerti sinfonici che il Maestro Dimitri Mitropoulos dirigerà questa sera, alle 21.15 con l'Orchestra del Maggio Musicale Fiorentino, al Teatro Verde dell'Isola di S. Giorgio.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, considerato oggi uno dei maggiori direttori viventi, musicista coltissimo e versatile, compositore e pianista, è nato ad Atene dove conseguì il diploma in pianoforte ed in composizione. Dopo un soggiorno berlinese, dove completò gli studi con Ferruccio Busoni, tornò in patria per dirigere l'orchestra stabile di Atene, incarico che tenne sino al 1938.

Si trasferì successivamente negli Stati Uniti dove fu direttore stabile, sino al 1949, della orchestra di Minneapolis. Passò poi a dirigere l'Orchestra Filarmonica di New York, incarico che tiene tuttora.

Nel dopo guerra Mitropoulos è venuto periodicamente in Europa per prendere parte ad alcuni dei maggiori festivals internazionali, sempre conteso dalle più grandi istituzioni musicali.

Della sua attività italiana si ricordano le memorabili partecipazioni al Maggio Musicale Fiorentino (Elettra, Forza del Destino, Fanciulla del West, oltre a numerosi concerti) e alle stagioni della Scala (Wozzeck, Elettra e concerti sinfonici).

Da Venezia dove aveva diretto una sola volta, il Maestro mancava da circa vent'anni, ed il suo ritorno assume quindi, anche per questo, una eccezionale importanza.

Il programma di questo primo concerto comprende: Cimarosa, Sinfonia dell'Opera «La bella greca» (Trascrizione P. Bormioli) — Mendelssohn, Sinfonia n. 5 in re minore (La Riforma) — Schumann, Sinfonia n. 2 in do maggiore.

Al botteghino del Teatro La Fenice continua la vendita dei posti.

Ο κ. ΔΗΜ. ΜΗΤΡΟΠΟΥΛΟΣ ΕΘΡΙΑΜΒΕΥΣΕ ΣΤΑΣ ΣΥΝΑΥΛΙΑΣ ΜΟΝΑΧΟΥ ΚΑΙ ΚΟΛΩΝΙΑΣ

Μᾶς γράφουν ἀπό τό Μόναχον ὅτι αἱ συναυλίαι ποὺ διηύθυνε ἐκεῖ καὶ εἰς τὴν Κολωνίαν ὁ Δημ. Μητρόπουλος ἐσημείωσαν θριαμβευτικὴν ἐπιτυχίαν. Σύσσωμος ἡ κριτικὴ ἀφιέρωσε διθυράμβους διὰ τὸν Ἕλληνα καλλιτέχνην. Ἡ συναυλία ποὺ διηύθυνε ὁ Μητρόπουλος εἰς τὸ Μόναχον περιελαμβάνετο εἰς μίαν σειράν συναυλιῶν ποὺ διοργανώνει ἡ ὀργάνωσις «Μούζικα Βίβα». Τό πρόγραμμα τῆς συναυλίας περιελάμβανε τὴν 5ην Συμφωνίαν τοῦ Προκόφιεφ, τό κοντσέρτο γιὰ βιολὶ καὶ ὀρχήστρα τοῦ Σαίμπεργκ, ἕνα κομμάτι γιὰ ὀρχήστρα τοῦ Φόν Ἄϊνεμ καὶ τὴν Εἰσαγωγὴ καὶ Ἀλλέγκρο τοῦ Καπερέν—Μιλώ.

Δίδομεν κατωτέρω δύο χαρακτηριστικὰ δείγματα ἀπὸ τὶς κριτικὲς ποὺ ἔγράφησαν διὰ τὸν Μητρόπουλον. Ἡ «Ἐφημερὶς τοῦ Μονάχου» ἀφοῦ ἀναφέρει διάφορα βιογραφικὰ στοιχεῖα διὰ τὸν Ἕλληνα ἀρχιμουσικόν, τονίζει ὅτι «Ἡ τελευταία συναυλία τῆς ἐφετεινῆς περιόδου ποσὲ φερε τῷ ὄντι μία ἰδιαιτέρα συγκίνησιν». Καὶ ὁ μουσικριτικὸς τῆς ἀνωτέρω ἐφημερίδος προσθέτει: «Ὁ λεπτός, φαλακρός αὐτός ἄνδρας, τοῦ ὁποίου τό ἀριστερό χέρι σὰν τοῦ Φουρτβάιγκλερ, ἐξορκίζει καὶ πάλλεται καὶ τό δεξί, σὰν τοῦ Στραβίνσκι, ἄρχει τοῦ ρυθμοῦ — εἶναι ἕνα ἀπό τὰ φαινόμενα τῆς μπαγκέττας! Δὲν ξέρεις σὲ ποιό σημεῖο ἡ τεχνικὴ μαεστρία, ποὺ ἐπιδέχεται ἐπὶ τέλους κάποιο ἔλεγχο, μεταπηδᾶ στὴν ἀστάθμητη, καθαρὰ πνευματικὴ σφαῖρα, τῆς ἐμπνεύσης, ὅπου ἀπό τὴ πιό αὐστηρὴ πειθαρχία πηγάζει ὑψιστη ἐλευθερία καὶ ἀπό τὴν πιό λεπτόλογη ἐργασία ἀναλάμπει ἡ γοητεία ἀπόλυτου αὐθορμητισμοῦ. Τό τί σημαίνει ἀκρότατη εὐαισθησία χωρὶς καμμιὰ νευρικότητα—ἰσχυρότατη ἔνταση δίχως τίποτε τόσπασμωδικό — πηγαῖο ταμπεραμέντο δίχως καμμιὰ αὐθαιρεσία, αὐτὰ καὶ πολλὰ ἄλλα ἀκόμα ποὺ ἀποτελοῦν τό μυστικό τῆς ἀνώτατης τέχνης τοῦ μαέστρου θὰ μποροῦσε κανεὶς νὰ σπουδάσῃ ἀκούγοντας τὸν Μητρόπουλο—ἐφ' ὅσον ἡ μαγεία ποὺ ἁπλώνει, ἀφίνει στὸν ἀκροατὴ τέτοια δυνατότητα. Ἡ αἴσθηση ποὺ ἔχει τοῦ ἦχου εἶναι ἐξ ἴσου μοναδικὴ ὅσο καὶ τὸ μνημονικό του ποὺ τοῦ ἐπιτρέπει, ἀπό τὴν πρώτη πρόβα νὰ διευθύνῃ ἀπ' ἔξω ἔργα τόσο πολύπλοκα σὰν τό κοντσέρτο τοῦ Σαίνμπεργκ. Τίποτε στὶς κινήσεις του δὲν εἶναι ἐπίδειξη — τὰ πάντα ὑποβολή. Ἡ ποιότητα τῆς ὀρχήστρας ὑπό τὴν δική του διεύθυνση, φθάνει τὸν ἀνώτατο βαθμό τῶν δυνατοτήτων της. Καὶ καταλήγει ὁ κριτικός: Ἐλπίζομε ὅτι δὲν θὰ λείψῃ ἀπό τὸν προσεχῆ ἑορτασμό τῆς δεκαετηρίδος τῆς «Μούζικα Βίβα», ὁ τόσο πλούσια προικισμένος ἀπό τὸν Θεό τῆς πατρίδας του Μουσηγέτη Ἀπόλλωνα Ἕλλην!»

—Ὁ μουσικοκριτικὸς ἐξ ἄλλου τῆς ἐφημερίδος «Ἐσπερινὴ» τοῦ Μονάχου, γράφει: «Τό γεγονὸς ὅτι ἕνας «μουσικὸς τοῦ ἀναλογίου» (ὑπερθετικό τοῦ μαέστρου!» σὰν τὸν Δ. Μητρόπουλο μπόρεσε νὰ κάνῃ διεθνῆ καρριέρα, συνηγορεῖ γιὰ τὴν τόσο συχνὰ ἀμφισβητούμενη καλαισθησία τοῦ Κόσμου. Γιατὶ ὁ Δ. Μητρόπουλος εἶναι μιὰ ἀπό τὶς πιό ἀπόλυτες, τὶς πιό ἀντίθετες σὲ συμβιβασμούς, τὶς πιό ἀριστοκρατικὲς προσωπικότητες! Ριζοσπαστὰστης τῆς μουσικῆς ἔκφρασης, φανατικὸς τῆς μουσικῆς — μιὰ Προμηθεϊκὴ φύση κ' ἕνας τεχνίτης γιὰ τὸν ὁποῖο τό ἔργο τοῦ διευθυντὴ εἶναι: συμπλήρωση τοῦ ἔργου τοῦ συνθέτη. Διευθύνει ἀπό μνήμης καὶ στὶς πρόβες. Οἱ φορτωμένες ἐνέργεια κινήσεις του στραγγίζουν ἀπό τὴν ὀρχήστρα καὶ τὴν τελευταία ρανίδα ἐκφραστικότητας—ἀπό τὸ πιό ὀχνὸ πιανίσσιμο ὡς ἕνα φορτίσσιμο ποὺ τοῦ κόβει τὴν ἀναπνοή. Ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἀποθεώθηκε σὰν ἕνα ἀπό τὰ ἑπτὰ ζῶντα μουσικὰ θαύματα. Τό Μόναχο συνήντησε ἕναν ἀπὸ τοὺς μεγαλύτερους μουσικοὺς τῆς ἐποχῆς μας.»

Louis Krasner, der amerikanische Geiger, und Dimitri Mitropoulos als Gastdirigenten

Glanzvoller Ausklang der Musica-viva-Saison 1953/54 war ein Konzert, das Dimitri Mitropoulos, Chef der New-Yorker Philharmoniker, leitete. Sein Programm war auf schärfste Kontraste abgestimmt, stellte Schönbergs Violinkonzert unmittelbar neben die V. Symphonie von Prokofieff, kühne Esoterik neben den etwas gewaltsamen Versuch, allgemeinverständlich zu sein. Gottfried von Einem fiel die schwierige Aufgabe zu, zwischen den Extremen zu vermitteln. Seine „Orchestermusik" op. 9 ist verständlich, ohne konventionell zu sein, motivisch kunstvoll gearbeitet, ohne unübersichtlich zu wirken.

Dimitri Mitropoulos leitete das Sinfonie-Orchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks auswendig. Insbesondere seine Interpretation Schönbergs war außergewöhnlich, gehörte zum Exzeptionellsten, was München an dirigentischer Leistung kennengelernt hat. Zweifelsohne ist Mitropoulos' Wiedergabe aus Liebe, ja aus einer gewissen Verliebtheit in Schönbergs Musik geboren. Schon seine hochexpressive, fast exaltierte Zeichengebung kommt Schönberg entgegen. Wunderbar, wie er das dichte motivische Gewebe auflockert und durchsichtig macht, wie er dem Orchesterklang Beseelung und Farbe verleiht! Auch der Solist Louis Krasner überzeugte durch die souveräne Überlegenheit, mit der er die immensen Schwierigkeiten des Schönbergschen Violinparts technisch und geistig beherrschte. Stürmischer Beifall rief Dirigenten und Solisten immer wieder aufs Podium. Für den ebenfalls anwesenden Komponisten von Einem gab es neben reichem Beifall einige laute Pfiffe — anscheinend von Heißspornen, denen seine Musik zu zahm war.

Salzburger Festspiele 1955:

Dimitri Mitropoulos am Pult

Die Einführung, dem internationalen Festspielpublikum alljährlich einen neuen Dirigenten vorzustellen, zeitigte in den vergangenen Jahren schon mehrmals überaus schöne Ergebnisse. Daß es Salzburg gelingen würde, als erste Festspielstadt Europas aber auch den berühmten griechischen Dirigenten Dimitri Mitropoulos zu gewinnen, war eine große und freudige Überraschung. Dem nun schon lange Zeit in New York so erfolgreich wirkenden Gast geht nicht nur ein ausgezeichneter Ruf, sondern auch die Kunde voraus, daß er sich für moderne Musik einsetzt. Wie die Erfahrung gelehrt hat, sind Festspiele und moderne Musik im allgemeinen aber doch noch immer recht unverträgliche Partner. Wenn Dimitri Mitropoulos dennoch den Sprung über das große Wasser tat, so können wir daraus wohl den Schluß ziehen, daß es sich nun selbst in Amerika bereits herumgesprochen hat, daß Salzburg eine rühmliche Ausnahme bildet. Schon im Hinblick darauf dürfte man das Salzburger Debut von Mitropoulos aufrichtig begrüßen.

Die Begegnung mit diesem bedeutenden Dirigenten gestaltete sich auch sonst interessant und dies, obwohl Mitropoulos die ausgesprochen modernen Werke dann erst bei seinem zweiten Konzert am Sonntag vormittag dirigierte. Bei seinem Debut am Samstag abend erlebte man indes auch ein überaus glücklich, um nicht zu sagen raffiniert, gewähltes Programm. So hörte man zunächst „Introduktion und Allegro" von Francois Couperin, die Darius Milhaud modern, könnerisch und doch mit dem entsprechenden Einfühlungsvermögen in die Rokokowelt seines großen Landsmannes bearbeitet hat. Hier fand sich die Gelegenheit, an der melodischen Führung der Instrumente und an der Farbgebung zu beweisen, wie sehr alte Musik auch heute anzusprechen vermag, wenn sie von berufenen Kennern und Könnern vermittelt wird. Darauf folgte mit der Zweiten Symphonie, C-dur, op. 61, von Robert Schumann ein Werk der deutschen Romantik. Und hier bewies nun der vorwiegend auf die Interpretation moderner Werke eingestellte Dirigent, daß er kein Spezalist im üblichen Sinne des Wortes sondern ein wahrer Musiker ist. Durch eine überaus plastische Modellierung des Rhythmischen gelang es ihm, die Bewegtheit der Ecksätze in einem — vom ökonomischen Standpunkt aus betrachtet — ruhigen Tempo darzustellen, wodurch dieses Mosaik melodisch-rhythmisch gleichartiger Motive den Charakter eines in die Irre gegangenen Klavierwerkes verlor und groß und bedeutend vor uns erstand. Sehr schön wurde auch das Adagio, jene herrliche Romanze mit dem verschwebenden Gesang der Streicher und dem samtenen Nachklang der Holzbläser, gespielt, zumal hier Mitropoulos für eine ungewöhnlich zarte Begleitung sorgte.

Zwei Eigenschaften, die Dimitri Mitropoulos vor vielen auszeichnen, seine elementare Freude am Rhythmus, den er triumphierend herausarbeitet, und seine ungewöhnlich ausdrucksvolle dynamische Gliederung des Vortrags, kamen nach der Pause der Fünften Symphonie von Serge Prokofieff zugute. Das an sich problemlose, aber doch interessante Werk, das in der Sprache unserer Tage abgefaßt ist, erlebte eine ideale Interpretation. Mitropoulos arbeitete die einprägsame Melodik der langsamen Sätze gleichermaßen heraus, wie den espritgeladenen Rhythmus der schnellen Sätze. Hinzu kam noch eine tief innerliche, intuitive Beziehung zu dieser Musik, die sich vom Dirigenten bald auf das Orchester übertrug und auch das Publikum erfaßte. Der begeisterte Applaus für Mitropoulos und die Wiener Philharmoniker war daher mehr als gerechtfertigt.

Das zweite Konzert

Richard Wagner hat zwei Schüler hinterlassen, die die Möglichkeiten menschlichen Seins mit aller wünschbaren Klarheit ausprägen: Hans Richter und Hans von Bülow, beide berühmte Orchesterdirigenten. Beide aber auch typologisch von einer Gegensätzlichkeit, die sie unverwechselbar macht. Dimitri Mitropoulos steht zweifellos auf der Bülowschen Seite: er wäre unglücklich, wenn im Orchester auch nur ein Ton erklänge, den er nicht gebilligt und hervorgerufen hätte.

Schumanns Zweite Symphonie, das Hauptwerk des ersten Konzerts, ward am nächsten Vormittag durch Musiken von Krenek und Einem ersetzt, so daß die Eckpfeiler der Programme: ein eingeleitetes Allegro von Couperin (in Milhauds Bearbeitung) und Prokofievs Fünfte Symphonie stehenblieben.

Erhalten hat sich auch der Begriff der Musik als eines Vorganges zwischen den Tönen, die Beziehungen zwischen ihnen können klar und gebunden, sie können aber auch verdunkelt und gelockert sein. Eine völlige Aufhebung der Wirkung und Gegenwirkung würde in das Nichts, das absolute Dunkel führen. Davor wird Dimitri Mitropoulos, der Dirigent der beiden vom Orchester der Wiener Philharmoniker getragenen Konzerte durch seine Herkunft bewahrt: er stammt aus der Stadt des Sokrates, aus Athen. Und der Meister der beiden Konzerte gemeinsamen Symphonie (op. 100), Prokofiev, hat lange in Paris gelebt.

Eine formale Analyse der gezeigten Werke müßte wohl von Schumann als dem Ältesten der Meister ausgehen. In der Tat ist seine Zweite Symphonie ein Muster von Form im elementaren, nicht aber im meisterlichen Sinne: sie reicht in Mendelssohnsche Bezirke hinein, womit nichts Abträgliches gesagt sein soll. Denn es kommt bei der Form auf den Inhalt an, der sie bildet, und „so'ne rechte Jupiter" ist die Zweite doch wohl nicht geworden.

Abschließendes über Prokofievs op. 100, die fünfte seiner Symphonien, zu sagen, ist wohl die Zeit noch nicht da: der russische Untergrund nimmt Elemente der europäischen Koine in sich auf, die in der spezifischen Beleuchtung seltsam irrisieren.

Die Reihe der kleineren Stücke ward von Milhaud eingeleitet, der ein Doppelstück seines Landsmannes Couperin mit feiner Hand orchestriert hat. Neben diesem hübschen Gebilde wußte sich Kreneks Elegie für Streichorchester sehr wohl zu behaupten Und das gleiche gilt von der bewegten und bewegenden „Orchestermusik", die Gottfried von Einem als op. 9 geschrieben und erdacht hat. Er durfte die Anerkennung der Hörer persönlich empfangen.

«Ο ΤΑΧΥΔΡΟΜΟΣ»

ΕΙΣ ΤΟ ΦΕΣΤΙΒΑΛ ΤΟΥ ΣΑΛΤΣΜΠΟΥΡΓΚ

ΠΡΩΤΗ ΦΟΡΑ ΑΠΟΨΕ ΘΑ ΔΙΕΥΘΥΝΗ Ο ΕΛΛΗΝ ΜΑΕΣΤΡΟΣ ΜΗΤΡΟΠΟΥΛΟΣ

ΤΟΥ ΧΡΟΝΟΥ ΤΟ ΚΑΛΟΚΑΙΡΙ ΘΑ ΕΛΘΗ ΣΤΑΣ ΑΘΗΝΑΣ —

— Τοῦ κ. ΜΙΧ. ΚΥΡΙΑΚΙΔΗ —

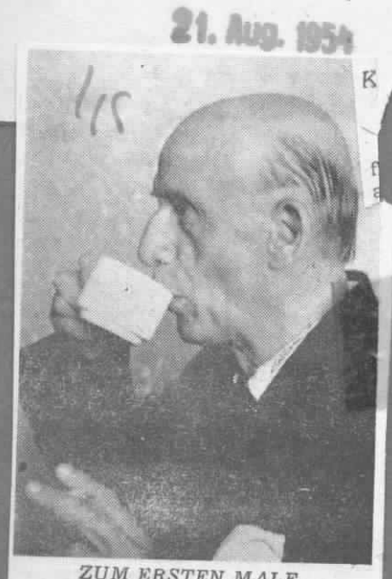
Σήμερα τὸ βράδυ ὁ Δημήτρης Μητρόπουλος κάνει τὴν πρώτη του ἐμφάνισι στὸ Σάλτσμπουργκ. Στὶς 9 ἀκριβῶς, στὴν κατάφωτη καὶ μεγαλοπρεπῆ αἴθουσα τοῦ «Κοντσέρτ Χάους», πλημμυρισμένη ἀπὸ κόσμο ὅλων τῶν ἐθνοτήτων, ποὺ ξεκίνησε ἀπὸ τὶς πιὸ ἀπίθανες καὶ ἀπομακρυσμένες χῶρες τῆς Γῆς, ὁ Ἕλλην ἀρχιμουσικὸς θὰ δώσῃ δείγματα τοῦ μεγάλου του ταλέντου. Τὴν βλέπω τὴν σκηνὴ σὰν νὰ εἶμαι παρών. Ἀφοῦ κτυπήσουν τὰ τελευταῖα κουδούνια καὶ χαμηλώσουν τὰ μεγάλα φῶτα τῆς πλατείας, ὅλοι οἱ θεαταὶ θὰ βρίσκωνται στὶς θέσεις τους. Ἀλλοίμονον στοὺς καθυστερημένους. Θὰ χάσουν ὅλο τὸ πρῶτο μέρος τῆς συναυλίας. Τὰ μέλη τῆς περίφημης φιλαρμονικῆς ὀρχήστρας τῆς Βιέννης κατέλαβαν τὶς θέσεις τους. Ὅλοι μὲ φράκο. Κι' ἂς εἶναι θεόφτωχη ἡ Βιέννη, κι' ἂς ὑποφέρῃ ὅσο ποτὲ ὁ λαός της.

Σὲ λίγο μπαίνει ὁ κοντσέρτ μάϊστερ. Τὸ πρῶτο βιολί. Εἶναι τρία τὰ πρῶτα βιολιὰ καὶ ἐναλάσσονται. Μερικοὶ θαυματαί του τὸν χειροκροτοῦν. Κάθεται στὴν θέσι του. Τὸ κούρδισμα τῶν ὀργάνων σταματᾶ. Ἤδη ἔρχεται ὁ μαέστρος τῆς συναυλίας. Καὶ σήμερα εἶναι ὁ Μητρόπουλος. Τὰ φῶτα τῆς αἰθούσης σβήνουν καὶ φωτίζεται καλὰ ἡ σκηνὴ καὶ ἰδιαιτέρως τὸ πόντιουμ. Χειροκροτήματα παρατεταμένα γιὰ τοὺς νέους, αὐτοὺς ποὺ εἶναι ἤδη διάσημοι, μὰ ἐμφανίζονται γιὰ πρώτη φορὰ στὴν καλλιτεχνικὴ πόλι, τὴν γενέτειρα τοῦ Μότσαρτ. Ἔτσι εἶναι ἡ παράδοσι. Τὸ ἴδιο ἔγινε γιὰ τὸν Τοσκανίνι καὶ τὸν Φούρβαιγκλερ, ὅταν γιὰ πρώτη φορὰ διηύθυναν. Τὰ παρακάτω ἐξαρτῶνται ἀπὸ τὶς ἱκανότητες τοῦ μαέστρου. Ἕως ἐδῶ τὸ κοινὸ ἔκανε τὸ καθῆκον του. Τί θὰ γίνῃ γιὰ τὴν συνέχεια ὑπεύθυνος θὰ εἶναι μόνος αὐτός. Ἐὰν κατορθώσῃ καὶ κατακτήσῃ τὴν ὀρχήστρα πρῶτα καὶ μετὰ τὸ κοινό, ἡ ὑπόθεσις ἐλήξε. Ἡ κριτικὴ θὰ ἐπακολουθήσῃ. Τὰ πάντα γιὰ τὴν πρώτη φάσι θὰ κρίνῃ ἡ αἴθουσα. Δηλαδὴ τὸ κοινό. Θυμοῦμαι τὸ 1950 εἶχε διευθύνει γιὰ πρώτη φορὰ στὸ Σάλτσμπουργκ ὁ Ραφαὴλ Κούμπελικ.

Ὁ μαέστρος Δημήτρης Μητρόπουλος, κατὰ παλαιοτέραν φωτογραφίαν του, ἐνῶ διευθύνει ὀρχήστραν.

Ἐρχόταν μὲ ὄνομα καὶ ἀρκετὲς περγαμηνές. Μετὰ τὴν εἰσαγωγὴ τῆς «Πουλημένης μνηστῆς» τοῦ Σμέτανα καὶ τὴν συμφωνία τῆς Πράγας τοῦ Μότσαρτ, εἶχε κριθῆ ἡ τύχη του. Καλὴ ἐμφάνισι, αἰσθητικὲς χειρονομίες ζωηρὲς καὶ κάπου κάπου περιττές. Συμπέρασμα. Τὰ χειροκροτήματα χλιαρὰ καὶ ἄτονα. Τὴν ἄλλη χρονιὰ ὁ Κούμπελικ δὲν διηύθυνε στὴν πατρίδα τοῦ Μότσαρτ. Τὸ ἴδιο ἔγινε καὶ γιὰ πολλοὺς ἄλλους ποὺ πέρασαν σὰν διάττοντες ἀστέρες. Τὸ ἀντίθετο φυσικὰ ἔγινε γιὰ τὸν Τοσκανίνι, τὸν Φούρτβαιγκλερ, τὸν Βάλτερ, τὸν Κλάϊμπερ, τὸν ἀλησμόνητο Κλέμενς Κράους, τὸν Κνάπερρτσμπους κ. ἄ. Τὸ ἴδιο θὰ συμβῇ γιὰ τὸν Μητρόπουλο ἀπόψε. Τὸ κοινὸ θὰ τὸν ἀποθεώσῃ. Εἶμαι τόσο βέβαιος. Καὶ τὸ σύνθημα θὰ τὸ δώσῃ ἡ «Βίννερ Φιλαρμόνικερ», ἡ θαυμασία ὀρχήστρα ποὺ ἀπετέλεσε τὴν Λυδία λίθο ὅλων τῶν μαέστρων ἀπὸ διακόσια καὶ πλέον χρόνια. Εἶναι ἀδύνατον τὸ φαινόμενον Μητρόπουλος νὰ μὴ θριαμβεύσῃ ἀπόψε στὸ Σάλτσμπουργκ. Ἀσχέτως μὲ τὴν ἐκλογὴ τοῦ προγράμματός του, θὰ ἐπιβληθῇ ὡς μουσικὸς γνήσιος, ὡς γεννημένος μαέστρος, σὰν ἕνας ὁδηγὸς τῆς ὀρχηστρικῆς φάλαγγος μὲ θεϊκὰ χαρίσματα καὶ κατάρτισι μουσικὴ σπάνια. Δὲν θὰ ξεχάσω τί μοῦ ἔλεγε ὁ διευθυντὴς τοῦ φεστιβὰλ τοῦ Σάλτσμπουργκ τὸ 1950. Ἔχομε πάντα μιὰ θέσι ἀνοικτὴ καὶ μιὰ ἡμερομηνία ἐλεύθερη γιὰ τὸν δικό σας τὸν Μητρόπουλο. Ἐλπίζομε ὅτι κάποτε θὰ τὰ καταφέρῃ νὰ μᾶς ἔλθῃ. Ἡ πατρίδα τοῦ Μότσαρτ τὸν ἀναμένει.

Νά, ποὺ ἀπόψε οἱ ἐλπίδες ἐπαληθευσαν. Στὰ ὀνόματα τῶν μεγάλων μαέστρων τῶν ἱστορικῶν Φεστιβὰλ τοῦ Σάλτσμπουργκ προστίθεται ἀπὸ σήμερα τὸ βράδυ καὶ ὁ Ἕλλην Δημήτρης Μητρόπουλος. Θὰ διευθύνῃ τὴν 2α συμφωνία τοῦ Σούμαν, τὴν 5η συμφωνία τοῦ Προκόφιεφ καὶ μιὰ εἰσαγωγὴ Κουπερὲν—Μιλώ. Ἡ ἀποψινὴ συναυλία θὰ ἐπαναληφθῇ αὔριο τὸ πρωῒ στὶς 11 μὲ μικρὲς ἀλλαγὲς τοῦ προγράμματος καὶ ὁ κύκλος τῶν συναυλιῶν ποὺ ἄρχισε τόσο θριαμβευτικὰ ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἀπὸ τὴν Φλωρεντία, τὸ Μιλᾶνο καὶ τὸ Μόναχο θὰ κλείσῃ στὸ Σάλτσμπουργκ.



Μερικοὶ Ἕλληνες ποὺ κατάφεραν νὰ ταξιδέψουν ὡς τὴν Αὐστρία ἐφέτος, θὰ τὸν ἀκούσουν ἀπόψε καὶ θὰ τὸν χειροκροτήσουν μὲ ὅλη τους τὴν ψυχή. Ἐμεῖς οἱ ἄλλοι θὰ περιορισθοῦμε νὰ τὸν παρακολουθήσωμε νοερῶς. Δὲν μᾶς μένει τίποτε ἄλλο παρὰ λίγη ἀκόμη ὑπομονή.

Γιὰ τοῦ χρόνου λέγονται πολλὰ καὶ ἀρκετὰ ἀληθοφανῆ. Ἴσως τέτοια ἐποχὴ νὰ τὸν ἔχουμε ἐδῶ καὶ νὰ τὸν χειροκροτοῦμε στοῦ Ἡρώδου καὶ στὴν Ἐπίδαυρο. Πολλοὶ φίλοι καὶ θαυμασταὶ τοῦ μαέστρου ἐργάζονται γι' αὐτὸ καὶ οἱ οἰωνοὶ διαγράφονται ἐξαιρετικὰ αἰσιόδοξοι. Ἕνα χρόνο ἀκόμη. Θὰ τὸν περιμένωμε.

Faszination einer großen Dirigentenleistung

Mitropoulos leitete in Salzburg zum erstenmal die Philharmoniker

Salzburg, 23. August. Mit Dimitri Mitropoulos, der in Salzburg zum erstenmal an der Spitze der Wiener Philharmoniker erschien, erhielt die Reihe der Stardirigenten des Orchesters einen höchst bemerkenswerten Zuwachs. Der Maestro erinnert darin an Toscanini, daß er ein Fanatiker präzisester Durchformung aller Einzelheiten des Kunstwerkes ist. Von jeder Komposition schwebt ihm ein unverrückbares Wunschbild der Interpretation vor. Obwohl es der persönlichen Farbe des Darstellenden natürlich nicht entbehrt, ist es doch keinerlei Stimmungsschwankungen des Augenblicks unterworfen und besitzt so gewissermaßen eine relative Objektivität. Mitropoulos ist ein blendender Rhythmiker, was ihm besonders bei den modernen Werken trefflich zustatten kommt. Seine eindringliche Gestik wirkt durch eine sportlich anmutende Geschmeidigkeit ästhetisch. Auffallend ist die intensive Einbeziehung der linken Hand beim Dirigieren, welche die Lenkung im Dynamischen stark beeinflußt.

Die zwei Konzertprogramme am Wochenende stimmten in den beiden Eckstücken miteinander überein. Beide Male eröffnete die Couperin-Bearbeitung Darius Milhauds „Introduktion und Allegro". Ohne streng historisierende Absicht ergeben hier zwei Personalstile ein neues Drittes, das von spezifischem Reiz ist. Apartes Flötenkolorit und beträchtliche Anteil des Blechs im polyphonen Tonsatz kennzeichnen die Milhaud-Komponente des Werkes.

Serge Prokoffiews V. Symphonie wurde gleicherweise eine Meisterleistung des Dirigenten und des Orchesters, das sich hier auf ungewohntem Boden hervorragend bewährte. Das Werk verrät bei aller stellenweisen Turbulenz moderner Klangballungen doch zugleich eine gewisse divertierende Konzilianz der Aussage und verankert alle Sätze motivisch miteinander. Am stärksten wirkte das Scherzo, dessen „Marcato" durch die gestraffte Wiedergabe mit dem satten Schmettern der Trompeten — die Bläser wurden dem Publikum am Schluß vom Dirigenten noch gesondert präsentiert — drastisch in Erscheinung trat.

Auf Schumanns „Zweite" hätte man trotz der virtuosen Wiedergabe gern zugunsten eines anderen Werkes verzichtet. Der deutsche Liedmeister ist kein Symphoniker gewesen. Mitropoulos entkleidete das Werk der romantischen Zwielichtigkeit und duldete auch in dem expressiven Adagio keim die klare Linie beeinträchtigendes „Tonschmalz".

Die Entstehung von Ernst Kreneks Symphonischer Elegie für Streicher knüpft an die Nachricht vom tragischen Tod Antons Weberns. Hier ist in allen Stimmen die melodische Prägnanz besonders bemerkenswert, die sich aus dem Reichtum starker Intervalle und einer sprechend geformten Deklamation ergibt. In scharfen Gegensatz dazu tritt Gottfried Einems Orchestermusik op. 9, die bei einem Wiener Musikfest aus der Taufe gehoben worden war. Hier ist der Ambitus der Melodieentfaltung recht eng begrenzt und die Steigerung wird hauptsächlich den rhythmisch gestrafften Einwürfen markanter Bläserregister überantwortet.

Mitropoulos wurde sehr laut und herzlich gefeiert, ließ aber immer wieder die Philharmoniker an dem Erfolg des Konzerts teilnehmen. Das Orchester, das sich von dem Dirigenten fasziniert zeigte, stimmte schließlich seinerseits in den Beifall für den prominenten Künstler ein.

DIE FESTSPIELSTADT 1954

Denkwürdiges Salzburger Dirigentendebut

Dimitri Mitropoulos zweimal an der Spitze der Philharmoniker

Kritiken über Dirigenten können mit wirklicher Kompetenz eigentlich nur die mit ihnen zusammenwirkenden Orchestermusiker schreiben. Nach den zwei Arbeitsproben zu den Konzerten am Samstagabend und Sonntagvormittag, die wir miterleben durften, können wir uns, ohne eine Indiskretion zu begehen, etwa die folgenden zwanglosen Randbemerkungen eines unserer vortrefflichen Philharmoniker imaginieren: „Der Bursch kann mehr als Brot essen! Eine solche Beherrschung der verschiedenartigsten Partituren ist uns seit Toscanini nicht vorgekommen. Der dirigiert ja von der ersten Probe an alles auswendig und hat nicht nur alle Noten und Vortragsbezeichnungen, sondern auch alle Taktziffern und Hilfsbuchstaben im kleinen Finger. Seine Bewegungen — bald scheint er an die Decke zu springen, bald glaubt man, er sinkt in die Erd' — kommen einem zuerst ein bissel übertrieben vor, aber man sieht rasch ein, daß er mit allem, was er tut und sagt, recht hat, und daß nichts, was er von einem verlangt, aus Pose oder aus anmaßendem Besserwissen gefordert wird, sondern immer nur aus dem festen Willen, dem Werk in aller Sachlichkeit zu dienen und aus uns das Beste herauszuholen. Wenn das im Konzert nicht sehr sehr schön wird, dann ist uns und ihm nicht zu helfen!"

Und es ist wirklich „sehr sehr schön" geworden. In alten und neuen Werken — seine Programme waren weitaus die interessantesten des ganzen Zyklus der Orchesterkonzerte — hat der in Griechenland geborene, in Deutschland ausgebildete und in Amerika zu Weltruhm gelangte Dirigent Dimitri Mitropoulos sich nun auch in Salzburg als einer der größten nachschaffenden und gegenwartnächsten Musiker unserer Zeit erwiesen. Seine genauen, die kompositionelle Struktur der dargebotenen Werke und ihre ideale Instrumentalgestalt bis ins letzte „aushörenden" Klangvorstellungen mußten bei dem von ihm mit wahrer Besessenheit, aber verhaltener als in den Proben. angeleiteten Meisterorchester der Wiener Philharmoniker volle tönende Wirklichkeit werden.

Beiden Programmen gemeinsam waren das mehr dem Bearbeiter Milhaud als dem Komponisten Couperin zugehörige Doppelstück „Introduktion und Allegro" und die V. Symphonie von Serge Prokofieff. In der pompösen langsamen Introduktion wurde der gewaltige Orchesterapparat zu barocker Klangpracht entfaltet, um dann im Allegro die durchsichtigste Zeichnung des polyphonen Gewebes herzugeben. — Die 1944 entstandene 5. Symphonie ist das erste Werk, das Prokofieff nach seiner Rückkehr nach Rußland schrieb. Er war dabei sichtlich von dem Bestreben geleitet, all das von ihm in der Fremde praktizierte Neue und „Exotische" seiner Tonsprache in allgemein faßliche Gestalt zu bringen. Dies hat eine etwas primitive Formung des reichen thematischen Inhalts nach sich gezogen. Hier den rechten Ausgleich zu treffen, war eine besondere Leistung des Dirigenten, der insbesondere die traditionellen Formen (Sonate, Scherzo, dreiteiliges Adagio, Introduktion und Rondo) in ihrer Thematik scharf herausarbeitete und innerhalb des so gesicherten Rahmens gewisse „barbarische" Klangcharaktere Prokofieffs förmlich rauschhaft zur Geltung brachte.

Seine Fähigkeit, angeblich Wohlvertrautes in neuer Bedeutsamkeit erscheinen zu lassen, zeigte Mitropoulos am klarsten in der im allgemeinen Repertoire etwas vernachlässigten 2. Symphonie von Schumann. Hier war vor allem den wahren, nicht immer ganz erreichten Intentionen des Komponisten nachzuspüren. Von den vielen in diesem Sinne voll geglückten Zügen der großartigen Gesamtdarstellung erwähnen wir nur die in immer neuer Beleuchtung durchgesetzte Wiederkehr des ersten Sostenuto-Themas in den anderen Sätzen, die feine Vorbereitung des ersten Allegro-Themas in der Introduktion, die frei phantasierende Gestalt der Variationen des Adagios und die Kontrastierung des umgebildeten Adagio-Themas mit dem etwas zu jokosen ersten Thema des Finales.

An die Stelle der Schumann-Symphonie traten im zweiten Konzert zwei Werke zeitgenössischer österreichischer Komponisten: die 1945 auf den tragischen Tod von Anton Webern komponierte „Elegie" für Streichorchester von Ernst Krenek und die 1948 entstandene „Orchestermusik" von Gottfried Einem. In beiden Fällen erfüllte Mitropoulos sein Grundprinzip: die klassische Musik so darzustellen als wäre sie neu, und die neue so als wäre sie klassisch. — Bei dem einen gewaltigen Trauergesang bedeutenden Stück Kreneks ergab dies ein derartiges Überwiegen der expressiven Elemente über die konstruktiven, daß die im herrlichen Klang der philharmonischen Streicher aufgelöste Elegie einen gar nicht an die zu ihrer Hervorbringung aufgebotene komplizierte Technik denken ließ. Und das im wesentlichen auf kühne kanonische Führungen basierte Werk Einems entfaltete seine außerordentlich erregende Ausdrucksgewalt mit einer Selbstverständlichkeit, die auch den der neuen Musik fernstehenden Hörern die Bedeutung der Konzeption dieses Kunstwerkes zwingend zu Bewußtsein brachte. Beide Stücke waren glänzende Zeugnisse des genialen Schöpfertums ihrer Komponisten und würden die Aufnahme ins allgemeine Konzertrepertoire vollauf verdienen.

So haben Werkwahl und Darstellung das erste Salzburger Auftreten von Dimitri Mitropoulos zu einem in jeder Beziehung denkwürdigen Ereignis gestaltet. Daß der vom Publikum stürmisch akklamierte, als musikalisches Elementarereignis empfundene, Künstler für die Festspiele als ständiger Dirigiergast gewonnen werde, ergibt sich aus diesem Debut wohl als unabwesbare Folgerung.

„Primus inter pares"

Dimitri Mitropoulos erstes Oesterreich-Konzert

Wir haben ihn sehnsuchtsvoll erwartet. Die Fama, die einst Äneas und Dido belauschte und das Wissen um beider Liebe weitertrug, ist auch Dimitri Mitropoulos vorausgeeilt, und die Wiener Philharmoniker, die die Proben solvierten, taten ein übriges, das Kommen eses Dirigenten begeistert anzukündigen. a wurde und wird von seinem phänomenalen Gedächtnis erzählt, von seiner unexaltierten Bescheidenheit, die sich auch in der Applausentgegennahme inmitten des sich erhebenden Musikerkreises ausdrückt, von seinem Musikwissen und seiner Dirigentenpersönlichkeit. So kamen wir mit den höchsten Erwartungen in dieses Konzert, dessen Programm uns freilich nicht allzu vorteilhaft für eine erste Begegnung mit einem großen Dirigenten schien. Aber auch da war schon die Persönlichkeit des Gastes spürbar. Er wollte kein konventionelles Programm bringen, er ließ die Moderne dominieren und gedachte im Mittelwerk des romantischen Zaubers. So kam eine Vortragsfolge zustande, die da hieß: Introduktion und Allegro von Couperin-Milhaud, zweite Symphonie von Robert Schumann und V. Symphonie von Sergei Prokofieff.

Die Bearbeitung des alten Couperin-Stückes durch den bedeutenden französischen Gegenwartsmeister Milhaud hat sich auf instrumentationstechnische Ausschmückung beschränkt. Da sind — um nur eines der vielen möglichen Beispiele zu nennen — Harfen-Mischklänge dazu angetan, in uns den Eindruck eines Cembalo zu erwecken. Das Stück hat ernste Haltung, knappe Aussage und ist die denkbar beste Intrada, wenn auch nur eben ein Auftakt.

Schumanns Zweite Symphonie, die auch Musikkritiker älteren Jahrganges gleich dem Schreiber dieser Zeilen (der doch schon bald zwanzig Jahre berichterstattend am österreichischen Musikleben teilnimmt) nur von der Partitur her kennen, ist in ihrer Aussage, in der stillen Kammermusik-Poesie, in der eigenartigen Instrumentation, aber auch im Formalen kaum mehr zu retten. Das Zentrum des Schaffens bleiben eben für ihn die unvergänglichen Lieder und die bedeutenden Klavierwerke. Alles übrige, also auch diese zweite Symphonie, bleibt am Rande. Sie hat uns nicht viel zu sagen. Es geht uns so, als ob wir in alten Bänden blätterten, mit verhaltener Wehmut, weil uns die Zeit nahe ist und gerade dieses Werk so fremd, so ferne ...

Prokofieffs Fünfte Symphonie (1945 in Moskau uraufgeführt) ist ein bedeutendes Werk. Es ist — ein Vorzug dazu — leicht verständlich, packt in seinen schnellen Sätzen (wie alles aus der Feder dieses espritvollen Tondichters) stärker als in den langsamen, denen doch bisweilen der Atem ausgeht. Der zweite Satz, eine Art erweitertes Scherzo, ist das grandiose Stück des Abends. Es wäre zu wünschen, Margarete Wallmann wäre Zeugin dieser Aufführung gewesen. Da hätte man vielleicht zu Honegger und Theodor Berger das dritte Werk für den Ballettabend des kommenden Festspielsommers gewonnen. Ich bin fest davon überzeugt, daß dieser Satz, choreographisch ausgewertet, zu den stärksten Teilen eines Ballettabends zählen würde!

Nun aber zu den Interpreten: die Wiener Philharmoniker hatten seit Cantelli ihren mitreißendsten Abend. Das bewies, wie sehr sie sich geborgen fühlten unter der Dirigentenhand des berühmten Gastes.

Mitropoulos könnte — seiner Physiognomie nach — Religionsphilosoph, Forscher oder Universitätslehrer sein. Er liebt, so scheint's, das Dunkle, das Hintergründige, das Ungeklärte (und hat sicher nach dem Hellen, Freundlichen, Unkomplizierten Sehnsucht!) Deshalb seine besondere Neigung zur Musik des 20. Jahrhunderts (zumal er selbst Komponist ist), deshalb aber auch seine Programmbildung mit Schumann als Herzstück des Abends. Seine Technik des Dirigierens ist klar und verständlich, jedoch nicht allein auf Hände und Antlitz beschränkt; der ganze Körper hat am Ausdruck seines Wollens teilzunehmen. Alles Temperament scheint vom Verstande gezügelt. Auf Mitropoulos paßt das Wort, das der Furtwängler-Biograph Willy Seibert einmal gesagt hat: „Das Auswendigdirigieren glaub ich nur einem Dirigenten, der sich ans Klavier setzt und mir das gesamte Werk, das er dirigiert, auch vorspielen kann." Bei Mitropoulos hat man den Eindruck, er kann's. Er kennt jede Sechzehntelnote und jeden Ton eines Geigenlaufes. Er gibt nicht nur Einsätze, er zeichnet in knapper Handbewegung den Charakter des jeweiligen Instrumentalsolos vor und nach, er ist wahrhaftig Primus inter pares, erster unter gleichen, Musiker unter Musikern. Da ist keine falsche Präpotenz, kein sich innerlich Hervortun, kein falsch angewandter Dirigentenstolz. Um den ersten Eindruck von Mitropoulos auf einen Nenner zu bringen: die musikalischen Vorzüge dieses eminenten Könners sind in eine Menschlichkeit eingebettet, die wie ein Funke auf Musiker und Hörer überspringt und einen innigen Kontakt zwischen Werk, Ausführung und Erlebnis der Komposition herstellt. Erik Werba

6. Orchesterkonzert unter Dimitri Mitropoulos

Gegenüber dem fünften Orchesterkonzert waren neu die „Symphonische Elegie" von E. Krenek und die „Orchestermusik" op. 9 von Gottfried von Einem. Ersteres Werk ist vom Komponisten dem Andenken seines Freundes Anton von Webern gewidmet. Es ist streng im Sinne der Zwölftontechnik entworfen, die Reihen ergeben aber eine überzeugende Trauermusik. Obwohl die Elegie einsätzig ist, lassen sich doch deutlich vier Abschnitte erkennen, zwei dramatische Sätze (der erste und dritte) und zwei mit Melodien der Klage durchsetzte (der zweite und vierte), wobei an manchen Stellen sich über tiefem Baßgrund einsam klagende Oberstimmen erheben.

Dagegen ist die Orchestermusik von Gottfried von Einem ein dramatisch bewegtes, stark instrumentiertes und den Bläsern dankbare Aufgaben zuweisendes Werk. Pi.

FUNFTES UND SECHSTES ORCHESTER-KONZERT:

Dirigent Mitropoulos

Der fast sechzigjährige Grieche Dimitri Mitropoulos, Dirigent des Orchesters von Minneapolis, kam zum erstenmal zu den Salzburger Festspielen. In ihm lernte man eine mit phänomenalem Gedächtnis begabte, suggestiv energische Persönlichkeit kennen. Aus der Werkzusammenstellung seiner beiden Salzburger Orchesterkonzerte (am Samstagabend und Sonntagvormittag im Festspielhaus) und aus der Art, wie er die unterschiedlichen Werke interpretierte, läßt sich seine Hinneigung zu romantischer Ausdrucksmusik erkennen, der eine gewisse „moderne" Angst vor vermeintlichem Gefühlsüberschwang entgegensteht, so daß unter seiner Direktion die zeitgenössisch unsentimentalen Werke besser, oft geradezu hinreißend gespielt wurden.

Beide Konzerte begannen mit einer Couperin-Komposition in der Bearbeitung durch Darius Milhaud. Es war eine wirksame Introduktion. — Beide Konzerte schlossen mit Serge Prokofieffs grandioser 5. Symphonie op. 100 aus dem Jahr 1945. Man kann sich kaum eine blendendere Wiedergabe vorstellen, als die Wiener Philharmoniker sie unter Mitropoulos boten. Diese Symphonie ist reich an lebendigen musikantischen Einfällen, sie fesselt und amüsiert als ein symphonisches Divertimento, in dem geniale Funken aufblitzen, so daß man einen tieferen gedanklichen Gehalt nicht vermißt. Die rhythmischen Akzente im „Allegro marcato" unterstützen den Reigen tänzerisch-plastischer Bilder — dieses Scherzo erinnert an Prokofieffs beste Ballettmusik. Stark ist auch das slawische Element, die melodischen Themen, der Reiterrhythmus. Und raffiniert sind die aufleuchtenden Farben an die Instrumente verteilt. Mitropoulos gestaltete alle Sätze in klarem Aufbau, holte dazu hexenmeisterisch mit scharfem Zupacken jeden einzelnen Einsatz heran, zeichnete beweglich die Figuren vor. Die Philharmoniker reagierten mit unerhörter Präzision und gaben obendrein auch dem kleinsten sanglichen Motiv Klangfülle. So mußte selbst dem Anhänger der klassischen Symphonie Prokofieffs moderne Romantik gefallen!

Moderne Romantik kam auch in den beiden kleineren Werken, die im zweiten Konzert des Griechen die Mitte bildeten, zu einer ausgezeichneten Darstellung. Kreneks „Symphonische Elegie" (nur für Streicher), trotz gestrenger Zwölftontechnik in linearer Anwendung sehr leicht verständlich, hatte nichts von „eiskaltem Konstruktivismus"; in einer vierfach abgewandelten Stimmung der Trauer hatte sie vielmehr überzeugenden Gefühlsausdruck (1946 geschrieben!). Und Gottfried von Einems „Orchestermusik Nr. 9", ein wiederum gefühlsbetontes Adagio, das sich ins Forte Allegro steigert, straff formuliert, mit originellen Instrumentaleffekten, gehört ebensowenig der rein intellektuellen Richtung zu, ist vielmehr einprägsame wirkliche Musik, in der nur noch etwas zuviel Gewicht auf Kontrastwirkung gelegt wird.

Enttäuschend war allein die Interpretation von Schumanns Zweiter Symphonie. Dieses kammermusikalische Werk in übertrieben großer Besetzung kann nur aus einem feinen Empfinden für zartgetönte poetische Stimmungen verstanden werden. Unter des Dirigenten energischem Zugriff zerbrach die Stimmung; die Romanze des dritten Satzes erschien zerzupft in kleine, nichtssagend hübsche Motive. Mitropoulos ist ein Dirigent der dramatischen Spannung. Da es diese in Schumanns Symphonie nicht gibt, blieb die selbstgestellte Aufgabe ungelöst. Dennoch war es lehrreich, daß er das „undankbare" Werk auf sein Programm gesetzt hatte! Und als Gewinn bleibt zu verzeichnen, daß Dimitri Mitropoulos nach Salzburg kam — um nach dem Erfolg dieser Konzerte hoffentlich wiederzukehren.

Philharmonisches Dirigentengastpiel in Salzburg

Dimitri Mitropoulos : Erik Werba

Das diesjährige Doppelkonzert, bei dem traditionsgemäß die jeweiligen Mittelwerke abgeändert wurden — in der Sonntag-Wiederholung trat an Stelle von Schumanns zweiter Symphonie Ernst Kreneks „Elegie" und Gottfried Einems „Orchestermusik", während zu Anfang Milhauds Couperin-Bearbeitung „Introduktion und Allegro" und als Ausklang Prokofieffs Fünfte Symphonie verblieben —, dirigierte der Grieche Dimitri Mitropoulos, der seit 1939 in New York, an der Spitze der dortigen Philharmonie, wirkt. Wir begrüßten den berühmten Orchesterleiter erstmals in Salzburg und konnten bereits der Programmwahl entnehmen, wen wir vor uns haben: einen Förderer, einen Vertrauten der modernen Komponisten, einen Kosmopoliten, den die Gegensätze der Nationen und ihrer „Schulen", den die Synthese von Tradition und Fortschritt anregen.

Es ist ja auch kein Wunder, daß Mitropoulos gerne Musik dez zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts dirigiert. Er ist selbst Komponist. Eine Oper, ein Orchesterkonzert, Klavierstücke liegen aus seiner Feder vor. Der 1896 geborene Athener hat bei Paul Gilson, dem 1942 dahingegangenen bedeutendsten flämischen Komponisten unseres Zeitalters, und bei Busoni studiert. Beide Meister waren Universalisten, wirkten als Tondichter und Virtuosen, als Musikschriftsteller und Pädagogen. Mit 24 Jahren als Korrepetitor an die Berliner Staatsoper engagiert, machte er den Werdegang eines Opernkapellmeisters durch, hat sich daneben aber als Pianist weiter betätigt. Athen holte ihn bald; als Konservatoriumsleiter und als Dirigent drückte er dem Musikleben seiner Vaterstadt den Stempel seiner starken Persönlichkeit auf. (Als ich ein paar Jahre nach seiner endgültigen USA-Verpflichtung in der griechischen Hauptstadt mit den führenden Musikern und Organisatoren Athens zusammen war, beklagten sie samt und sonders den Weggang des anerkannten Musikers und versicherten, keiner seiner Nachfolger käme ihm gleich!) Minneapolis band den griechischen Gastdirigenten als erste nordamerikanische Stadt. Von dort führte die Karriere direkt nach New York. Immer wieder hat er in seinen Konzerten auch österreichische Solisten zu Gast, unentwegt ist er auf der Suche nach neuer Musik, die Aussagemut und Aussagekraft vereint. Rein physiognomisch, wie er uns am vergangenen Samsag das erstemal gegenüberstand, könnte er Religionsphilosoph, Wissenschaftler, Forscher sein. Die Philharmoniker erzählten schon tagelang vorher als Ergebnis der Probentätigkeit von dem phänomenalen Gedächtnis des Musikers, der nicht mehr sein will als alle anderen, dem jegliche Übereinschätzung seiner eigenen Person fremd ist und dessen photographisches Gedächtnis nicht nur die Buchstaben und d Haltezeichen der Partitur bewahrt, sonder auch die Namen der Musiker, mit denen e zusammen ist. Und wahrhaftig, man hatt den Eindruck, dieser alles auswendig dirigierende Musiker ist imstande, sich ans Klavier zu setzen und die Fünfte des Prokofieff oder die Zweite des Schumanns von Anfang bis zum Ende tadellos zu spielen. Der Eindruck seiner Persönlichkeit auf den Hörer ist stark und tief. Jedes Schaudirigieren ist ihm fremd, trotzdem aber scheint er auf harmonische Bewegungen bedacht, denn — so wie er es im Mozarteum in freier Rede ein paar Tage vorher sagte — „jeder Künstler, der sich der Öffentlichkeit stellt, hat gleichzeitig auch Schauspieler zu sein und nicht nur durch sein Fachkönnen und -wissen, sondern auch durch sein Gehaben das Publikum für das Werk einzunehmen!"

Das Programm selbst entsprach nicht den Erwartungen, die man an eine erste entscheidende Begegnung knüpft. Couperins Introduktion und Allegro ist eine prächtige Intrada, nicht mehr und nicht weniger. Hervorragend ist die Instrumentation des Werkes durch Darius Milhaud, der die Harmonik völlig unangetastet gelassen hat und nur mit virtuosen Klangeffekten die Komposition dem gegenwärtigen Klangempfinden nähert. Schumanns Zweite Symphonie, die nicht nur der Schreiber dieser Zeilen (der immerhin auch schon 18 Jahre als Musikkritiker tätig ist), sondern auch Ältere im Zuschauerraum nur von der Studienpartitur her kennen, ist — man muß es unumwunden feststellen — keine Offenbarung. Geniale Ansätze brechen zusammen, alles ist Suche, wenig bleibt gefunden. Der matte Glanz der Instrumentation tut ein übriges, den Einblick des Werkes, das im Adagio noch am meisten der Gegenwart zu sagen hat, abzuschwächen. Nun hätte ein Dirigent, der nach kammermusikalischer Dichte des Ausdrucks hin arbeitet, der die stille Poesie des Werkes stützt, einigermaßen helfen können. Mitropoulos aber suchte das Werk vom Rhythmus her und von der unromantischen Präzision, vom „Stoppen" eines Rubato her zu bewältigen. Damit kam es in einen anderen Blickwinkel, aus dem heraus es schon gar nicht gefallen konnte. Mit dionysischem Schwunge läßt sich kein apollinisches Werk retten, mit der Hingabe an den Rhythmus zerbrechen die kantablen Linien. So ging man etwas traurig und schwermütig, ob der Tatsache, wie sehr die Orchesterwerke des Meisters, der uns unvergängliche Lieder und Klavierkompositionen geschenkt hat, verblassen, in die Pause. Dann aber folgte Prokofieffs Fünfte Symphonie. Sie ist 1945 geschrieben worden und wendet das Schema der viersätzigen Symphonie anders. Der erste Satz ist langsam, der zweite schnell, der dritte wieder langsam und der vierte rasch. Prokofieff ist ein aparter Plauderer, sein Stil ist verständlich, wenn auch bisweilen skurill, die Thematik durchaus unreflexiv, die Harmonik recht gesucht, der Rhythmus voll Leben, zündend und packend. So ist der zweite Satz, ein Scherzo, der stärkste. Das wäre ein Ballettvorwurf erster Güte, eine Synthese von Verfeinerung und Barbarismus. Der geistvolle Musiker bringt immer Überraschungen, Abwechslung, nicht allzu tief geht das meistens. Sein Können aber entflammt den Hörer und läßt ihn in diesem Werk nicht aus. Hier entfaltete sich die Darstellungskraft Mitropoulos' aufs stärkste. Er und „seine" Philharmoniker boten eine überzeugende Leistung und wurden gemeinsam außerordentlich herzlich gefeiert.

Kunst und Wissen

Prokofieff in Salzburg

Ein Höhepunkt der Festspielsaison

Das 5. und 6. Orchesterkonzert waren zweifellos der Höhepunkt in der diesjährigen Konzertsaison der Salzburger Festspiele. Hauptstück des Prorgammes war in beiden Fällen die 5. Symphonie des sowjetischen Komponisten Sergej Prokofieff. Der Dirigent beider Konzerte war der gegenwärtig in den Vereinigten Staaten lebende Grieche Dimitri Mitropoulus, die Ausführenden das Wiener Philharmonische Orchester. Beide Konzerte, vor einem wahrhaft internationalen Publikum, gestalteten sich zu einem Triumph des Publikum wie Orchester gleichermaßen elektrisierenden Dirigenten, des unübertrefflich spielenden Wiener Orchesters und der tief aufwühlenden sowjetischen Musik.

Prokofieff verfaßte seine 5. Symphonie 1944 nach seiner Rückkehr in die Sowjetunion, und er brachte in diesem gewaltigen Werk seine ganze Freude zum Ausdruck, nach jahrelangem Umherirren in der Fremde wieder mit der Heimat vereinigt zu sein. Er schrieb mit dieser Symphonie ein Werk, in dem er die Bewunderung seines großen Vaterlandes und seines geliebten Volkes zum Ausdruck brachte, das sich in einer schweren Prüfung, dem Kriege, befand, und diese durch die Größe seines Geistes, seines Willens und seiner Kraft siegreich meisterte. In dem Werk, das durch sein Ausdrucksmittel diesem großen Wurf des Planes und den gewaltigen Ereignissen der Zeit angepaßt ist, erklingen immer wieder stark nationale und volkstümliche Weisen, die die enge Verbundenheit des Komponisten mit seinem Volke zum Ausdruck bringen. Man merkt immer wieder die Kraft dieser Symphonie, die aus der unbändigen und urwüchsigen Kraft des russischen Volkes selber kommt, die hier in der Person des Komponisten einen großartigen musikalischen Ausdruck fand. Der Erfolg des sowjetischen Werkes war nachhaltig und gewaltig. In den nichtendenwollenden Beifall mischte sich die Bewunderung für das Werk, die großartige Leistung des Dirigenten und das einzigartige Spiel des Orchesters.

Der Dirigent Dimitri Mitropoulus braucht eigentlich einen Taktstock nicht. Dieser scheint ihm nur im Wege. Er „dirigiert" mit seinem ganzen Wesen, seiner ganzen Person, ist von der Musik, die er dirigiert, geradezu besessen, lebt mit und reißt alles mit. Dabei erkennt man die bis in die kleinste Note gehende Beherrschung des Stoffes.

In beiden Konzerten bildet die Einleitung die „Introduction und Allegro" von Coupeurin-Milhaud, während im 5. Konzert als nächstes die 2. Symphonie von Schumann, im 6. Konzert aber zwei Stücke von Gottfried Einem und Ernst Krenek gegeben wurden. Auch die 2. Symphonie von Schumann, unter der Leitung von Mitropoulos und ausgeführt von den Philharmonikern, war ein Genuß. Die anderen Stücke stellten sowohl Dirigenten wie Orchester und Publikum vor nicht leicht zu bewältigende Probleme eigener Art, sie gehören in das strittige Gebiet der „modernen" Musik.

Es ist kennzeichnend, daß unsere eigenen österreichischen Musikdirektionen bisher noch nicht darauf gekommen sind, Prokofieffs Symphonie, die schon in der ganzen Welt berühmt ist, aufzuführen. Dies blieb jetzt Mitropoulos in Salzburg vorbehalten. Kennzeichnend ist auch, daß das sogenannte „Oesterreichische Radio" in seiner Uebertragung des Konzertes es sich nicht verkneifen konnte, die Wiedergabe mit abfälligen Worten über Prokofieff und seine Symphonie zu begleiten. Sie sei „in der Unfreiheit entstanden", ihr Optimismus daher „unbegründet", und ähnliches mehr. Und das nennt sich dann musikalische Radioansage! Wie man sieht, gibt es eben bei uns anscheinend Leute, die „amerikanischer" sind als manche Amerikaner. Den Erfolg des Werkes von Prokofieff in Salzburg — und durch die Radioübertragung ja weit darüber hinaus — konnten aber auch sie nicht schmälern. Es bleibt nur der Wunsch, sowohl in Salzburg, wie auch in Linz, Wien oder Graz derartige Werke öfter zu hören, denn sie gehören zu den bedeutendsten unserer Zeit. R. S.

Ein Höhepunkt – Mitropoulos

Das 5. und 6. Orchesterkonzert

Dimitri Mitropoulos, des weltberühmten Dirigenten Erscheinen am Dirigentenpult der Philharmoniker bedeutete einen Höhepunkt der Festspielsaison. Der große Ruf, der diesem Künstler vorausging, erfuhr zunächst Bestätigung durch Bekanntwerden von Einzelheiten, welche aus der Abgeschlossenheit der Probenarbeit in die Öffentlichkeit drangen: sie wußten von der stupenden Partiturkenntnis des Dirigenten zu künden, von einer Gedächtniskraft, welche nicht bloß den Inhalt einer Partitur mit der Fülle ihrer Ausführungsschriften vollständig innehat, sondern der auch das Visuelle des Notenbildes stets gegenwärtig ist. Diese technisch-artistische Fähigkeit allein wäre indes nicht hinreichend, um die suggestive Kraft, welche von dieser, zu den bedeutendsten nachschaffenden Musikern unserer Zeit gehörenden Persönlichkeiten ausgeht, zu erklären, fände es nicht ihr Komplement in der Erfassung der geistigen, ethischen und musikalischen Werte der jeweils darzustellenden Komposition. Das Wort Schopenhauers, demzufolge die bildende Kunst von Schatten, die Musik aber vom Wesen spricht, wird angesichts einer Interpretationskunst offenbar, der die Wiedergabe des Klangbildes so restlos, so beglückend, so erschöpfend gelingt.

Bild eines Meisterdirigenten

Mitropoulos Dirigentenbewegungen sind klar und eindringlich. Von großer Lebhaftigkeit, wenn sie agogische oder dynamische Steigerungen ausdeuten, von ebenso großer Ruhe an Stellen, deren in Fluß befindliches musikalisches Geschehen keiner besonderen Anfeuerung bedarf. Mit geballter Faust wird die Intensität einer abschließenden Fermata erzielt, mit nicht mißzuverstehender Deutlichkeit fordert die linke Hand des Dirigenten das Hervortreten einer Stimme aus der polyphonen Struktur eines Werkes. Diese unendlich minuziöse Umsicht der Leitung kommt vor allem dem Verständnis zeitgenössischer Musik zustatten, als deren überzeugter Anwalt Mitropoulos gilt und der es im Rahmen dieser beiden Salzburger Konzerte breiten Raum gewährte.

Die Vortragsfolge wurde sowohl Samstagabend wie Sonntagvormittag mit einer Suite Couperins in der Orchestrierung Milhauds eröffnet. Der französische Barockmeister, Liebling des alternden Ludwigs XIV., und des Hofes von Versailles hätte sich wohl nicht träumen lassen, daß mehr als 200 Jahre nach seinem Hinscheiden die kammermusikalischen Klänge dieser Introduktion samt Allegro in prächtiger klanglicher Vergrößerung fröhliche Auferstehung feiern würden. Milhaud vollzieht diese Kostümierung mit Geschick und viel Stilgefühl, meidet jegliche romantisierende Koloristik und wandelt das Orchester einmal zur Orgel, dann wieder zum Glockenspiel oder zum Cembalo.

Sehr begabt ist Gottfried von Einems Orchestermusik, ein nach der Oper „Dantons Tod" entstandenes Opus. Es gestaltet durch den Impetus des die Allegropartie beherrschenden Bläserthemas die kunst- und phantasievolle Abwandlung des Adagiogedankens kontrastreich und fand auch diesmal wieder in der dem Stück sehr zuträglichen Verbesserung des Epilogs lebhafteste Zustimmung, für welche sich der anwesende Komponist wiederholt bedanken konnte. Kreneks symphonische Elegie für Streicher (der Programmzettel vergaß bedauerlicherweise anzuführen, daß der tragische Tod Anton v. Weberns Anlaß zu dieser Komposition bot) fand durch Mitropoulos eine unbeschreiblich ausdrucksvolle klangliche Interpretation. Sie vermochte stellenweise vergessen zu lassen, daß bei aller konstruktiver Kunst des Komponisten stärker die Trauergeste als substantiell wertvolles thematisches Material hörbar wurde.

Überaus interessant war Mitropoulos' Schumanndeutung. Die 2. Symphonie, in einer Zeit seelischer Depression entstanden, gilt allgemein als das Stiefkind der Schumannschen Symphonik und ist somit willkommener Boden für Retouchen. Mitropoulos führt sie in Beethoven-Nähe, betont das Ringende, Grübelnde der Einleitung, bevorzugt sehr rasche Tempi, trägt dem romantischen Charakter des Werkes fast nur in Frage-und-Antwort-Spiel des Allegros durch sinngemäße Anwendung von Rubatis Rechnung. Bei aller Bewunderung vor der Plastik und Klangschönheit einer Wiedergabe, die das Märchen vom pianistischen Wesen der Schumannschen Orchesterwerke Lügen straft, lassen sich gewisse Einwände gegenüber einer vielfach primär vom Rhythmischen aus bestimmten Darstellung nicht unterdrücken, die auch die Konturen des in Trillerketten ätherisch verschwebenden Adagiothemas allzu scharf zeichnete. Die Wiedergabe der 5. Symphonie von Prokofjew war eine Meisterleistung von unbeschreiblicher Vollendung. Unter der hinreißenden Leitung des Dirigenten übertrafen die Philharmoniker sich selbst.

Festlicher Ausklang in Salzburg

Orchesterkonzert, Solisten und Matineen

Salzburg, Ende August

Die beiden von Dimitri Mitropoulos geleiteten philharmonischen Konzerte bedeuteten einen Höhepunkt der Festspiele. Der Ruf unerreichter Meisterschaft, der dem Dirigenten vorausging, sowie fast legendär anmutende Berichte über das Außerordentliche einer musikalischen Psyche und einer nachschaffenden Gestaltungskraft waren nicht aus urteilslosem Enthusiasmus geborene Schönfärbereien, noch weniger propagandistische Übertreibungen. Gleich wie das Auditorium stand von Anbeginn der Probenarbeit das Orchester unter dem Bann einer Persönlichkeit, deren ethische Einstellung zum Kunstwerk ebenso offenbar wurde wie die artistische Fähigkeit einer bis in die letzten Einzelheiten vollkommenen Partiturdeutung. Die ans Wunderbare grenzende Gedächtnisleistung des Dirigenten, welchem auch das Visuelle des Notenbildes stets gegenwärtig ist, kam lediglich den Musikern zum Bewußtsein, dem Hörer aber die klangliche und rhythmische Vollendung, mit welcher Mitropoulos eine Suite Couperins in der überaus interessanten Instrumentierung Milhauds, Prokofieffs blendende 5. Symphonie, Einems begabte Orchestermusik, Kreneks „Elegie auf den Tod", Anton v. Weberns und Schumanns so selten aufgeführte 2. Symphonie ausdeutete.

Salzburger Festspiele 1954

Zweimal Dimitri Mitropoulos

Man hatte es schon vorher gewußt: das erste Gastspiel des in Deutschland groß gewordenen und in Amerika zu Toscanini-Ruhm gekommenen Griechen würde das dirigentische Ereignis der heurigen Festspiele werden. Und die zwei Konzerte haben diese Ahnung bestätigt, besser gesagt: eine Gewißheit bekräftigt.

Schon die äußere, dem breiten Publikumsgeschmack wenig konvenierende Erscheinung, ist bedeutungsvoll und aufschlußreich: ein hagerer, mittelgroßer Mann um die Sechzig, mit kahlem Schädel und einem Gesicht, das ganz Auge, ganz Nase, ganz Ohr — „ganz vom Intellekt zerstörte Schönheit" (Wilde) — ist. So sind denn auch die Dirigierbewegungen des Mannes alles eher denn auf Schönheit und elegante Pose abgestimmt: eine große, freilich sehr gelöst wirkende Gestik, die in dem ständig vibrierenden Körper ihren unverrück- und unverlierbaren Zentralpunkt hat und in dem feinnervigen Spiel der ätherisch-schlanken Finger der linken Hand einen Nuancierungs-Apparat von höchster Sensibilität besitzt. Die Armbewegung kommt immer — bei aller Selbständigkeit des präzis taktierenden Handgelenks — ganz aus der Schulter heraus, und der schier unendliche Zeigefinger der Linken sticht die Einsätze förmlich in die Instrumentengruppen: blitzschnell und wie ein verlängerter Taktstock. Keine Sekunde Ruhe ist in diesem Musiker gewordenen Energien-Speicher, und doch erscheint alles, was Mitropoulos tut, maßvoll und beherrscht.

Denn wenn auch zu dem Intellekt, der in dem Dirigenten dominiert, ein Temperament kommt, das ihn besessen macht, wenn er auch bei Proben (die er ebenfalls ohne Partitur durchführt) den Philharmonikern zur Erläuterung seiner Intentionen ganze Takte lang nur Einsätze gibt und alle Stimmen selbst singt, die Bässe mit den Füßen stampfend: am Abend, beim Konzert, erscheint diese verzehrende Intensität zur Flamme des Dienens am Werk geläutert und der ganze Mensch, sein scharfer, stählerner Geist und sein durch Musik in Raserei versetzter Körper, nur noch geballte Expression, die sich mit unwiderstehlicher Suggestiv-Kraft auf das Orchester überträgt. Auf ein Orchester, das an sich gewohnt ist, auf eine „Eins" erst bei dreivertel zwei „zu kommen", das jedoch selbst nach diesen harten Proben völlig einer Meinung war. Einer Meinung, die sich am besten in vier Worten zusammenfassen läßt: „Seit Toscanini nicht gehabt!"

Das Programm von Dimitri Mitropoulos war ein Programm der Zusammenschau durch eine Konfrontation von alt und neu. Vielleicht hätte man sich das zweite Konzert, in dem Schumanns II. Symphonie durch die Elegie für Streichorchester von Krenek und eine 1948 entstandene Orchestermusik von Gottfried von Einem ersetzt worden war, in seiner Vortragsfolge substanzreicher vorstellen können, zumal die Introduktion von Couperin-Milhaud (mehr Milhaud als Couperin) auch nicht mehr als ein Einleitungsstück darstellte und in Prokofieffs „Fünfter", dem Finalstück beider Konzerte, die Primitivität der thematischen Verarbeitung keineswegs durch rhythmischen oder instrumentalen Witz gemildert erschien. Der Wunsch, die außerordentlichen gestalterischen Kräfte des Dirigenten an einem bedeutenden Werk eingesetzt zu sehen und zu hören, bleibt also ein Wunsch für die nächsten Salzburger Festspiele, zu denen man Mitropoulos hoffentlich wieder holen wird.

Für diesmal ist dem Gast aus New York und seiner kosmopolitischen Gesinnung immerhin sein Eintreten für zwei Österreicher zu danken, wenngleich weder die espressive Krenek-Elegie noch das effektvoll gebaute Einem-Werk in ihrer Wirkung über die Funktion eines die Konzert-Stimmung vorbereitenden Eröffnungs-Stückes hinauskamen. Das Publikum war von der erregenden Persönlichkeit am Pult gebannt bis zur Atemlosigkeit und löste seine eigene Spannung in einem Beifallsjubel, der des Anlasses würdig war.

Modernes Musiktheater ohne Bühnenbild

Salzburger Konzert mit Dimitri Mitropoulos — aufregend und interessant

Dimitri Mitropoulos, der in Amerika lebende griechische Dirigent, entspricht in seinem Aussehen genau dem Typ des modernen Orchesterchefs: groß, eher schlank, scharf geschnittenes Profil, energisches und sicheres Auftreten, keine Podiumallüren — kurz, ein Mann mit Tatkraft und geistiger Spannung. Beim Dirigieren verstärkt sich dieser Eindruck: keine Pose, keine leere Geste, alles Schauspielerische fehlt, hingegen ist bei aller Großzügigkeit der Zeichengebung doch jeder Einsatz für die Musiker da. Auffallend, daß die rechte Hand verhältnismäßig sparsam und eher andeutend eingesetzt wird, während die linke als „Lautstärkeregler" fungiert, oft auch die komplizierten Einsätze genau vorzeichnet und im allgemeinen einem Schalter gleicht, der den Strom der Musik reguliert und ihn anschwellen und absinken läßt.

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS war das Ereignis des letzten Salzburger Wochenendes. Aber nicht nur sein Konzert, sondern auch die vorangegangene Probearbeit mit den Wiener Philharmonikern erregte allgemeine Aufmerksamkeit. Auch bei den Proben dirigierte er auswendig und wußte die Anzahl der Takte zwischen den einzelnen Abschnitten mit unfehlbarer Sicherheit anzugeben. Außerdem verblüffte er das Orchester dadurch, daß er schon bei der ersten Probe die einzelnen Herren mit ihren Namen ansprach. Er hatte, wie er später verriet, wie immer, die Liste der Orchestermusiker nach dem Sitzplan auswendig gelernt.

Etwas komplizierter als die äußere Erscheinung Mitropoulos' ist seine Art der Interpretation in Worte zu fassen. Vielleicht ist es gut, zunächst sein Programm, das stets ausgefallene Werke bevorzugt, zu betrachten. In seinem Salzburger Konzert brachte er eine barocke Festmusik von Couperin in einer überladenen, überinstrumentierten Bearbeitung von Milhaud, die Zweite Symphonie von Schumann, die ein teilweise wirklich recht langweiliges Stück ist, und die Fünfte Symphonie von Sergej Prokofiew. Je öfter man diese Symphonie hört, desto stärker fällt ihr innerer Zwiespalt auf — die blechgepanzerten, lauten, langsamen Sätze leiden bei aller Schönheit der Einfälle unter deren umständlicher, langatmiger Ausarbeitung und dem vaterländischen Pathos, während besonders der schnelle zweite Satz mit seinen grimassenschneidenden Holzbläserfiguren, den verbogenen Motiven und den gewollt banalen Tanzparodien ein beonderes Juwel scharfer Ironie und treffenden Witzes ist.

Herrlicher Orchesterklang

Eine Bearbeitung, ein fast aus der Mode gekommenes romantisches Werk und ein „modernes" Stück — diese Zusammenstellung deutet darauf hin, daß Mitropoulos auf Zugstücke bewußt verzichtet und sich besonders darum bemüht, Musik in der Wiedergabe interessant und aufregend zu machen. Das trifft auch zu. Er ist sicher auch ein guter Musiker, gewiß jedoch ein berechnender Theatraliker, der jede Interpretation auf den auffallenden Effekt hin anlegt und sie zu einer großartigen musikalischen Schaustellung macht. Man bewundert die ungemein präzise, bis ins kleinste Detail festgelegte Wiedergabe, den klargelegten Aufbau der Werke, die brillanten Steigerungen und überraschenden Effekte, die den Hörer wie ein Tiger anspringen, den herrlichen Orchesterklang, der so differenziert ist, wie man es kaum jemals in letzter Zeit ähnlich vollkommen erleben konnte und nicht zuletzt auch den Mut, sich alle Musik für den eigenen Bedarf zurechtzubiegen.

Biegen ist eigentlich nicht ganz das rechte Wort. Man denkt während des Hörens eher an ein Gummiband. Das kann man ausdehnen und zusammenschnellen lassen — es bleibt doch stets ein Gummiband. Das gleiche tut Mitropoulos. Er wendet bedenkenlos alle Effekte an, wenn er glaubt, die Musik dadurch aufregender zu machen. Nur merkt man doch, daß diese angestrebte Aufregung synthetisch ist, und man kommt auch hinter einige Schliche. Man bemerkt, daß Mitropoulos nie eine Phrase gleichmäßig ausspielen läßt, sondern stets mit Crescendo- und Decrescendowirkungen arbeitet. Das wirkt zunächst tatsächlich beunruhigend; hat man sich aber an diesen neuen Effekt gewöhnt, so stumpft man gegen diese Wahrnehmung ein wenig ab. Aber trotz aller Freiheiten in Dynamik, Agogik und Rhythmus gehört die Musik doch immer noch dem Komponisten und nicht Mitropoulos. Er macht zwar aus ihr eine Theatervorstellung, aber unter dem grellen Kostüm erkennt man doch den wahren Träger.

Der Erfolg war triumphal. Mitropoulos ist genau jener Dirigent, auf den das Publikum „fliegt". Auch das über sich selbst hinauswachsende Orchester wurde für seine fabelhafte Leistung mit Beifall überschüttet.

Salzburger Festspiele 1954:

Mitropoulos dirigierte die Philharmoniker

Mitropoulos kam zu den Festspielen 1953 zum ersten Male nach Salzburg, kam inkognito, sichtete, verhandelte und hörte sich die Uraufführung der Oper „Der Prozeß" von Einem an, mit dem er befreundet ist. 1954 kam er wieder, diesmal als Dirigent, der sein Publikum vom ersten Heben des Taktstockes an von seiner beherrschenden musikalischen Persönlichkeit überzeugte.

Das Programm des Konzertes war faszinierend und ungewöhnlich. Der große Stabführer hatte an den Beginn Couperin-Milhauds effektvolle „Introduction und Allegro" gestellt, ein Stück barocker Musik, klanglich neu eingekleidet und zu starker Wirkung durch großes Orchester gebracht, bildkünstlerisch ungefähr so zu betrachten, wie wenn Cézanne einen Poussin übermalt hätte. Nach diesem feierlichen Aufklang dirigierte Mitropoulos Schumanns Zweite (opus 61), die nur mehr durch einen Ausdeuter vom Maß dieses Meisters Interesse gewinnt. Glühend und funkelnd in dem weit ausgesponnenen Adagio espressivo, leitete er mit kühner Verve zu dem mitreißenden Schlußsatz über, dem er zu packenden Höhepunkten verhalf.

Das zentrale Werk des Abends, wenn auch an den Schluß gestellt, war selbstverständlich Prokofievs fünfte Symphonie (opus 100). Hier erbaute Dimitri Mitropoulos eine neue und großartige Tonwelt, die mit gewaltigen Akzenten in die im wesentlichen überaus konservativ temperierte Atmosphäre der Festspielkonzerte einbrach. Wie ein richtiges Ungewitter, Blitze versendend und Donnerkeil auf Donnerkeil in die zum Großteil des bedeutungsvoll Neuen ungewohnten Gehörgänge des Publikums. Aber selbst der Ablehnendste konnte sich solch suggestivem Musizieren nicht entziehen. Suggestiv nun auch vom Auge her für den, der den Dirigenten bewußt miterlebte. Die Zeichengebung Mitropoulos' ist einzigartig. Sie geschieht zumeist mit der ausdrucksvoll formenden Linken, und zwar vom Schultergelenk bis zu den Fingerspitzen. Die Bewegungen sind dabei immer knapp und notwendig. Die Rechte mit dem Taktstock agiert ruhiger, unterstützt die Linke zeichengeberisch und taktschlagend solange, bis es notwendig ist, auch unter ihrem vollen Einsatz das Letztmögliche an Steigerung aus dem Orchester zu holen. Mitropoulos gehört jenen Dirigenten an, die sich in das hineinverwandeln, was sie wiedergeben wollen, und das gelingt ihm ganz.

Die Fünfte Prokofievs verlangt vom ehrlichen Zuhörer sehr viel. Da ist keine Stelle in diesem bis zur äußersten Brutalität von Bläsern und Paukenklang vordringenden Andante am Beginn, die nicht intensivste Aufmerksamkeit abforderte. Aus fast idyllischem Anfang (der Gedanke an das „Sâcre" Strawinskijs steigt auf, aber nur aus landschaftlicher Verwandtheit, nicht Nachahmung!) entfesselt sich bald ein Sturm der Instrumente, der die Klangüberdimensionierungen eben fast bis zum Platzen vortreibt. Hart und unerbittlich hämmert darauf das Allegro marcato dahin, unerbittlicher noch als der erste Satz, aber unausweichlich in seinem wilden, oft geheimnisvoll dunkel aus den Bässen aufrauschenden Rhythmus und neuer Polyphonie. Danach ein Adagio von fast klassischer Schönheit und einfallsreicher, großlinig sich spinnender Melodik. Mitropoulos hat die Wiener Philharmoniker, die er zuerst als zu verhalten gefunden haben soll, zu einer geradezu explosiven Dynamik angetrieben und sie vom ersten bis zum letzten Takt in seinen Zauberkreis beschworen. Man muß zur Ehre dieses großartigen Orchesters sagen, daß es neu bewiesen, wie es sich im Nu auf einen so diffizilen, fanatischen und beherrschenden Dirigenten eingestellt hat und seine Wünsche, aber auch alle, wie man aus dem Ergebnis erkannte, zu erfüllen vermochte.

Salzburger Festspiele: Fünftes und sechstes Orchesterkonzert

Von unserem zu den Salzburger Festspielen entsandten Sonderberichterstatter

Salzburg, 23. August

Dimitri Mitropoulos, der mit Spannung erwartete Chefdirigent des New-York-Symphonieorchesters, ist eine spezifische und schwer mit irgend einem andern Meister des Taktstocks vergleichbare Persönlichkeit. Sehen wir davon ab, daß seine Zeichengebung ungemein präzis und klar ist, daß jede seiner Bewegungen organisch aus dem musikalischen Geschehen herauswächst, daß jede Geste ihren Sinn in der Großform des Kunstwerks findet, daß der optische Eindruck allein schon einen Begriff letztmöglicher innerer Sammlung vermittelt und daß dieser optische Eindruck zuletzt etwas Tänzerisches gewinnt, etwas, das an das genau festgelegte Vokabular klassischer Ballettkunst erinnert.

Dimitri Mitropoulos hat in zwei Konzerten die Wiener Philharmoniker dirigiert, er hat beide Male mit einem von Milhaud instrumentierten Couperin („Introduktion und Allegro") eröffnet, und dies wohl kaum allein der glänzenden Auftaktwirkung wegen. Denn Milhaud kleidet die barocke Musik in das prunkende Gewand des großen Orchesters, er überdimensioniert die lyrischen Linien und die wuchtenden Flächen, seine Ausdeutung stellt schwere Blechregister, prächtiges Trompetengold neben den silbrigen Klang von solistischen Streichern und zarten Holzbläsern. Der Kontrast der Jahrhunderte wird zum Erlebnis: die musikalische Substanz als solche zeigt sich in ihrer Wertbeständigkeit als von allen zeitbedingten Instrumentaleinkleidungen unabhängig. Man möchte annehmen, daß dies zu demonstrieren die Hauptabsicht Mitropoulos' war. Wohl wägt er die Klanggruppen des Orchesters gegeneinander ab wie selten ein zweiter, wohl wird bei ihm das Ensemble zur vielköpfigen Orgel, die auf jeden noch so leisen Wink reagiert — aber im Vordergrund steht die Substanz, der geistige Gehalt. Nur so kann man seiner Interpretation von Schumanns wenig gespielter, als undankbar verrufener Zweiten Symphonie gerecht werden. Weit ab von der Sonne der Frühlingssymphonie, weit ab von der inneren Sicherheit der Vierten, die ja noch vor der C-dur-Symphonie entstanden ist, erfüllt Schumann diese vier Sätze mit einer fast quälenden Aussagekraft, lehnt sich, den Krankheit bereits gezeichnet und an den Rand der Verzweiflung getrieben hatte, gegen ein Unentrinnbares auf und läßt den Kampf endlich in ein unglaubwürdig optimistisch klingendes Finale münden, das man nicht als Lösung, sondern als Resignation vor dem Trivialen empfindet, gegen das die Unruhe der beiden ersten Sätze und die wundervolle, weit über das symphonische Maß Schumanns hinauswachsende Klarheit und Harmonie des langsamen Satzes sich vergeblich aufgelehnt haben. So sieht Mitropoulos das Werk: Eine verzehrende Glut schlägt uns vom ersten Takt an entgegen, ein beklemmendes Feuer, eine menschlich tiefe Angst und ein menschlich wahres Glaubenwollen, Der „gewohnte" Schumann ist es nicht; kleinbürgerliche Enge fehlt, Zeit- und Lokalgebundenheit weichen einer subjektiv gesehenen Allgemeingültigkeit.

In seinem zweiten Konzert erteilte Mitropoulos zwei lebenden Österreichern das Wort. Die „Symphonische Elegie für Streichorchester" von Ernst Křenek entstand 1946, zwei Jahre nach jenem 7. Streichquartett, in dem Křenek nach seinen eigenen Worten das von ihm seit jeher angestrebte, aber in seiner ungleichmäßigen Produktion nur selten wirklich erreichte „Gleichmaß von logischer Konstruktion und Elastizität, von Genauigkeit der Arbeit und Wärme des Ausdrucks" verwirklicht hatte. Diese Elegie mit ihrem hochromantischen Espressivo, mit ihrer in die Nähe Alban Bergs vorstoßenden Schmerzlichkeit, mit den klagenden Rezitativen und den hartnäckigen Pizzicati läßt den Baustoff, aus dem sie geformt ist, vergessen. Sie ist kein konstruktives Zwölftonspiel und will allein nach dem künstlerischen Wert beurteilt sein, „ebenso wie wir ja auch die künstlerische Bedeutung von Tomas Luis Victorias Musik nur in dem erkennen, was sie uns zu sagen hat, ohne uns darüber Sorgen zu machen, wie er sich mit Zarlinos Kontrapunktregeln auseinanderzusetzen wußte" (Křenek: „Selbstdarstellung").

Das Publikum gab sein „Placet" ebenso unmißverständlich wie bei Gottfried Einems Orchestermusik, op. 9, die in ihrer Virtuosität und Dramatik den Hörer kaum vor unlösbare Probleme stellt. Erregende Rhythmen der Militärtrommel stehen am Beginn, bedrohlich überstürzen sich die Konflikte, bis die Wiederkehr des charakterlich gewandelten ersten Themas die Form abrundet und ein Ostinatobaß das Bild kraftstrotzender Lebensfülle entwirft.

Prokofjews Fünfte Symphonie war das Hauptwerk beider Konzerte. Mitropoulos reihte sie mit ihrer einprägsamen Thematik, der oft an Tschaikowskij erinnernden Süße mancher Kantilene in die große Symphonietradition ein, und dort wird sie — etwa in der Höhe von Tschaikowskijs und Dvořáks Fünfter — zu stehen kommen, auch in der Gunst des Publikums. Sind es im ersten und dritten Satz die Lyrismen, die Mitropoulos mit einer bis zum Zerreißen gespannten Konzentration singen läßt, so ist es im Allegro marcato die Mischung aus rhythmisch-unbestechlichem Witz und tänzerischer Naivität (Anklänge an „Peter und der Wolf"!), die fasziniert. Großartig werden Episoden eingeführt und klingen wieder aus, stärkste Kraftentladungen bleiben trotzdem in Einzelstrichen sichtbar, immer ist noch ein Steigerungszusatz möglich, jedes Detail, vom messerscharfen Sforzato bis zum kleinsten Bindebogen, gibt plastisches Leben.

Mitropoulos kommt übrigens im der nächsten Saison nach Wien. Wir freuen uns darauf.

Salzburger Elite-Konzert

Mitropoulos und die Philharmoniker —

Nach den Opernpremieren war in den letzten Jahren Bruno Walter ein Doppelkonzert in Salzburg vorbehalten; heuer trat an seine Stelle der vielgerühmte Dimitri Mitropoulos. Er wählte ein etwas merkwürdiges Programm, das einer kleinen Analyse bedarf.

Beide Abende wurden mit einer Introduktion und einem Allegro von Couperin eingeleitet, denen Milhaud ein prunkvolles Orchestergewand umgelegt hat. Hier zeigte der Dirigent, daß er aus einem außerordentlichen Orchester wirklich außerordentlichen Glanz herausholen kann. Dann folgte im ersten Konzert die 2. Symphonie von Schumann, ein Stiefkind der Konzertprogramme, dem man gemeiniglich keine besondere Wirkung zutraut. Mitropoulos erfüllte das Werk mit dauernder Spannung; wechselnde starke Akzentuierung, Klangeffekte der herausgearbeiteten einzelnen Instrumentalgruppen ließen immer wieder aufhorchen. Dem ungeheuer Positiven dieser wirkungsvollen Wiedergabe stand eine bisweilen bedenkliche Eigenwilligkeit der Auffassung gegenüber.

Als Hauptwerk hörten wir in beiden Konzerten die 5. Symphonie von Prokofjew. In den Händen von Mitropoulos sprühte das Werk; besonders die motorischen Teile rissen mit, so daß der zweite Satz — im Grunde eine geniale Jausenmusik — elegant dahinbrauste und fast wie Champagner schmeckte. Mitropoulos erlebt die Musik mit dem ganzen Körper, überträgt dieses Erleben auf die ausdrucksreiche Linke, die dann suggestiv die Musiker lenkt.

Das zweite Konzert brachte zwei Werke der Gegenwartsmusik. Einems „Orchestermusik" hörten wir vor einigen Jahren in Wien. Die Philharmoniker gaben sich ganz in die Hand des Dirigenten, der dem Werk und dem anwesenden Komponisten einen starken Erfolg errang Tiefen Eindruck machte Kreneks „Elegie", ein Werk für Streichorchester, das zu den allerbesten Schöpfungen Kreneks gehört. Heroisches Aufbäumen wechselt mit elegischer Trauer, echtes Gefühl klingt in wirksamer, dramatischer Auseinandersetzung. Eigentlich wird nur dem vertraut Werkkundigen die Zwölftontechnik bewußt; die Klangwirkung ist stimmungsgetragen, fast impressionistisch. Der pp-Schluß verbot allzu lauten Erfolg, er war aber echt und überzeugt.

Es ist gewiß ein Glücksfall, wenn Gegenwartsmusik in so anteilnehmende Hände wie die von Mitropoulos gelangt. Das Debüt überzeugte von dem unübertrefflichen Virtuosen in der Leitung der Musiker, von dem vor allem jeder motorischen Musik mit ganzer Kraft verbundenen Meister. Daß er zu den ganz wenigen größten Dirigenten gehört, hat Mitropolous gezeigt; welches seine besondere Domäne ist, ebenfalls; andere Begegnungen werden über den Umfang seines Feldes Klarheit geben. Dem großen Erfolg schlossen sich die Philharmoniker, die seine außerordentliche Probensicherheit bewundern, herzlichst an. So ist wohl noch manche für alle ergiebige Zusammenarbeit zu erhoffen.

Dimitri Mitropoulos' Salzburger Triumph

Milhaud, Einem, Krenek und Prokofieff im 6. Orchesterkonzert

Das sechste Orchesterkonzert war ein wohltuendes Korrektiv der absoluten Instrumentalmusik nach all den Belastungen, denen die Musiksprache durch Ideen- und Formulierungszwänge im theatralischen Sektor der Salzburger Festspiele unterworfen wurde. Man hatte die Gelegenheit, Musik zu hören und brauchte sie nicht erst ausgelegt zu bekommen. An sie hing sich auch kein mit symbiosenhaften Kunstvokabeln gedrechselter Schwatz in den Wandelgängen des Festspielhauses, sondern eine Urteils- und Meinungsbildung durch Musikgefühl und -verstand. Dimitri Mitropoulos, der große griechische Dirigent aus Amerika, hatte das Programm, das sein Programm ist, fix und fertig im Kopfe. Ja, er hatte es in Berlin schon erfolgreich abgesetzt und so entsprang es nicht einem Salzburger Minervahaupte, sondern löste sich wie ein leichtes Diktat aus den Händen des Dirigenten.

Da war zuerst das Doppelstück „Introduktion und Allegro" von Couperin-Milhaud, mit das Konzert eingeleitet wurde und das Mitropoulos nicht nur nach Noten auswendig, sondern in seiner ganzen instrumentalen Gestalt beherrschte. Der Introduktion war keine blasierte Gravität, eher eine pompöse, dem musikalischen Neubarock nahestehende Klangegozentrik des Bearbeiters Milhaud zu entnehmen. Dem großen Bewunderer der Couperinschen Grazie, Claude Debussy, hätte vor solcher Brachialis der Bearbeitung geschaudert, Strawinsky hätte eine greifbarere Stilnähe angestrebt, doch Milhaud lockte die klangliche Auswertung der musikalischen Substanz mehr als der Binnenzauber der Couperinschen Persönlichkeit und so setzte er sich auch über eine Wahrung des stilistischen Dekors hinweg. Vor Couperin stellte sich also der Bearbeiter Milhaud, hinter diesen wiederum der Dirigent, dem die überdeutlichen Klangregisterzüge sichtlich behagten und der sie nur im polyphonen Quartext des Allegros etwas proportionierte.

Ohne Arg vor falschen Suggestionen durfte man sich auch dem Genuß der Orchestermusik von Gottfried Einem hingeben. Dieses Werk aus einer verhältnismäßig frischen Aera des Musikers Einem (1948 entstanden!), hätte gleich nach dem milhaudisierten Couperin stehen können, so sehr entspricht die geistvoll-kecke Art, mit der der übermütige Routinier kanonische Führungen, orchestrale (allerdings nicht sehr minutiös genaue) Effekte und rhythmische Belebungseingebungen dem Hörer verbindlich zu machen versteht, der von Milhaud so selbstsicher angewandten Autonomik der musikalisch-technischen Mittel. Diesen gab Mitropoulos als ebenso vehementer wie gliedernder Nachgestalter die plastischen, offenkundig ehrlichen Wirkungen. Ja, manchmal wollte es uns scheinen, als gewänne die Partitur durch seine zur innerlichen Geläufigkeit (und mithin Klassizität in der Auffassung alles Neuen) drängenden Wiedergabe erst ihr verdecktes, dem Auslegungszufall enthobenes Leben.

Um viele Grade inklusiver wirkte die in einem feineren Spannungsfeld nachzuerlebende „Symphonische Elegie" für Streichorchester, die von Ernst Krenek, als überzeugende Trauermusik dem Andenken des von ihm bewunderten Freundes und Vorbildes Anton von Webern gewidmet wurde (1946). Die vier kurzen Sätze wirken gar nicht abstrakt und konstruiert, obwohl sie in strengster Zwölftontechnik entworfen sind. Sie eröffnen vielmehr die Geheimnisse eines abgeklärten Expressionismus, wenn man den Willen hat, sich erstmals auch ohne das Zwölftonkoordinationssystem einzufühlen. Krenek, der sich sonst noch in einer Mulde zwischen Schönberg und Alban Berg bewegt, machte es hier dem Hörer auch emotionell nicht unbequem, Mitropoulos und der Streicherchor der Wiener Philharmoniker sorgten überdies für unverwischte, auch im Zwölftongeäder nicht untergehende Stützen.

Eingängig melodisch, farbig instrumentiert und geradezu problemlos unterhaltsam, bot sich die fünfte Symphonie von Serge Prokofieff durch solche Eigenschaften als dankbarer Abschluß eines von moderner Musik getragenen Konzertes an. Obwohl Prokofieff damit eine Symphonie über die „Größe des menschlichen Geistes" geschrieben zu haben glaubte, und dem Schreiben eine zweijährige Konzeption vorausging, überschreitet das Werk keineswegs die Grenze, die die tiefgehenden Regionen von den frischen, ursprünglich gängig zu Tage liegenden trennt. In den klassischen, allerdings im Satzablauf gegen die Regel gestellten Formbau sickern vollauf romantische, gelegentlich impressionistische Einschläge durch, ohne daß man dabei, wie Virgil Thomson, von einer „Neoromantik" zu sprechen braucht, denn Romantik ist in der heutigen Musik ein Zustand und keine Richtung, sie ist meist immer da, wo man sie nicht bemerken will. Dann wirkt sie neu, wie bei Prokofieff, der nach 1935 ihren heimatlichen Nährboden wieder in Rußland fand, da er zur Ueberzeugung kam, „der Künstler sollte nicht fern seiner heimatlichen Quellen herumschweifen". Dem vermeintlichen Primitivismus in der Formung der 1945 entstandenen Symphonie abhelfend, gestaltete Mitropoulos die Thematik konturenhaft scharf, ließ die pathetische Lyrik innerhalb der klassischen Bauformen durchbrechen, um den Geist aufzuzeigen, der hier nolens volens zu einem Stück musikalischer Natur geworden ist, von der wir sagen können, daß sie nicht mehr primitiv, sondern schon einfach geworden ist.

Mitropoulos kehrte gerade in dieser Symphonie seine hervorstechendsten Eigenschaften als Dirigent heraus: federnde Schwungkraft und Präzision. Er befleißigt sich zur Mitteilung an die Musiker einer ebenso lebhaften wie einfachen Zeichengebung, liebt die dynamischen und klanglichen Kontraste, geht eher ins Dramatisch-Zügige als in das Episch-Breite der Darstellung und sucht daher mit Vorliebe die nach Spannung drängenden Momente auf. Sein Auftreten ist ohne jede Pose, ja, er markiert den Schaudirigenten lieber bei den Proben, als im Konzert, wo seine eindringlichen, mit den Armen weit ausgreifenden Bewegungen im Letzten immer sinnvoll wirken. Er hat sich die Herzen der Wiener Philharmoniker bei den Proben buchstäblich „arbeitend" erobert, die des Publikums durch die frappierende Art, die Werke, insbesondere die Prokofieff-Symphonie, nicht ästhetisch zu sublimieren, sondern gesund und ohne Knalligkeit auf ihre einzig zuträglichen Wirkungen zu stellen.

Mitropoulos und die Philharmoniker —

Nach den Opernpremieren war in den letzten Jahren Bruno Walter ein Doppelkonzert in Salzburg vorbehalten; heuer trat an seine Stelle der vielgerühmte Dimitri Mitropoulos. Er wählte ein etwas merkwürdiges Programm, das einer kleinen Analyse bedarf.

Beide Abende wurden mit einer Introduktion und einem Allegro von Couperin eingeleitet, denen Milhaud ein prunkvolles Orchestergewand umgelegt hat. Hier zeigte der Dirigent, daß er aus einem außerordentlichen Orchester wirklich außerordentlichen Glanz herausholen kann. Dann folgte im ersten Konzert die 2. Symphonie von Schumann, ein Stiefkind der Konzertprogramme, dem man gemeiniglich keine besondere Wirkung zutraut. Mitropoulos erfüllte das Werk mit dauernder Spannung; wechselnde starke Akzentuierung, Klangeffekte der herausgearbeiteten einzelnen Instrumentalgruppen ließen immer wieder aufhorchen. Dem ungeheuer Positiven dieser wirkungsvollen Wiedergabe stand eine bisweilen bedenkliche Eigenwilligkeit der Auffassung gegenüber.

Als Hauptwerk hörten wir in beiden Konzerten die 5. Symphonie von Prokofjew. In den Händen von Mitropoulos sprühte das Werk; besonders die motorischen Teile rissen mit, so daß der zweite Satz — im Grunde eine geniale Jausenmusik — elegant dahinbrauste und fast wie Champagner schmeckte. Mitropoulos erlebt die Musik mit dem ganzen Körper, überträgt dieses Erleben auf die ausdrucksreiche Linke, die dann suggestiv die Musiker lenkt.

Das zweite Konzert brachte zwei Werke der Gegenwartsmusik. Einems „Orchestermusik" hörten wir vor einigen Jahren in Wien. Die Philharmoniker gaben sich ganz in die Hand des Dirigenten, der dem Werk und dem anwesenden Komponisten einen starken Erfolg errang Tiefen Eindruck machte Kreneks „Elegie", ein Werk für Streichorchester, das zu den allerbesten Schöpfungen Kreneks gehört. Heroisches Aufbäumen wechselt mit elegischer Trauer, echtes Gefühl klingt in wirksamer, dramatischer Auseinandersetzung. Eigentlich wird nur dem vertraut Werkkundigen die Zwölftontechnik bewußt; die Klangwirkung ist stimmungsgetragen, fast impressionistisch. Der pp-Schluß verbot allzu lauten Erfolg, er war aber echt und überzeugt.

Es ist gewiß ein Glücksfall, wenn Gegenwartsmusik in so anteilnehmende Hände wie die von Mitropoulos gelangt. Das Debüt überzeugte von dem unübertrefflichen Virtuosen in der Leitung der Musiker, von dem vor allem jeder motorischen Musik mit ganzer Kraft verbundenen Meister. Daß er zu den ganz wenigen größten Dirigenten gehört, hat Mitropolous gezeigt; welches seine besondere Domäne ist, ebenfalls; andere Begegnungen werden über den Umfang seines Feldes Klarheit geben. Dem großen Erfolg schlossen sich die Philharmoniker, die seine außerordentliche Probensicherheit bewundern, herzlichst an. So ist wohl noch manche für alle ergiebige Zusammenarbeit zu erhoffen.

Salzbourg accueille un chef d'orchestre virtuose

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS

L'EUROPE avait oublié jusqu'à son nom. Elle ne le retrouvait que par un processus associatif d'assonance : Dimitri Mitropoulos, Metropolitan Opera, New-York. Et Paris, qui l'avait reçu avant la guerre, se souvenait vaguement d'un film américain de propagande culturelle, où l'on voyait ce Grec chauve, dont le visage rappelle Gide, Grock et Picasso, faire, sans baguette, la démonstration d'une répétition d'orchestre, avec des instrumentistes complaisants.

Soudain, le Festival de Salzbourg 1954 rappelle au monde musical européen l'existence d'un prodigieux homme de musique, traitant son art comme une mission, et les musiciens d'orchestre comme ses frères, dont il respecte d'autant plus la personne humaine, qu'il sait qu'il doit violenter la sensibilité de chacun pour imposer la sienne. Pour mériter cet « insolent privilège », il travaille avec acharnement, s'habituant à la tolérance, à l'humilité, dédiant à l'orchestre la meilleure part des applaudissements du public. Après un concert, ce n'est que lorsqu'il a remercié l'orchestre, et demandé à celui-ci de se lever qu'il se retourne vers le public pour saluer.

On pourra se moquer de semblables gestes, sachant que Mitropoulos est comme la plupart des chefs d'orchestre un homme de théâtre, un comédien merveilleux, sachant mimer les moindres inflexions de la musique qu'il dirige. De même, il y a quelques années, pouvait-on prendre pour originalité excessive, son habitude de diriger sans baguette — new-look de la technique de direction aux Etats-Unis. Or, s'il dirige de nouveau et définitivement avec une baguette, c'est qu'il s'est aperçu que, sans cela, il détournait à son profit l'attention du public, qui, du même coup, s'intéressait moins à la musique qu'il dirigeait qu'à la démonstration plastique du chef. Cet artiste désintéressé se soucie avant tout de ne pas distraire le public de la musique. Et pourtant, par la contradiction constante que porte avec soi l'homme de génie, il est difficile de voir un chef dont la présence sur la scène exerce une plus aveuglante fascination. Une vitalité diabolique, une présence vigilante aux quatre coins de l'orchestre, une personnalité rayonnante l'engagent à une plastique d'une particulière turbulence ; il réunit simultanément tous les dons physiques des plus grands chefs : puissance concentrée de Monteux, souplesse élastique de Karajan, élégance capricieuse de Münch, dignité austère de Furtwaengler... Tout cela passe dans l'orchestre, les sonorités des instruments se modifient, l'éventail des nuances s'ouvre plus largement, donnant aux partitions classiques des éclairages et des dimensions inconnus. Encore une fois, la moitié du public, et principalement les habitués des exécutions traditionnelles, sera scandalisé, mais ceux qui savent lire les partitions d'orchestre seront éblouis de constater qu'un tel rajeunissement sonore n'est que la projection intégrale et fidèle des œuvres, « sur grand écran », si l'on peut dire. Démarche analogue à celle de Toscanini, il y a cinquante ans, l'aventure de Mitropoulos est celle d'un homme qui respecte intégralement l'œuvre qu'il dirige, prenant conscience de tous ses détails, et remettant seulement en question les clichés de sensibilité qui déforment habituellement les œuvres trop entendues. Cette vigilance, cette lucidité de chaque instant ne sont possibles que grâce à une mémoire exceptionnelle ; et c'est évidemment cette faculté qui, chez Mitropoulos, stupéfie le plus les musiciens et le public. Il fait toutes les répétitions par cœur, même celles d'un opéra comme Wozzeck 1. Il considère même comme une sorte de lâcheté, de paresse inadmissible le fait de se présenter devant un orchestre si l'on ignore le moindre détail de l'œuvre à diriger. Tous ces dons, qui sont le résultat de trente années d'entraînement méthodique, d'exercices quotidiens, font de cet artiste de cinquante-huit ans, qui a puisé peut-être le secret de sa vie intérieure dans les longues années qu'il passa jadis au monastère du mont Athos, un chef d'orchestre virtuose, mais aussi un homme dépourvu de toute vanité, et dont l'exemple sera sans doute décisif dans l'évolution de l'art de la direction d'orchestre. Dès maintenant, bouleversant les habitudes, terrorisant les petits-maîtres orgueilleux et les faux-modestes, Mitropoulos vient, le plus courtoisement du monde, de remporter, à Salzbourg, une grande et nécessaire victoire.

Ὁ Δ. Μητρόπουλος στὸ Σάλτσμπουργκ

Η ΠΡΩΤΗ ΤΟΥ ΕΜΦΑΝΙΣΙΣ ΕΠΙ ΚΕΦΑΛΗΣ ΤΗΣ ΦΙΛΑΡΜΟΝΙΚΗΣ ΤΗΣ ΒΙΕΝΝΗΣ

«Η ΜΑΓΕΙΑ ΕΝΟΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΟΥ ΜΑΕΣΤΡΟΥ»

«Ἡ Μαγεία ἑνὸς μεγάλου μαέστρου», «Ὁ Μητρόπουλος γιὰ πρώτη φορὰ διευθύνει τοὺς Φιλαρμόνικερ στὸ Σάλτσμπουργκ», αὐτοὺς τοὺς τίτλους βλέπουμε στὴν κριτικὴ τοῦ δρος Ρόλαντ Τένσερτ, διαπρεποῦς κριτικοῦ τῆς Βιέννης καὶ εἰδικοῦ ἀπεσταλμένου τοῦ ἡμερησίου «Βίϊνερ Κουρίρ». Εἰς τὸ φύλλον τῆς 23ης Αὐγούστου, γράφει:

Προχωρώντας, ὁ δρ Τένσερτ, ἀναλύει τὰ ἔργα τοῦ Ἔρνστ ΚΚσένεκ «Συμφωνικὸν Ἐλεγεῖον γιὰ ἔγχορδα» καὶ τοῦ Γκότφριντ φὸν Ἄϊνεμ «Μουσικὴ γιὰ Ὀρχήστρα» ἔργ. 9, τονίζοντας καὶ πάλι τὴν ἐκφραστικὴ δύναμι τῆς ἑρμηνείας τοῦ Ἕλληνος μαέστρου. Καὶ τελειώνει:

«Ὁ Μητρόπουλος ἔγινε ἀντικείμενο θερμοτάτων καὶ ἐγκάρδιων ἐκδηλώσεων, ἀλλὰ ἐκεῖνος ἔφινε διαρκῶς τοὺς Φιλαρμόνικερ νὰ συμμερίζωνται τὴν ἐπιτυχία. Στὸ τέλος, ἡ ὀρχήστρα ποὺ φαινόταν κυριολεκτικῶς μαγευμένη ἀπὸ τὸν ἀρχιμουσικό, προσέθεσε καὶ τὰ δικά της χειροκροτήματα στὶς ἐπευφημίες τοῦ κοινοῦ, γιὰ τὸν μεγάλο αὐτὸν καλλιτέχνη».

Στὸ ἴδιο πνεῦμα γράφουν ὅλοι οἱ ἄλλοι κριτικοί, τονίζοντας ὡς «ἀξιομνημόνευτο γεγονὸς» τὴν ἐμφάνισι τοῦ Μητροπούλου στὰ «Φεστπίγλε» τοῦ Σάλτσμπουργκ. Ὁ δρ Βίλλυ Ράϊχ, γράφει ὅτι «ἀπὸ τῆς ἐποχῆς τοῦ Τοσκανίνι εἶχαν νὰ θαυμάσουν τέτοια ἀκρίβεια, τέτοια ἀπέραντη ποικιλία χρωματιστῶν, τέτοιες «πιστὲς» καί, ἐν τούτοις, τόχο «προσωπικὲς» ἑρμηνεῖες — ἕνα προσὸν ποὺ μόνο ὁ Τοσκανίνι κατεῖχε».

LES CONCERTS D'ORCHESTRE AU FESTIVAL DE SALZBOURG

IL faut au festival de Salzbourg une certaine éducation musicale et un certain pouvoir d'attention pour s'abonner aux « matinées » de musique de chambre organisées et dirigées par Herr Hofrat Professor Doktor Bernhard Paumgartner, et consacrées exclusivement à Mozart. Au milieu du baroque des programmes, reflet de l'architecture de Salzbourg, ces concerts sont comme la permanence de l'unité d'esprit du XVIII[e] siècle. Grâce à eux, le mélomane, ébloui, découvre avec délices toute une série d'œuvres de Mozart, ravissantes, oubliées, méconnues, inconnues. Et peut-être sera-ce à Paumgartner, qui, depuis des années, poursuit patiemment ses recherches d'érudit et d'artiste à travers le catalogue Köchel, que ce public devra ses souvenirs mozartiens les plus authentiques et les plus purs. Des concerts, comme ceux où jouaient en solistes Clara Haskil, Teresa Stich-Randall, demeureront dans la mémoire des privilégiés perspicaces qui ont su les choisir. On n'oubliera pas non plus les récitals Geza Anda et Yehudi Menuhin, le remarquable concert de soliste de Nathan Milstein, qui, dans un programme varié et périlleux — de Haendel à Strawinsky — a vu consacrer définitivement son grand talent. (On regrette seulement que cet artiste exceptionnel ne se fasse pas entendre plus souvent en France.) Au Mozarteum, la soirée Hugo Wolf avec Elisabeth Schwartzkopf, la soirée Schubert avec Irmgard Seefried, la soirée Brahms du trio Fischer-Schneideerhan-Mainardi, la soirée du Quatuor Italien, la Messe en ut mineur de Mozart dirigée par Paaumgartner... Trente-cinq concerts d'une égale qualité, d'un remarquable niveau artistique, parmi lesquels il fallait malheureusement choisir.

Ici même, en donnant aujourd'hui un bref aperçu des manifestations du Festival, je regrette d'être contraint de limiter ce compte rendu aux huit grands concerts d'orchestre donnés dans la grande salle de la Festspielhaus.

Un orchestre unique

Pour ceux qui ont pu assister à l'ensemble de ces concerts, la première chose qui les a frappés est l'extraordinaire souplesse de l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Vienne. La réputation de cet orchestre, l'un des premiers du monde entier, et le premier par la qualité et l'homogénéité de ses « cordes », n'est certes plus à faire. Mais il est rarement donné d'entendre et de comparer un aussi magnifique instrument sous la direction successive, à quelques jours d'intervalle, de chefs d'origine et de technique aussi diverses que Karl Böhm, Guido Cantelli ou Georges Szell. Ces musiciens d'orchestre, comme notre Société des Concerts ou notre Orchestre National, sont des Princes, ne voyageant qu'en voiture, ne portant jamais eux-mêmes leur instrument, jugeant avec une tranquille assurance tout ce qui les concerne, partition, technique, chef, esthétique, public. Mais, réunis sur le plateau, ils savent aussitôt se discipliner, se fondre comme un seul instrument dans la main du chef. Il semble qu'ils organisent leur sonorité, leur propre sensibilité autour de celle qui les unifie et les anime.

Quant aux chefs à qui ils étaient confiés, on peut, si on le veut, les classer en deux catégories très distinctes.

Un technicien de grande classe : Szell

J'ai déjà parlé de la manière de penser et d'agir de Mitropoulos ; artiste résolument moderne qui éclaire les chefs-d'œuvre d'une façon tout à fait nouvelle, grâce à une technique et à un mode de penser la musique, révolutionnaires. A ce style on peut rattacher Georges Szell, chef du splendide orchestre de Cleveland (U.S.A.), technicien de grande classe ; il a su, comme Mitropoulos, obtenir de cet orchestre un renoncement à ses habitudes, à ses sonorités et à ses attaques favorites ; sous leur direction et grâce à leur personnalité, à la fermeté de leur pensée, on pouvait se croire en présence d'un orchestre tout à fait nouveau, comme rajeuni soudain et dégagé de ses conventions de sensibilité.

Le successeur de Toscanini

Le cas de Guido Cantelli est aussi intéressant. Ce jeune chef de 34 ans, qui n'est jamais venu en France, mais qui a obtenu des succès sans précédent à la Scala de Milan, à l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Londres, dans tous les grands festivals internationaux, a été choisi par Toscanini pour lui succéder à la N.B.C. de New-York. Depuis dix ans, il galvanise les orchestres, par sa présence, son charme, sa mémoire, sa fougue, son autorité, son ivresse de musique. Mais, pourrait-on dire, il semble que sa direction soit plus animale et moins lucide que celle d'un Karajan ou d'un Mitropoulos, et, de ce fait, soit plus comparable à la manière d'un Charles Münch.

En face de Mitropoulos, Szell et Cantelli, représentant, si l'on veut, la technique moderne de direction d'orchestre — groupe dans lequel on rangerait évidemment aussi le Salzbourgeois Karajan, actuellement « en froid » avec l'Orchestre de Vienne — les grands chefs Knappertsbusch, Böhm et Furtwaengler me sont apparus comme les gardiens d'une admirable tradition, celle qui a fourni au monde Bruno Walter, Monteux, Schuricht, Rosbaud et bien d'autres. Il s'agit d'artistes qui se préoccupent exclusivement de musique, c'est-à-dire à peine de la façon technique d'obtenir ce qu'ils rêvent, et pas du tout de la façon plastique de présenter l'œuvre au grand public. Ils voient large, pensent noble, et tout cela finalement passe dans l'orchestre qu'ils ont devant eux. Il ne faudrait pas croire que cette technique « lourde » et « traditionnelle » ferme les chefs qui la pratiquent aux formes nouvelles de la musique ; on sait que Böhm a donné la première audition de Wozzeck à Vienne et à Paris, que Rosbaud est le plus fougueux défenseur de la musique sérielle en Europe. Si l'on n'a entendu sous leur direction que Bruckner, Mozart et Beethoven, c'est que l'administration du Festival, qui connait son public, formé en très grande majorité d'Allemands et d'Autrichiens, a préféré confier à ses chefs favoris sa musique favorite. De plus, ce public mélomane, fier de ses « traditions » et ferme dans ses conceptions artistiques, se croit le véritable gardien d'un secret dans l'exécution et l'appréciation des chefs-d'œuvre de son pays. Que Cantelli dirige Rossini, que Mitropoulos dirige Prokofieff, d'accord ; mais qu'un chef gréco-américain donne une Symphonie de Schumann, le public austro-allemand est prêt à sourire ou à s'indigner. Je pense personnellement qu'il y a là un problème grave, d'ailleurs davantage un problème de génération qu'un problème de civilisation. Chaque époque apporte sa sensibilité qui donne aux chefs-d'œuvre un éclairage nouveau ; certaines interprétations de Weingartner et même de Furtwaengler semblent désormais grisâtres, comme démodées. La génération nouvelle n'a peut-être pas davantage raison que la précédente, mais on ne peut lui en vouloir d'avoir foi dans sa sensibilité.

-uh. Auch in Salzburg, wo die Festspielidee immer noch die glanzreichste Ausprägung findet, beginnt man sich Gedanken zu machen über die problematische Lage, in die das europäische Festspielwesen geraten ist. Bezeichnend hierfür ist ein Aufsatz eines Direktionsmitgliedes der Salzburger Festspiele, Josef Kaut, in der österreichischen Monatsschrift «Forum», der dem Unbehagen über die Gleichförmigkeit der Programme, die den Eigencharakter der einzelnen Festspiele mehr und mehr beeinträchtigt, über die durch die Mitwirkung vieler Prominenter an verschiedenen, fast gleichzeitig stattfindenden Festspielen eingeengte Bewegungsfreiheit und über die zunehmende Kommerzialisierung des Betriebs prägnanten Ausdruck verleiht, ohne freilich einen Ausweg aufzeigen zu können. Die nunmehr zur Regel gewordene Uraufführung eines neuen Opernwerkes — dieses Jahr war es Liebermanns «Penelope» — darf gewiß als ein mutiger Versuch gelten, neben dem ursprünglichen Aufgabenkreis, wie ihn Hofmannsthal umschrieb — «dem klassischen Besitz der Welt zu dienen» —, einen neuen zu begründen, aber das beziehungslose (um nicht zu sagen: feindliche) Nebeneinander bedeutet weder eine Lösung des allgemeinen noch des speziellen salzburgischen Festspielproblems. Und die Einbeziehung des Balletts, das dieses Jahr an die Stelle des vorübergehend (mit Ausnahme des «Jedermann») ausgeschalteten Schauspiels trat, vermag — ganz abgesehen vom bescheidenen künstlerischen Ergebnis — gleichfalls keine Vertiefung oder gar neue Sinngebung zu bewirken. Daß Mozart in der Oper, im Konzertsaal, in der Kirche und in den Freiluftserenaden das Zentrum bleiben muß, versteht sich in Salzburg von selbst. Und daß der «Jedermann» — in dem auch diesmal Will Quadflieg die Titelrolle innehatte — und daß nicht weniger auch das festliche Musiktheater Hofmannsthals und Richard Strauss' (deren «Ariadne» die nicht nur von den musikalischen Feinschmeckern, sondern auch vom breiteren Publikum am meisten bewunderte und bejubelte Aufführung bildete) unentbehrlich sind, zeigt mit aller Deutlichkeit, wie tief die Salzburger Festspiele ihren geistigen Vätern Hofmannsthal, Strauss und Reinhardt noch immer verpflichtet sind. Wenn Ernst Lothar auf die wiederholt aufgeworfene Frage: «Immer wieder „Jedermann" in Salzburg?» die Antwort gibt: «Ja, solange es kein Festspiel gibt, das der Allgemeingültigkeit „Jedermanns" gleichkommt, immer wieder!», so kann daraus nicht nur der Triumph Hofmannsthals, sondern auch eine Bankrotterklärung der Gegenwart abgelesen werden. Hofmannsthals ist übrigens im Rahmen der diesjährigen Festwochen in einer eigenen Feier gedacht worden, an welcher u. a. Ernst Lothar und Rudolf Alexander Schröder des großen Dichters und Mitbegründers der Festspiele gedachten.

Die Gedanken, die man sich über die Zukunft der Festspiele machte, konnten die Freude an der Gegenwart nicht trüben. Auch dieses Jahr war Anlaß genug, sich des Gebotenen ehrlich zu freuen. Den Vorrang hatten, wie immer, die Opernaufführungen, die den Kern des Salzburger Programmes ausmachen. Die Sinfoniekonzerte, die sich über sechs Wochen verteilen (und von denen man deshalb nur das eine oder andere erwischen kann), entbehren der eigenen Physiognomie, und ihren Dirigenten (Böhm, Cantelli, Fischer, Furtwängler, Knappertsbusch, Szell) begegnet man auch anderswo. Lediglich die beiden Mitropoulos-Konzerte, in denen der rasch zu den höchsten Rängen aufgestiegene Grieche durch seine großartige Kunst des Einstudierens und Gestaltens die Kenner und das Publikum hinriß, können schon ihrer Programme wegen (Prokofjeffs 5. Sinfonie, Kreneks Elegy und G. von Einems Orchestermusik) als besondere Ereignisse gelten. Leider war es dem Schreibenden nicht möglich, sie zu hören.

CONDUCTOR BOXES MUSICAL COMPASS

By IRVING KOLODIN
Music Editor, The Saturday Review

TAKE IT FROM DIMITRI MITROPOULOS, Europe's hope of getting to know the "music of today" will have to come from this side of the ocean, not the other. He came to this conclusion after a summer spent conducting opera and concerts in Florence, Salzburg, Munich, Cologne. In the latter cities, for example, he conducted the Schoenberg Violin Concerto with its long-time devoted interpreter, Louis Krasner, much to the wonderment and approval of local critics.

"They must think America is all Hollywood and movie music," said the craggy-looking, Greek-born conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. "They have very little idea of how much musical culture has developed here in the last few decades." There is, of course, always a reason for everything. Schoenberg's removal to this country in the '30s and Stravinsky's residence in California transferred the two leading figures in the opposing camps of 12-tone and non-12-tone music to the Western hemisphere, giving us a much closer view of history-in-the-making than Europe had in the '30s and '40s.

What's Going On in Music: Orchestral Season Begins

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Although more than two dozen events of various kinds have already been offered in the city's concert halls, the opening evening of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Thursday holds its traditional position of marking the formal inauguration of the new concert season. Dimitri Mitropoulos' program for that date and Friday and next Sunday afternoons will be mainly devoted to the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere" with Astrid Varnay as Sieglinde, Ramon Vinay as Siegmund and Luben Vichey as Hunding. The former Lubomir Vichegonov, who has shortened his name, is about to become an American citizen.

the trip. A second New York concert, at the end of the Concertgebouw's schedule of forty-three performances, will be given on Friday night, Dec. 3.

THOUGH MITROPOULOS HAS BEEN an American figure for nearly 20 years, his musical training is basically Germanic, going back to Berlin influences of 1920-30, when his mentors included the great pedagogue-composer-pianist Busoni. He rates Eugen d'Albert as the greatest pianistic personality he ever heard. "His playing of the Brahms B flat Concerto is something that will not happen again," he says. "Maybe he didn't have the fingers for the finale, the thirds bothered him, but what an experience!" (Pianists of today might be curious as to whom Mitropoulos rates as closest to d'Albert in that work. Names are not mentionable, but his initials are R.S., and he is related by marriage to Martial Singher.)

IN LATER YEARS MITROPOULOS got enormous musical satisfaction from his associations with Rachmaninoff, both in collaborating with him as soloist, and in conducting his music. The great Russian's disdain for most contemporary music was well known, but there was one work which Mitropoulos thought might persuade him otherwise. This was the "early" Hindemith Symphony in E flat, which he induced Rachmaninoff to hear. The great man asked for a chair in the wings, so he would not attract attention in the audience, and sat there throughout. As Mitropoulos came off, he rose and greeted him with the words: "No goooood," dragged out as only Rachmaninoff could). He couldn't understand how Mitropoulos could conduct his (Rachmaninoff's) music so well, and still pay tribute to Hindemith. "That is the difference between composer and conductor," said Mitropoulos.

RIGHT NOW MITROPOULOS IS LOOKING forward both to his opening weeks with the Philharmonic (including a concert version of the first act of Wagner's "Walkuere" to be broadcast next Sunday) and to his debut as a conductor at the Metropolitan in December. His assignment will be "Salome," in which Christl Goltz, much-admired member of the Vienna State Opera, will make her debut.

Philharmonic broadcasts, scoffed at in 1930, are one of radio's most solid fixtures.

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

IN 1930 it struck sensible men as a wild idea. What, broadcast a full symphonic concert every Sunday afternoon? For whom—a small, insignificant group of longhairs? That did not seem a useful contribution toward the strengthening of a young network fighting to establish itself on a par with a big, successful one.

William S. Paley had recently acquired control of the Columbia Broadcasting System and he proposed to his directors that the New York Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra should be signed up and that its entire season of Sunday afternoon concerts should be broadcast in full from Carnegie Hall. Mr. Paley was assured that there was no audience for good music, and he replied that one would be built. He signed a contract with the Philharmonic, and on Oct. 5, 1930, the first regular broadcast was beamed to the nation.

The network used for that concert was small—sixteen stations. But it reached into many sections of the country. The guest conductor on that October afternoon was Erich Kleiber. The Philharmonic's principal conductor was Arturo Toscanini, and some weeks later these Sunday afternoon broadcasts became the medium for introducing him and his art to a huge American public that knew him only as a name.

Next Sunday afternoon the Philharmonic will begin its twenty-fifth season of broadcasts with Dimitri Mitropoulos leading off with Weber's "Freischuetz" Overture, the very composition that began the first 1930 concert. The hook-up will be in almost 200 stations, and the audience will be in the millions, encompassing listeners not only in this country but in other parts of the world.

THE Philharmonic has proved to the hilt that there is a vast audience for good music throughout the country. In its 740 broadcasts over the years it has provided Americans with a brilliant cross-section of musical achievement. While relying largely on the established masterworks, it has also performed neglected old scores as well as important new ones. It has introduced to the radio audience such conductors as Leopold Stokowski, Bruno Walter, Sir Thomas Beecham, Artur Rodzinski, Walter Damrosch and Mr. Mitropoulos. It has been one of the powerful factors in the spread of musical knowledge across the land.

Conductor Dimitri Mitropoulos rehearsing the Philharmonic.

How can one measure the impact of these weekly broadcasts? For one thing, the audience any Sunday afternoon is greater than the total of all those who have attended the more than 5,000 concerts that the Philharmonic has played since it was founded in 1842. For another thing, the symphonies and artists heard in these concerts have become favorites on recordings. Thirdly, it is clear from the fan mail over the years that the audience is not restricted to any class or place; rich and poor and middle class in small towns and big cities; farmer, industrial worker, housewife, professional and business man—all kinds of Americans listen to the Philharmonic. Schools, colleges and local musical clubs schedule regular listening sessions for groups on Sundays. Many community orchestras, which do their rehearsing on Sunday, stop for the Philharmonic broadcast.

THE influence of these broadcasts can hardly be measured. It is probable that the formation of the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra especially to bring back Arturo Toscanini to America late in 1937 was in part a move to compete with the Philharmonic radio concerts. It is also likely that the founders of stations devoted largely to good music, like WQXR, drew encouragement from the Philharmonic's success on the air.

It may even be that offerings like the Philharmonic will bulk increasingly as one of the principal raisons d'être of sound-broadcasting. Television has made serious inroads on audio transmissions, but it has hardly touched the field of symphonic music. The millions who are fond of good music remain a huge nucleus of audio broadcasting. No matter what is going on in the television world, they will stick to their Philharmonic broadcasts each Sunday afternoon.

CARNEGIE HALL

Opening concert of the season last night. Conductor, Dimitri Mitropoulos; soloists, Astrid Varnay, soprano; Ramon Vinay, tenor; Luben Vichey, bass. The program:
Overture, "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach-Mitropoulos
Act I, "Die Walkuere".....Wagner

Wagner in Evening Dress

It is perhaps a wise custom to open the season of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society with a program that will not disturb the patrons' enjoyment by forays into musically unfamiliar territories. Such a program can be thoroughly acceptable to all factions if the individual numbers add up to a nice bouquet. Mr. Mitropoulos' choice of the "Freischuetz" overture and the first act of "Die Walkuere" makes for good companions; one is the manifesto of German musical romanticism, the other the end result of the movement. Ordinarily, one would object to a concert performance of portions of a well known opera that is regularly sung but a few blocks from Carnegie Hall, but Wagner permits such liberty and, considering the marked letdown between the first and third acts of this work, it is rather engaging to hear, once in a while, the wonderful music of the first act alone.

But Mr. Mitropoulos made a mistake separating "Freischuetz" and "Walkuere," nice bugling music of the German heath and forest, with a fat transcription of music that is by nature all sinew and wholly without suet—Bach's G minor

Fantasia and Fugue. Baroque music lends itself to transcription, it was the accepted custom of the times, Bach himself was addicted to it, but the character of the music never changed in the operation even when the medium of expression did. When the vast color and dynamic potential of the modern orchestra is thrown into the bargain the stark architecture of the fugue is obscured by drapes and buntings hung all over the vaults and columns. This sort of thing is as much old hat as the operatic transcriptions for piano fashionable in mid-Victorian concerts. One wonders what is eating our musicians. The organists play transcriptions of symphonies while the symphony conductors belabor organ fugues to bring forth sounds that would make a steam calliope blush.

Mr. Mitropoulos is a great conductor with an especially developed sense for the dramatic. His Wagner was fiery and the orchestra responded to his demands. He is particularly adept at seizing upon sudden changes, such as the rapid accelerations and violent outbursts that characterize the Wagnerian orchestral fabric. He likes to bite into the music and does so with a firm jaw (albeit with a somewhat less firm beat), but the delicate passages seemed a bit perfunctory, at other times overdone. Yet if it were not for the poetic passages—and they are by no means rare—Wagner would be difficult to take.

Granted that those female warriors, armed to the teeth and riding on their steeds with the corpses of some puny males slung across their saddles are rather disconcerting. Why, Bruennhilde takes a two-fisted sword with her even when she retires for the night. But in their relaxed moments some of them can be women with hearts, and the cantankerous gods may stop their eternal bickering and the men pause in their weird plotting to act like plausible dramatic figures. It is very important to catch them in their moods of human impersonation with appropriate musical accents and inflections, to provide a balance for the somewhat trying heroics that dominate the "Ring."

When all is said, the performance was moderately enjoyable but not entirely free of the ludicrous. There is something vaguely incongruous about these figures from the Nordic saga, standing in front of the orchestra in evening dress, waiting for their turn to chime in the proceedings while the conductor lashes the air around them.

Astrid Varnay, a distinguished daughter of the vanishing tribe of Wagnerian sopranos, sang affectingly although this was not one of her best days. The transition from pity to love was not well enough projected. Ramon Vinay, whose voice has the good quality that comes from being moved upstairs from the baritone region, stayed with the character he was portraying and rose from the depths of despair to an assertive and confident mood without engaging in Heldetenorics. Luben Vichey, who took the part of the Evil One, was authoritatively sinister but there was not too much variety in his demeanor and his robust voice was not always under control.

Wagner's Walkuere By Philharmonic

By HARRIET JOHNSON

Act I of Wagner's "Die Walkuere," abounding in incest and aglow with splendid music, was performed with matching splendor by the Philharmonic-Symphony last night at its opening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. The work was presented in concert form.

When Siegmund and Sieglinde discover that they are twin brother and sister, and from that point on launch into sumptuous love music, the excitement builds to a magnificent musical climax which rarely is performed with justice in the opera house.

With Dimitri Mitropoulos, Philharmonic musical director, however, leading his first-class ensemble in fiery mood, and with an extraordinary trio of singers onstage the result was something, to say the least.

To begin with, the Philharmonic audience was treated to a set of lovers that looked as well as sang their parts. Astrid Varnay, resplendent in flash-colored gown and scarlet-velvet scarf sang Sieglinde with a vocal beauty which was as limpid as her figure appeared slim, at least from where I was sitting.

Whether she really is below 150 is not important. She gave the illusion.

Towering over her was handsome, curly-headed Ramon Vinay, who has not been too vocally successful recently in his roles at the Metropolitan Opera; but who last night seemed to have recovered what last season appeared to be a lost voice. Though sometimes his soft tones appeared not well focused, he was impressive in his louder tones to the point of being exciting. His final climactic "A," was a climax in fact.

Last but not least was Luben Vichey, Met bass, who sang Hunding with a full ringing vocalism that stamped him as one of the most important singers of his type before the public today.

Towering over everybody, however, was Mitropoulos, who kept the orchestra discreet when the singers had a chance to pour forth but who inspired the orchestra to magnificence when its opportunities came, of which there were many.

There is no doubt that the Philharmonic maestro has a kind of genius with dramatic music and his debut at the Met opera this season is eagerly anticipated.

Astrid Varnay, Ramon Vinay and Luben Vichey Sing—Mitropoulos Conducts

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, Astrid Varnay, Ramon Vinay and Luben Vichey, soloists. At Carnegie Hall.
Overture to Der Freischuetz.....Weber
Fantasia and Fugue in G minor.....Bach-Mitropoulos
Act I, Die Walkuere.....Wagner

By OLIN DOWNES

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, Dimitri Mitropoulos conductor, opened its 113th season last night in Carnegie Hall, with a program, curiously compounded, and presented with a curious variety of interpretive effects within the frame of brilliant virtuoso performances.

The orchestra was in uncommonly fine fettle, supplying every variety of nuance, color, technical precision and sonority that the masterful conductor desired. Perhaps it is one of Mr. Mitropoulos' fascinations that one never knows precisely what to expect of him. We have heard him perform the "Freischuetz" overture in a vein of extreme simplicity and understatement that changed its color scheme and scale of sonorities in a way that was neoclassic and that gave the wonderful old piece a charm that was original and legitimate.

But last night he played the introduction with a swollen solemnity that was out of proportion to its simple and naive mood. Nor was this impression lessened by the big crescendo of the opening sustained C, an effect that is not the conception of the composer but a more modern virtuoso idea, descended, we believe, from Nikisch. Per contra, the main body of the overture, again under-played, lacked Weber's fiery chivalry and flourish, or the wildness of the famous passage of the solo clarinet over the vibrating strings, after the call of the horns.

The most impressive performance of the evening was that of Mr. Mitropoulos' orchestration of Bach's great G minor organ fantasia and fugue. It is a remarkably skillful and imaginative transcription, one that suggests the organ style of Bach's thought, while utilizing orchestral resources of which Bach had not the tithe at his disposal. The instrumentation is exceptionally clean-cut, both in the voice leading and in the great baroque tone-masses of the introduction.

In the excitement of the fugue approaching its climax Mr. Mitropoulos over-drove the orchestra, which is the only reservation that this writer feels about the superb effect. It is fashionable today to look down the nose at orchestral transcriptions of Bach's clavier and organ pieces—regardless of whether the transcriptions are good or bad; this in face of the fact that Bach was one of the most indefatigable of transcribers of his own works as well as those of others.

And there is a more important fact—dare we utter it?—that the orchestra can do more justice in certain respects to the wealth and power of Bach's music than the organ can, when a musician as remarkable as Mr. Mitropoulos takes a hand in scoring for it. And we may be sure that if Bach had had at his disposal such an orchestra as the Philharmonic-Symphony to work with, we should have heard some stupendous effects, direct from the composer.

The feature of the concert that represented to many a special attraction, while others would as certainly deplore its esthetics, was the programming in concert form, with Astrid Varnay, Ramon Vinay, and Luben Vichey, as the singers of the entire first act of "Die Walkuere." There was reason for this anticipation. There is no question that Mr. Mitropoulos, by aptitude and temperament, is particularly in his element in dramatic music. One has only to recall works as far apart and demanding as much from the chief interpreter as Strauss' "Electra" and Berg's "Wozzeck," both of which he has done here in concert form, to know what might be expected of him with Wagner.

But here again was an incalculable element to deal with. In detail the performance was outstanding. What would not one give to hear such clear and salient orchestral utterance on a Wagnerian night at the Metropolitan. But the very thing that is characteristic of Mr. Mitropoulos in his incandescent moods, that is to say, his potential sweep of line and power of climax, was last night absent. The tempi were prevailingly too deliberate. There was the effect of a series of episodes, not too cohesively bound together.

Perhaps this was a matter of the moment. Such slackings can occur with the best regulated interpreters, at moments which are unpredictable. The singers were highly competent,, though Mr. Vinay is not exactly a "heldentenor," or Miss Varnay invariably in her smoothest vocal form. But all sang intelligently, authoritatively and well, including the excellent bass, Mr. Wichey. But the first act of "Wallkuere" should start and continue in one long unbroken line, laden with constantly accumulating excitement, from the first note to the last, and this, for some reason, was lacking.

Philharmonic-Symphony Concert:

Fine Opening Program

By MILES KASTENDIECK

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS and the Philharmonic-Symphony opened the society's 113th season with a German program in Carnegie Hall last night.

Though Act 1 of Wagner's opera "Die Walkuere" was featured, the best performance of the evening was accorded Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G Minor.

What the Bach was doing in an operatic lineup that began with the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz" may be dismissed as curious programing.

That it brought forth the most integrated sounds from the orchestra may be attributed to the rapport between conductor and players as well as the arrangement of the music made by Mitropoulos himself.

As transcriptions go, this one qualifies as better than most. It reflects an intellectual grasp of both the music and instrumental counterpoint. It reveals resourcefulness in making the orchestra sound.

Because some of the pages of the Fugue grow tenuous, the arrangement of the Fantasia fares better. Beyond this Bach himself takes over.

It was good to hear the Wagner played and sung well, but the performance lacked distinction. The ebb and the flow of the music, its depth of romantic feeling and its innate intensity, yielded to straight-forwardness of presentation.

Deliberateness of tempo curbed the surging quality of the music. The interpretation sounded more old-fashioned than enlightened.

With Astrid Varnay as Sieglinde, Ramon Vinay as Siegmund, and Luben Vichey (born Lubomir Vichegonov) as Hunding, the roles were sung by a thoroughly experienced Metropolitan cast. To this listener they offered no special inspiration but courted much respect.

What would have happened had some leavening quality been at work in the performance may actually become the story of repeat performances this afternoon and Sunday. Incidentally this one would have profited by the trappings of operatic production.

The Weber proved to be a warmup number.

Philharmonic Opens Season at Carnegie

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The music season 1954-55 can be said to have begun last evening in Carnegie Hall. Officially, too, for the Philharmonic-Symphony has regularly been putting the stamp on such inaugurals with each initial concert in Carnegie Hall.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, of course, was on the podium. He conducted three works, none with the score before him. They were the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," the Bach Fantasia and Fugue in G minor (transcribed by Mr. Mitropoulos) and the first act from Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

Changes on the Stage.

Now there is nothing especially novel about that program, excepting the transcribed Bach, perhaps, which we'll get to in a minute. But some minor changes had been made on the stage. Air-conditioning portholes faced us from the back wall; fiberglass curtains graced the side walls, and the musicians seemed to be flooded in more light than previously.

First of all, it should be reported that the orchestra sounded very well, indeed. For quality of sound alone, it deserved much praise. Also, as it happened, the Philharmonic played well. There was poise, cleanness, clarity. Only here and there did one note any departure from grace.

Favors Brilliant Sound.

Mr. Mitropoulos' transcription of the much transcribed Bach Fantasia and Fugue favors the brilliant sound, big speech, melodic passagework of a romantic, even sentimental, nature. In the Fantasia, that is. On the other hand, the Fugue could have had greater regularity in the tempo.

It may be that the spirit of Bach was not entirely present in this transcription. If so, however, that didn't hurt the piece as a piece. It's excellent, authentic or not, and the orchestration, a bit different in sounds and effects from the usual run of such, is often exciting.

In the Wagner excerpt, three artists of the Metropolitan were soloists—Astrid Varnay, Ramon Vinay and Luben Vichey. They represented, respectively, Sieglinde, Siegmund and Hunding.

Conductor Generously Endowed.

We know full well by now that Mr. Mitropoulos is a man possessing several fortes. One of these is his conducting of opera. Nor did he let us down last evening. For despite the several stretches of dullness—made the more so by a stage bare of operatic trappings—the batonist really got into the music, proving again how generously endowed he is.

The singers all acquitted themselves well. And Mr. Vinay, I thought, sounded lots better than he has been of recent seasons. For the rest, there was noisy applause from a capacity audience.

FAMILIAR MUSIC AT CARNEGIE HALL

Brahms and Mendelssohn Played by Philharmonic—Francescatti Is Soloist

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Zino Francescatti, violinist. At Carnegie Hall.
Variations on a Theme of Haydn...Brahms
Violin Concerto.....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2.....Brahms

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall last night was as comfortable as a visit with good, old friends. With the music of Brahms and Mendelssohn on the program, there were no surprises except the ever-recurring wonder of how rewarding these familiar scores can be.

Zino Francescatti was the evening's soloist. His performance of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto was a thing of distinction. The French violinist played with that blend of elegance and taste that is a fixed trade-mark of his style. The beguiling song of the slow movement was like a sustained, tender meditation. One was scarcely conscious of bow on strings, one's ears were held steadily by the heart of the music. And the end movements had the spirit, and character they needed.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who is not only brave but sure, conducted the supporting orchestra without score. He and the Philharmonic gave Mr. Francescatti orchestral backing worthy of his performance. There were several places in the first movement where the tutti were somewhat overbearing and gave the soloist more contention than the law required. Otherwise, orchestra and soloist played like a fine team.

The rest of the evening was devoted to Brahms. Mr. Mitropoulos may not be the beau ideal of all Brahmsians, but he does a careful, workmanlike job with this music. The orchestra was in fine fettle last night and provided Brahms with the dark, glowing colors his music requires.

The audience was large and seemed to be pleased with the program and the performances. It gave Mr. Francescatti, Mr. Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic lively receptions. If there was no novelty to write home about, that did not seem to disturb the paying customers.

Francescatti Makes Old Concerto New

Zino Francescatti made Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto sound like a newly minted masterpiece in Carnegie Hall last night.

Appearing as soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony, the noted French fiddler reeled off the old classic with the glow and excitement of a fresh discovery.

Dimitri Mitropoulos joined him sturdily in the adventure, and added two Brahms readings of remarkable beauty and power—the "Haydn" variations and the Second Symphony.

The Mendelssohn concerto nestled snugly between the two Brahms classics on a program that was just as perfectly put together as it was played. A large audience seemed to be in complete agreement on that point.

The Philharmonic

Well known music was played by well known musicians in last night's concert of the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, where Zino Francescatti was the soloist in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor. Dimitri Mitropoulos and his instrumentalists bracketed it with the works of Brahms, the Variations on a Theme by Haydn and the Second Symphony, in D major. Mr. Francescatti's performance of the concerto gave a sense of interpretative sympathy as well as of technical mastery and fluency; it avoided sentimentality, but was persuasive in its realization of the freshness and lyricism of the music. The violinist was in good tonal form, with a quality that was particularly ingrating in the poetically played andante, and the orchestral cooperation was admirably proportioned.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra gave the Variations a rather routined beginning, but the performance of its later sections gained in flexibility, nuance and range of moods. In the generally revealing interpretation of the symphony the conductor realized that this is not music to be hurried over, and the spaciousness of his reading was appealing in its general plan while not in all details ;there were times in the first and third movements when momentum slackened a little unduly. The adagio, however, combined breadth with the necessary sense of motion.

Shostakovich Symphony No. 10 a Turkey

By DOUGLAS WATT

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

It is probably unfair to pass judgment on Dmitri Shostakovich's Symphony No. 10, which was given its American premiere last night at Carnegie Hall by the Philharmonic-Symphony, after a single hearing. But I guess I'll have to, because I don't expect ever to hear it again. I doubt that many of us will hear it again.

Although it is an ambitious work, running to a little over 45 minutes in last night's painstaking performance, conducted from memory by Dimitri Mitripoulos, this is definitely one of the 48-year-old Russian symphonist's least inspired efforts. Opinion was reportedly divided after its premiere in Leningrad last December. Scanning last night's large audience, I'd say attention was divided here.

Repeating Himself

Shostakovich, who has proved himself a worthy symphonist with at least a few of his earlier works, is up to several of his old tricks here but he seems to be doing them by rote. By means of a dawdling beginning, a meandering course and the composer's familiar device of hammering out a trite little phrase until, like a simple word looked at for too long, it loses all meaning, Shostakovich has managed to stretch his first movement out to 20 minutes. But the second, though only four minutes in length, is just as bad in a different way. Obviously intending to change pace here with one of his dashing, breathtaking scherzos, he succeeds merely in being bombastic.

In the third movement he gets down to serious business with a very slow section sandwiched between two livelier ones, but it is all pretty hollow. So is the final movement, which opens with an andante theme, lyrical in character but rather dull, and leads into some more of his noisy repetitions, the strings dancing madly and foolishly while the brass screams and roars at them.

Shostakovich's Work Has U. S. Premiere

PHILHARMONIC - SYMPHONY. Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting. Mischa Elman soloist. At Carnegie Hall.
Overture, Colas Greugnon.....Kabalevsky
Symphony No. 10 (first United States performance).....Shostakovich
Violin Concerto.....Tchaikovsky

By OLIN DOWNES

TWO events gave special significance to the concert that Dimitri Mitropoulos directed as conductor of the New York Philharmonic - Symphony concert last night in Carnegie Hall. One was the first American performance of Shostakovich's Tenth Symphony. The other was the appearance as soloist, on the fiftieth anniversary to a day of his debut outside of Russia with the Berlin Philharmonic, of Mischa Elman, a sovereign master of his instrument.

The performance of the symphony was momentous, for this is obviously the strongest and greatest symphony that Shostakovich has yet produced. One would say that it is the first score in the symphonic form that proclaims the complete independence and integration of his genius.

He has appeared in earlier works as a singularly gifted, yet split creative personality. No doubt the creative problem was complicated rather than clarified for him by the fact that through special circumstances and events he became virtually the composer laureate of present-day Russia. In that capacity he had to compose, for example, his Seventh Symphony, the war symphony, which then symbolized the conflict and the struggle in which Russia and America were mutually engaged. It was excellent musical propaganda, but a second-class symphony. The inequalities, superficialities and weaknesses of the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies, which soon followed it, were all too apparent.

Precious persons, neo-classicists, perhaps even those musical devotees who dub themselves "intellectuals," will not be comfortable in the presence of this powerful, outspoken and at times grossly impolite symphony. But here is music with contour and force, with grand and broad lines, emotional tensions, and sincere and unconditional statement.

The feeling is matched by the strength and logic of the form. The dimensions, especially of the somber first movement, are spacious, and this first movement contains in germination all the main themes and developments of the movements that follow. And we know of no other composer producing today who would dare to write such an unhurried, and inevitably developing movement.

The composer's method is one of broad brush strokes. For the most part it is in two-part counterpoint, with many instruments doubling the notes of each part, which means emphasis, and strong, sometimes shadowy, sometimes strident, contrasts of tone color. It is a style that goes directly to the mark, without sophistications to soften the utterance.

The first movement, the longest, is one of lament, sometimes introspective, profoundly melancholy, sometimes of a despairing emphasis. The second movement is very short, swift, furious, battle-drunk. The third is in a lugubrious waltz rhythm, in this, somewhat remindful of Mahler. But the expression is not Mahler. The essential ideas are but transformation of the melodic material of the first movement. It is true that in this score Shostakovich refers now and again to Tchaikovsky, as well as Mahler and Prokofieff—Prokofieff, especially, in the exultant finale.

But these influences are no longer quoted. They are assimilated, and made part of an expression that is now wholly personal, and eminently racial and ancestral in its nature. Shostakovich, born of troubled times and confusing creative cross-currents, has gone through much to reach this symphony. It seems to us the sure token of his arrival at the master's estate, and it should precede more scores of his growing power.

There was immense and deserved applause for this symphony and for its magnificent performance.

When Mr. Elman appeared on the stage, after the intermission, he received a special greeting from the expectant audience. They listened and they rejoiced in the maturity and the grand sincerity of his playing. This was the Tchaikovsky concerto, performed no longer by a young genius in the flush of his youth and temperament, but by a musician greatly learned through experience and thought. The interpretation, by one particularly born to understand this superbly Slavic score, was that of a ripened artist whose heart and soul were in every note that he sounded.

In a box at this performance sat Andrei Vishinsky, his wife and daughter, who afterward went backstage to congratulate Mr. Mitropoulos and Mr. Elman. Mr. Vishinsky said that he would send this evening to Shostakovich a cable telling him of the brilliant performance and the strong effect of his symphony.

Philharmonic Concert Cheered:

Shostakovich 10th in U.S. Premiere

By MILES KASTENDIECK

WITH HIS Tenth Symphony, Shostakovich has proved that he is still very much a major figure in the symphonic field. Its American premiere was given by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the philharmonic-symphony in Carnegie Hall last night.

It not only held interest throughout its 50-minute course but courted respect for the composer's invention and mastery of orchestration. It created a strong desire to hear the music again soon.

On first hearing, the symphony suggests that Shostakovich has grown intellectually. His interest in counterpoint has increased, and his ability to write melody holds strong even though he did not spin melodies too extensively through the score.

Indeed, his fertility in musical ideas somewhat handicaps him, for there is almost too much material in the work.

Of the four movements, the first is the longest and the most diffuse. It would profit by some shrewd editing. In contrast the scherzo that follows is too brief, though its brevity may have been prompted by the nature and length of the next movement.

This "philosophical" slow movement may be the core of the work which has some kind of aim to express the "thoughts and aspirations of our contemporaries."

Contemplation apparently motivated the writing of this music. It begins solemnly in the dark colors of the strings and returns brilliantly at the outset of the finale.

As it aspires to a brighter outlook, the music works up to a rousing conclusion as Russian in character as it is Shostakovich in style.

The stamp of individuality typical of his orchestration is unmistakable. And like all Russian composers the imprint of the dance makes itself felt strongly in both the middle movements.

The Tenth may not be the equal of the Fifth Symphony, which is one of the masterpieces of the 20th century, but it compares favorably with it. How much it is of this century was made clear by having Tchaikovsky's violin concerto conclude the program.

Shostakovich Tenth Offers Peace Theme

Dmitri Shostakovich, the volunteer fireman of Leningrad during the German blitz, which activity coincided with the production of his Seventh Symphony, has now composed his Tenth. Since the Seventh, the symphonies have become increasingly reflective. And here in the Tenth—premiered last December in Russia—we have the composer, with gaze fixed upon all humanity, considering and perhaps philosophizing on the subject of peace among all people.

The Philharmonic-Symphony, under Dmitri Mitropoulos, offered the first American performance of this work in Carnegie Hall last evening. The program, all Russian, comprised, in addition, the Overture to "Colas Breugnon," by Kabalevsky, the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, with Mischa Elman playing the solo.

In His Old Vein.

To expect anyone not to recognize this as a work of Shostakovich's would be utterly fantastic. The idiom is there, the orchestral tricks, too. The music flows out of the orchestra in a manner completely his, with the flair for the dramatic, the lengthy preludes to climaxes, and the folkish touches.

Yet it is not quite the same Shostakovich, and it may be that the subject matter is what creates the difference. Peace. Nothing programmatic about the composition. He isn't saying specific things, that is, since he, as well as any composer of our day, admits right off that you just can't do it with music.

But one may attribute to this score, anyway, a poetic and serious, sometimes grave, thoughtfulness. And, of course, the hint of levity is not missing, nor that of the sardonic, both employed as contrasting material.

Debatable Passages.

To be sure, the Symphony is well-ordered, though it does seem to have (perhaps unavoidable) passages of debatable musical worth. The kind of passages, I should say, that might be likened to the "er-er's" and prolonged "ah's" in an otherwise articulate talk.

The orchestration is brilliant, there is tunefulness, and there is the typical variety in the harmonic scheme. In short, your reporter is ready to align himself with those in favor of this piece. From the sounds of enthusiasm at the conclusion, he would judge that company to be well in the majority.

Frequent Loveliness.

Mr. Elman rode the Tchaikovsky battle horse with much assurance, frequent tonal loveliness and—I hate to say it—a bit of loose rein in the rhythm.

He, too, was given an ovation. And Mr. Mitropoulos, who conducted everything with the expected elan—not omitting a smidgin of schmalz in the Concerto—also received acclaim.

Among the listeners was Andrei Y. Vishinsky, head of the Russian delegation to the U.N. In fact, he went right out to cable Shostakovich about his American success.

Overture, "Colas Breugnon".....Kabalevsky
Symphony No. 10 in E minor (first performance in America) ..... Shostakovitch
Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 35 Tchaikovsky

Long-awaited Symphony

The second program of the Philharmonic orchestra given last night in Carnegie Hall, was dominated by the new work of Shostakovich. This symphony, his tenth, was the object of keen rivalry among conductors and it is rumored that a tidy sum was paid for the rights for the first whirl. It's good to see an orchestra with a tight budget spend money for music, but I wish it had got more for its money this time.

To judge a new symphony is a difficult enough task, but to judge one that is, so to speak, read into the Congressional Record (or whatever they have,) in Moscow, makes it doubly so. Well, here is a symphony that follows the traditional four movement design of the genre, but in a truly symphonic organization it is lacking. As in much Russian music there are too many sequential passages as well as endless repetitions. Instead of organic development the music dies away, revives and dies away again. The work is full of little fugatos that do not seem to lead anywhere and their presence does not represent polyphonic thinking, only a play with a device.

The first movement is very long, monochrome in sound and rhythm, and its harmonic scheme is singularly "old-fashioned" in spite of the occasional dissonant combinations. The piece sounds like a threnody, complete with grumbling basses and a peroration by the brasses, yet our eyes remain dry. The second movement is good old Russian ballet music with the piccolo whistling, the percussion whacking away, while the strings do a flight of the bumble bee. The third movement starts nicely but does not get far before it bogs down in "meditation." The last movement, too, begins with a lugubrious introduction but in the end all hands (and all tunes) are called on deck and the work ends in the usual free-for-all.

This is a puzzling work. At times it is raw—even brutal—a phenomenon present in many Russian composers. Such passages do not reflect "elemental strength," the favorite term of annotators, nor can it be called "primitivism"—it is just something Russian that is a little strange to us. For those nurtured on Western music cannot completely identify themselves with this music. Somehow the vast reaches extending beyond the Ural Mountains come to mind, the somewhat strange music of a strange land, of an immense land that calls for immense gestures, but when these spacious frames have to be filled with music that on the whole follows precepts from this side of the Urals there comes the clash of incompatible elements and the music becomes sprawling, noisy, lacking in coherent style, and even culture, that bugaboo of bourgeois respectability.

Still, there is talent under the bearskin as well as pathos that could be genuine. Just what made this symphony so forbidding I cannot divine. At times it sounds like background music to a film, at others one feels that the music follows some nebulous program. I regret to say, though, that the most disquieting feature of the work is a calculated effort to write "popular" symphonic music. All the sure-fire tricks of the trade are there in abundance, and they were not wasted on either the party censors or the general public.

Mr. Mitropoulos gave the work a carefully prepared performance, and his orchestra followed him with precision and zest. There can be no doubt that this conductor knows his scores inside out.

With the first frenetic strains of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto, we were in the presence of a real master. All right, this is music in which both performer and audience can wallow—and Mr. Elman, old and experienced hand at this game, obliged in the traditional manner — but there is nothing enigmatic about it and in its own way it is uninhibited, full-blooded, and utterly professional. How curious that this inveterate heart-render, despised by the intelligentsia, always comes out on top when pitted against his more complicated and artful descendants.

Shostakovich 'Tenth' Premiered by Philharmonic

By PAUL AFFELDER

Dmitri Shostakovich's Tenth Symphony was given its Western Hemisphere premiere last evening in Carnegie Hall by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. Listening to the performance in a first-tier box was the composer's countryman, Andrei Vishinsky.

Written some eight years after his Ninth Symphony and first performed last December in Leningrad, the Tenth is a large-scale work in four movements. The score enlists the services of a fairly full orchestra, which is called upon for a few ear-splitting climaxes.

Musically and emotionally, it is a far cry from any of the earlier symphonies by Shostakovich. Its mood is quite somber throughout; even the scherzo and finale go their way with some speed and boisterousness, but they never cease to be intensely serious about it.

Gone entirely are the saucy themes, the brash, glib orchestral utterances that have been a part of most of the composer's previous works in symphonic garb. He is in deadly earnest here, so much so, in fact, that one wishes at times for some light-hearted relief.

Nevertheless, the symphony seems well made. It has some worthwhile thematic ideas, which are developed logically and at some length, several of the more important themes making re-appearances in succeeding movements. As was the case in most of his earlier symphonies, it is the slow movements which are outstanding.

Too Early to Judge

On a first hearing, the opening movement seems to be the best. But this is too big a work to judge on a single acquaintance. Undoubtedly, future performances will help to determine its worth.

As far as we could determine, Mr. Mitropoulos and his men gave a well-prepared, meaningful interpretation to the new symphony. There were a few climactic passages where we felt the conductor asked for too great an orchestral sound, the result being rather too overwhelming to be convincing. At the conclusion of the work, the applause was long and cordial, if not completely enthusiastic.

Mischa Elman Soloist

The soloist of the evening was Mischa Elman, who made his debut outside his native Russia exactly 50 years ago, to the day. He chose as his vehicle his favorite concerto—the Tschaikowsky D Major—which he has probably played more than any other living violinist.

Time has taken its toll of his technique, and he was obliged to slyly circumvent several tricky passages. But the Elman tone and sense of style were still very much in evidence, so that he treated us to a performance that had many musical values. Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra provided capable, often sensitive accompaniment.

To open the all-Russian program, Mr. Mitropoulos chose the bubbling little overture to Kabalevsky's opera, "Colas Breugnon." Though his ideas about the music were properly jovial, he must have skimmed over it in rehearsal, for the performance was extremely ragged.

Orchestral Tune-Up

By Miles Kastendieck
New York

With the Philharmonic-Symphony opening its 113th season and the Philadelphia Orchestra paying its first visit to Carnegie Hall, the orchestral season is well under way.

Dimitri Mitropoulos decided on a German program to begin his eight weeks of conducting the Philharmonic, while Eugene Ormandy chose a Russian program for the Philadelphians. It happens that Mr. Mitropoulos has scheduled a Russian program for his second week end of concerts and Mr. Ormandy still another Russian program for his second visit. Such single-mindedness in program-making appears as coincidental as it is unusual.

Though the Philharmonic-Symphony program was operatic in character, Mr. Mitropoulos separated the Overture to Weber's "Der Freischütz" and a concert performance of Act I of Wagner's "Die Walküre" with Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. This curious choice under the circumstances became emphasized when the Bach emerged the finest presentation of the evening. It was offered in an arrangement made by Mr. Mitropoulos himself.

Bach Arrangement

As transcriptions of Bach go, this one ranks high. It benefits from both the intellectual grasp and the keen sense of orchestral values which characterize Mr. Mitropoulos's conducting. Not unexpectedly, then, its resourcefulness in making the orchestra sound revealed the Philharmonic-Symphony at its best.

The appeal of Wagner's orchestra undoubtedly lured the conductor to having the opera done on the concert stage. Such a performance had not been given by the Philharmonic in 20 years. That this one lacked an over-all distinction may be attributed to Mr. Mitropoulos's concern for making the score articulate in detail. He moved with deliberateness of tempo sufficiently marked to rob the music of its surging quality. Thus the ebb and flow of romantic feeling and the innate intensity of the score were checked by straightforwardness of presentation.

Metropolitan Cast

A thoroughly experienced cast of Metropolitan Opera singers won respect for their performances: Astrid Varnay as Sieglinde, Raymond Vinay as Sigmund, and Luben Vichey (formerly known as Lubomir Vichegonov) as Hunding. Their manner of singing somehow made the absence of scenery more marked than it need have been.

Shostakovich 10th by Philharmonic

The tragedy of man—groping, striving, stumbling, never attaining his ideal—has been the inspiration of great literature and great music since these arts began to make their imprint on the civilized world.

The renewal of the theme by genius, however, is perenially inspiring when the end result is a profound work of art.

The Shostakovich 10th Symphony, written eight years after the 9th, and given its American premiere last night by the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall, is such a work. Of numerous pieces given premieres by that indefatigable protagonist of contemporary music, Dimitri Mitropoulos, the Philharmonic's musical director, this scoop is his prize. For here is a work with profound, moving content, ironically enough, seeming to express through intangible tone the glory of man's destiny as an individual. Here is a four-movement symphony, which, by its tempestuous, untrammeled struggle, testifies to the indestructibility and significance of the single spirit. By its unconventional, but monumental architecture it appears to glorify freedom as opposed to the shackles of a preordained code.

Violent Short 2nd Movement

The initial movement is long and involved but melodically and rhythmically compelling—as is the entire 50-minute work—and never dull. By contrast, the violent short second movement, the scherzo, storms by in about three minutes, a bombast, a tornado of percussion and brass abetted by the other choirs. The two final movements have magnificent lyrical sections contrasted by potent rhythmic dynamism.

Though the symphony is not superficially startling through its dissonance, it never descends to the commonplace. It continues with amazing vitality until the conclusion. The fact that Columbia Records will, within three weeks, release a recording of the work with Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic is cause for rejoicing. This is a symphony which reaffirms our belief in the creative vitality of our age.

In a recent interview with Harrison E. Salisbury in the N. Y. Times Magazine, Shostakovich aims to show how the Soviet composer can retain his freedom despite certain restrictions superimposed by policy dictates from the Soviet government. Despite the advantages to the composer of sizable government support from various sources (royalties, prizes etc.), one leaves the article with the conviction that if the 10th Symphony is a great work, it is in spite of, not because of the governmental dicta from which it must necessarily emanate.

To this reviewer, its beauty seems indestructible. But even more important, the symphony seems to testify that, no matter how great the superimposed weight, the glory of a free imagination and mind continues to live.

After all, there is no way for Shostakovich to tell us this but through his music. Ironically, this very fact may lie at the core of the work's intensity.

The celebrated veteran, violinist Mischa Elman, brought the all-Russian program to a brilliant conclusion by his sumptuous performance of the Tchaikovsky Concerto.

Casadesus Plays With Philharmonic

Pianist Robert Casadesus celebrated 20 years of playing with the Philharmonic-Symphony last night by joining the ensemble in two concerti at Carnegie Hall. Dimitri Mitropoulos was the sympathetic collaborator on the podium.

These works were the "Coronation" Concerto of Mozart and the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven.

As Irving Kolodin pointed out in his informative program notes, in each case the title serves to identify the work without ever having been so designated by the composer.

So far as can be ascertained, the D Major Mozart Piano Concerto, No. 26, K. 537, never was inspired by a coronation; and Beethoven never called his fifth and final piano concerto the "Emperor." Nonetheless, the designation, wherever it came from, in the former case, helps to differentiate it from the 27 other works by Mozart for piano and orchestra, while the term, "Emperor," probably attached to the piece by publisher J. B. Cramer, does describe the heroic, imperious quality of the Beethoven music.

Though Casadesus was supposed to be participating in a celebration, he took his task much too seriously to give us any such feeling of spontaneity. In fact, he adhered so strongly to the letter of the music, that he neglected to think about its poetry, its joyousness or its grandeur. As one perceptive wit remarked, he played with glacial penetration. This was no artist off on a binge, as Mozart, himself, frequently was wont to do.

We are reminded of what Christopher Fry said in the preface to his recently published play, "The Dark Is Light Enough,"—that there is a point at which tragedy and comedy meet and here is frequently where human beings are at one with themselves.

Well, Casadesus did not find himself or the music; he was at one with the notes and at odds with the content. He skated on its surface without ever getting excited enough to really probe its meaning. This was especially true of the Mozart, less so of the Beethoven. Technically, he played the latter with brilliance, while the beautiful slow movement projected a remote loveliness which was distant but compelling.

Mitropoulos At His Best In 'Walkuere' Excerpt

By EUGENE BONNER
Blade Special Writer

NEW YORK, Oct. 16—With the opening concerts of its 113th season, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting, gave its official accolade to the 1954-5 musical season—which, as a matter of fact, was doing very nicely already.

The program presented by Mr. Mitropoulos consisted of the overture to "Der Freischuetz" of Weber; Bach's great Fantasia and Fugue in G minor for organ, transcribed for orchestra by the conductor himself, and the entire first act of Wagner's "Walkuere," given in concert form — the assisting artists being Astrid Varnay, Ramon Vinay and Luben Vichey.

Always at his best in interpretations of dramatic music, Mr. Mitropoulos gave a sympathetic, vivid and, at times, most exciting reading of this Wagnerian score, though the music of the earlier part of the act seemed at times to lose continuity and break up into disconnected episodes. But with the sounding of the "Sword" theme, unity established itself and was maintained to a thrilling and triumphant finish, the orchestra playing with a clarity and brilliance of tone which should make even its Philadelphia confreres sit up and take notice.

Miss Varnay was in fine voice (I'm speaking now of the Sunday - afternoon performance) and sang very well indeed, although her style seems sometimes just a wee bit explosive for Sieglinde. Mr. Vinay, also in excellent voice, served well the music of Siegmund, and with a sonorous third in the person of Mr. Vichey (Hunding) the singing of this mighty actlong trio was sutained at a high level throughout.

THE "FREISCHUETZ" overture was less satisfactory, a curious suggestion of heavy-handedness being perceptible; but with the first notes of the Bach fantasia, lucidity and brilliance were regained.

One wonders what the great Johann Sebastian would have thought of a re-creation of his piece thus orchestrally clothed by Mr. Mitropoulos; for the music came forth in a grandeur almost barbaric—the finale of the Fugue bringing the audience to its feet in a burst of spontaneous and prolonged applause.

Casadesus Soloist

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TWENTY years ago the French pianist Robert Casadesus made his American debut with the Philharmonic - Symphony in Carnegie Hall.

Last night he celebrated this event by playing two sovereign concertos under the same auspices. This time Dimitri Mitropoulos was the conductor.

That Casadesus proved himself more a master of Beethoven than of Mozart repeated an impression gained on other occasions.

Though a classicist of sorts, he rarely conveys the essence of Mozart. It eludes him. He has the classic style, the restraint and the polish, but he stands outside the classic spirit.

Thus his performance of the "Coronation" Concerto K. 537 became that of a master pianist rather than of a master interpreter.

Beethoven's "Emperor," on the other hand, revealed him as a master interpreter. He rose to the challenge always lurking in Beethoven. Last night it was possible to note his acceptance of it as the first movement unfolded.

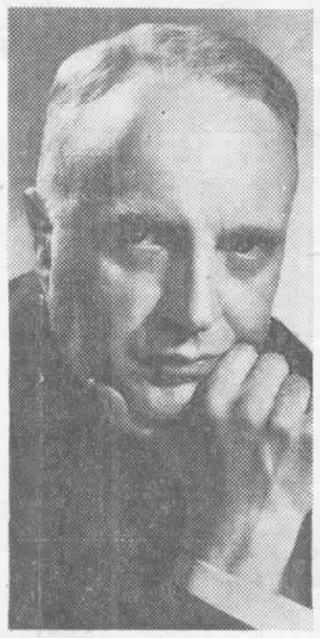
Casadesus

Except for the opening twelve minutes, devoted to Beethoven's second "Leonore" Overture, Robert Casadesus was the soloist throughout last night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dimitri Mitropoulos in Carnegie Hall.

The program, including Mozart's Concerto in D major (K. 576, known as the "Coronation") and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto had been announced as a celebration of the twentieth anniversary of the noted French pianist's American debut with the same orchestra. That was on Jan. 19, 1935, with Hans Lange conducting; Mr. Casadesus had played the same Mozart concerto.

In both concertos, Mr. Casadesus' playing had characteristics which have been associated with it during his two decades before American audiences, including complete technical mastery and neatness, clarity, a finely graduated dynamic range and discerning interpretative insight. In both works, the performances showed the musical individuality of the artist, but they also disclosed the differing and contrasted style and individuality of the two works. The "Coronation" Concerto has formal finish, melodic appeal and diversity of mood; it is even-tempered rather than emotionally sweeping, and this was a prevailing vein in this appropriate, sympathetic presentation.



The pianist's playing of the "Emperor" Concerto was impressive for its dignity and proportion, for a momentum attained without haste and a largeness of scale achieved without emphasis on loudness. Mr. Casadesus never displayed energy for its own sake or departed from a musical quality of tone; the sense of dynamic spaciousness came from his remarkable control of volume, while he fully realized the differing expressive savor of the three movements. The orchestra under Mr. Mitropoulos gave him sympathetic cooperation, and the conductor could be thanked for beginning with the second "Leonore" Overture instead of the imperishable, but hard-worked third.

Robert Casadesus

By OLIN DOWNES

ROBERT CASADESUS, the French pianist and one of the foremost virtuosi of our period, celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his first appearance as soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society at the concert given by that organization last night in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Mitropoulos began the concert with a finely turned and highly dramatic performance of Beethoven's second "Leonore" overture. The rest of the program was designed to emphasize various aspects of Mr. Casadesus' interpretive art.

The concertos he played were the "Coronation" concerto, so-called, of Mozart, and the Fifth Concerto of Beethoven, long designated as the "Emperor." The choice of these works is significant of Mr. Casadesus' artistic maturity. For it was not as the theatrical communicant of some work of the "romantic" or contemporaneous period that he elected to present himself. It was as the reverent, if also passionate, exponent of two classic masterpieces.

This was not because of a repertory limited to works of the older period Mr. Casadesus has the entire repertory of piano concertos as well as solo compositions at his finger-tips. But perhaps there is something to be said for the depth of thought and power of form that the works of the great tonal architects of a century past possessed: a musician at his complete maturity may find their appeal to be supreme.

Mr. Casadesus played Mozart with fineness of phrase and the singing tone demanded as the sine qua non of the performance of his music. But the climax of the concert was the playing of the towering concerto of Beethoven. The effect of this performance grew as it progressed. Here was the freedom and plasticity that results from complete authority and over-all control. It has well been said that the master interpreter of music must have a heart that is a volcano and a head that is ice. The aphorism was memorably demonstrated in Mr. Casadesus' performance.

It has been seldom in one's experience of these concerts that the "Emperor" concerto has been revealed, both by pianist and orchestra, in all its aspects. The noble breadth and masculine stride of the grand opening movement was balanced by the tenderness, happily without a touch of sentimentality and the wonderful sustained line of the singing movement that follows. And now and again, over the instruments, descended the mysterious hush—as of nature brooding over the earth—that is a peculiar and unique characteristic of the music of Beethoven. Here, in a word, Mr. Casadesus and Mr. Mitropoulos discoursed great music, sought and found its secrets, and communicated them to an absorbed audience. At the end there was an ovation for the interpreters.

Royal Treat Program Heard at Carnegie Hall

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

The Philharmonic concert conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos in Carnegie Hall last night was a royal treat in more ways than one.

There was a "Coronation" concerto by Mozart and an "Emperor" concerto by Beethoven, and it is no exaggeration to say that there was majesty in the way they were performed last night.

The pianist was Robert Casadesus, who at his best has very few equals and even fewer superiors. He was at his best last night, particularly in the slow movements, each of which went like a dream.

Mr. Mitropoulos was the perfect conductor for the kind of evening it was. The atmosphere was one of soft poetry, of whispered confidences, of the hushed trance that only Mozart and Beethoven can produce in their moments of absolute calm.

Mr. Mitropoulos had begun the concert with a dramatic reading of the second "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. The intensity and suspense were such at times that one wondered what the opera could add that the overture had not already divulged.

The timing and dynamics made for an imaginative hold on the audience's attention. It was drama told in terms of symphonic heroism and villainy, and as vivid as if the conflict were being enacted by people instead of instruments.

If two major links between the Mozart and Beethoven concertos are their wealth of expressive beauty and their perfect fusion of form and content, a third last night was the superb artistry of Robert Casadesus.

It was artistry that brought out the spiritual kinship of the two men and the two concertos—the twin devotion in the ministry of music.

Robert Casadesus Marks Milestone With Philharmonic

By PAUL AFFELDER

Twenty seasons ago, Robert Casadesus made his American debut as piano soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. In commemoration of that event, he appeared with the same orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos last evening at Carnegie Hall.

It was Mr. Casadesus' evening, as well it might be. He dominated the program by playing two concerti—Mozart's No. 26 in D Major (K. 537), known as the "Coronation," and Beethoven's No. 5 in E Flat Major, the "Emperor." Since neither composer named his own work, these popular titles don't have to be taken very seriously.

Contrast in Texts

The Beethoven may be imperial, but the only coronation with which Mozart's opus could possibly be connected would be that of Oberon or Titania.

This is truly music of fairy-like grace and beauty, and it was with feathery lightness and magic fluidity that Mr. Casadesus played the opening movement. The larghetto was made to sing in the most etherally poetic fashion, while the finale had a real elfin quality about it.

Certainly no pianist we know of can interpret Mozart with such buoyancy, such completely captivating charm.

Much poetry and songfulness were also to be found in Mr. Casadesus' reading of the "Emperor" concerto. Though his approach here was more virile, he never missed an opportunity to let a passage sing itself on the keyboard. This was especially apparent in the quieter sections of the opening movement and throughout the lyral adagio.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra, seemingly content to take second billing to such a noble and sophisticated artist, accompanied both concerti with care and understanding.

Allowed to shine on their own, they began the concert with a clean, firm, well-controlled and often sensitive performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 2.

Lesson in Opposites

Grant Johannesen was piano soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra Saturday night at Carnegie Hall in two works so different in nature that the evening became almost an object lesson in opposites: the Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" Fantasy and Milhaud's "Le Carnival d'Aix."

Liszt's reworking of Schubert's mammoth piano Fantasy suffers from many of the commonest transcription disorders. It sprawls and meanders—grandly, it's true—but in spite of all the extra instruments it dilutes rather than augments the thunder that the solo piano builds up in Schubert's original. Mr. Johannesen did his best; he gave a carefully studied reading and a brilliant-sounding one. And when a mature and first-rate pianist studies, the results are not a bit academic even when there are transcriptions to contend with.

On the other hand, Milhaud's "Carnival," a set of brief, sharply pointed ballet scenes, doesn't waste a note, a chord, an echo or an accent; its purpose, to delight and entertain, is crystal-clear throughout. Milhaud often uses the piano texturally, as part of a blended sound rather than as a solo instrument. Mr. Johannesen's ear reacted keenly to those moments: the blend was perfect.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, who conducted the two solo works, also led the orchestra in Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Grant Johannesen, American pianist, was the soloist at the concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under Dimitri Mitropoulos, presented Saturday night at Carnegie Hall. The program was lengthy but held the interest well from beginning to end.

Mr. Johannesen played two works infrequently heard. They were Schubert's "'Wanderer' Fantasy" as arranged by Liszt for piano and orchestra, and Milhaud's "Le Carnaval d'Aix." The gifted young artist performed both with verve and vitality.

He had plenty of power and brilliance where demanded. In softer passages his tone was suave and subtly molded. He commanded a wide dynamic range, and a varied tonal palette. He brought poetry to the Schubert offering and the awaited humor to Milhaud's witty score. His playing did not always come clearly across the footlights, but his interpretations were marked by keen intelligence and true insight.

Despite all the care expended by soloist and orchestra on the Liszt version of the Schubert opus, one would rather have listened to Mr. Johannesen in the original form of the masterpiece, for piano alone. Played as Schubert conceived this music, it still has a purity of style that makes it viable. But Liszt, by fussing up the piano part and adding an orchestral support not up to his customary skill in instrumentation, turned the work into a dated period piece.

Milhaud's fantasy for piano and orchestra, comprising a dozen pieces from his ballet "Salade" received its world première by the Philharmonic Symphony Society, under Willem Mengelberg, in 1926, in Carnegie Hall. Its several short component pieces, largely descriptive of characters of the old Italian comedia dell'arte, are on the superficial side.

But they proved decidedly clever, the music covering not only folk and dance elements from southern Europe but also ranging as far afield as Brazil, which inspired a quite fetching tango. It was led like the rest of the amusing suite with scintillation and exuberance by Mr. Mitropoulos.

The concert opened with a deeply comprehending, finely articulated performance of the Overture to Mozart's "The Magic Flute," and closed with a masterful interpretation of the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony. There were far too many remarkable details in the profoundly felt Funeral March division, the virtuosic unfoldment of the scherzo with its noteworthy horn playing in the Trio, or the noteworthy treatment of the final variations to mention here. But all of it exhibited a rare combination of sanity and artistic wizardry.

New Concerto for 'Cello Premiered at Philharmonic

By PAUL AFFELDER

The entire first half of Dimitri Mitropoulos' program with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last evening in Carnegie Hall consisted of novelties. Newest of all was the Concerto for 'Cello and Orchestra No. 2 by the Italian-American composer, Vittorio Rieti, which received its world premiere.

The concerto, written last year, is dedicated to Raya Garbousova, the soloist who introduced it last night. It is in three movements, connected to each other by lengthy cadenzas for the 'cello.

Much of the thematic material is fresh and stimulating, though a recurring fragment in the first movement could have come straight out of Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith." The orchestration is not particularly light, yet it is so contrived that there is plenty of space for the soloist to shine through.

Call the concerto, then, skillful, vivacious and well put together, but not vastly inspired or inspiring. Miss Garbousova, who was lovely to look at, played with technical assurance and musical understanding, but her tone was not large enough in this hall to sound completely convincing.

Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra lent admirable support. The lengthy applause at the end brought the composer out on the stage for several bows.

Programming Criticized

Miss Garbousova was also heard in Paul Bazelaire's arrangement of five "Pieces en Concert" for 'cello and strings by Francois Couperin. Originally composed for the more delicate-toned Viola da Gamba, this charming little 18th-century suite must surely have been intended for performance in more intimate surroundings than Carnegie Hall.

Even though the conductor kept his players down to an irreducible minimum of sound, Bazelaire's scoring was too much for the soloist's light tone, with the result that she was frequently inaudible. This, of course, did not add to the effectiveness of the work.

To open the program, Mr. Mitropoulos chose the justly obscure overture to "Julius Caesar" by Robert Schumann. This dull, uninspired piece, with an overworked principal theme not worth treating in the first place, has only been performed twice before in the Philharmonic's long history. If it is never performed again, no one will miss it.

Williams Symphony Hailed

How much brighter and more satisfying was the more familiar second half of the program, Vaughan Williams' Fourth Symphony, played in honor of the composer's current visit to this country, may not be completely familiar, but it has won a deserved spot in the repertoire. This stark, intensely powerful work was interpreted with great forcefulness and insight, and proved to be the high spot of the evening.

Later in the season, Mr. Mitropoulos is to conduct Richard Strauss' "Salome" at the Metropolitan Opera. He gave us a promising sample at the end of the concert in the popular "Dance of the Seven Veils."

It was a sensuous, beautifully thought-out and carefully phrased reading right up to the concluding measures, where several wrong entrances in the orchestra threw things off kilter for a short while and spoiled the effect of what might have been a truly stirring performance.

Williams' 4th:

Brilliant Revival

By MILES KASTENDIECK

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS Fourth Symphony quite dominated the Philharmonic-symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

The remainder of the program made it all the more obvious that the English composer was truly first-class.

Mitropoulos had programed the symphony in honor of Vaughan Williams' current visit here for the first time in over 20 years.

Unfortunately the composer could not be present to hear the brilliant performance Mitropoulos and the orchestra gave his music.

As for this venture into modernity which Vaughan Williams took almost a score of years ago, the music grows on each rehearing.

Its "barbaric yawp" has lasting vitality and the melody that soars in the violins in the opening pages of the work is a notable contemporary creation. The finale fugue is skilfully wrought.

The work is a powerful utterance, as solid in its integrity as it is in its workmanship.

Cello Concerto

The world premier of Rieti's Cello Concerto No. 2 with Raya Garbousova as soloist had a lukewarm reception. Only Rieti's personal appearance swelled the applause to respectable proportions.

The score is too theoretical and inaccessible for the average listener. It has moments of jauntiness and capriciousness, but it falls apart too often to hold interest.

Miss Garbousova played the cello part smoothly, finding the cadensas grateful for the instrument. She also played Couperin's "Pieces en Concert" gracefully, but Paul Baselaire's orchestral arrangement robbed the music of much of its inherent graciousness.

The concert opened with Schumann's dullish overture "Julius Caesar" and closed with a finely molded performance of Strauss's "Dance of the Seven Veils."

World Premiere

LAST night's concert of the Philharmonic orchestra included nothing less than a world premiere; always a challenge to performer, public—and critic. Rieti, the composer of the new cello concerto, belongs to the generation born just before the advent of our century. A pupil of Respighi, he started his career, good Italian that he is, with opera, but by this time he has produced a sizable list of instrumental works.

The concerto shows the tendency of modern composers toward integration of solo instrument with the orchestra rather than the domination of the former over the latter. I regret to say, though, that what was integrated did not amount to much. Liszt was severely rebuked when he employed the triangle in his E flat concerto. Rieti starts with the crashing cymbals. This sets the tone, for while the orchestra is handled with skill there is little substance left for the soloist whose instrument is somewhat ungainly in a concerto anyway.

There are some good tunes in the piece and one occasionally gets a glimpse of a not unattractive musical personality, but there are long stretches where nothing noteworthy happens. This is especially true of the passages where the cello plays alone. A cadenza by a solo instrument is usually a bore—this was no exception. To think that there sits a fine orchestra unemployed while the soloist saws away on unconnected remnants from the body of the work! What fascinated me was the decided East-European quality of the music. It sounded more Hungarian or Rumanian than Italian.

Miss Garbousova, a distinguished artist, did her best, but there was not much chance for showing off her beautiful tone, although her dextrous fingers performed with her wonted skill.

The first stentorian strains of Vaughan Williams' noble and powerful symphony blew open the windows of the hothouse and bracing fresh air streamed into the house. There is something very appealing about this venerable composer. One would surely assume that a musician who studied with three Victorian worthies would be saddled with an inherited plushiness for life. But he did not succumb. Not because of the possible antidote of a brief study with Ravel, but because he consciously returned to the warming hearth of old English music. The solid melodies in this symphony are not at all of the late romantic type but convey the vigor of English folk song and Elizabethan air and madrigal. These he does not imitate, but re-creates their spirit.

Raya Garbousova, cello soloist with the Philharmonic last night.

Vaughan Williams is a true interpreter of English music beyond the isles, whereas Elgar, an institution in England, remains to the rest of the world merely another post-Brahmsian.

Mr. Mitropoulos gave the symphony a finely wrought performance. The sharp dissonances were projected with a nice feeling for balanced sonority, the dogged rhythms pulsated and the strings sang beautifully with leisurely molded phrases. But above all, the conductor ably sustained the harsh and almost uncompromising ground tone that makes this such a sturdy work.

* * *

The rest of the program was pretty drab. The Schumann overture should not have been disturbed in its resting place, while the Couperin "concert pieces" are innocuous though pleasant pieces that are not suitable for such an occasion. They have nothing to do with the "concerted" style, and the rather inept transcription did not endow them with more vigor. This is really simple chamber music which requires the soloist to keep company with the others. Therefore Miss Garbousova, who played elegantly, did not have much to offer in the way of solo playing.

Mitropoulos Spotlights Cello Soloist

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Apart from the respective merits of the five compositions in last night's program of the Philharmonic-Symphony in Carnegie Hall, they constituted as bizarre a piece of devising as Dimitri Mitropoulos has accomplished in some time. For my tastes, anyway.

Place of honor in the list was accorded the Second Cello Concerto of Vittorio Rieti, in which Raya Garbusova was the soloist. Preceding that, Miss Garbusova did a warm-up on Couperin's "Pieces en Concert," a suite in five parts for cello and orchestra arranged by Paul Bazelaire. Vaughan-Williams' Fourth Symphony and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from Strauss' "Salome" came next in order. The evening began with Schumann's "Julius Caesar" Overture.

The Rieti Concerto is a work in three movements separated by two cadenzas. Both are long and showy, in whose spotlight misguided soloists will just love to bask. Miss Garbusova, however, is an artist who likes to get as much as she can out of music without pressure.

The Concerto is well made. It has a tense, nervous quality. Never does it orate. In fact, its speech, if anything, is almost brusque, with plenty of dissonance to fling in all directions. There is great variety in the rhythms. They labor with and around and against one another in a rather tight design, which permits itself, every so often, a generous break in the discipline.

Miss Garbusova played this work, dedicated to her, with all the skill at her command. It's difficult music for the soloist, as well as the orchestra, yet the Garbusova-Mitropoulos-Philharmonic axis had it always in control.

The Couperin-Bazelaire job, a well-meaning one, had little of interest. Frankly, it was pretty heavily cast in the orchestral mold. And the soloist, barring some pretty passages, had nothing very much to work with.

Vaughan-Williams' Fourth Symphony, real substance of the evening's fare, got a stirring performance by Maestro Mitropoulos and his men. Here the Philharmonic really began to sound. And here, too—or at the Symphony's conclusion—the audience put on its own show, a noisy show of appreciation.

Rieti Concerto by Philharmonic

Dmitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony are having a few sessions with contemporary music in Carnegie Hall this week-end. Raya Garbousova, Caucasian-born 'cellist, started the ball rolling by playing the world premiere last night of the Second Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra by Vittorio Rieti.

Rieti, quite an internationalist, was born in Egypt, educated in Italy and now lives here. His music was also eclectic with a 20-minute concerto which had poignant moments in the adagio but generally was more clever than moving or profound.

The work, however, was magnificently played by Miss Garbousova, who looked beautiful as well. Performing with grace and ease on her Stradivarius, the handsome blond disposed of the technical difficulties with spirit as well as brilliance. She made the most of them, performance-wise, and in every way was an asset to Rieti's creativeness. She plays a repeat performance Sunday at 2:30, of this work as well as of the Couperin suite, "Pieces en Concert," originally written for Viola Da Gamba and figured bass but arranged for orchestra by Paul Bazelaire.

Shostakovich Tomorrow

Ralph Vaughan Williams, now visiting in this country, was represented by his Fourth Symphony, an abstruse work which needs repeated hearings in order to be absorbed and which, fortunately, will also be repeated Sunday. My impression, however, was that a different kind of programming would have been more grateful to this four-movement composition. Hearing it preceded by the Rieti made heavy demands on all but the most adventurous and receptive contemporary ear.

The Shostakovich Tenth Symphony, given its world premiere two weeks ago by the Philharmonic, will have another (and probably final) hearing this season tomorrow night. Though it takes 50 minutes to perform, this is a short hour filled with interest every second. A work of inspiration, the symphony is one of the significant works of our time.

Pianist Ania Dorfmann will be the soloist of the evening in the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto No. 1, in G Minor.

Philharmonic Premiere

"Greek Dances," by the late Niko Scalcotas, is Dimitri Mitropoulos' novelty for the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts next Thursday, Friday and Sunday. The composer, who was also a violinist, studied at the Athens Conservatory and later in Germany; Arnold Schoenberg told Mr. Mitropoulos in 1929 that he expected great things from this young Greek musician.

The rest of his history, as outlined by Mr. Mitropoulos, is tragic. Back in Greece, where he was an orchestral second violinist, he lived a secluded life, letting no one know when he fell ill; he died in 1949 from lack of medical attention. His music began to gain recognition soon afterwards. These concerts also bring the first American appearances of Pietro Scarpini, a forty-three-year-old Roman pianist who began his concert career in Europe eighteen years ago.

By OLIN DOWNES

The outstanding, indeed the memorable, event of the Philharmonic-Symphony concert last night in Carnegie Hall was the profoundly perceptive and moving interpretation by Mr. Mitropoulos and his players of Vaughan Williams' Fourth Symphony.

Ere this Mr. Mitropoulos has shown his special understanding of the work. Last night he surpassed himself in the clarity as well as the intensity of his performance. So presented, the symphony was wildly applauded and cheered from many parts of the hall.

This symphony is entirely different from all other of Vaughan Williams' compositions in the form. An index to its mood and its stripped, stark expression is the opening theme. It is the famous discord of protest that ushers in the choral finale of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The music is turbulent, strife-ridden; with passages of sombreness and lamentation; perhaps of "ancestral voices prophecying war."

Such, at least, are the emotional connotations of this work to the present writer.

Its lines are austere, its expression unsensuous. The emotion is the more affecting for the concentration and conciseness with which a spacious design is firmly carried out. It is Vaughan Williams' least ingratiating score, and the most austere and dramatic symphony — vintage of 1935—that he has written.

'Cellist Is Soloist

Of the rest of a strangely assorted program it is not possible to speak so enthusiastically. A first class 'cellist, a finished and highly communicative virtuoso of her instrument, is Raya Garbusova, soloist at this concert. But her talents were expended upon second-rate music. The suite of pieces of Couperin is very badly and uncharacteristically arranged for its present orchestral combinations, which detract from the essential character of the music and also cover up the soloist to disadvantage.

The concerto of Rieti is skillfully written in the modern polytonal style. Further hearings would doubtless give us more familiarity and hence a more complete realization of the details of the work. But one doubts if further acquaintance would reveal it as more significant music than it seemed last night to be. Miss Garbousova showed a superb grasp of the music as well as of the resources of her instrument, and she was tendered a well-deserved tribute for her accomplishment as a virtuoso and artist.

For reasons of his own, Mr. Mitropoulos elected to open the concert with a weak and redundant overture of Schumann, "Julius Caesar," a work little known, and deserving no better. It is music of Schumann's late and weaker period, which lacks continuity of thought or any convincing physiognomy. The concert ended with a performance, very vivid, very climactic, of the dance music from Richard Strauss' "Salomé."

Philharmonic Seeks To Raise $150,000

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Helping the Philharmonic-Symphony this season is a philanthropic gesture that should return considerable enjoyment to the giver. By becoming a "Friend of the Philharmonic," through sending in a contribution of $5 or more, the organization offers, in cooperation with orchestra and soloists, entree into some special events.

The "Friends" are now seeking to raise a much needed $150,000 in order to underwrite the current operating expenses of the orchestra. Wishing to stimulate friendship as well as contributions, the "Friends" offer special "listening" privileges to bring members in closer contact with the Philharmonic.

For as little as $5, a Philharmonic "Friend" may attend one rehearsal of the orchestra in Carnegie Hall, with soloist. This year there will be two of these open rehearsals and the contributor may choose whichever one he wishes. For the Jan. 6 rehearsal, George Szell will conduct with pianist Claudio Arrau as soloist. Feb. 26, Dimitri Mitropoulos will be on the podium with violinist Yehudi Menuhin playing.

By contributing more than $5, the "Friend" may attend both of these rehearsals plus two private concerts at the Hotel Plaza. Mitropoulos will conduct the first, Feb. 4; Kostelanetz will conduct the second, March 14. For further information contact the Philharmonic office, CO. 5-4480.

Scarpini Debut Thursday

Pietro Scarpini, Italian pianist, well known in Europe, will make his American debut with the Philharmonic in Carnegie Hall, Thursday, Friday and Sunday, Nov. 7. Scarpini will play the Prokofieff Second Piano Concerto. Dimitri Mitropoulos will conduct.

Under the direction of Franco Autori, Ruggiero Ricci, violinist, will perform the Tchaikovsky Concerto in D Major, Saturday night, Nov. 6.

For the Thursday, Friday and Sunday concerts, Mitropoulos has also scheduled the American premiere of an eight-minute work, "Greek Dances," by the Greek composer, Niko Scalcotas.

Scalcotas, a pupil of Kurt Weill and Arnold Schoernberg, died in 1949 at the age of 46, relatively unknown, even in his native Athens. Since then he has been "discovered" and recently the Universal Edition of Vienna has undertaken the publication of all his works.

ORFMANN SOLOIST FOR PHILHARMONIC

Heard in Mendelssohn Piano Work—Mitropoulos Leads Shostakovich's Tenth

PHILHARMONIC-SYMPHONY, Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting; Ania Dorfmann, pianist. At Carnegie Hall.
Prelude and Allegro from "La Sultane" ..... Couperin-Milhaud
Piano Concerto in G minor ..... Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 10 ..... Shostakovich

By NOEL STRAUS

As soloist in the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto in G minor, Ania Dorfmann reached new heights at the concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Saturday night in Carnegie Hall. The esteemed artist received excellent support from the orchestra, which was in top form and splendidly directed by Dimitri Mitropoulos.

Deeply sincere and completely unassuming in her approach to Mendelssohn's finely wrought display piece, Miss Dorfmann infused her performance with fire and brilliance, as well as the anticipated expressiveness.

The sparkle and virility of the opening octaves demonstrated the fact that the pianist was distinctively in the vein. She built up climaxes that were not only resounding but spirited; they were exciting in themselves and received just the correct amount of tonal volume to set off the lovingly detailed softer and more tranquil parts of the score to the best advantage.

Soulful, indeed, was Miss Dorfmann's treatment of the Andante. It had pronounced charm of sound, great refinement of feeling and the subtlest of nuances in color and dynamics. The Presto leading to the finale went at a sufficiently deliberate tempo to give the accelerated tempo of the finale itself a fine sense of impetus and dash. The expertly discoursed peroration brought the concerto to a rousing close and was followed by long and enthusiastic applause.

Mr. Mitropoulos was to be congratulated on the sympathetic, expertly balanced accompaniment accorded the soloist. He began the evening with a superb performance of Milhaud's impressive orchestral transcription of the Overture and Allegro from Couperin's sonata "La Sultane," originally composed for two violins, two 'cellos and harpsichord continuo. It was read in a manner that gave the utmost richness to its sonorities and made patent the nobility and emotional expansiveness of this inspired music. The concert was terminated with a superlative performance of Shostakovich's remarkable Tenth Symphony, which reached its third local hearing on this occasion.

The Philharmonic

The Philharmonic-Symphony concert last night at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Dimitri Mitropoulos, offered a double novelty—the American debut of the Italian pianist Pietro Scarpini and the first local performances of Nicholas Skalkotas' Greek Dances. Mr. Scarpini chose to introduce himself to New York with Serge Prokofiev's Concerto in G minor, No. 2, and the remaining works were Schumann's Symphony No. 2, in C major, and the Couperin-Milhaud Prelude and Allegro, "La Sultane."

Mr. Scarpini, who is known in his homeland as a leading champion of twentieth-century music, plays it, to judge solely by the present instance, accurately, with great feeling for its line, and the ability to project its spirit. He goes about his job fastidiously, prepossessingly, without heroics or excess hysteria. Indeed, he performed Prokofiev's highly imaginative concerto as though it were an acknowledged classic needing only a faithful and pulsating rendition to make its point. It was a novel approach, and to these ears a refreshing one.

As a rule, pianists laboring in fields of modern music have a tendency to hack away mercilessly at every phrase, to try, by every means available, to make their readings as brashly "contemporary" as the work they are planying. Not so, Mr. Scarpini. With fingers strong that strikes the notes cleanly and in time, with a coherent sense of form and a large sonority pool, he is content to deal with the music on its own terms, to explicate its meanings and to place himself at the service of the composition at hand.

These facts alone reflect his basic musicality, though it must be here confessed that the wiry and extrovert substance of the Prokofiev concerto makes it impossible to speak further on Mr. Scarpini's inherent talents. This much is sure—modern music he planys grandly and well. His skills are needed, should be used.

Nicholas Skalkotas, who was known before his death in 1949 as a student of advanced atomality, was represented by a group of conservative Greek dances. Mostly they are nationalistic in nature, and their constant reiterations indicate a folk song origin; but the scoring is pure twentieth century bandwagon and accounts for the work's frequent brushes with vulgarity. The piece makes a big noise and does so without shame. It seemed called into being for no other reason.

Mr. Mitropoulos dealt strikingly with the Prokofiev and Skalketas, less so with the Schumann symphony. As is his way with composers of the mid-Romantic epoch, his reading was nervous, edgy and crowded with oddities of interpretation. Gruff accents dispelled the symphony's lyricism, swollen dynamics its generous calm. And the genuine Schumann that broke through shone with scant help from the conductor.

Pianist Pietro Scarpini Makes Dazzling Debut

By PAUL AFFELDER

Last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert, conducted by Dimitri Mitropoulos in Carnegie Hall, was one of the best we have heard from this organization in a long time.

Most of the excitement came after intermission. First, Pietro Scarpini, an Italian pianist who has concertized extensively abroad but who has never ventured to this side of the Atlantic, made his American debut in the seldom-heard Prokofieff Piano Concerto No. 2 in G Minor.

There is ample reason for the scarcity of performances of this work. It is frightfully difficult and full of keyboard fireworks throughout its four movements. The cadenzas in the first and last movements are almost staggering. Yet the composer wrote and played the concerto when he was still in his early twenties. Mr. Scarpini played it last evening as if he owned it.

Amusing Byplay

After a few minutes of amusing byplay while the soloist, Mr. Mitropoulos, and, finally, a stagehand worked at raising the piano stool, Mr. Scarpini launched into the concerto, giving a truly fantastic display of virtuosity. There wasn't much opportunity for lyrical playing or subtle phrasing, but for tone and technique the pianist showed that he has few peers.

During the long and complicated cadenza in the first movement we had to look several times to make sure the orchestra wasn't joining in; it seemed incredible that a single performer could conjure up such a mountain of sound from his instrument.

Needless to say, there was a prolonged ovation after the concerto. It was an interesting and rewarding experience to hear this work, especially in such a commanding performance. Now that our appetite has been whetted, though, we would like to hear what Mr. Scarpini can do with a standard concerto in solo recital.

Mr. Mitropoulos concluded the program by introducing to this country a group of four Greek dances by the Greek composer, Nicholas Skalkotas, who died in 1949. Though he was a disciple of Arnold Schoenberg and wrote extensively in the 12-tone idiom, Skalkotas treated the folk material in these dances in a manner that is a cross between Enesco and Bartok.

The music displays a strong rhythmic sense and colorful command of orchestral sonorities. The dances, with their distinct Balkan flavor, were accorded a rousing performance. No doubt, they will assume their rightful place in the orchestral repertoire, for they are sure to please anyone who hears them.

The evening began with the prelude and allegro from Francois Couperin's "La Sultane," in the orchestral version by Darius Milhaud. The prelude was notable for the rich sonorities which the conductor drew from the Philharmonic's strings, while the allegro was set forth in brilliant fashion.

This was followed by Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C Major, a work which Mr. Mitropoulos has always interpreted with conviction. His reading on this occasion was no exception; it was an effective combination of strength and romantic songfulness.

There were a few spots, however, where the balance could have been improved by keeping the brasses under firmer control, yet it was an extremely virile performance that rounded out an altogether splendid evening of music-making.

Scarpini Is Excellent in Prokofieff Work

By OLIN DOWNES

THE soloist at the concert given by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was Pietro Scarpini, a pianist of prodigious capacities, who played the little-known second piano concerto of Prokofieff with whirlwind virtuosity and rhythmic drive.

It is a nervous, brilliant, yeasty piece, exploding with youthful energy and audacity—indeed effrontery—as one might say, to the established order. And it is music of this machine age, with its electrical energy and the irresistible power and rhythms of turbines and other implacable machines.

The pianist has a part of enormous difficulty and brilliancy. At the climax of the long cadenza of the first movement it sounds as big and powerful as the orchestra itself, as if two orchestras had collided when the one with the hundred instruments strikes in.

The pianist who adequately performs the part needs endless strength, swiftness and must be something of a cyclone at the keyboard. Mr. Scarpini fulfilled the requirements, in the power and drive of his playing, and the horseplay with chords and octave skips and the like that are so frequent that at last the music begins to feel repetitious and lose its power to excite us.

This is the defect of the concert. The invention and audacity of the writing are not enough to save it from a somewhat immature redundancy of effect. It is not therefore, as well balanced or as richly developed as the Third Prokofieff Concerto, which has well earned its greater popularity.

But for the purposes of virtuoso performance the concerto seemed written for Mr. Scarpini to play, and more than sufficient to excite the admiration and esteem of the audience. Mr. Mitropoulos, conducting without a score, provided a wonderful orchestral accompaniment. The triumph of the moment was due to all—the pianist, the conductor—yes, and the concerto!

Hearing the Couperin-Milhaud "Sultana," which opened the program, one wondered just why Mr. Milhaud, transcribing for orchestra a modestly scored "Sonata a quatuor" by the French master of the 17-18th centuries, should have elected to make his charming piece sound like a modern conductor's inflated orchestration of a Bach Chorale Prelude. For that is what it sounded, and that is certainly not Couperin's style. There sounded the massive in many instruments, and the final climax for full brass choir at the end. This is certainly an injustice to Couperin, here butchered, one would say, to make a conductor's holiday.

We enjoyed and admired Mr. Mitropoulos' reading of Schumann's poetical symphony. He played it with romantic fervor and fancy; sometimes with tempi and dynamics of his own, but always with fine responsiveness to the tenderness and feeling of the music.

The concert ended with the first performance in America of a suite of Greek Dances by Mr. Mitropoulos' countryman, Nicholas Scalcotas. These dances were not well placed, following the commotions and intensities of Prokofieff's concerto. And it cannot be said that the author of the dances is unacquainted with Enesco of the Rumanian Rhapsodis, or even Rimsky-Korsakov of Scheherazade. It is skillful but self-conscious orientalism of a sort, which makes a brave noise—rather too much noise.

Greek Composer Paves Way for Italian Pianist

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A brilliant Italian pianist and a gifted Greek composer made their American debut together on last night's Philharmonic program in Carnegie Hall.

The Italian, 43-year-old Pietro Scarpini, made his bow by way of Prokofieff's fiendishly tricky Second Piano Concerto, and a very impressive bow it was.

The Greek composer, Nicholas Skalkotas, unfortunately could only be present in the spirit of his music, having died an untimely death in 1949 at the age of 45.

In Dimitri Mitropoulos, however, Skalkotas had the perfect confrere and compatriot to act on his behalf, and in a set of "Greek Dances" the perfect card of introduction.

Lively Dances.

These are lively, exotic dances, teeming with color and gusto and that Pied Piper kind of effect that sets bodies swaying and feet tapping. Mr. Mitropoulos should give us more of this Greek bearing gifts.

Mr. Scarpini established himself as a master technician able to cope with the bristling problems of Prokofieff's concerto. It took courage to tackle this keyboard bugaboo at a debut.

The tone was there, the mastery of mechanics, the feeling for line and direction, the sheer verve of the virtuoso. Mr. Mitropoulos, in his massive control, was something of a virtuoso, too.

Still another virtuoso last night was Frank the propman, who was called in at an amusing snarl in the night's festivities. The knobs on Mr. Scarpini's piano bench failed to work.

The crowd began to enjoy the show when Mr. Mitropoulos stepped down from the podium and joined Mr. Scarpini. Both twirled the knobs, but the bench refused to rise. Finally Frank emerged, applied a quick expert touch and stalked off in a blaze of glory.

Mr. Mitropoulos opened the program with the Couperin-Milhaud "Prelude and Allegro" and followed it with a magnificent reading of Schumann's Second Symphony. It had the poet's touch—and the painter's, too.

WHEN the sound and fury had abated at the Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last night, what remained was a curious mixture of impressions.

The second half held the most interest, perhaps because of novelty more than anything else.

There was a new pianist in Pietro Scarpini, Italian by birth. Playing Prokofieff's second piano concerto for his debut, he proved to be as technically resourceful as the work is technically difficult.

He controlled its tremendous power with an assurance that stamped him as fine a musician as he is an excellent pianist.

To my taste he revealed neither the complete grasp of style nor the brilliant brittleness of touch necessary to do the music full justice.

Hardly an ingratiating work, this concerto leaves the soloist few pages for lyrical expression. Its pulsations throb too constantly. To remain abreast of these, however, is accomplishment itself. Scarpini caught the audience's fancy in doing so.

Fine Finale

Also by way of novelty there was a first American performance of Nicholas Skalkotas's "Greek Dances."

For all their suggestions of other composers, they provided a refreshing interval in spite of coming at the end of a program with a preponderance of loud playing. They qualify as quite acceptable for ending concerts.

Mitropoulos opened the evening with Couperin-Milhaud's brief prelude and allegro, "La Sultane" and Schumann's second symphony.

In performance, the latter acquired a loudness and an austerity hardly compatible with its inherent warmth and exhilarating qualities. Meticulous attention to detail detracted from its wholeness.

HEARING the Shostakovich Tenth Symphony a second time underlined the strong impression it made at its American premiere. This is a major symphonic work.

As Mitropoulos and the Philharmonic - Symphony played it last Saturday night, its substance grew on the listener and its meaning became clearer.

It appears most fortunate that Columbia has rushed production on a recording so that it may be released about the middle of this month.

This is a work that all music lovers will want to hear numerous times to appreciate. Its aspiration for peace may not be too readily grasped at first.

Knowing that this is the thought behind the music, however, helps explain the somber consideration embodied in the first and third movements as well as the introduction to the last.

Shostakovich has knit his music together with sufficient skill to hold the listeners' attention in spite of some lengthiness.

Those who have become familiar with Shostakovich's music will find that his Symphony bears the unmistakable stamp of the composer. It may be found in its rhythmic vitality, in the style of its melodies, and in the quality of its instrumentation.

In it are echoes of the First and Fifth symphonies, both of which have found a secure place in symphonic repertory. Yet there are creative freshness and intellectual growth to suggest that the composer is constantly moving forward.

Typical of Russian composers, Shostakovich makes the most of the dark hues in the lower registers of instruments, notably the cellos and the bassoons.

The focal point of the work apparently centers in the solo horn of the third movement whose theme proclaims the challenge to better things.

Mitropoulos and Elman in Russian Concert

By a curious coincidence, Dimitri Mitropoulos arranged for the second week of Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra concerts, Oct. 14 and 15, a program devoted to Russian composers which made three concerts (and including the Sunday program) four, by two major symphony orchestras devoted to Russian works. True enough, among these was a very important premiere, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 10 which would be "news" on any program. It was also news that Mischa Elman celebrated his 50th anniversary as a concert violinist, having appeared in Berlin in the first concert outside of his native land on Oct. 14, 1904. So his appearance with the Philharmonic-Symphony on this occasion was 50 years to the day.
